REVIEW OF REVIEWS

EDITED BY W. T. STEAD

VOLUME XX.

JULY-DECEMBER, 1899

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS

The Review of Reviews

EDITORIAL OFFICE: MOWBRAY HOUSE, NORFOLK STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PUBLISHED BY HORACE MARSHALL AND SON, 125, FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

MAR 2 8 1958

MAY 8 1900

INDEX TO PERIODICALS.

WITH the help of the ascertain in what Period and, as the more reconewer as well as the old no longer remain unexists at a price within the number of Librarians, Booksel the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and The Sixth, Seventh, and elaborated, are issued to the Literature of our time. The First, Second, 1891, 1893, and 1894, and and WITH the help of the ANNUAL INDEX, the student or writer can easily ascertain in what Periodicals he can read articles on almost any subject; and, as the more recent Magazines and Reviews are to be found in the newer as well as the old Public Libraries, these mines of current thought need no longer remain unexplored on the shelves with such a handy Key, issued at a price within the means of all.

The ANNUAL INDEX is universally admitted to be the best work in its line ever published, and "an absolutely indispensable work of reference" for Librarians, Booksellers, Journalists, Clergymen, and all Contributors to the Literature of our time.

The First, Second, Fourth, and Fifth Volumes, covering the years 1890, 1891, 1893, and 1894, are still to be had at 5s. each; or 5s. 6d. post free.

The Sixth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Volumes, being greatly enlarged and elaborated, are issued at 10s. nett.

Vol. I., covering the year 1890.

Vol. II., covering the year 1891.

Vol. 111., covering the year 1892. Vol. IV., covering the year 1893.

Vol. V., covering the year 1894.

5s. per Volume; or 5s. 6d. post free.

VOLUME VI., covering the year 1895, 10s. post free.

VOLUME VII., covering the year 1896, 10s. post free.

VOLUME VIII., covering the year 1897, 10s. post free.

VOLUME IX., covering the year 1898, 10s. post free.

VOLUME X., covering the year 1899, in preparation.

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE: MOWBRAY HOUSE, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

0001 8 YAM

IN

アとのどのどのどのどのどのどのどのどのどのどのどのどのどのどの

INDEX TO VOL. XX. OF REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

Abyssinia, see under Africa
Ae ial Navigation, see under Ballooning Africa (see also Egypt, Egypt and the Soudan):
Th. Transvaal and the War:
Sir Alfred Milner and the Transvaal, 1), 30, 43
The Topic of the Month, 2), 335
Olive Schreiner on the Crisis, 34
The Transvaal and the Peace Conference, 118
The Proposed Commission of Inquiry, 121
A Succ as for Mr. Chamberlain, 127
The Australian View of the Crisis, 128
Disbellei in War, 285
The Attitude of Cape Colony, 226, 227
The Wolf and the Lamb, 32-333
Naboth's Vineyard, 332, 363
Arbitration, 32-31
Public Meetings, 334
A Daniel (Edmund Garrett) Come to Judgment, 372
Mr. Chamberlain's Mistakes, 373
The Boers, 374, 375
Outbreak of the War, 435-438, 448
Mr. Chamberlain's Mistakes, 373
The Policy That led to the War, 474
Sidelights on the War, 479
The War in South Africa (with map and illustrations), 463
Maps of the Transval from Within, 'by J. P. FitzPatrick, 521
Other References, 11, 12, 43, 44, 113-121, 157-158, 225-227, 329-335, 372-375, 547-545, 525-535, 554-555, 574-577
English and Dutch in the Past, 578
The Cape Parliament, 488
Cecil Rhodes of Africa (illustration) 47 Anthropology: Big Skulls and Weighty Brains, 397 Abitration, International, see under Peace and Disarmament, etc. Architectural Review reviewed, 419, 630 Arctic Regions: Life in Nova Zembla, 282 rmies; The Police of the Empire, 343 War Preparations, 332 The Making of a Heavy Gun, 483 The Dum-Dum Bullet, 179 Gunnery Te ms, 579 Gunnery Te ms, 579
"The War of the Future," by Jean Bloch, 355
The Army as a School of Industry, 231
The Curse of Conscription, 312
Martid Soldiery, 57
Soldiers as Colonats, 161 rt:
A. H. Haig and His Art (illustrated), 56
Arthur Hopkins (illustrated), 60
Millet's Model (illustrated), 181
The 'National Art Comp rition, 378
Percy Robertson (illustrated), 392
How Statuse are made, 208 Percy Robertson illustrated), 392 How Statues are made, 398 The Art of Peter Graham, 499 Silve:points at the Continental Gallery (illustrated), 316 The Arts and Crafts Exibition, 1899, 630 Art Journal reviewed, 60, 64, 391, 332, 5 1

Art Journal Christmas Annual reviewed, 499
Art Journal Jubilæ Series reviewed, 56
Art in the Magazines, 56, 60, 64, 71, 101, 153, 181, 212, 284, 317, 378, 398, 399, 419, 423, 498, 499, 531, 515, 533, 630
Artist reviewed, 181, 378, 630
Artis and Craffs Exhibition, 630
Asia Minor, Past and Future, 73 Astronomy:
Is Laplace's Nebular Theory upset. 76
The November Meteors, 494, 591
Atlantic Monthly reviewed, 53, 74, 76, 156, 168, 185, 272, 290, 388, 405, Australian Crick 5, see under Cricket Austria-Hungary:
The Language Question, 442
Eggenburg Open Air Reformatory, 177
Vienna Hosp tal Scandal, 600
Austria, Empress Elizabeth of,—"The Martyrdom of an Empress," 89
Automobiles, see Motors, Autonomes, see motors
Bachelors, 57
Bahr-el-Ghazal, see under Africa
Bakeries: Socialistic Bakery in Belgium, 178
Balfour, Gerald, on Co-operation, 234
Ballooning and Aérial Navigation:
The Romance of the Air, 495
Wireless Telegraphy from Balloons, 382
Bavaria, Ludwig II. of, 526
Beauty's Awakening (Masquz), 159
Bearnaert, M., 11-12
Belfast, 278 Belfast, 278 B-lgium: The Electoral System, 11-12
B-lgium and the Bahs-1-Ghazal (with map, 441, 442
A Socialistic Bakery, 178
Birds: Is Grouse-Shooting humane? 176
Blackwood's Magazine reviewed, 63, 162, 176, 274, 289, 374, 377, 378, 285, 387, 410, 477, 577, 578, 601, 602, 603
Bloch's (Jean) "War of the Future," 355
Boers of South Africa, see under Africa
Bolivia: Ascent of Mount Sorata, 497
Book of the Month: Bolivia: Ascent of Mount Sorata, 497
Book of the Month:

"The Martyrdom of an Empress," 89
"Leo XIII." by J. de Narfon (illustrated), 197
"The Sccret History of the Oxford Movement," by Walter Walsh, 309
"A Prisoner of the Khaleefa," by Charles Neufeld (illustrated), 412
"One Hour and the Next," by Unchess of Sutherland, 517
"The Transval from Within," by J. P. FitzPatrick, 522
"The Map of Lée." by W. E. H. Lecky, 522
"Recollections," by Sir Algernon West (with portrait), 620
"That Reminds Me," by Sir Edw. Russell, 620 Books, New Publications, 95-99, 204-209, 312-315, 418-421, 523-531, 633-633
Boston (Mass.) Public Library, 159
Bourgeois, Léon, 146
Boy's Own Paper reviewed, 627
Brains: Big Skulls and Weighty Brains, 397
British Association at Dover and the French Association at Boulogne, 337
Browning's (Robert) "Two Poets of Croisic," 666
Burnah: Burmah: Lord Curzon and the Rangoon Outrage, 447
A Frenchwoman in Burmah, 595
By-Elections, see under Electoral Hy-Elections, see under Electoral Canada:
Cana atholic Church (see also Leo XIII.):
Plea for democratising the Papacy, 6a
The Next Pope and His Electors, 493
The Pope and the English Catholics, 444
The Pope and the Peacs Conference, x18
St. Hugh's Monastery, Parkminster, 275
Cardinal Newman on Catholic Crim., 283
The Gain to Rome from Mod.rn Science, 598

```
Central Asia, Russia and, see under Russia Century Magazine reviewed, 81, 263, 275, 379, 402, 486, 586, 614 Chamberlain, Joseph,
Biographical, etc., 395, 484
Mr. Chamberlain and the Kaiser, 548
Mr. Chamberlain and the Transvaal, see under Africa
Chaplin, Henry, on a Tax for Old Age Pensions, 234
Character Sketches:
Six Alfred Milner (illustrated) vo.
   Character Sketches:
Sir Alfred Milner (illustrated), 19
Ex-King Mil. nof Servia (illustrated), 129
The Tsarevi cin (Grand Duke George), by Erica Glenton (illustrated), 139
Alfred Dreyfus (illustrated), 247
Dr. F. E. Claik and the Christian Endeavour Movement (illustrated), 343
Cecil J. Rhodes (illustrated), 457
Andrew Carnegie (with portrait), 558
Harry Escombe, by X. X. (with portrait), 561
Cecil J. Rhodes, by Princess Radziwill (illustrated), 564 Children:
Child Lahope (by Sir Laho County)
       Child Labour (by Sir John Gorst), 69
Eggenburg Reformatory, 177
Wantsd—More Babies in France, 595
Chimneys: How Tall Chimneys are felled, 385 China:
                hina:
The Art and Mystery of the Concessionnaire, 582
British Policy in China, 12-13, 385
What ought to be done in China, 277
An All-British Railway to China, 272
Russia and China, 230, 385
The United States and China, 385
                The United States and China, 385
The Chinaman at Home, 478
The Yellow Peril, 583
The Yellow Hope, 623
Women's Dress in China, 286
Christian Endeavour Movement and Dr. F. E. Clark (illustrated), 343
       Christma Endeavour Movement and Dr. F. E. Chark (Industrated), 343
Christma reviewed, 627, 629
Church and Christ anity:
Dr. F. E. Clark and the Christian Endeavour Movement (illustrated), 343
      Dr. F. E. Clark and the Christian Endeavor
Robert Raikes and the Sunday School, 343
The New Reformation, 384
Nineteenth Century Christianity, 598
Church of England:
The Clerical Dole Bill, 123
The Romanisers and the Archbishops, 234
The "No Popery" Fuss, 338
The Hubbub in the Church, 387
Red Rivialists, 687
                Red Ritualists, 587
The Church Congress, 444
"The Secret History of the Oxford Movement," by Walter Walsh, 307
       The New Reformation, 384
Church Quarterly Review reviewed, 304, 481, 515, 606
Clark, Dr. Francis E., and the Christian Endeavour Movement (illustrated), 343
Clarke, Sir Edward, on the War in the Transvaal, 334
Clerical Dole Bill, 123
Colley, Gen., 591
Columbia: A Case of Arbitration, 440
      Columbia: A Case of Arbitration, 440
Colonies and the Empire:
The Real Motive for Expansion, 54
What English Imperialism means, 136
Ultimate World Folitics, 295
The Expansion of Empire, 495
Education and Imperialism, 464
Hooligan Imperialism, 581
England and South Africa, see under Africa
Soldiers as Colonists, 161
The Trouise as a Home for White Men. 168
             The Tropics as a Home for White Men, 165
      Communism in the Cotswolds, 177
Condition of the People (see also Housing, Labour, etc.):
            London's Grievances, 121
A Picture of East-End Life, 418
A Picture of East-End Life, 4:8
How to help the Aged Poor, 688
Charity in place of Out-Relief, 888
Conscription, see under Armies
Conservative Party: What makes Unionism dwindle? 162
Contemporary Review reviewed, 49, 50, 53, 6a, 65, 80, 172, 176, 180, 185, 270, 277, 283, 23, 206, 372, 380, 387, 400, 475, 479, 488, 490, 496, 507, 575, 581, 599, 600, 603, 605, 611
Contents of Periodicals, 101-111, 212-222, 317-326, 423-432, 533-544, 630-639
Cook, Capt., and His First Log, 399
Co-operative Movement, 234
Copyright in Speeches, 230
Corea, see Korea
Cornhill Magazine reviewed, 46, 56, 57, 59, 82, 180, 183, 190, 286, 298, 389, 399, 407, 483, 504, 508, 587, 589, 591, 608
Cricket:
Dr. W. G. Grace, 314
The Australian Cicketers in England, 235
Crime and Prisons:
 The Australian Cricketch in England, 235 Crime and Prisons:
The Revision of Criminal Trials, 61
The American Convict Lease System, 60
Eggenburg Reformatory, 177
Siberian Prisons, see under Russia
The Assassin of the Empress of Austria, 23x Crimean War, 456
Cromwell, Oliver, 65, 74, 486, 550, 586
```

```
Cuba: Regenerating Cuba, 98
Curzon, Lord, on the Fo:ward Policy in India, 227
      Damien, Father, 605
David Harum (Novel), 208
Death: The Dying of Death, 175
Delcasse, M., on Colonial Expansion, etc., 551
Denmark: Scandinavianism in Denmark, 607 Deterioration of the Race, 381
Deavey, Admiral, 335
Diamond-Making, 71
Diary: for Lune, 185; for Luly, 186; for August
      Diamond-Making, 71
Diamond-Muking, 72
Diary: for June, 15; for July, 126; for August, 238; for September, 340; for October, 448; for November, 556
Diplomaticus's Indiscretion, 584
Domestic Service, see Servant Question
Drama, see under Theatres and the Drama
               The Delirium of Dress, 289
Women's Dress in China, 286
      Dreyfus, Caps, and the Dreyfus Case, see under France Drink Question, see under Temperance and the Liquor Traffic
Dublin Review reviewed, 302, 514
Dum-Dum Bullet, see under Armies
      East-End of London, see under Condition of the People
Edinburgh Review reviewed, 71, 73, 260, 170, 189, 474, 475, 494, 498, 505, 512, 588, 597
Education (see also Universities, Technical Education):
University Extension and Priggishness, 46
Ireland's "Spiritual Nationality," 279
The Training of Our Social Officers, 284
Imperialism and Education, 446
Eggenburg Reformatory, 127
    Imperialism and Education, 446
Eggenburg Reformatory, 177
Egypt under Lord Cromer, 286
Egypt and the Soudan:

Desecration of the Mahdis' Tomb, 12
The Vanishing Khai'ffa, 441
End of the Khalifa, 555
Charles Neufeld; a P. isoner of the Khaleefa (illustrated), 411
The Bahr-el-Gharal, see under Africa
Glimpses of the Upper Nile, 505 Electoral:
Voting by Machinery, 200
             lectoral:
Voting by Machinery, 399
By-Elections, 12, 16, 127, 445, 448, 556
Edinburgh (South), 12, 16
Edinburgh (East), 12, 16
Vorkshire (Osgoldcross), 127
Oldbar (Osgoldcross), 127
                       Oldham (2), 127
St. Pancras (East), 127
    Bow and Bromley, 445, 448

Exeter, 556

Elephants in Africa, 287

Elepineering: Standardisation, 494

Engineering Magazine reviewed, 73, 168, 171, 173, 269, 282, 285, 306, 405, Engineering Magazine reviewed, 73, 106, 174, 173, 209, 282, 285, 492, 494, 502)
England an Oligarchy, 292
England an Oligarchy, 292
English History, see Cromwell, Crimean War
English Illustrated Magazine reviewed, 195, 476, 477, 491
English People: The Typical Englishman, 55
Ermack (Ice-Crushing Boat), 63
Escombe, Harry, Character Sketch, by X. X. (with portrait), 561 d'Estournelles, Baron, on Arbitration in the Transvaal Crisis, 330 Ethics:
"The Map of Life," by W. E. H. Lecky, 522
Evolution and the Mystery of Evil, 76
Etude reviewed, 102
European Alliances, Foreign and International Affairs, see Foreign Policy
Evolution and the Mystery of Evil, 76
Exhibition in 1900 at Paris, see Paris Exhibition Fainting, 56
Farming, see Agriculture
Feilden's Magazine reviewed, 269, 406
          British Novelists on Show, 59
 British Novelists on Show, 59
The Scot in Fiction, 388
Bret Harte on the Short Story, 59
Finance (see also Railways, Shipping, etc.):
Relative Taxation of Ireland and England, 270
England and the World's Landlord, 53
Export and Import: a Rosy View of English Trade, 279
American Locomotives for England, 272
         American Locomotives for England, 17
Is British Steel doomed?, 432
The Iron Trade, 492
The Tussle for Indian Trade, 285
Paradoxes of British Finance, 293
A Trade Intelligence Department, 379
A Real National Danger, 445
A Real National Danger, 445
Finland, 42, 395, 396
Fishes: Facts and Fancies about Them, 176
Fitchett, Dr., on the Transvaal, 158
Fitchett's (Dr.) "How England Saved Europe," 624
FitzPatrick's (J. P.) "The Transvaal," 521
Flying Machines, see under Ballooning Food and Food Supply;
Free Dinners for Wo kpeople, 282
London's Dinner, and Whence It comes, 500
```

Foreig

The The The

Fran Gen Fran Fran

Fortn 190, 576, Forum

Franc

AVPC

M. Dis

The The

Fra If I

The Fra Fra The The Wa

Sna

Free Free Frence 193 478

Gent

Geog Geog

Germ Germ Ge Th

De De Th

Te Ge Fri Ru Ge Ge

Gern Hi On Girl's

Glen Goet Gold

Ind Kl Good

Gors

Gove Grac Grah Grah Grea Grot Grou

Guia Ve Guin Hag Hag Haig

Hart Hay Hein Hills Hind Holk

Foreign and International Policy, European Alliances, etc...

Peace and Disarmament, the Peace Conference at the Hague, etc., see under Peace and Disarmament
The Coalition Nightmare, 271
The Powers and China, see under China
The United States and England, see under United States
France and England, 272
Germany and England, 435-436
France and Germany, 156, 231, 271
France and Germany, 156, 231, 271
France and Germany, 422
Russia and Germany, 442
Russia and the United States, 167, 487
Fortnightly Review reviewed, 45, 49, 55, 61, 68, 83, 157, 162, 168, 175, 184, Russia and the United States, 167, 487 fortnightly Review raviewed, 45, 499, 55, 61, 68, 83, 157, 162, 168, 175, 184, 190, 271, 274, 277, 284, 277, 373, 375, 378, 399, 403, 480, 495, 506, 516, 574, 576, 577, 580, 584, 590, 593, 603, 608, 613 Forum reviewed, 54, 58, 85, 111, 163, 165, 192, 279, 286, 293, 2)5, 302, 379, 386, 404, 478, 487, 511, 582, 583, 615 rance:
The Dreyfus Case:
Alfred Dreyfus; Character Sketch (illustrated), 241 Verdict, 335, 376-378
Pardon, 337, 376
Other References, 9, 121-122, 232, 274, 490
M. Guérin and the Siege of Fort Chabrol, 233
Disturbances in Paris, 232-3
Boycott of the Paris Exhibition, 336
The British Association at Dover and the French Association at Boulogne, 232 The British Association at Dover and the French Association The Waldeck-Rousseau Ministry (with portraits), 8-10 The Duc d'Orleans, Pretender, 337 The Orleanist Revolutionists, 443 France and England, 272 If France and England, 272 If France and Germany, 156, 231, 721 France and Germany, 156, 231, 721 France and Germany, 156, 231, 721 France and Africa, see under Africa The Curse of Conscription, 313 The Assistance Publique, 178 Wanted—More Babies, 595 Snapshots of French History, 524 Free Church Chronicle reviewed, 75 Free Dinners, 282 Free Dinners, 282
French Reviews reviewed, 61, 67, 77, 83, 86, 87, 88, 161, 167, 173, 178, 191, 133, 194, 105, 238, 211, 287, 290, 256, 277, 303, 304, 305, 378, 407, 408, 478, 501, 513, 514, 585, 595, 597, 599, 604, 610, 617, 618, 619, 625, 626, 62) Gentleman's Magazine reviewed, 47, 74, 168, 181, 222, 345, 617, 623. Geographical Journal reviewed, 63, 85, 175, 500, 592 Geography, Bibliography of, 604 German Reviews reviewed, 75, 83, 601, 603 Germany: ermany:
Germany and the Peace Conference, 4-6
The Penal Servitude Bill, 10
Defeat of the Kaiser's Canal Scheme, 230
Defeat of the Penal Servitude Bill, 550
The Making of Modern Germany, 32
Technical Education, 445
Germany and England, 435-436, 548
France and Germany, 156, 231, 271
Russia and Germany, 156, 231, 271
Russia and Germany, 143 France and Germany, 150, 321, 271
Russia and Germany, 442
Germany and the Caroline Islands (with map), 10
Germany and the Samoan Islands (with map), 440, 441, 548, 552
Germany, Emp-ror William II. of,
His Visit to England, 548, 549
On the Valour of the French Soldiers, 231 Girl's Own Paper reviewed, 627
Girl's Realm reviewed, 527
Girl's Realm reviewed, 52, 66, 77, 163, 170, 271, 306, 386, 587
Glenton, Erica, on the Tsarevitch (Grand Duke George), (illustrated), 139
Goethe, 232
Gold Mines: Gold Mines:
Increase in the Yield of Gold, 173
Klondike, see under Yukon Region
Good Words reviewed, 82, 166, 23, 457, 482, 495, 608, 618
Gorst, Sir John, on Child Labour, 63
Government Waste-Paper Basket, 390 Grace, Dr. W. G., 314 Graham, Peter, Artist, 499 Grahame, Miss, Tiger-Hunter (illustrated), 534 Great Thoughts reviewed, 284 Grotius, 3 Grouse-Shooting, 176 Guiana, B itish, and the Venezuelan Boundary Arbitration, see under Venezuela Guinness Trust, 184 Haggard, Rider, and "The Farmer's Year," 287, 393
Hague Conference, see under Peace and Disarmament
Haig, Axel H., Artist (illustrated), 56
Harmsworth Magazine reviewed, 60, 190, 275, 235, 385, 390, 410, 507
Harper's Monthly Magazine reviewed, 70, 276, 315, 490, 497 Harper's Monthly Magazine reviewed, 70, 270, 315, 497, 497
Harte, Bret, 52
Hayti: Assassination of President Heureaux of San Domingo, 123
Heine, Heinrich, 74, 60t
Hillman, Adolf, Sp. nish Writer, 75
Hildusism, see under India ontand: The Peace Conference at the Hague, see under Peace and Disarmament English and Dutch in the Past, 578

Hooligan Imperialism, 581 Hooligan Life, 97 Homes for Homeless Gentlewomen, 289 Homes for Homeless Gentlewomen, 289
Hope, Anthony, 418
Hopkins, Arthur, Artist (illustrated), 60
Hospital Scandals in Vienna, 600
Housing of the Working Classes:
The Abodes of the Homeless, 57
What the Guinness Trust has done, 184
Municipal Buildings in Shoreditch, 530
Rowton Houses, 68
Hull House, Chicago, 46
Humaur:
Humour: Humour:
The Comic Immortals, 74
Humour; Its Place and Function, 388
Cockney Humour, 602 Ice-Crushing Boats, 63 Illustrations (see also Portraits); Caricatures, 11, 226, 228, 336, 355, 361, 470, 471, 548, 532, 625; and Supplement. The Cromwell Statue, 546 'Kew Bridge, 331
"An Old German Mill," by A. H. Haig, 56
Pencil Study, by A. Hopkins, 60
Millet's Studio, 281 Millet's Studio, 181
Shere, 322
Shere, 325
Silverpoints, by Charles Sainton, 516
Christmas Books, 526, 52)
The Skamrock, 124
The Columbia, 446
Chocolate Box from the Queen to the Troops in South Africa, 557
The Australian Cricket Team, 13
Miss Grahame, Tiger-Hunter (illustrated), 594
The Christian Endeavour Convention at Detroit, 350, 351, 353
The British Delegates to the Peace Conference at the Hague, 114
The Austro-Hungarian Delegates to the Peace Conference, 148
Leading Journalists at the Hague Conference, 148
Leading Journalists at the Hague Conference, 200
The Peace Conference at Christianis, 253, 260, 261, 263, 266, 268
Christiani, 353, 260, 261, 262, 365, 268
The Norwegian National Anthem, 265
L'lle du Diable, 10
The Dreyfis Case, 224, 240, 249, 253
The Kaiser at St. Privat, 231
The Vatican, 109 The Vatican, 199 St. Peter's and the Vatican, 203 The Devil's Bridge, Abastouman, 139
Palace of the Grand Duke Alexander at Abastoum in, 141 Palace of the Oracle Duke Arkander at Abastoni Sanatorium, Abastouman, 143 Queen Tamara's Castle, Caucasus, 142 The Venezuelan Arbitration Commission, 7, 438 The Flag of Khalifa Sheriff, 415 The Nile, near Cairo, 23 Sir Alfred Milner at Bloemfontein, 24, 25 Delagoa Bay, 333 Delingua Day, 333
Pretoria, 333
Fretoria, 357
Johannesburg, 359
Mr. Rhodes's Old Claim at Kimberley, 454
Diamond Mines, Kimberley, 455
Mr. Rhodes's Farm in the Matoppos, 456
Groot Schuur, Mr. Rhodes's Residence, 458, 462, 566 Groot Schuur, Mr. Rhodes's Residence, 458, 462, 566
Ladysmith, 466
Maleking, 469
Armoured Engine at Mafeking, 469
Imperial Institute and London University, 123 Imperialism, see under Colonies Independence Day, 3
Index to British and American Periodicals, 18,8, 96, 207, 284
Index to German Periodicals, 284
India: idia:
Lord Curzon and the Forward Policy, 227
Famine in India, 445
The Malthusian Problem in India, 228
The Tussle for Indian Trade, 285
A National Church for India, 600
The Subconscious Hindu Mind, 180 Ingersoll, Robert G. (with portrait), 394
Insurance, National,—Old Age Pensions:
Unionists on Old Age Pensions, 50
Old Age Pensions and Organised Lapour, 237 Ireland: Relative Taxation of Ireland and England, 170
The Unionist Party, see under Conservative Party
A National Convention, 234
Ireland's "Spiritual Nationallty" (Education', 17)
The American and the Irish Spirit, 16)
The Port of Belfast, 276
Irish Monthly reviewed, 75
Iron Trade, 422 Iron Trade, 4)2 Italian Reviews reviewed, 84, 192, 305, 40), 515, 616, 61) The Pope and the Peace Conference, 118
The Industrial Regeneration of Italy, 285
Italian Captains of Agriculture, 3)4
Marble Quarries of Carrara, 601

```
Jupan :
Will the Press supersede Parliament ? 70
                    Russia and Japan, 580
panese Literature, 182
                  The Dreyfus Case, see under France
Max Nordau on the Jews, 51
Jew-Baiting in the United States Navy, 275
Mark Twain on the Jew Problem, 276
The Zionist Movement, 233, 602
A New Palestine for a Restored Israel, 295
Jernalism:
The Capitalist Press Gag, 554
Will the Press supersede Parliament? 70
Plans for a Christian Daily, 65
The Grave of Seven Days Journalism, 67
The Chief Newspapers of Europ2, 503
July 4, 3
           July 4, 3
        F.ew Bridge (illustrated), 391
. ipling, Rudyard, 555
l issing; Its Origin and Extension, 174
klond ke, see under Yukon Region Knowledge reviewed, 397
Korea: Russia and Koreas, 330
Kruger, President, and the Transvaal, see under Africa
     London:
Kew Bridge (illustrated), 391
London a Century Ago, 449
Superstitions about "the City," 603
Life of the People in London, see under Condition of the People, etc.
London Season, 1899, 610
London Local Government Bill, 1899, 14; Map, 184
       London Local Government Bill, 1829, 14; Map, 184
London Letter, 315
London Ouarterly Review reviewed, 466, 510
London Ouarterly Review reviewed, 466, 510
London University at the Imperial Institute, 123
Longman's Magazine reviewed, 164, 287, 234, 333, 334, 485, 533
Lord Chamberlain as Censor of the Stage, 281
Lyall, Edna, 391
       McClure's Magazine reviewed, 979
Mack anzie, Rev. John, 488
Macmillan's Magazine reviewed. 174, 479, 420, 577
Maeterlinck, Maurice, on the Modern Drama, 180
Magazine of Art reviewed, 71, 378, 515, 627
Manchester; The John Rylands Library, 584
Manchester; The John Rylands Library, 584
Maps:
London according to Local Government Act, 1839, 184
Bahr-el-Ghazal, 441
Transvaal, etc., 354, 365, 468, 568
The Alaskan Boundary, 125
British Guiana and Venezuelan Arbitration, 333, 433
Germany's Possessions in the Western Pacific, 10
Samoan Islands, 440
Marble Quarries of Carrara, 601
Marriage and Marrivge Customs:
Marriage and Marrivge Customs:
Marriage Gustoms in the Philip; ine Islands, 583
Marniage Customs in the Philip; ine Islands, 583
Milan, Ex-King of Servia, see under Servia
Millet, J. F., and His Model (illustrated), 181
Millet, J. F., and His Model (illustrated), 181
Millonaires noticed, see Carnegie (Andrew), Rhodes (C. J.)
Milner, Sir Alfred,
Character Sketch (illustrated), 19
Sir Alfred Milner and the Transvaal, see under Africa
Mithra, Cult of, 77
Monastery of St. Hugh, Parkminster, 275
Monstery of St. Hugh, Parkminster, 275
Monstery of St. Hugh, Parkminster, 275
Monstery of St. Hugh, Parkminster, 275
        Maps:
```

```
Month reviewed, 598
Morley, John,
The Greatest of Nonconformists, 379
                  On Cromwell, 486, 586
Motors: The Rival Auto-Motors, 398
Mountaineering: Ascent of Mount Sorata, 497
Muravieff, Count, 442, 584
              Music: Wanted—an English Bayreuth, 166
Singing on the River, 66
The Norwegian National Anthem, 265
Music in the Magazines, 66, 166, 192
                Narfon's (J. de) "Leo XIII." (illustrated), 177
Natal, see under Africa
Nat onal Review reviewed, 48, 50, 52, 64, 66, 73, 156, 158, 177, 187, 272, 277, 28, 277, 378, 381, 387, 402, 479, 481, 510, 60)
Natural History, (see also Fishes, Birds, Elephants, Tigers, Sport):
Chivalry among Animals, 539
          Natural History, (see also Fishes, Birds, Elephants, Tigers, Sport): Chivalry among Animals, 529
Navies:
The Cash Value of the British Navy, 170
Jew-Baiting in the United States Navy, 275
Négrier, Gen., 122
Neufeld's (Charles) "A Prisoner of the Khaleefs" illustrat.d', 411
New Century Review e-viewed, 436
New Century Review e-viewed, 439
New Zealand Experiments, 605
New England Magazine reviewed, 349
New Zealand Experiments, 605
Newman, Cardinal, on Catholic Crime, 283
Neiszsche, Friedrich, 596
Nigra, Count, 116
Nile River, see under Egypt and the Soudan Nineteenth Century:
When does the Nin-teenth Century end? 75
Heine and the Nineteenth Century, 74
Nineteenth Century reviewed, 45, 50, 67, 63, 70, 81, 111, 183, 186, 272, 284, 288, 291, 299, 374, 377, 384, 385, 387, 407, 476, 480, 482, 485, 508, 574, 576, 578, 579, 580, 585, 588, 531, 508, 600, 612, 620
North American Review reviewed, 46, 51, 70, 84, 1537, 161, 167, 172, 2°0, 281, 289, 235, 201, 375, 385, 390, 394, 398, 405, 477, 420, 512, 587, 58
Norway:
The Struggle for Independence, 443
              539, 598, Norway:
The Struggle for Independence, 443
The Inter-Parliamentary Peace Conference at Christiania (illustrat.d., 25)
The Norwegian National Anthem, 265
Nova Zembla, see under Russia Novels, see Fiction
            Obituary, 17, 127, 233, 341, 449, 557
Old Age Pensions, see Insurance (National)
Orleanists, see under France d'Orleans, Duc, French Pretender (with portrait), 337
d'Orleans, Charlotte Elizabeth, Duch.sse, 283
Over-Man Philosophy, 5, 5
Over-Man Philosophy, 5, 5
Oxford Movement, see under Church of England
Oxiond Movement, see Sanda, Philippine Islands, Samoan Islands Palestine:

The Zionist Movement, 233, 603
A New Palestine for a Restored Israel, 235
Pall Mall Magazine reviewed, 47, 79, 164, 166, 174, 278, 377, 497, 503, 617
Papacy, see under Catholic Church
Paris Exhibition in 1900 boycotted, 336
Parkminster; St. Hugh's Monastery, 275
Parliamentary (s e also Electoral, Cons.rvative Party):
Diary for June, 16; for July, 127; for August, 233; for October, 449
England on Oligarchy, 232
Will the Press supersede Parliament? 70
Pauncefote, Baron, 233, 393
Pauperism and the Poor Law:
Old Age Pensions, see Insurance (National)
How to help the Aged Poor, 588
Charity in place of Out-Relief, 588
The French Assistance Pu lique, 178
Peace and Disarmament:
The Tsar's Rescript and the Conference at the Hague:
The Principle of A bitration, 4-6, 47, 152
At the Hague: a Month's Doings and Sayings, 37
What has been done at the Conference, 145
A Plen for International Picnics illustrated), 257
The Art tration Convéntion signed, 437
Other References, 3-6, 16, 46, 115-119, 126, 223, 2-10, 489, 502, 500
The Inter-Parliamentary Conference at Christiani illustrated), 259
The Alaska Arbitration, see Alaska
The Venezuelan Arbitration, see Venezuela Arbitration in the Tanswalf C isis, 320-331
"The War of the Future," by Jean Bloch, 255
Pearson's Magazine reviewed, 63, 64, 195, 307, 382 Periodicals:
Ind.xes to Periodicals, see Indexes
Ind
                Pacific Islands, see Caroline Islands, Philippine Islands, Samoan Islands
```

Pro

Ra Rei Re

Phil Pho

AAABB

Philosophy of the Over-Man, 5 % Photography:
The Work of J. Caswall Smith, 64 Telephotography, 382 Plague, 501 Poems:
"The Hunting of the Boer," by Joe Jingo, Junr., 371
"Britannia's Picaninny," by Lynn Lyster, 364 Poet Lore reviewed, 606
Poetry in the Magazines, 99, 233, 377, 576, 614
Poland, Russia and, 339 Poland, Russia and, 339 Portraits:
Abdullah Pasha, 5
Aberdeen, Countess of, 2
Alg.r, R. A., 233
Allen, Grant, 447
Baer, Mr., 347
Bonheur, Rosa, 78
Buller, Sir Redvers, 434
Caillaux, M., 8
Camegie, Andrew, 538
Camimar-Périer, Mi, 448
Centra, Plo, 137 Milner, Sir Alfred, 18, 20, 22
Napoleon, 624
Négrier, Gen., 122
Neufeld, C., 411
Newton, Alfred J., 448
d'Orléans, Duc, 337
Paudin, Pierre, 8
Pausacefore, Sir Julian, 117
Peary, Lieut., 340
Peoci, Countess, 108
Picquart, Col., 248
Plumer, Col., 473
Powell, Lieut.-Col. Baden, 473
Private, Private, 123 Catimire Pétier, Wi, v48
Centra, Pio, 137
Chaplin, Rev. K., 347
Chaplin, Rev. K., 347
Clark, Dr. F. E., 342
Clarke, Sir Edw., 328
Coanda, Col., 5
Decrais, M., 8
Demange, Maltre, 224, 242
Drupty, Jean, 8
Escombe, Harry, 562
Esterhazy, Major, 246
d'Estournelles, Baron, 117
Farrer, Lord, 449 Priaulx, Private, 225 Rhodes, Cecil J., 450, 452, 453, 459, Rhodes, Geal J., 450, 452, 433, 459, 460 Robertson, J. Forbes, 64 Rogers, F., 356 Root, Elihu, 323 Rosebery, Lord, 521 Russia, Tar Nicolas II. of, 146 Russia, Grand-Du'ce Alexander of, Russia, Grand-Duke Ackander on, 141
Russia, Tsarevitch (Grand-Duke George) of, 140
Salisbury, Lord, 72
Salisbury, Lord, 72
Salisbury, Lord, 78
Samoa, Ex-King Matanafa of, 556
Schreiner, Olive, 94, 331
Servia, King Alexander of, 132, 134
Servia, King Milan of, 128, 134, 126 d'Estournelles, Baron, 117
Farrer, Lord, 449
Gallifer, Miarquiss de, 9
Gatacre, Gen, 570
G-many, Emproro 6, 436
Greene, Conyngham, 238
Guérin, M., 341
H-sssaptschieff, Major, 5
Holland, Queen Wilhelmina of, 144
Ingersoll, Col., R. G., 334
Johnston, Sir H. H., 235
Joubert, Gen., 22
Kruger, President, 28
Labori, Maltre, 232, 251
Labori, Mdme, 248
Laness-2au, M. de, 8
Larare, Bernárd, 254
Leo XIII., Pope, 196, 198
Lund, John, 257 5.Frvi, Ex-Aing Milan of, 128
136
Servis, Queen Natah; of, 130
Shaw, Mr., 347
Sipyagui, D. S., 555
Stanciof, Dimitri, 5
Steen, M., 262
Svampa, Cardinal, 200
Symons, Gen., 467
Vanderbilt, Cardinal S., 201
Voulet, Capt., 443
Walker, Gen. Sir F. F., 227
Waters, Chas., 347
Waters, Chas., 347
West, Sir Algemon, 620
White, Gen., 465
Wingate, Col. F., 555 Lund, John, 257 McCrae, G., 15 Macdonald, Rev. F. W., 126 Martens, Prof., 119 Massingham, H. W., 554 Massingham, H. W., 554
Mercier, Gen., 245
Methuen, Lord, 571
Meyer, Rev. F. B., 332
Mi lerand, M., 8
Portuguess Magazines reviewed, 53
Practical Teacher reviewed, 422
Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review reviewed, 99 Prisons, see under Crime
Progress of the World, with Dirry, Maps, and Illustrations: in June, 3: in July, 115: in August, 225: in September, 327; in October, 435: in November, 547
Prohibition, see under Temperance and the Liquor Traffic Prose, see under Literature
Psychology: Women and Emotions, 456
Public-House Reform, see under Temperance and the Liquor Traffic Puritan reviewed, 65, 162, 171, 180, 26), 481, 512 Puritanism, 65, 586 Quarterly Review reviewed, 74, 164, 168, 179, 188, 474, 475, 489, 491, 493, 500, 504, 50) Que.n Victoria, see Victoria (Qusen) Qusensland, see under Australia Quiver reviewed, 338, 438, 624, 627 Radziwill, Princess, on Cecil Rhodes allustrated), 564 Raikes, Robert, and the Sunday School, 343 Railways: Railways:
American Locomotives for England, 171
Russian Railway Policy in Asia, 380
The Si serian Railway, 172
An All-British Railway to China, 272
A Railway across the Sahara, 173
The Cape to Cairo Railway, see under Africa
Rangoon, see under Burmah
Reformatories: Egg:nburg Open Air Reformatory, 177
Review of Reviews: Ten Years of Modern History, Supplement
Review of Reviews (America) reviewed, 78, 495, 502
Review of Reviews (America) reviewed, 78, 55, 277, 401, 610
Reviews Reviews (Arstralasia) reviewed, 79, 55, 277, 401, 610
Reviews Reviews (Asstralasia) reviewed, 79, 55, 277, 401, 610
Reviews Reviews (Asstralasia) reviewed, 79, 515, 277, 401, 610

Rhodes, Cecil J.,
Character Sketch illustrated), 451
An Impression, by Princess Radravill illustrated', 564
Robertson, Percy, Arist (illustrated'), 392
Rome, Ancient, and Its Fall, 597
Romish Church, see Catholic Church
Rosebery, Lord,
Lord Rosebery and the Premieral ip, 163
A Palmerston—with Nerves, 68
Palmerston—with Nerves, 68
Palmerston—with Nerves, 68 A Palmerston—with Nerves, 68
Our Dark Horse in a Loose Box, 485
On Cromwell, 550
On the Housing Question, 550
Round-About reviewed, 83, 164, 315, 406, 550
Rowton Houses, 68
Royal Family (see also York (Prince Edward of)):
The Relaxations of Royalty, 54
Royal Magazine reviewed, 65, 68, 169, 294, 306, 389, 406, 509, 611
Russell's (S.r Edward) "That Reminds Me," 620
Russell's (S.r Edward) "That Reminds Me," 620 Russia:

The Tsar's Rescript and the Conference at the Hagus, see under Peace and Disarmament Count Muravieff and the Transvaal, 584
Russ a and Poland, 33
Russia and Finland, 43, 3)5, 3,6
Russia and Finland, 43, 3)5, 3,6
Russia and Foreign Shipping, 168
Life in Nova Zembla, 282
The Samoyads of No a Zembla, 577
France and Russia, 231
Russia and Germany, 442
Russia and Germany, 442
Through Siberia, 597
The Penal Settlements of Siberia, 507
The Pinal Settlements of Siberia, 507
The Siberian Railway, 172, 230
Russian Railway Policy in Asia, 380
Russian Railway Policy in Asia, 380
Russian Railway Russia, 30
Russian Railway Russia, 30 Kussian Turkestan, 183, Russia and China, see under China Russia and China, see under China Russia and Korea, 230 Russia and Japan, 883 Plea for a Russo-American Understanding, 167, 487 Russia, 78a Ticolas II. of, and the Conference at the Hague, see under Peace and Disarmament Peace and Disarmament
Russia, Tsaritsa of, 392, 587
Russia, Tsaritsa of, 392, 587
Russia, Tsarevitch (Grand Duke George) of,
Character Sketch, by Erica Glenton illustrated), 133
Dath of the Tsarevitch, 123
Russia, Grund-Duke Michael of, 123
Russia, Greviews reviewed, 183, 272
Rylands (John) Library at Manchester, 584 Sahara, see under Africa Salisbury, Lord, on the Samoan Agreement, the Transvaal War, etc., 552 Salisbury, Lady, 123 Samoan Islands; Salisbury, Lady, 123
Samoan Islands:
Germany and the Samoan Islands with map), 440, 441, 548, 552
England and Samoa, 552, 577
San Domingo, see under Hayti
Scandinaviana Reviews retired, 75, 182, 283, 335, 396, 478, 602, 607
Schreiner, Olive, on the Transvaal, 34
Science (see also Astronomy, Natural History, etc., etc.):
Applied Science, 383
The Gain to Rome from Modern Science, 5,8
Scottish Ceographical Magazine reviewed, 482, 532
Scottish Landscap: in Art, 439
Scottish Landscap: in Art, 439
Scottish Review reviewed, 285
Scribner's Migazine reviewed, 88, 382, 503, 605
Servant Quistion, 279
Servia, Ex-King Milan of,
Character Sketch (Illustrated), 12)
A Worthless King, 539
Attempted Assassination of Milan, 122
S.ttlements: The Robert Browning Settlement at Walworth, 210
Shik sspeare's Income, 606
Sheldon, Rev. C. M., 65
Shepscombe Communistic Colony, 177 Shere, illustrated), 37 Shepscombe Communistic Colony, 177 Shere illustrated), 34
Si.pping and Shipb ilding:
Si.pping and Shipb ilding:
A Rosy View of Fnglish Trade, 279
Russia and Foreign Shipping, 168
The Ice-Crushing 3 rat, 52
The Ocean Steamship of 1933, 391 Siberia, see under Russia
Sioging, see under Music
Smith, J. Caswall, Photographer, 64
Sociology (see also Condition of the People, Pauperism, Labour Problems, etc.):
Communication in the Cotswalds, 127 etc.):
Communism in the Cotswolds, 177
Applied Soci dism in France and Belgium, 178
Songs: The Norwegian National Anthem, 265
Sorata, Mount, Ascent of, 477
Soudan, ase Egypt and the Soudan
South Af les, see under Africa pain; The United States War with Spain, see Cuba, Philippine Islands Germany and the Caroline Islands, see Caroline Islands Russia and Spain, 442 Is Grouss-Shooting humane? 176

277.

5.4. 2°0, 58),

25)

Sport—continued.

Big Game in Central Africa, 205
Tiger-Hunting by a Lady (illustrated), 594
Spurgeon, Rev. C. H., Autobiographical, 95
Staal, M. de, 115
Standardisation in Engineering, 494
Statutes; How They are made, 338
Steel Industry, 422
Stevenson, Robert Louis, 503, 605
Stories from the Magazine, 183, 24, 38), 504, 608
Strand Magazine reviewed, 211, 536
Studio reviewed, 321, 426, 616, 610 Strand Magazine reviewed, 211, 536
Studio reviewed, 25, 47, 616, 630
Sugar: West Indiu Sugar, 58
Sunday at Hom: reviewed, 66, 99, 195, 605, 637
Sunday Magazine reviewed, 73, 234, 488, 504, 582, 640
Sunday Question: Seven Days' Journalism, 67
Sunday Schools and Robert Raikees, 434
Sutherland's (Duchess of) "One Hour and the Next," 517
Swinburne, A. C., and His Sonnet on the War with the Transvaal, 444
Szczepanik, Jan, 382

Technical Education: A Real National Danger, 445 Telegraph: Wireless Telegraphy from Balloons, 382 Teleictroscope, 382 Telegraph: Wireless Telegraphy from Balloons, 38a Telelectroscope, 38a
Telephotography, 38a
Temperance and the Liquor Traffic:
Against "Letting Off" the Drunkard, 6a
Charles Booth on Public House Reform, 27o
Does Prohibition prohibit; 38o
Temple Bar reviewed, 18, 187, 289, 293
Temple Bar reviewed, 189, 69, 293
Temple Mag wine reviewed, 159, 607
Ten Years of Progress; Supplement
Thackeray, W. M., 420, 625
Theatres and the Drama:
The Lord Chamberlain and the Drama, 28t
The Future of English-Speaking Drama, 497
M. Maeterlinck on the Modern Drama, 180
Tiger-Hunting by a Lady (illustrated), 594
Topic of the Month:
War or Peace with the Transvaal (illustrated), 29
What must follow the Peace Conference? 145
A Plea for International Picnics (illustrated), 377
Shall We let Hell loose in South Africa? (with map and illustrations), Shall We let Hell loose in South Africa? (with map a 355

Mr. Chamberlain's War (with map and illustrations), 463
The War in South Africa (with map), 569
Trade, see Finance, etc.
Trad's Unionist reviewed, 603
Transvall, see under Africa
Trevelyan, Sir Gsorgs, on the American Revolution, 169
Tropics as a Home for White Men, 165
Turkestan, Russian, 289
Turkey: Asia Minor, Past and Present, 73
Turner Exhibition at the Guildhall, 71
Twain, Mark, 276

Uitlanders of the Transvaal, see under Africa Unionist Party, see Conservative Party United Service M gazine reviewed, 47 United States: Jnited States:
Australian and American Federations compared, 493
November Elections, 553
Tammany triumphant in New York, 553
Voting by Machinery, 399
The Alaska Arbitration (with map), 125, 440
Anti-English Americans, 22), 335
America and England, 478
The British Embassy in Washington, 333
Plea for a Russo-American Understanding, 167, 487 United States—continued.

The War with Spain, see under Cubn, Philippine Islands Reception of Admiral Dewey, 335
The Real Motives for Expansion, 54
America and China, see under China
Curious Cycle in American Wheat, 64
American Locomotives for England, 171
Youth in Command of American Industry, 172
Klondike, see under Yukon Region
Five Years of American Progress, 580
The "White Negro" in the United States, 288
Negro Slavery, 585 The "White Negro" in the United States, 228
Negro Slavery, 363
Jew-Baiting in the Navy, 275
The Convict Lease System, 60
Boston Public Library, 159
The American Motor-Man, 392
A German Estimate of Americans, 604
A merican History, see American History
American-Language and Literature, see American Language.
Universities: London University at the Imperial Institute, 123

Venezuela and the British Guiana Boundary Arbitration, 6, 438-440, 516; Maps, 339, 439
Victoria, Queen,
Stories of the Queen, 163
The Queen as Housekeeper, 164
Vienna Hospital Scandals, 600
Voting by Machinery, 339

Walsh's (Walter) "Secret History of the Oxford Movement," 307 Walworth: A New Centre of Social Help for the New Borough, 210 War (see also Armies):

The Peace Conference at the Hague, see under Peace and Disarmament

"The War of the Future," by Jean Bloch, 255

ment
"The War of the Future," by Jean Bloch, 255
Ward, Mrs. Humphry, 384
Waster-Paper Basket in Government Offices, 390 Wealth, Gospel of,—Millionaires and Rich Men noticed, see Carnegie (Andrew), Rhodes (C. J.), Rylands (John)
Wedding Customs, see under Marriage
West's (Sir Algernon) "Recollections," 620
West Indies (see also Cuba, Hayti):
The Sugar Problem, 58
Hurricane, 235
Westminster Review reviewed, 82, 166, 190, 300, 375, 410, 576, 614
Whiteing, Richard, 523
Windsor Magazine reviewed, 82, 166, 190, 300, 375, 410, 576, 614
Wit and Humour, see Humour
Woman at Home reviewed, 54, 125, 594
Women and Women's Work:
The Peers and Women Councillors for London, 14
The International Women's Congress in London, 14
The International Women's Congress in London, 14, 45, 280
The Reverses of Britomart, 70
What degrades Domestic Service, 273
Homes for Homeless Gentlewomen, 283
Women and Emotions, 456
Women in China, 286

Women in China, 286 Woman in Central Africa, 63 Women's Dress, see Dress Yachting: The American Cup, 235 York, Prince Edward of, 66 Young Man reviewed, 395, 666 Young Woman reviewed, 391, 392, 579 "Youth loved a Maiden," by Heine, 601 Yukon Region, 187, 204

Zionist Movement, see under Jews Zola, Emile, in England, 207

The Annual Subscription

LEKEKKEKE EKEKEKEKEKEKEKEKEKEKEKE

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS

8s. 6d. post free to any part of the World.

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, L'MITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.

Der W SCENE

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

SIZING TA (JUNE.) TE BHT ALL

I.—THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

Ulk.]

Neue Glühlichter.]
THE "ANGEL OF PEACE" AT WORK.

Der Wahre Jacob.] [Stuttgart. :SCENE AT THE ENTRANCE TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

Life.] (New York THE "ANGEL OF PEACE" AT THE HAGUE.

THE CHAIRMAN.

A German View of the Peace Conference.

Lustige Blatter.] [Berlin.
THE NEWEST ILLUSION! IN THE SPECIALISTS' THEATRE

II.—THE TRANSVAAL CRISIS.

Picture-Politica.

A DARK RABBIT IN A LOOSE BRIER-PATCH.

Brer Rabbit (Kruget) wonders what Brer Fox (Chamberlain) gwine ter do now.

Judy.] [May 31., A SITUATION THAT MAY TURN OUT "BAD FOR THE COO!"

South African Review.]

KRUGER'S STUBBORNNESS BRITANNIA'S DIFFICULTY.

Westminster Budget.]

[June 23.

THE CATERPILLAR THAT WON'T.

The farmers in one of the Eastern States of America have found out that if they blow horns and trumpets under their fruit trees the caterpillar tumble to the ground and can be destroyed with ease. Mr. Chamberlain wishes he could do the same with the Oom Caterpillar, which declines to tumble.

"Have a care, Paulus, or the wind will blow your light out."

Birmingham Weekly Mercury.]

[May 5.

[June 3.

THE OF SOME SAME THE PARTY

III.-FRENCH "AFFAIRES."

Lustige Blätter.]

lars

[Berlin.
AT THE "ÎLE DU DIABLE."

THE MASTER OF THE ISLAND: "They take away one Captain from me; but look here, a whole handful of Generals! Oh, after all the arrangement is not so bad!"

THE REPUBLIC: "You see, my friend, one does not need to be a Hercules in order to clear away all this dirt" (the General Staff).

Birmingham Weekly Mercury.]

FRANCE, INTENT ON A CHANGE OF GOVERNMENT: "WHICH SHALL IT BE?"

Amsterdammer.]

[Amsterdam.

THE LAST PHASE OF THE DREYFUS CASE.

Justice takes Dreyfus into her car.

Nebelspalter.]

[Zürich.

FRANCE: "A stone has been rolled off my heart now that this fellow has been swept out."

Judge.]

THE FILIPINO'S FIRST BATH.

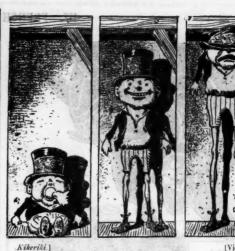

McKinley: "Oh, you dirty boy!"

BOTH: "It may be well to put the muzzle (Anglo-Russian Treaty) on, but you will pardon me if I refuse to shut my eyes."

A scene in the St. Stephen's Military Tournament during the debate on the grant to Lord Kitchener.

AMERICAN "EXPANSION."

(1) BROTHER JONATHAN: "Yes! I wish to grow."

(2) "You see how large I am? Well, I wish to continue growing

(3) — "Hullo!" What's up!"

THE OPEN DOOR IN CHINA.

RUSSIA: "What's the matter, John? Of course the door is open."

KITCHENER'S REWARD.

JOHN BULL: "IT (the Mahdi's head) is very ghastly, I admit,
Mr. Morley, but it shall not stop me from rewarding merit!"

ozig.

Photograph ly]

LADY ABERDEEN,

[Lafayette, Ltd.

President of the International Council of Women.

Held in London, June 26th to July 5th, 1899.

bein birth outs Day feren and the (tions 0.1 bass deliv upor a s Gov mucl

Gld

the man proc the r nents

work for t claim not e jurist

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

66604

LONDON, July 4, 1899.

The Date.

The day on which these lines are written is the one hundred and twentythird anniversary of the declaration of American Independence. It is being celebrated everywhere in the United States as the birthday of the Republic. It is coming to be regarded outside the United States as one of the Red Letter Days of Humanity. The International Peace Conference at the Hague, representing all the Monarchies and all the Empires of the Old World of Europe and the Older World of Asia, to-day suspends its deliberations in order to celebrate the fourth of July by going on pilgrimage to Delft to hear the American Ambassador and first Delegate, Mr. A. D. White, deliver an oration in praise of Grotius as he lays upon the tomb of the great international jurist a silver wreath, the homage of the American Government to the father of international law. It is a pleasant and suggestive incident, significant of much. The people that expelled monarchy from the New World are receiving the acclamations of mankind when in solemn but simple fashion they proclaim the sovereignty of international law before the representatives of all the monarchs of the continents of Europe and of Asia.

To recall the name of Grotius is in itself no mean service to mankind.

Whether or not we agree with Mr.

White in believing that his great work on the Law of Peace and War has done more for the happiness of mankind than any book not claiming to be inspired—Smith's "Wealth of Nations" not excepted—there is no doubt that the old Dutch jurist is one of those who have rendered signal service to the human race. To-day's ceremony at Delft is but the formal and public recognition by the representatives of all nations, races, religions and tongues, that the man whose mortal remains rest in the Nieuwe Kerke at Delft was one of the great benefactors of mankind. Two centuries ago he stood like a prophet on the mountain tops and saw the eastern sky crimson with the light of the coming day. He proclaimed the reign of law in the midst of an age when Europe reeked with the smoking havoc of the Thirty Years' War. And what was his reward? His generation gave him leisure to write his immortal work by clapping him into prison. Afterwards it hunted him into exile. It is ever so. Grotius was in the true line of succession of the prophets of all ages. Now as in the seventeenth century-

Far in front the cross stands ready, and the crackling fagots burn.

While the hooting mob of yesterday in silent awe return To glean up the scattered ashes into History's golden urn,

The Perspective of the Man in the Streat.

"We see dimly in the present what is small and what is great." A bluebottle fly at the end of a telescope can conceal from the eye of the astronomer a galaxy of stars. Nothing is more certain than that the most important epoch-making things are never those which are most en évidence. They are usually invisible, always unnoticed. We marvel at the blindness of our predecessors who busied themselves about pompous trifles which have long been swept into the dust-heap of oblivion, and imagine that we at least have keener eyes and truer appreciation of the comparative importance of things. But at the Hague the other day there arrived a letter from the director of one of the best news agencies, ordering the curtailing of the reports from the Peace Conference. "No one in London," so ran the missive, "cares for anything at present but the news from the Transvaal and the latest scores of the test matches with the Australians." Yet the Peace Conference was engaged in founding what every one admits to be the most important of all international institutions. It was busy creating at last, at the close of nineteen centuries of nominal Christianity, a Court which would at least give the nations a chance of appealing in their disputes to some other judgment seat than that of the God of War. But what does the man in the street care for such things? Nothing, and less than nothing. He never did, he probably never will. He does not think. He only feels. And he does not understand.

Apart from the intrinsic usefulness of the work which is being done by the work which is being done by the than they knew. Peace Conference, there is one aspect of its proceedings which deserves special mention. Far more important than anything which men do, is the evidence which their deeds from time to time afford that there is behind them, and over them, and working through them, a Power that is mightier and wiser than they. The extraordinary manner in which the Conference has been led, by a way it knew not of, to evolve a High Court of Justice among the nations is calculated to confirm the faith of the doubting in the reality of the "stream of tendency not ourselves which makes for righteousness," When the delegates met at the Hague on May 18, few of them, possibly none of them, believed that they had come on anything but a fool's errand. They said frankly that they did not believe anything would come of it. But after six weeks they see, even the most sceptical, that great things are coming of it -whereof they are glad. The codification of the laws of war is an achievement of which any Conference might be proud, and it is very satisfactory that at last-after thirty years-the beneficent rules of the Geneva Convention are now to be extended to naval warfare. But these provisions for regulating war, or for rendering its sufferings less acute, are trivial compared with the measures taken to diminish the danger of the outbreak of war, and to provide for the administration of a system of international law. If twelve months ago any one had predicted that the representatives of all the Governments would be employed for two months in elaborating a Court and Code for the universal establishment of a system of arbitration among nations, he would have been derided as the idlest of dreamers. But this strange thing is coming to pass before our eyes.

The Master Builder and His Tools. And the strangest part of it all is that the very men who have been employed as instruments in the building of this temple of international justice did not know when they arrived at the Hague what task they were to be engaged The Master Builder, in His wisdom, did not unfold to His artificers the plan on which they were to build. They came imagining that they were to do one thing; they remained to do There was nothing about arbitration in the Tsar's Rescript. Many of the delegates openly scoffed at the idea of an International Court. One of the most powerful of the potentates represented was known to be frankly opposed to the idea of arbitration as involving a curtailment of his Divine Right of Sovereignty. His representative, even down to the end of last month, sneered at the whole thing as a farce. Yet this composite, heterogeneous conglomerate of representatives from all nations near and far, moved as if by some constraining impulse, has done the very thing which the most sanguine optimists amongst us would have declared to be far beyond the reach of this generation. It is such things as this which made Cromwell continually burst out into quotations from the Hebrew seers, and marvel at the blindness of those who do not or will not see the presence and the potency of One who is wiser and mightier than they.

Germany's

"Surely the wrath of man shall praise Him: the remainder of wrath will He restrain." The familiar text was quoted the other day by a delegate who, least of all, can be accused of sympathy with superstition. He applied it to explain how it was that the opposition of Germany, which for a full fortnight delayed the deliberations of the Conference, had, in an altogether unexpected manner, tended to enhance the importance of the Arbitration Court. The scheme as originally drafted provided that arbitration should be obligatory in the case of disputes arising out of differences in interpreting the clauses in a dozen international conventions. Germany took so strong a stand against making arbitration obligatory in any disputes, that this clause has been dropped. If it had remained it would more or less have associated the functions of the Court with the adjudication of twopenny-halfpenny disputes about the interpretation of conventions. By its removal the true function of the Arbitral Court as a judicial

GENERAL ABDULIAH PASHA. Turkish Military Delegate.

MA OR HESSAPTSCHIEFF Balgarian Military Delegate.

COLONEL COANDA.

Reumanian Military Delegate.

D'MITRI STANC!OFF. Bulgarian Delegate.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE: MORE PORTRAITS OF DELEGATES.

val

ial

our lis een the terved ged did ich hat do in nly ne. ted of ine wn ing onand

has

ine

fac ıch ırst vel see ser ise ath iar lay of ain for oner, on nat tes in so ry ed. ve he ut body, created by international authority for the settlement of international disputes which might endanger international peace, comes into clear pro-And in securing the removal of the obscuring veil, Germany, little as she dreamt of helping the good cause, has perhaps contributed as much as any more willing helper to the triumph of Arbitration.

The Compulsion The cynic and the sceptic declare that a Court of Arbitration, recourse to which is purely optional, and which has no armies at its back to enforce its decisions, is a mere castle in the air. But as some one said the other day to Count Münster when he was belittling the scheme, "It is your task to create the tribunal; it will be ours to see that it is used." The compulsion which will drive the nations to arbitrate instead of fighting will be not the less potent because it can be embodied in no treaty. The popular pressure upon every Government not to fight until it has at least tried what can be done by arbitration will be irresist-The case of the Transvaal is complicated by the dispute about suzerainty; but does any one doubt for a moment that, if that had not been in the way, public opinion in Britain would have peremptorily insisted upon utilising the new tribunal for purposes of investigation if not of decision? The dispute about the Alaskan boundary, which is still unsettled, is one of those questions which will go almost of themselves before the tribunal that is being established at the Hague. Nor is it only public opinion within the disputing countries which will secure a reference to the tribunal. The opinion of neutrals is annually becoming more potent on questions of peace and war. We may depend upon it that any government that in the future proposes to fight before arbitrating will have to face, first, an immense opposition within its own borders, and then the unanimous condemnation of the whole civilised world.

The Future Armaments.

Disarmament will be reached through arbitration. Mars was tolerated as Chief Justice of Christendom only because hitherto mankind had to choose between his arbitrament and none. creation of a Tribunal, which the Germans insist must be called a Court, where impartial judges will hear the evidence and decide each case upon its merits, affords the opportunity for which the slowly-evolved moral sense of mankind has been waiting. It is, perhaps, as well that the Conference put its foot down heavily upon all efforts to make war more economical, more humane and less deadly. War and Arbitration are two competing rivals for the business of settling international disputes. War is every day becoming more heavily handicapped by the intolerable cost of the procedure and the unwieldy size of its instruments. War on a great scale may not be quite as impossible as M. Bloch argues, but there is no doubt that it tends to become more and more ruinous and more and more difficult every year. The shrinkage of the world, the growing inter-communication of States, the immense complexity of human society, all tend irresistibly to make some other system of settling disputes than war a first necessity of the modern State. When that system has proved itself, armies will continue to exist. But they will only be used after the sanction of the tribunal is asked and obtained for the vindication of law, or the maintenance of order, or the destruction of some lawless State that refuses to submit to the universal rule.

Arbitration.

Last month has witnessed not The Venezuelan merely the fashioning of a Court of Arbitration open to all nations; it has witnessed the opening of the Anglo-American Court of Arbitration at Paris which is to decide the vexed question of the right of title to six hundred and sixty-nine thousand square miles of possibly auriferous territory in dispute between Venezuela and British Guiana. M. Martens spends half his time in presiding over the Court in Paris and half in discussing the details of the proposed general Court at the Hague. Sir Richard Webster is now in the midst of a sixteen days' speech setting forth the British view of the case. Mr. ex-President Harrison will take at least as long to reply on behalf of Venezuela. Then Sir Robert Reid will have his turn, and another American will follow. It is very prosaic no doubt, and very sensible, and no one in the Old World or the New pays a scrap of attention to the Court and its orators. How different it would have been if, instead of arguing it out quietly in a Court of Arbitration, armies and navies had been set in motion and thousands of men had been slaughtered! Then the whole world and all the world's newspapers would have been full of the controversy-for nothing interests the living so much as the taking of life. Bloodshed and slaughter are the greatest advertisers in the world. But probably the ends of justice will be better attained by M. Martens and his colleagues, with the aid of long-winded Websters, Harrisons, etc., than by all the Queen's horses and all the Queen's men arrayed for mutual slaughter.

MEMBERS OF THE ANGLO-VENEZUELAN ARBITRATION COMMITTEE NOW MEETING IN PARIS.

(Photograph by B. Matusewski.)

×/1.18

ion
ing
ing
of its.
ble
ids
ind
the end ing ern ies be ked the aw-

of it the ich itle iles

nds

ral in

of of ow.

ent out ies ad the

the ch the the

ed i's

M. DECRAIS.

M. MILLERAND. (Commerce.)

of less year was seed. Eve him is,

his

Je ow we

ac

th

mi rei

the Att ign was too si cla as ma

to his with The six

Pr the the sp of

so

the an 1'1

M. DE LANESSAU.
(Marine.)

M. JEAN DUTUY.
(Agriculture.)

M. WALDECK-ROUSSEAU, (Prime Minister and Interior.)

M. CAILLAUX (Finance.)

M. PIERRE PAUDIN.
(Public Works.)

MEMBERS OF THE NEW FRENCH MINISTRY.

The Vindication of Dreyfus.

It is not only for the progress of arbitration that we have cause to thank God and take courage. The gradual unfolding of the vindication of Dreyfus is hardly less marvellous and not a whit less reassuring. A few years ago, when Dreyfus was condemned, his fate seemed utterly hopeless. Everything was against Everything, that is, except the love of his wife, the pen of the Jew Lazarus, and his own innocence. What were they against the accumulated weight of all the authorities - social, military, judicial, and religious-which weighed him down? But the solitary pen pleaded for the innocent condemned. At first the plea was ignored. But when it was taken up in quarters too powerful to be silenced, a hideous clamour began. It was as if the nether regions, making common cause with the authorities, had sent forth all their fiends to swell the tumult. The highest joined hands with the lowest to defeat the ends of justice. The chiefs of the army, six Ministers of War. Cabinet after Cabinet. President after President, the Magistracy, the Press, the Church, all conspired to stifle the cry of outraged justice. Forgery was freely resorted to. So also were murder and suicide. The Chamber of Deputies and the priesthood, the representatives of the Democracy and of the Theocracy, united in the effort to ecraser l'Infâme,-the infâme this time being not Jesus, but another lew of another name.

The Return from Captivity.

For years the struggle went on. Hell from beneath was moved to support the cause of Injustice. But at last, despite all opposition, the forces arrayed against Dreyfus have been beaten.

The God who is "only to be found on the side of the big battalions" was not conspicuous in the fight over Drevfus. In his place rather do we see Him who hath scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts. He hath put down the mighty from their seats and exalted them of low degree. There is cause for singing a new Magnificat over the return of Dreyfus from his long exile. The Court of Cassation having decreed Revision, Dreyfus was brought back from the Ile du Diable to be tried by another Court Martial at Rennes. He arrived off the coast in the midst of a storm of the elements which but faintly symbolised the fury of the passions that have raged round the person of the returning officer. What the result of the new Court Martial will be it is as yet impossible to predict. It is enough to note that a thing almost as incredible as that the grave should give up its dead has happened: the Ile du Diable has given up its prisoner, and he is to have a full, a free, and open trial. For that much thanks!

Compared with the inner significance The of these two great salient features of in last month's news, most other events are as insignificant as the buzzing of flies on a window-pane, or let us say the hubbub that

GENERAL LE MARQUIS DE CALLIFFET.

New Minister of War.

New Ministry France.

is made over the latest dole of £87,000 to the distressed clergy. It is true that some of these events have been notable enough in their way. In France President Loubet has emerged from a trying

L'ÎLE DU DIABLE.

Where Captain Drayfus was confined for four and a half years.

crisis stronger and more trusted than before. In M. Loubet it begins to be evident that the French Republic has found a chief as strong as he is loyal, as brave as he is true. In M. Dupuy, whose government was cast out last month amid general rejoicings, it lost a Minister who inspired no confidence and received none. The composite Ministry of M. Waldeck-Rousseau, in which General de Galliffet. as Minister of War, sits side by side with Socialists like M. Millerand, is a Ministry of Public Safety. It was not formed a day too soon, and it will do much to reassure the fainting hearts of the friends of France if it steers the Republic safely through the whirlpool of the Dreyfus case. Everything depends upon the courage and loyalty of General Galliffet. It will be woe to France if he should be lacking in either.

The Kalser of the Kaiser even in the Reichstag.

Home and Abroad. His pet scheme for keeping strikers within bounds by prescribing penal

25

th

fo

m lo

pi

ha

di

th

servitude for their leaders has been incontinently rejected by the representatives of the German people. Mr. Rhodes came back from Berlin convinced that even the Social Democrats were but tame cats of the Kaiser, and that the Reichstag was but a registry for the Imperial will. The fate of the Penal Servitude. Bill shows that Mr. Rhodes's generalisation was too sweeping. There are some things which are too much even for the Reichstag. In foreign affairs the Kaiser has a freer hand. The announcement that he has just bought the Caroline Islands from Spain for £800,000 provoked no opposition, although it must have occurred to many to ask whether there was ever any likelihood of the investment proving remunerative. The Caroline Islands are miserable remnants compared with the richer islands of the West Indies. But as assets in the Imperial stocktaking, how many tropical islands are worth their keep? As Spain appears to be selling off her colonies, it would be as well if Lord Salisbury were to acquire a lien upon all Spanish colonies which serve as stepping-stones to the Cape. The riots occasioned by financial difficulties in Spain serve as a reminder that, unless we are alert, we may find ourselves forestalled.

GERMANY'S POSSESS ONS IN THE WESTERN PAC FIC.

No War with the Transvaal.

ice

ag.

ers

nal

tly

le.

at

he

or

de.

00

00

rs

nt

m

h

re

g

le

e

ir

The situation in the Transvaal is so fully dealt with elsewhere that it is only necessary to say here that the only thing quite clear is that there must be no war. War with the Transvaal would be loudly repudiated with practical unanimity by everybody in Britain if it were not that Mr. Chamberlain pretends that if we spoil his game of bluff he may have to make war in earnest. It is, of course, extremely disagreeable to have to run the risk of hardening Paul Kruger's heart, and of postponing redress for the grievances of the Uitlanders, by stating the simple fact that the British public has no notion of tolerating another Transvaal war. But it is better to run that risk than to encourage the Jingoes in the belief that they can plunge us into war if they please. They cannot and shall not. We can much better afford to shed Mr. Chamberlain, and even, though it grieves me to say it, Sir Alfred Milner, than to shed the blood of the Boers in an attempt to force them to govern the Transvaal according to our We all want reform, but none of us are prepared to go to war to get it. That is the simple bedrock fact of the situation, and nothing but harm can come from any attempt to make believe that it is otherwise. Nor do we believe that the Cabinet is of any other opinion. Mr. Chamberlain is trying, no doubt, to get them into a corner on this matter. But he will not succeed.

"Not Cricket."

We have got to win the game for the Uitlanders by playing fair. To appeal to rifles and Maxims is "not cricket." We have our own Paul Kruger in the shape of the House of Lords, a hopelessly obstructive, reactionary, selfish, short-sighted body. It has done us and is doing us much more harm than the Uitlanders have ever suffered at the hands of the Boers. But we do not on that account shoot down the Peers as they troop to the Gilded Chamber to defeat some popular reform. To appeal to shot-guns and dynamite against the Peers is recognised as contrary to the rules of the political game. What we have got to teach our people is that it is equally outside the limits of what is permissible to invoke the aid of a British army to compel the Boers to introduce Reform Bills. If the Queen is their suzerain they are our fellow-subjects. And we do not slaughter our fellow-subjects

Westminster Budget.]

[June 23.

THE WRESTLERS.

In this interesting toy the figures wrestle violently, but they do not get any "forrader," when we differ with them on a question of the franchise. In the Transvaal we have tried too long the bullying, teasing tack, and we have failed. Those who have killed Home Rule with kindness might do worse than try and see whether in the Transvaal, as elsewhere, the rule holds good that you can catch more flies with a spoonful of treacle than with a hogshead of vinegar. Hitherto British policy in Pretoria has been very vinegary.

The Struggle in Belgium. In Belgium, an attempt on the part of the extreme Clerical party now in power, to re-adjust the Electoral system, has provoked popular disturbance. The proposal to give representation to minorities in districts where the minority is Clerical, while refusing to redress the grievance of minorities in districts where they are Liberal, naturally irritated the Liberal majority in Brussels. There have been great scenes in the Chamber, and some serious collisions between the people and the gendarmes in the streets. It is probable that the fracas will result in a change of Ministry. It would be well for Belgium if the King were to entrust M. Beernaert with the task of forming an administration, with a free hand on the Electoral question. M. Beernaert is one of the Grand Old Men of Europe. He has rendered invaluable service to the Conference at the Hague, and he is probably the only man who can appease the storm in Brussels. He is a Catholic, but a Catholic whose Catholicism is tempered by commonsense and broad democratic principles. He has experience, prestige, energy, and no small share of the wisdom of the serpent, combined with the vigour and buoyancy of youth. Indeed, since Mr. Gladstone passed away, M. Beernaert is the most juvenile septuagenarian in Europe.

The Retrogression to Savagery. In the House of Commons the attempt to secure an inquiry into the wholesale massacre of the wounded Dervishes by the black troops at the Battle of Omdurman failed to secure even the courtesy of a reply. Mr. Scott brought the question forward in the debate on the grant to Lord Kitchener of £30,000, which Mr. Morley opposed chiefly on account of the ghoul-like desecration of the Mahdi's comb. The statements made by Mr. Scott were supported by evidence which at least seemed to afford a prima facie case for inquiry. But no inquiry was promised. Not even an official denial of the accuracy of the allegations was put in. We fear therefore that we may take it that the terrible story is true, and that our black troops, who were disciplined up to fighting point, were not disciplined

Photograph by]

MR. DEWAR, M.P.

[Moffat, Edinburgh.

sufficiently to stop killing when their enemies were helpless and at their mercy. As for the abomination practised on the Mahdi's remains, that was not merely admitted but almost gloried in. The worst thing about the debate was the cynical by-talk of the members. It would seem as if the taint of savagery was contagious. How long will it be before we hear cannibalism openly defended by the Leader of the House of Commons? There is a good deal to be said for cannibalism, especially in the Soudan, where it is a local institution much esteemed by the inhabitants.

The Swing of the Pendulum.

The Liberals continue to win byelections. In Edinburgh Mr. Dewar captured the seat for the South Division, and Mr. McCrae retained that of the East by a quadrupled majority. There are two seats vacated at Oldham—for one of which young Mr. Churchill is a candidate. There is a fight between the Liberals on the question of Local Veto at Osgoldcross, and there is like to be a still more interesting fight for Stockport, where Sir G. Whiteley resigns as a Unionist in order to stand again as an opponent of the Government of Doles. In all these constituencies the divisions which distract the front Opposition bench have left no trace in the local Liberal ranks. Hence we are winning all along the line, and after next General Election we shall have to face the responsibility of forming an administration out of a company of gentlemen who are hardly on speaking terms with each other.

Our Policy in China. There has been at last a debate on the Chinese question in the House of Commons, in which something was said more practical and truthful than the usual carping and snarling at Russia. Mr. Brodrick's statement of policy was rational and comprehensive. It was only evasive on one point. He spoke as if the making of a railway by Russia to Pekin involved the establishment of Russia as sovereign of Pekin. But that is not the case. Russia's influence at Pekin does not depend upon the existence of a railway to the capital, and that Mr. Brodrick very well knows. Excepting in that particular, his statement was clear and to the point. We shall not occupy the Yang-tse valley; but our gunboats will patrol the river for the protection of The Russian agreement, he said, was valuable in itself and of happy augury for the future. The following words should be written up in letters of gold in every newspaper office :-

If we are to have a new departure, we must make it by d

is no like

Goy

the two

that dre

N

by dealing with doubtful questions in an amicable spirit, and by endeavouring to consider that a fair compromise is not a bad bargain.

Mr. Yerburgh in the debate used an expression likely to be remembered. He said "he hoped the Government would make up their minds to Egyptianize the Yangtse region." As the Yangtse region contains two hundred and fifty millions of the human race, that is just what ought not to be done or even dreamed of.

a whole being in the proportion of five to three in favour of Federation. This vote is decisive of the whole question. West Australia may still stand aloof, unwilling to abandon the privilege of taxing imports from its sister colonies; a performance on which the public finance of West Australia almost depends for its existence. But Queensland will almost certainly follow the lead of New South Wales. Victoria is enthusiastically Federal. South Australia

Photograph by]

THE AUSTRALIAN CRICKET TEAM.

[Reinhold Thiele and Co.

After a campaign of much angry Australian rhetoric and even angrier newspaper History. literature, the great vote for or against Federation has been taken in New South Wales. The result is a victory which, if not overwhelming, is still decisive and final, and, allowing for the unknown chances of politics, the Australian Dominion is now a In Sydney itself the voting was almost certainty. equally divided. The citizens of Sydney are affronted because, under the Federal Act, that city is expressly forbidden to be the capital of United Australia. But outside Sydney the new Federal Bill is accepted by a quite decisive majority, the voting of the colonies as has already accepted the new policy; and Tasmanian is certain to accept it. Out of the seven Australian colonies, in a word, five will probably federate, forming a Dominion of immense geographical scale, and with great political possibilities. In New Zealand, it is to be noted, a League has been started to advocate the cause of Federation. But there are 1,200 miles of stormy water betwixt New Zealand and the Australian continent; and that wide space of the divorcing sea will probably keep New Zealand in separate political existence. Geography, in this case, is an almost final argument against Federation.

on ly

ng

ne

e

The Peers

The House of Lords last month distinguished itself by defeating Women Councillors Lord Salisbury, who pleaded in vain for the clause in the London

Local Government Bill which secured for women the same right to sit on the new Councils which they now have to sit on vestries. It was an act worthy the traditions of the Second Chamber. The Peers, who have everything, are the natural enemies of those who have nothing. Women naturally have such a tendency to conservatism and the established social order, that it is perhaps as well that they should have a taste of the quality of our hereditary legislators. The spirit that has just led the Irish Local Government Board to declare that no woman shall be allowed to serve as a rate collector found one hundred and eighty-two noble Lords to throw out the clause allowing women to sit as Only sixty-eight voted with Lord Councillors. Salisbury. The spectacle of two hundred and fifty Peers actually in the House at one time was a portent indeed. These birds of ill-omen only muster in such force when some deed of darkness is to be done. Lord Salisbury's words on the relation of women to the housing of the poor were weighty and wise. He said :-

Whatever may be the feelings of others, for myself I cannot refuse to vote for that course which will help forward in some degree-it may be to a great degree-a high and noble cause, and which is the cause of right, of justice, and of true philanthropy. Many years ago, at the request of this House, a Commission was appointed to examine into the condition of the lodging of the working classes, and the result which that Commission reported was most unsatisfactory and, I should add, most alarming, and yet things have got worse since. The London County Council itself has undertaken part of the duty, but it will not be only on the London County Council that this duty will fall-the duty of providing-I will not say of providing but of striving to provide-adequate lodgings for the vast multitudes who inhabit this city. It is one of the principal duties which these municipal bodies will have to perform, and you ought to arm them with every weapon and every assistance that may enable them to perform it with success. Now, I maintain that women are as necessary for the purpose of assisting these local bodies to provide decent lodgings for the working classes as they are for the purpose of administering the Poor Law. It is quite as essential and a far more pressing and urgent duty.

Women in Council. One of the most notable events of last month was the meeting of the International Parliament of Women in London, under the presidency of Lady Aberdeen. The papers read at the various meetings of this council will, if printed, fill 3,000 pages of the official report. The quality of the papers is said to have been exceptionally good. The gathering was a great social and political success. Experience has shown that when women are set to do things all by themselves, they will do them much better than when they are set to do them along with men. They usually refuse even to try to do them when men are with them; the ingrained spirit of subjection having paralysed even the ambition to excel. But when all by themselves they often do better than men. When they have found their feet and gained a little more confidence the justification for this unnatural separation of the sexes will disappear.

DIARY FOR JUNE.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

on ty, at ot

te

y.

al

m

11

I

se rs

of

d

of

e n f June 1. Sir Alfred Milner and President Kruger meet at Government House, Bloemfontein, in a conference.

Major Marchand and his companions of the Fashoda expedition arrive in Paris, where they receive an ovation of welcome. In the Court of Cassation, M. Mornard Madame Dreyfus's Counsel delivers as address for Dreytus 8 Counseil denivers L. Address for a revision of the case. Yardley Hill, near Epping Forest, presented to the public by Mr. E. N. Buxton, is opened by the Duke and Duchess of Connaught.

A Strike Bill, popularly known as the "Penal Servitude Bill," is laid before the German Servitude lim,

Reichstag

The Queen-Regent reopens the Spanish Cortes, and announces that the Government have signed a Convention to cede to Germany Library Lebands and that part of the signed a Convention to cede to Germany the Caroline Islands and that part of the Ladrones still under Spanish dominion. Colonel Du Party de Clam is arrested in Paris. Major Esterhazy confesses that he wrote the borderram at the instigation of Colonel Sir Gordon Sprigg is defeated in the election for Tembuland, Mr. Soloman (Bond) being elected.

3. The Court of Cassation in Paris pronounces judgment in the Dreyfus case. The Court quashes and annuls the judgment of 1894, and directs the accused to be tried before a Court Martial, at Rennes.

Anti-ravisionists insult President Loubet on the Auteuil racecours:

Diplomatic relations are resumed between Spain and America.

5. The French Cabinet asks the Chamber to proocute Goneral Mercier and Major Esterhazy. The Chamber decides to postpone the im-peachment of General Mercier till after the verdict of the court martial to be held at Rennes on Captain Dreyfus; the Chamber further decides that the judgment of the Court of Cassation on the Dreyfus case be posted in every Commune of France. The Conference between Sir A. Milner and President Kruger at Bloemfontein terminates. The Tsar expresses dissatisfaction with the authorities and the students for the recent disorders in the Universities.

disorders in the Universities.

M. Zola publishes an article in the Aurone entitled "Justice," on his return to Paris.

The Centenary of the Royal Institute is celebrated by a banquet in the City.

6. The French Senate by 258 votes to 2) contains the disgraceful acts committed at Autoul paries. People of Loyal have the

Auteuil against President Loubet by "the enemies of the Republic,"

The German Reichstag reassembles after the Whitsun Recess. Herr von Bülow makes a st tement regarding the cession by Spain of the Caroline, Pelew, and Marianne Islands. 7. According to official statements the Conference at Bloemfontein has proved abortive. Sixteen deaths occur at New York owing to the heat: thermometer stands at 94 degrees in the shade.

The International Congress of Publishers commences in London.

Professor Dewar demonstrates his discovery of liquid hydrogen at the Royal Institution.

The centenary celebrations of the birth of Pushk'n, the national poet and novelist, are to the hald throughout Russia.

8. M. Carrière, ex-major of gendarmerie, is selected as the prosecutor at the coming Rennes Court Martial.

g. The Indictment Chamber in Paris decides on the liberation of Colon.! Picquart, who was

The Dominion Government decides that it is in-up-dient to grant charters to railway companies to build lines in the Yukon

 Captain Dreyfus embarks on board the cruiser Sfax, which sails for France.
 A meeting of 5,000 persons at Johannesburg supports Sir A. Milner's proposals. The President's proposals on the franchis: and the West Indies. A meeting of 5,000 persons at Johannesburg supports Sir A. Milner's proposals. The President's proposals on the franchis: and arbitration are approved of by the Rand, at Pretoria.

resident Loubet is present at the races at Longchamps; order was maintained and the President well received.

President well received.

Great fire at Armstrong's Elswick works:
damage estimated to be over £100,000.

The Plasterers' dispute ends.
The Dupuy Ministry defeated on a vote of confidence in the Chamber—M. Ruou's motion being carried by act to 120-ms with the control of the confidence in the Chamber—M. Ruou's motion being carried by act to 120-ms with the control of the control nuence in the Chamber—M. Kuou's motion being carried by 321 to 173—resigns. Admiral Dewey lands at Singapore, and is received with military honours. Ninety-seven cases of plague reported from Hong Kong.

The Cambridge Mathematical Tripos issued:
R. P. Paranjpye, a native of India, and
G. Birtwhistle bracketed equal for the Senior Wranglership.

Photograph by]

[Moffat, Edinburgh.

MR. MCCRAE.

 Baron F. de Christiani is sentenced by the Correctional Chamber to four years' imprisonment for the assault on President Loubet at Auteuil.

The Indictment Chamber dismisses the charges against Colonel Picquart. A blue-book on the Transvaal is issued. The Anglo-French Convention regarding Africa is ratified in Paris.

The Shan-tung Railway Company is incorpor ated at Berlin with a share capital o

The centenary celebrations of the birth of Pushk n, the national poet and novelist, are held throughout Russia.

M. Carrière, ex-major of gendarmerie, is selected as the prosecutor at the coming Rennes Court Martial.

The Indictment Chamber in Paris decides on the liberation of Colon.! Picquart, who was accordingly s.t. free from prison.

M. Zola gives the necessary notice of his intention to appear and take his trial.

Sir A. Milner's official report of the Blozm-fontein Conference is published.

The Dominion Government decides that it is President Kruger and his franchise proposals.

Jonannesourg, who express connected in President Kruger and his franchise proposals. There is an animated debate in the Italian Chamber on the 1st clause of the Public Safety Bill.

A frightful explosion occurs at the Caledonian Mines, Canada. One hundred and sixty men are entombed.

17. The Spanish Government presents its Budg t

Bill to the Chamber.
The Bill authorising the German Government to prolong the commercial arrangement with Great Britain and her Colonies is read a second time in the Reichstag.

The Protection of Labour Contracts Bill is introduced into the Reichstag by the German Chancellor

Herr von Bülowmakes an important statement regarding German policy in Samoa.

The Prince of Wales visits the Royal Agricultural Society's show at Maidstone.

A large meeting of Pretoria burghers pass a resolution agreeing to the draft Franchise Bill, but decline to go a step further. the referendum on Federation is taken throughout New South Wales. The returns show a majority in its favour.

M. Fleury-Raverin, D.puty of the Rhône, ublishes a letter denouncing the organisation f the French coast and colonial defences. Admiral de Cuverville, who endorses this criticism, is superseded by the Minister of Marine.

At the Colonial Office, Lord Strathcona and Mr. Taite are appointed representatives for Canada on the Pacific cable question. The Arbitration Tribunal on Venezuela sits in Paris, and Sir R. Webster begins the presentation of the case for Great Britain.

The International Commission on affairs in Samoa issues its conclusions.

M. Bourgeois is summoned from the Hague by President Loubet.

The Bill for settling the commercial arrangements between Great Britain and Germany is read a third time in the Reichstag, ord Elgin, Lord Kitchener, and Mr. Cecil Rhodes receive the degree of D.C.L. at

M. Waldeck-Rousseau succeeds in forming a collition Ministry with General de Galliff t as Minister of War and M. Millerand Minister or Commerce.

for Commerce,
The Tasmanian House of Assembly passes a Federal Enabling Bill.
The Reichstag adjourns after refusing by a large majority to refer the Bill on Strikes to mmittee

Lord Tennyson opens the South Australian Parliament.

Farament.

Bishop Tugwell is released at Lagos.

The difficulties regarding the working of the Chines: Northern Railway are removed by an arrangement between Chang Yi and Mr. Kinder.

The Emperor of Germany raises M. Bülow to the rank of a Count.

The Prince of Wales lays the foundation stone of the new buildings of the Royal School of Needlework at South Kensington.

The Prince of Wales lays the foundation stone of the Central Offices for the Post Office Savings Rosk.

Savings Bank.

Savings Bank.
The French Premier issues a Circular to all the Prefects stating that the Ministry has undertaken the defence of the Republic.
A Committee of the Spanish Chamber of Commerce decide to protest against the Budget.
An International Congress of Women is opened in the Church House, Westminster under the presidency of Lady Aberdeen, delegates from all countries being present.
The Queen reviews the troops at Aldershot.

The Queen reviews the troops at Aldershot.

A Ministerial declaration is read both in the French Senate and the Chamber. In the Senate a vote of confidence in the Govern-In the ment is passed by a m. jority of 132 votes, in the Chambe. of 26. The Itali in, General Gelitta, is sentenced by a French Court Martid at Nice, as a spy, to five years' penal servi ude.

27. The Art Workers Guild gives a Grand Masque,
"Beauty's Awakening," at the Guildhall.
The International Congress of Women commences sectional work, and holds a meeting in favour of International Arbitration.
In the French Chamber a proposal of M.
Déroulède's, to revise the Constitution, is refused by 27 votes to 20.

27. The Option of Berlin.
28. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare ratified by the full Conference after discussion.
29. The revised Geneva rules for naval warfare rat Déroulède's, to ravisa the constitution, is refused by 37) votes to 70.

28. In the Italian Parliament the Public Safety Bill is referred to a Parliamentary Committee. In the Chamber at Madrid there is a discussion on the ant-Budget riots.

2). A Federal Enabling Bill passes the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, Great Demonstration in Brussels against the Electoral Reform Bill favoured by the Government.

Government

The Belgian Chimber is adjourned for the consideration by the Government of its Electoral Bill.

Duke of Albany is to be the heir to the Dukedon, the Duke of Connaught renouncing his claim.

Peace Conference.

June v. At the sitting of Commission No. 2, a small committee is appointed to settle the details of how to extend the Geneva Convention to maritime warfare.

The United States delegate proposes to app to private property at set the article of the Brussels Convention excluding from capture private property on land. Objection being raised to this that it was not covered by Count Muravieff s circular, it is decided to refur the market to a pleasure extract of the refer the matter to a plenary sitting of the onference.

Sub-Committee No. 3 decides to submit to the Conference a recommendation forbidding the use of explosive bullets.

The text of Sir Julian Pauncefote's proposal for a permanent international arbitration tribunal is published.

tribunal is published.

The Naval sub-section for the application of the Geneva Convention meets.

Committee No. 2 meets, when the revision of the Brussels Convention is continued.

The Arbitration Commission adopts the scheme for the exercise of good offices and mediation. It consists of eight articles, six of which are taken from the Russian project, one is Italian, and the eighth from the American scheme for special mediation.

The Sub-Committee on the revision of the Brussels Convention meets and discusses proposals regarding the duty of neutrals in military warfars.

The Armanats Sub-Committee meets and dis-

The Armaments Sub-Committee meets and dis-cusses the proposal that for five years the signatory States bind themselves to use in signatory States bind themselves to use in their armies only the rifles with which they are armed at present. At a meeting of the Sub-Committee of the Arbitration Commission it is decided that Sir Julian Pauncefote's scheme for a permanent arbitration tribunal be taken as the basis of discussion along with the Russian and American projects.

projects,

8. The Sub-Committee on the Brussels Rules of War discusses military authority in the enemy's country.

The first four articles of Sir J. Pauncefote's project are discussed at the sitting of the Comité d'Examen. The discussion lasted four hours

10. The section of Commission No. the discussion of the articles defining military authority in an enemy's territory. The Coulté d'Examen mests and has under consideration the three projects for a permanent tribunal.

tribunal.

12. The German motion for the complete publication of the protocols of the Conference is brought forward, but not agreed to.

15. The Sub-Committee dealing with the application of the Geneva Convention to naval wa. the agreement of the convenience o mittee.

16. The Naval Committee on Articles 2, 3, and 4 of the Muravieff circultance on the Muravieff circultance on the Muravieff circultance of the Muravieff circultan

The Sub-Committee on Arbitration sits; it consisters, am ands and approves scheme for a permanent tribunal.

Commission No. 1 sits; reports of its Sub-Committees are considered. The United States delegates point out the unreasonablements of forbidding the use of asphyxiating gas while allowing submarine torpedo-boats, but are outvoted, as are also the British and United States delegates on the Dump Dum United States delegates on the Dum Dum bullet.

Commission No. 1 again s.ts, and the Russian proposals for restraining the increase of arma-ments are submitted to it. The question of the suppression of submarine boats and rams is put to the vote but not carried. Russia does not vote.

24. The Russian delegates submit to the Conference the text of a proposal for the limitation of naval armaments; the United States a statement on the subject of the exemption from capture of private property at sea.

26. Commission No. r sits and discusses the Russian proposals for the restriction of naval and military armaments. The German military delegate, Colonel von Schwarzboff, strongly conposes the Russian military prostrongly opposes the Russian military pro-psals. The Committee on Arbitration meets under the Presid-ncy of M. Bourgeois. The proposals for a permanent arbitration tribunal are approved.

28. The United States delegates, in a letter to M. de Staal, demand that the exemption of private property at sea, in time of war, be discussed at the Conference.

Commission No. r sits; a motion is adopted, without being put to the vote, declaring that restriction of armaments, even for five years, difficult, the Russian scheme impracticable, but affirming that a limitation of armaments desirable for the moral and material welfare of humanity.

By-Election.

4,989 Radical majority

831

This represents a gain to the Opposition of a 23. Owing to the death of Dr. Robert Wallace (R), a vacancy occurred in the East Division of Edinburgh. An election took place with the following result:

Mr. McCrae (R) 4,831
Mr. Vonger (II)

... 4,831 Mr. Younger (U) ...

Radical majority ... 1,730 SPEECHES.

r. The Spanish Premier, Señor Silvela, at Madrid, on the present needs of Spain after her disasters.

2. The Queen-Regent, in the Spanish Cortes, on the reorganisation of the country.

Baron Troil, in the Finnish Diet, on the bonds between Russia and Finland.

Major Marchand, in Paris, on the mission of France in Africa.

Mr. Bryce, at Westminster, on the importance of literature in education.

Lord Lansdowne, in London, on the Army.

o. Lord Lansdowns, in London, on the Army.
Mr. Morley, in London, on Militarism and the Liberal Party.
7. Mr. Balfour, in London, on Home Rule and other points of Lord Rosebery's speach.
He is of opinion that the controversies between the South African Republic and Great Britain are capable of a satisfactory settlement. settlemant.

The Bishop of Rochester, at Richmond, on the crisis in the Church.

Lord Rossbery, at Epsom, on the essentials to the true work of the Church.
 The Duke of Devonshire, in London, on Technical Education.

Sir A. Milner, at Cape Town, on the franchise question in the Transvaal.

14. President Kruger, at Pretoria, on the franchise difficulties with the Uitlanders. Sir John Gorst, at Oxford, on children's work the home.

2. In

5. M

13. D

14. D

16. Mr. Balfour, at Cambridge, on English public schools.

Signor Grippo, in the Italian Parliament, on the sacredness of Italian unity.

General Joubert, at Paardekraal, on the Franchise question in the Transvaal.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, at Ilford, on the Transva

Transvaal crisis. The Chinese Minister, at the Crystal Palace, on British industries.

The German Emperor, at Hamburg, on the Major-General Emperor, at Hamburg, of the sport of sating.

Major-General Sir W. Stirling, at Chelsea, on the advantages the Corps of Commissionaires offers to soldiers leaving the Army.

General Marchand, at Thoissey, on the brother-

General Marchand, at I noisesy, on the ordina-hood of all Frenchmen.

Herr Bebel, in the Reichstag, on the effect of the Labour Contracts Bill in Germany.

Herr Von Bülow, in Berlin, on Samoa.

W. T. Stead, at the Hague, on "The Confer-ence and after."

ence and after."

M. Ribot, at Versailles, on the present crisis in France: the need of having calm confidence in the Republic and in the Army.

Mr. Chamberlain, at Birmingham, on the Transvaal question.

Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, in London, on the Transvaal crisis.

PARLIAMENTARY. House of Lords.

June 1. Bills advanced a stage.
2. Third reading Parish Councillors (Tenure of Office) Bill.

The second reading of the Prevention of Cor-ruption Bill is moved by Lord Russell of Killowen, and carried.

Lord Selborne reads a long statement regarding the recent negotiations between Sir A. Milner and President Kruger.

and resident renger.

Lord Salisbury moves the Queen's Message with reference to Lord Kitchener, which is agreed to, along with the thanks of the House to the officers and troops employed in Third reading Lincolnshire Coroners Bill.

The Education of Children Bill, the London Government Bill and the Finance Bill are brought up from the Commons and read a first time first time.

6. Finance Bill is passed through all its stages.

Lord Selborne explains the indenturing system in Western Australia.

79. Second reading of Youthful Off-nd-rs Bill.

Speech by Lord James of Hersford.

20. Second reading London Local Government Bill; speeches by the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Tweedmouth, Lord Kimberley and others.

others.

others.

22. Third reading of the Trawlers' Ce-tificate Suspension Bill. Second reading of Commons and Open Spaces Bill.

23. Land Tenure in Wales; speeches by Lord Carrington, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Carrington, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Salisbury, and Lord Kimberly. Second reading Elementary Education (Defective and Epileptic Children) Bill.

25. London Government Bill. Eligibility of Women to seats on the new borough Councils is opposed by Lord Dunraven and the Duke of Devonshire, is supported by Lord Salisbury. On a division the majority of votes against women is 114—182 votes against 68.

against women is 114—182 votes against 68.
27. London Government Bill passes through Committee. Second reading Summary Jurisdiction Act Amendment Bill, and Poor Law Acts

Amendment Bill. Second reading Education of Children Bill.

House of Commons.

Trouse of Comminons.

It is the London Water (Purchase) Bill is withdrawn on the motion of Mr. Stuart. Mr. Dillon calls the attention of Mr. Gerald Balfour to the insulting language to Roman Catholic num by a Mr. Balloutine at Belfast. The House goss into Committee of Supply. Vote for the Post Office agreed to; the resolutions passed in Committee of Supply on May 19th are confirmed.

speech by Mr. Chaplin.

hise

ork

blic

the

anthe

, on

the

on

on-

er-

t of fer-

nce

the

on

of

of

ng

ga

in

on

a

5. ng II. n! h

rd rd re ol d 25 h :1

d

- 5. Mr. Balfour moves the vote of £30,000 to Lord Kitchener for his services in conducting the Soudan expeditin: debate follows; speech by Sir H. Campbil-Bannerman. Mr. Morley moves and Mr. C. P. Scott seconds amendment condemning treatment of Mahdi's tomb and wounded Dervishes: The grant is voted by 393 against 51.
- 6. Finance Bill as amended is considered. The report stage of the London Government Bill is entered upon. The eligibility of women to to serve on the new councils is carried by 196 votes to 161.
- Service Franchise Bill considered and passed through Committee; Mr. McKenna's amend-ment carried by §8 votes to 40. Education of Children Bill also passes through Com-mittee. Sunday Closing Bill and Wine and Beerhouse Acts Amendment Bill considered.
- 8. Mr. Chamberlain replies to questions with reference to the Bloemfontein conference, and makes a statement on the situation. Mr. Balfour submits a series of resolutions of thanks to the officers and men engaged in the Soudan Expedition, which are adopted, and the vote for the grant to Lord Kitchener. is confirmed on report.
- 9. Foreign Office vote is considered; speeches by Sir C. Dilke, Lord Charles Research Sir C. Dilke, Lord Charles Beresford, Mr. Broderick, and Sir E. Grey. Third reading Seats for Shop Amistan's (England and Ireland) Bill.
- Committee and discussion on Private Legisla-tion Procedure (Scotland) Bill.
- 13. Dublin Corporation Bill introduced and no tived by 211 votes to 12). Speeches by Mr.

 J. Redmond and Colonel Saunderson. Third reading of the London Government Bill and the Finance Bill.
- Discussion on the Education of Children Bill; speeches by Sir John Gorst and Sir W. Harcourt. Bill read a third time.
- 15. Discussion on the Indian Tariff Act; speeches by Sir H. Fowler, Mr. Maclean, Lord G. Hamilton, Mr. Courtney, Mr. Chambrian, and Sir H. Campball-Bannerman. On a division the Indian Tariff Act, 1899, is carried by 232 votes to 152.

- 2. In Committee of Supply the Civil Service 16. Scotch estimates in Committee of Supply considered on the vote for Public Education. The Lord Advocate makes his loans to Boards of Guardians considered; Scotland.
 - 19. Mr. Balfour explains how business will be taken for the remainder of the Session,
 - 20. Mr. Chamberlain announces amid cheers the news that New South Wales has voted in favour of Australian federation. Private navour of Australian federation. Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Bill is reported to the House. Second reading of Telephonic Communication Bill.
 - Wyndham moves in Committee Mr. Wyndham moves in Committee of Ways and Means a resolution on which to found the Military Works Loans Bill. Estimate, £4,000,000. Resolution carrisd by 24r votes against 66. The debate on the Telephons Bill is resumed, the Bill read a second time and referred to a Grand Committee. Speeches by Mr. Balfour, Mr. Stuart, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and Mr. Labouchere.
 - 22. Rating of Tithes Bill introduced by Mr.
 Long; speech by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, who moves the adjournment of the debate; this is defeated by 243 votes to 162. In Committee of Supply Irish Estimates are considered.
 - 23. Mr. Lloyd-George moves a resolution on the provisions for the Provisional Order (Rhyl Bill. Afterwards the House goes into Committee of Supply on Irish Estimates. Proposed Irish Catholic University; speeches by Mr. Dillon and Mr. Balfour.
 - Second reading Board of Education Bill, which is then referred to a Grand Committee on Law. Telephone Bill; statement by Mr. Hanbury.
 - Rejection of the Tithe Rent-charge (Rates Bill moved b/ Mr Asquith; speeches by Mr. Long, Mr. Birrell and Mr. G. Whiteley.
 - The Telephone Bill is referred to a Grand Committee on Trada. Small Houses (Acquisition of Ownership) Bill discussed as amended by the Standing Committee.
 - The adjourned debate is resumed on the Tithe Rent-charge (Rates) Bill; speeches by Mr. Courtney, Sir W. Harcourt, Sir E. Clarks, Sir H. Fowler and Mr. Balfour. On division the second reading is carried b/ a majority of 138 votes.
 - 30. Supply; Irish Estimates.

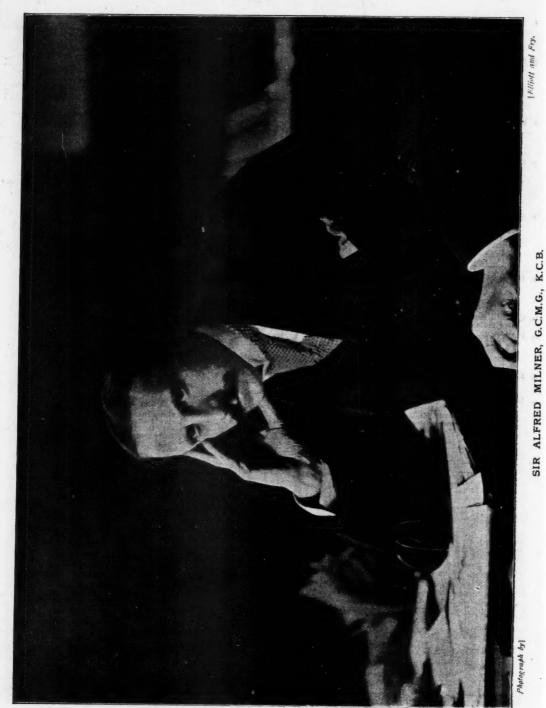

OBITUARY.

- June 1. Countess Alice Kearney.
 2. Mr. Robert Cox, M.P. (South Edinburgh), 54.
 Sir Melmeth Osborn, K.C.M.G., 66.
 Professor Klaus Groth, 80.
- Herr Johann Strauss (in Vienna), 74. Mr. John Nixon (mining engineer), 85. Mr. W. Hogarth (comic opera), 54.
- Professor H. H. Siegel, 68. Señor Carvajal (at Madrid). Mr. Cockburn Stewart (Administrator of the Seychelles), 54.
- Dr. Wallace, M.P. (Edinburgh), 67.
 Sir Henry Binns, K.C.M.G. (Premier of Natal).
 Mr. Frank Tomson (President Pennsylvania Railway).
 Hon. Sir Célicoart A. Anteline, K.C.M.G.
- (Mauricius), 77. Mr. Augustin B. Kelly (of the Times). M. Laviron, 84.
- 7. Mrs. W. Crawford (née Miss Annette Bear).
- 8. Mr. Augustin Daly (theatrical manager), 60.
- 11. Rev. W. Garden Blaikie, D.D., LL.D., 79. The Very Rev. T. Graham, D.D. (Roman Catholi: Canon of Westminster). Rev. J. Turland Brown, 80.
- 13. Lawson Tait (the eminent surgeon), 54.
- 14. Professor Konrad von Knoll, 69.
- Richard Parks Bland (author of the Bland Act), 64.
- Mr. Robert Ascroft, M.P. (Oldham), 52.
 Dr. George Ferdinand Shaw (Senior Fellow of Trinity, Dublin), 78.
 Mr. F. W. Culmer (twenty-two years publisher of the Daily Chronicle), 56.
- 21. General Charles Stockwell, C.B.
- 22. Sir Archibald Michie, K.C.M.G., Q.C., 86. Bishop Tozer, 71.
- Cardinal Count Franc's Schoenborn, Arch-bishop of Prague, 55.
- Dr. Albert Socin (Leipzig). Mr. Henry W. Blake, F.R.S., C.E., 84.
- 28. Mr. John Thackray Bunce (late editor Bir-mingham Daily Post), 71. Mrs. Ellen Johnson, 63.
- 2). Chevalier L. von Blumencorn, editor Fremdenblatt, 95.

Other Deaths Announced.

Mr. Henry Horn; Sir Edward Hulse; Sir Georg: Irwin; Professor Nourisson; Mr. Arnold R. Hay; Dr. Israel Hildesheimer; M. Louis Tribert; Cardinal Sourrieu.

circle and Eng loya pror SCH

the spring are mer I such Year down the "the weld talk not investigated that the three strick of the was of not mer as not the and the talk most and the talk not investigated the talk not investigated

Covernor of Cape Colony and High Commissioner of South

CHARACTER SKETCH.

SIR ALFRED MILNER.

Looking around to-day along the somewhat overclouded horizon of South African life one figure strikes the eye, new to the circle of our existence here; and we eye it with something of that hope and sympathy with which a man is bound to view the new and unknown, which may be of vast possible good and beauty. What have we in this man, who represents English honeur and English wisdom in South Africa? To a certain extent we know. We have a man honourable in the relations of personal life, loyal to friend, and above all charm of gold; wise with the knowledge of books and men; a man who could not viclate a promise or strike in the dark. This we know we have, and it is much to know this; but what have we more?—OLIVER SCHREINER, May 24, 1899.

"THE man of whom South Africa has need to-day to sustain England's honour and her Empire of the future," says Olive Schreiner, "is a man who must possess more than the knowledge and wisdom of the intellect. He must have the large and rare qualities springing more from the heart than from the head, which enable him to realise that sympathy and comprehension are more potent than coercion in the government of men."

Is Sir Alfred Milner, "this new Englishman of ours," such a man? I, who know him well, am fain to answer, Yea. But since his despatch of May 4th, I have my

"I give you my word of honour," said Mr. Garrett, of the Cape Times—the fidus Achates of our pius Æneas— "that I am not playing for war." The assurance was as welcome as it was necessary. When an editor begins to talk of the duty of proving that a gun is loaded, he may not be playing for war: he certainly seems to be invoking it.

When Milner was working with me at Northumberland Street, one of the things he did every day was to go through the proofs of my leading articles before they were printed and "tone them down." He would squirm at an adjective here, reduce a superlative there, and generally strike out anything that seemed calculated needlessly to irritate or offend. He was always putting water in my wine. He was always combing out the knots in the tangled mane of the P.M.G., and when the lion opened his mouth Milner was always at hand to be consulted as to the advisability of modulating the ferocity of its roar. That is my abiding memory of Milner on the Pall Mall. He stood as guardian armed with ruthless pen ever on guard against any expression that seemed strained or any utterance that rang false by excess of vehemence. His task was most useful, but when he pruned he sometimes cut to the quick, and the victim smarted while his offspring bled.

And now I am sadly avenged. For by some strange Nemesis Milner seems to have been doomed to use up as material for his own despatch all the strongest overstrained adjectives and expletives which in the whole three years he was with me he had combed out of the proofs of the Pall Mail Gazette. They now experience a strange resurrection in the despatch of May 4th, which I publish in another page under "The Topic of the Month." It is a leader of the kind which we used to describe as "a regular snorter," and I cannot but smile at thinking how the Milner of other days, the Milner of the "University tip," would have dealt with the telegram of May 4th had it come before him as the proof of a Pall Mall Gazette leader. But, alas! there was no Milner to revise Milner, and the result is before us.

I.—PERSONAL REMINISCENCES.

It is nearly twenty years since first I had the privilege of meeting Alfred Milner. I had come up from Darlington to assist Mr. Morley in editing the Pall Mall Gazette in the autumn of the year 1880. At that time Milner was one of the outside contributors, who usually wrote two or three Occasional Notes a day. At first I saw little of him, as he used to receive his instructions from Mr. Morley. My first impression of him as a journalist was not altogether favourable. His handwriting, which to this day retains much of its original characteristics, was almost sprawly enough to recall reminiscences of W. E. Forster, one of those men whose upstrokes and downstrokes were almost of the same thickness. Milner used at least twice and often three times as much copypaper as he need have done, for he seemed to write best when he was allowed to spread himself over the whole of a quarto sheet of paper. In person he was singularly neat; his manuscript was exactly the reverse. He used to write chiefly upon foreign subjects, and his notes were by no means remarkable for snap or point. He would say what he had to say in a clear, colourless way; but there was a singular absence of devil in it. It was "a good grey style." In those days Milner was still in the chrysalis stage, and it needed a great deal to rouse him.

MILNER AT NORTHUMBERLAND STREET.

After I had been at the Pall Mall for a year or so, Milner used to come into the little room at the top of the stairs and write his Occasional Notes there, instead of writing them at his chambers, and sending them in by hand. This change, if I remember rightly, was introduced because the messenger did not always arrive in time. Milner was not an early riser, and he never found himself altogether at home in the drive and rush of journalism as it was practised at Northumberland Street. In those days he was a weaker man physically than he is to-day. He suffered much from indigestion, had to be careful about his food, and if he ever had a long morning's work he wilted considerably under the strain. thoroughly capable, and when he was well and interested in his subject, he would work like steam. Hence it is not surprising that when Mr. Morley entered Parliament, and I was installed in his chair, Alfred Milner was promptly established as my right-hand man in the adjoining room. We were, alas, both much younger than we are now. I was thirty-four, instead of fifty; he was a couple of years or so my junior.

"LARKS" AT THE P. M. G.

We both flung ourselves into the task of remodelling the Pall Mall with great glee. Milner, although more sedate, entered thoroughly into the fun of the thing. "What larks!" he would frequently exclaim, when we were planning or executing some of the numerous escapades which, within three months of the time of

Mr. Morley's departure, completely revolutionised the Pall Mall Gazette. Milner used to come down to the office usually late, invariably accompanied by an umbrella with an extraordinary eagle's head as its handle, with very conspicuous eyes. I remember this umbrella well. After the last proof of the leader was revised and sent to press, I used to go into his little room and discourse on things in general, flourishing his um-brella by way of emphasising my argument. He used to declare that I would certainly either destroy his head or the umbrella's, and when the strain was exceptionally tense. he used carefully to stow the umbrella away out of sight. But when the time came that we separated, he to prosecute his Parliamentary ambitions and I to go to gaol, the umbrella intact. I wonder sometimes whether he has still preserved that eagleheaded staff as a kind of fetish. It certainly figures very conspicuously in my reminiscences of these early days.

HIS NEED FOR STIMULUS.

Milner was a universal favourite. No one ever heard him say a harsh word, and he was always saying kind ones.

On one occasion, the precise nature of which I forget, the tradition runs that he swore a good round oath; but it must have been something very extraordinary, for Milner's great weakness, from the journalistic point of view, was that he was slow to rouse. Nor was it only in journalism that this characteristic appeared. In those days he used to go down to Toynbee Hall to address meetings of East-Enders on various subjects. He was a personal friend of Arnold Toynbee's, and a veritable enthusiast in praise of him. Arnold Toynbee was the only man whom I know for whom Milner seemed to cherish an intense personal affection. Milner was very kind to everybody, and exceptionally kind to me, but he loved Arnold Toynbee in a way in which I have never known him care for any mortal man. He came in one morning after his meeting in the East End, quite radiant. wh

wa

Ch

wh

He

fin

1150

Ge

his

po

th

its fer

the

wa

us

hu

po

ag

bu

I

se

ne

if or

no

m

th

CO

ha

gi

pr

SO

SO

in

N

w

is

m

"I had a good time last night," he said, "which was quite unusual for me."

"But what was the matter?" I asked.

asked. "Ah," he said. "I had immense good luck. •I got up feeling, as I always do, very uncom-fertable, and was beginning to say what I had to say, in what you call 'my usual lackadaisical style, when a rude fellow in the audience blurted out some insulting remark which hit me right between the eyes. It gave me just the stimulus I wanted. My great difficulty, as you know, he added, "is that I never can get sufficiently keen to take off my coat; but that insult gave me just the fillip I wanted. waked me up all over, and I have seldom ever had such a good time."

MR. ALFRED MILNER.

(From a photograph taken in 1885, when he was on the staff of the Pall Mall Gazette.)

"Milner," I said, "I wish to goodness I could insult you every morning before you start work." And then we both laughed, as indeed we were in the habit of doing, to an extent not very usual in newspaper offices before or since. Looking back on those old days, we were almost as schoolboys together, having, to use again his old phrase, "great larks" nearly every day.

"THE UNIVERSITY TIP."

he

to ry

he

er

re

al

ne

ng

d,

or

·I

0,

d

gI

11

,,

e

e ek

e

n

t

e

y

Milner was the restraining element in the partnership, which, indeed, was inevitable, owing to the difference of our temperaments, but his contribution to the combination was invaluable. Milner-to quote again a saying which I have often quoted before concerning him-was, in Dean Church's phrase, "the finest flower of human culture" which the University of Oxford produced in our time. He possessed not only classical culture, but that undefinable element which Horace Voules, who was then the Manager of the Pall Mall Gazette as well as of Truth, used to describe as "the University tip." Being partly German, for his boyhood was passed in Stuttgart, where his father, if I remember right, had been a physician, he possessed a continental side to his mind which was, at that time, as impossible to me as the "University tip" itself.

HIS JINGOISM.

I was Russian; he was German; but we were both fervid Imperialists. He was a bit of a Jingo, whereas I then, as always, regarded Jingoism with a whole-hearted abhorrence. I was a very enthusiastic Gladstonian; he was Gladstonian with limitations and reserves. remember in one of our innumerable discussions that we used to have upon the great anti-Jingo agitation which hurled Beaconsfield from power, he defined the different points of view rather closely. He said: "To you that agitation was one whole, and you ran it for all it was worth; but to me that agitation had two sides, with one of which I sympathise heartily, while the other I detested with my whole soul. That which I supported was that which Mr. Gladstone represented when he appealed to our sense of duty to make whatever sacrifices might be necessary in order to liberate the Bulgarians; but Mr. Gladstone, I very much fear, would never have been able to have made more than a mere demonstration if behind him he had not had legions of a very different order of mind - the men who halloed with him, not because of any high sentiment of British duty, but merely because of a sluggish repugnance to any great national effort, and cowardly shrinking from anything that might lead to war. There was the knightly side of it, and the cowardly side, and Mr. Gladstone led the combined host to victory; but as for me, I had much more sympathy with Beaconsfield and the Jingoes than I had with your peace-at-any-price crowd that helped to give victory to Mr. Gladstone, when he was advocating principles which they detested almost as much as Lord Beaconsfield's." "You are all right," he would say to me often; "it is your followers I dislike, and it is a constant source of entertainment to me to see how you contrive to keep them in line, and make them quite enthusiastic when so many of them have an absolutely opposite conception of national life to that which you entertain."

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE "P. M. G."

He was speaking of the "Little England" contingent in the Liberal ranks. At the time when Mr. Morley left the Pall Mall Gazette it was almost regarded as heresy in the Liberal Party to speak enthusiastically about empire. We set ourselves to preach with passionate enthusiasm what we considered to be the sane and righteous Imperialism. At first we were very largely as voices crying in the wilderness; but before long such rapid progress was made with the propaganda, that many "Little Englanders" discovered not only that they were stout Imperialists, but that they had always been devoted to the Empire since they were born. We founded in those days, Milner and I, a veritable school of political thought. The Gospel according to the Pall Mall Gazette may have been a true gospel or a false one, but there was not the least doubt as to the energy, the enthusiasm and confidence with which we preached it on all occasions. It was a composite gospel, to which Milner and I contributed in unequal proportions. Milner, despite his Liberal Jingoism, was more concerned at that time with social questions.

A SOCIALIST OF THE CHAIR.

It was he who first introduced and popularised in England what the Germans call "socialism of the chair," that kind of academic socialism which confines itself to the realising of the socialistic ideals wherever opportunity offers. Our own municipal socialists, who find vigorous supporters in the Liberal Press, had Milner as their forerunner. He was not a fiery-eyed apostle, he was always somewhat of a kid-gloved gentleman; but his heart was in the right place, and he always rejoiced when he could call public attention to the necessity for remedying some social wrong. The first great coup of the Pall Mall Gazette, after Mr. Morley left it, was the booming of the "Bitter Cry of Outcast London," an exploit which led Lord Salisbury to take action and caused the appointment of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor, from which modern social legislation may almost be said to date. Milner had charge of the Housing Question after the boom was launched, but, as often happens in such a movement, a bold initiative causes a multitude to spring into the field, whose exertions speedily cause those who started the thing to become lost to the public eye. Stirring times followed, and Milner became more than ever indispensable.

MILNER, 1883-5.

It was not that he wrote much, for he wrote little. As I look back, I regret that his duties were so often reduced to the mere reading of proofs and toning down of excrescences, and generally seeing that "the University tip" was duly in evidence. He was very good-natured. He never pushed himself; and as I was always at the office long before he arrived, I had the driving business almost entirely in my own hands. But his sympathy and support, his generous recognition of whatever had been accomplished, helped me more than innumerable leaders. I well remember the day after the announcement was made that Gordon was ordered to the Soudan. He came into the office, and, as he began unbuttoning his coat, he remarked: "I think that is the biggest thing you have done yet."

Alas! neither of us foresaw that the bloody welter in the Soudan which we hoped Gordon would stay would be still weltering on, down even to the present time.

REMINISCENCES OF BYGONE DAYS.

I do not remember having any serious difference of opinion with Milner upon any question that was handled in the Pall Mall. He was never an obstreperous person. He never "slopped over." He kept on the even tenour of his way, quietly and suavely, looking at his chief with a humorous twinkle in his eye, and modulating his zeal by half cynical, half humorous comments, which left no sting, and often averted mischief. "Do not be Orlando Furioso," said Cardinal Manning to me once, and what Cardinal Manning said on that occasion Milner was always saying, but in a most charming way and in a fashion which no one could ever resent. He was as great a favourite at Wimbledon as he was at Northumberland Street. He used to come down very often in those days, and sit about the garden smoking a cigar. "There is nothing," he would say, "so healthy as a fat cigar"; or he would be driving about Richmond Park in our low phaeton in the days when what he used to call "our good socialistic pony" was still in the land of the living. He had long legs, had Milner, and he used to have considerable difficulty in disposing of them in the little trap. They usually would hang outside, and as he never wore his hat when he could possibly go bare-headed, and all the spare places in the phaeton were filled up with children, we made a somewhat amusing picture. We were photographed one Derby Day, I remember, when we were out driving near Hampton Court, by an itinerant photographer, who took the group for a shilling. I have hunted for that photograph in order to illustrate this article, but alas! it is put away safely in one of those places where it may be found after many days, but where it cannot assuredly be found to-day.

MILNER AS A JOURNALIST.

Milner wrote a sketch of me once, at the time of "The Maiden Tribute," in some magazine. I have often wished I could lay my hands upon it, and more especially to-day, in order that I might quote it here. Having said so much of what I thought of him, what he thought of me would complete the picture. I would quote it the more readily, for it was by no means altogether complimentary. I think the unkindest thing he said about me in that article, if I remember, was that I was a kind of compound of Don Quixote and Phineas T. Barnum, which is a pictures ue way of saying that while I pursued high ideals, I never forgot the absolute necessity of keeping the machine going by which alone I could hope to gain an audience. "The Maiden Tribute" tried Milner severely, but he was very good about it. At that time his connection with the paper was wearing thin. Mr. Cook was coming more to the front, and it was no surprise to me, although a great regret, when he decided to abandon journalism for another career. That he chose wisely the result has abundantly shown, for as journalist he lacked an all-round interest in things. He had too much of the "University tip" about him, was too much absorbed in a few questions, and utterly unable to throw himself heart and soul into the management of the news department. His physical energy was deficient. He often suffered from sleeplessness, and he needed to take care of himself. The true iournalist never thinks of taking care of anything but his newspaper. Some of us are fortunate enough to have wives to take all other duties off our shoulders. Milner, unfortunately, never married. We often used to chaff him about this, that and the other lady who ought to have been the complement of his existence; but he has persevered in his bachelorhood even to this day. Arthur Balfour, Cecil Rhodes, and Alfred Milner are the three most distinguished bachelors of our time. Considering their eminence in their various departments, the human race may be forgiven if it cherishes a grudge against their persistent refusal to found a family.

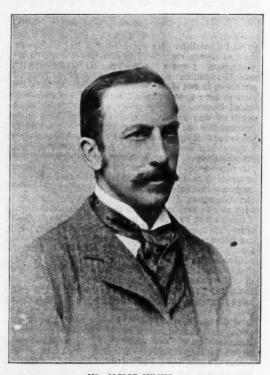

HIS CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE PRESS.

Milner wrote Occasional Notes every day, leaders about once a week, and "middles" and reviews occasionally. The only article he wrote in a lighter vein which I can remember at this moment was an imaginary diary of some savages who visited London. I suggested the subject, and he took to it with zest. It was a long article, which was published in two parts, and described with considerable humour the impressions made upon the ingenuous savage on visiting such trophies of civilisation as the underground railway, etc. It was very well done, and I remember that it completely took in at least one reader, who in his innocence imagined that the untutored African had actually written the diary which Milner had concocted in his name. When I was away, Milner assumed the editorial chair. He was heart and soul with me in all the Gordon business, and was especially enthusiastic when I was writing "The Truth about the Navy." It does one good to look back to the old days when Russell Lowell said the Pall Mall Gazette edited England, and when a much smaller man, Harold Frederic, declared that if ever a newspaper came near running an Empire, it was the Pall Mall Gazette when Milner and I were at the helm.

II.-FROM THE P.M.G. TO SOUTH AFRICA.

When I went to gaol over "The Maiden Tribute," Milner appealed to the Harrow division as a Liberal candidate.

MR. ALFRED MILNER.
(From a photograph taken when he was in Egypt, 1890.)

He failed—as any Liberal would fail in the Harrow division. It was just immediately before the great Home Rule split. Milner then was devoted to Mr. Goschen, whose secretary he afterwards became, and so gained that initiation into the everyday routine of administering the Empire which stood him in such good stead.

HIS APPRENTICESHIP WITH MR. GOSCHEN.

Mr. Goschen was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Milner applied himself with a will to master the whole business of the department. He had never displayed any particular fondness for figures when at Northumberland Street, and sometimes when he had to deal with statistics the way in which he sprawled

hi

ex

as

th

SO

wl

50 sit

H

for

ed

un

the

the sec

COL

on

at

it e wo

an

the

mu

Me

res

his figures about the sheet was a caution for gods and I suppose at the Treasury he restrained the exuberance of his arithmetic within more sedate proportions, but certain it is that Mr. Goschen regarded him as an ideal secretary. He found in the collar-work of the office that stimulus to sustained exertion which he sometimes lacked at Northumberland Street. Milner, when talking to a friend one time, paid me a very handsome compliment, when he advised him to obtain a situation on the Pall Mall Gazette, "for," he said, "believe me, to work day by day in the newspaper office with Stead is a liberal education in itself." His friend was sufficiently impressed by his advice to come and offer me his services free, gratis and for nothing, for the sake of the education aforesaid, an offer I did not see my way to accept. But Milner's education as an administrator was not gained in the Pall Mall Gazette office so much as at the Treasury, given a vigour and verve to his English which it used to lack at Northumberland Street. There was also visible in every page a stalwart faith in his country, which, although he had always possessed it, had seldom been expressed with such sustained vigour and unhesitating confidence. Milner, it was evident, had improved his health as well as his style in Egypt. I remember saying to him one day, "Milner, if you only had my health and my faith, there is nothing in the Empire which you could not attain." For he had so many advantages which I lacked. He replied, laughing, "I do not know about your faith, but I would give anything for your digestion."

AT SOMERSET HOUSE.

He seemed to have picked up some digestion in the land of the Pharaohs, and when he returned to England to take charge of Somerset House, he was in a much under Mr. Goschen. It is Mr. Goschen's influence which gave him his official backbone. There is a good deal of the old Pall Maller about Milner still, as any one can see who reads his despatches; but the official Milner, Milner the Administrator, must be regarded as more the product of Mr. Goschen than of any other man.

ON THE NILE: NEAR CAIRO.

MILNER IN EGYPT.

From the Treasury he went to Cairo, to be financial secretary under Lord Cromer, who may be said to have completed his education. Of his official work there only those can speak who worked with him. To the public at large his sojourn in Egypt is chiefly remarkable because it enabled him to write that admirable survey of England's work on the Nile which, from the moment of its appearance, was accepted everywhere as the standard work on the subject. I was surprised, on reading it, to find how much Milner's style had improved since he was on the Pall Mall. The close contact with men and affairs, and the responsible duties of administrative government, had better physical condition than he was before he went away. At Somerset House, at the head of the Inland Revenue Department, he remained for some years. According to his official chiefs and to those who had to look up to him as official superior, he was a faultless civil servant. Whether servant or master, Milner was always civil; and he had a faculty of getting on with people which stood him in good stead when he had to work with such widely contrasted Chancellors of the Exchequer as Sir William Harcourt and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.

HIGH COMMISSIONER.

He never regarded his stay at Somerset House as the culmination of his career. Milner was a man of deep rather than of loud ambitions, and we who believed in him were always delighted to seize any and every opportunity to help him to positions in which he could realise his ideals. The position which he coveted in the rare moments in which he would speak of his future was

d

on-

ned

in

stic

It

sell

nd

red

re.

at

ier

te.

Photograph by]
SIR ALFRED MILNER LEAVING THE CONFERENCE.

the position of Finance Minister of India, a position to which he thought he might not unreasonably aspire. When Sir Henry Loch retired from the Governorship of the Cape, I had a long discussion with Mr. Rhodes as to who would be the best man to send out as High Commissioner of South Africa. Rhodes was bent upon having Sir Hercules Robinson back again. I was quite as strong in favour of Milner. Milner laughed in his good-humoured way when I told him of the discussion, and said that I might as well spare myself the trouble, because there was no more chance of his being appointed to South Africa than there was of his being Viceroy of India. Mr. Rhodes unfortunately had his way, and Sir Hercules Robinson went back to South Africa to close a long career in the gloom of the Raid. I have often wondered since then what would have happened if Milner had been sent out to South Africa when first I proposed it. Events would have been different, that at least is certain. After Lord Rosmead's return, when another High Commissioner was wanted, I again pressed urgently for Milner's appointment. This time Rhodes agreed with me. Milner, however, wrote me a long letter saying that there were five reasons which rendered it absolutely impossible that he could be sent out. He wrote out two of these reasons, and then said that as they were quite conclusive, he would spare me three, four, and five. Nevertheless, to his great astonishment, Mr. Chamberlain, who was certainly free from any imputation of acting under my influence, or of approaching the choice from my standpoint, selected Milner. And so it came to pass that my old assistanteditor at the Pall Mall became Governor of the Cape and High Commissioner for South Africa.

we vin

lar

to

the

wh

En

vei

vic

So

the pos

jud

to we:

see

im

gre

inc

alit

Rh

fut

do

Co

har

wo

THE DOCTRINE OF THE FREE HAND AND BLIND EYE.

I have deemed it best in writing this Character Sketch to indulge in personal reminiscences of my old and dearly loved colleague. To appreciate the man, to understand his character, possibly those reminiscences are more useful than a far more laboured attempt to describe the incidents of his career or to subject him to the analysis of a formal essay. Since he went out to South Africa I have heard from him but seldom. He seemed to me the right man in the right place, and in the old Pall Mall days he and I had laid it down as one of the fundamental articles of the Gospel according to the Pall Mall Gazette that in governing an empire like ours, the only way of safety is first to choose your best man, then to give him a free hand, and turn a blind eye to anything he may do that does not exactly square with your ideas as to what should be done. Nothing can be more foolish than to be perpetually pulling the leg of your proconsul by telegrams from Downing Street. Given that he is the best man whom the Empire can produce, you cannot as a rule do better than give him his head, so long as he does not manifestly lose his sense of the comparative importance of things. There is always a danger that strong, capable natures may mistake their province or their colony for the hub of the universe, and persist in subordinating the Empire and all the appurtenances thereof to the

Photograph by]
FRESIDENT KRUGER LEAVES THE CONFERENCE.

[Clark.

[Clark.

welfare of their own particular province. Milner is a man who from training and temperament was singularly free from the danger of yielding to such temptation. He had studied the infinite complexity of the influences which affected the foreign policy of the Empire at Cairo, and often in conversation he had expressed his conviction that the great danger of our South Africa policy lay in forgetting its dependence upon, and relation to, the general politics of the Empire. No African-born politician could possibly be expected to have that breadth of survey and balance of judgment which Milner possessed.

nt-

me

gh

ND

ng

in nd

er,

re

ed

of

he he

ve

le

he

as

he

all

re

st

ve

ye

ot

to

an ul

is

ot

ne

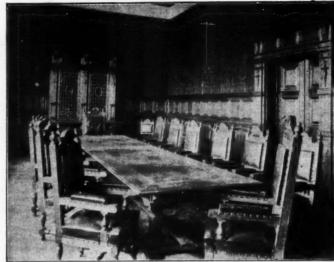

ve

ny

"GO IT BLIND ON MILNER."

Hence, as soon as he was appointed to South Africa, knowing that he went there with a determination to seek peace and ensure it, knowing also that he appreciated to the full the importance of harmonising the two great factors which find their leading incarnations in the two great personalities of Paul Kruger and Cecil Rhodes, I felt quite easy as to the future in that portion of the Queen's dominions. No doubt Mr. Chamberlain was at Downing Street, and so long as "Blastus" reigned in the Colonial Office we could never be sure of what might happen. I knew Milner well enough to feel sure that it would be more than Mr. Chamberlain could do to deflect him from the course which he considered safest and best for

Photograph by

[Clark.

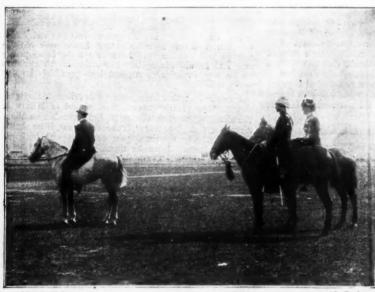

THE ROOM IN WHICH THE CONFERENCE WAS HELD.

the Empire. When he first went out, there was a danger that Mr. Chamberlain's influence and authority might have weighed too much in the counsels of the High Commissioner, but after the first six months I felt secure. Milner set himself to learn Dutch, and wherever he went up and down the Colony, he devoted himself with all his unequalled charm of address and suavity of manner to conciliating enemies and welding the various races into one. The situation was difficult, but he seemed to be overcoming the obstacles one by one. The trouble in Basutoland subjected him to a very severe strain, which he triumphantly surmounted, not, however, without risk of losing his position. But Milner was never a man to count his future or his reputation dear unto him, if by sacrificing either or both he could serve his country.

HIS LATEST DEVELOPMENT.

It was therefore with very profound astonishment that I heard just before leaving for the Conference at the Hague, that Milner had decided to adopt a policy in the Transvaal from which almost every Rhodesian in London, with the exception of Dr. Jameson, seemed disposed to recoil. Dr. Jim, indeed, was full of fight and would hear of nothing but putting things through by

Photograph by]

[S. Taylor.

THE GOVERNOR OF CAPE COLONY AT THE SALUTING POINT.

(Queen's Birthday Review at Cape Town.)

the summary process of embarking an army corps on the water and preparing to fight for South Africa as we fought for India when the Mutiny was raging in Hindostan. But the very demands which Dr. Jameson insisted upon as indispensable seemed to many of us the most conclusive arguments against the adoption of the policy which he advocated. Moreover, owing to the unfortunate issue of the Raid, Dr. Jameson's judgment as to the possibility of overcoming the resistance of the Boers was necessarily discounted. It was much the same with Mr. Chamberlain. He was distinctly a minus influence, for the fact that he advocated any course told against it rather than in its favour. Milner was a horse of another colour. So strongly did I feel this that in every question relating to South Africa I was prepared and am prepared to follow him blindfold, so long as he stops short of ultimatum point. We could not have a better man if we searched the Empire through. He is a man of calm judicial judgment, entirely free from all party prejudice or from petty personal ambitions. Nothing could be further from his calm and well-balanced temperament than the vulgar longing to wipe out Majuba Hill, nor could any one be less likely to overlook the frightful dangers of aggravating a race feud between Dutch and English which would be a fatal bane of our South African Empire. He is a just man, and a good man, chivalrous and loyal; but while all this leads me to follow him unhesitatingly in any policy that does not depend for its success upon war, I cannot bring myself to admit that even Milner should be permitted to lead us into a war with the Transvaal.

III.-HIS PRESENT POSITION.

On looking over the preceding pages, I feel it just to my dear friend and old colleague to ask whether we have not done him grave injustice in thinking that he has ever contemplated war as the result of his recent action. I have already quoted the message which Mr. Garrett sent me, and I am quite certain that Milner would recoil as much as any man from the terrible responsibility of endeavouring to cut the Gordian knot of South African politics by the sword. What I should like to believe is that Milner thought he saw his way clear to induce Kruger to make reasonable concessions by å policy of vigorous pressure which without repudiating all appeal to arms in advance nevertheless did not contemplate the making of war.

THE EXCUSE FOR HIS TELEGRAM.

Milner's telegram of May 4th, which I quote elsewhere, may never have been intended to be published until after the crisis had passed. Published as it was after the breakdown of the Bloemfontein Conference, it had a most unfortunate effect in stimulating our Jingoes into a wild and brutal display of their worst characteristics. There are amongst us, as we all know too well to our cost, many lewd fellows of the baser sort, who are utterly incapable of realising any policy of magnanimity, and who cherish the meanest and most vindictive feelings towards those who they consider worsted them in no matter how fair a fight. It might seem incredible that men who are never weary of boasting of the greatness and might of our world-encircling Empire should be guilty of the infinite pettiness of cherishing a rankling grudge against the little State of herdsmen which inflicted upon us a series of petty defeats, defeats which we well deserved, if only from cur stupidity and rashness; but incredible though it may seem there are such men.

Nor are they regarded with the contempt which is their due.

to

fr

a u

d ir

H

of 01

0

fr

Slo

W

n

in

MISCHIEF DONE BY ITS PUBLICATION.

Milner's despatch, which might be perfectly justifiable if it is regarded solely as an appeal to the Cabinet to allow him a free hand in dealing with the reactionary party in the Transvaal, assumed altogether a different light when it was supplied as a dram of raw brandy to the Jingo maniacs of our people. Instantly a hid ous clamour arose, in the midst of which Milner's real policy was confounded with the mere passionate lust for war and vengeance of those to whom his phrases most appeal. Even now I prefer to think that the difficulty will be got through without war, for against war on such grounds, against such a puny adversary, there is an insuperable repugnance on the part of the British people. At the same time undoubtedly those persons who support Milner most strongly are people who parade their readiness to go to war, and regard war as a less evil than a policy of patient steady pressure which Milner himself seemed to advocate after returning from the Bloemfontein Conference.

AN APPEAL FROM THE CAPE.

Here, for instance, is a letter addressed to me by a friend at the Cape. It runs thus:—

"Pin yourself to Milner publicly and also privately, and do what you can to keep the Liberals in line, for if they bust Milner up, they will be making British hold on South Africa rock a bit too, and you know I don't talk like that often. Keep Rhodes of the scene as to Transvaal affairs. This is John Bull's turn to have a try. I genuinely as a Liberal prefer a settlement to war, though war and annexation seem shorter cuts; but settlement we must have. Drift or retirement now or vacillation would be more dangerous than war, though that is no child's play. I am as firm for acting now as I was against acting in 1896 and 1897. There is a tide, etc., and it is now or never. We must be friends with the Dutch, but first, and as a condition precedent, we will be equals. Milner's willingness to risk his career first in Basutoland crisis little known, but stricus scene after he came cut with generals warning and Home Government funking showed what stuff he was made of. He won on that occasion, and I am sure if he is adequately supported he will win again. His action in this crisis has been a new revelation to me, and it is proud of him that we ought to be.

I received another letter from a subscriber in England, which shows clearly enough that support of Milner in the minds of many entails as its indispensable corollary a readiness to go to war with the Transvaal, if he should so advise. But therein I part company with both my correspondents. I am as much against vacillation or drift as any one; but I absolutely dissent from the theory that war and annexation is a shorter cut than patience and pressure.

PRESSURE, NOT WAR.

Pressure, steady and resolute—with that I agree with all my heart. From pressure carried to the point of throat-cutting in the Transvaal, I recoil. It ought not to be. It may be very harassing, and it is no doubt extremely worriting to have to deal with a small boy who throws stones at you, and makes himself an unmitigated nuisance on the other side of your garden wall; but although you may send the police after him, and may birch him if you can catch him, no amount of worry will justify you in blowing out his brains as a relief for your angry feelings. To make war upon the Transvaal on no better grounds than that the internal condition of the country is a worry and a danger to Africa, seems to me very much like such a method of ridding yourself of your small tormentor.

MILNER'S SPEECH.

Milner's speech after his return from Bloemfontein seemed a sane, sensible, Milner-like utterance. That was made for the public, whereas the other despatch may only have been made for the Cabinet. It is certainly very much unlike Milner to fling abroad firebrands such as the effective phrases which bristle in his despatch to Mr. Chamberlain; and until it is proved to the contrary, I prefer to believe what a South African correspondent calls the legend of the "safe and cautious Milner," all appearances to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE SHADOW OF THE COLOSSUS.

There is little doubt that the absence of Mr. Rhodes from South Africa tended to hurry Sir Alfred Milner's action. "What is the Latin for Rhodes?" asked an undergraduate when Mr. Rhodes received his doctor's degree at Oxford the other day. The obvious answer was "Colossus," and Mr. Rhodes is such a Colossus that the High Commissioner could take no step whatever of a serious nature in South Africa if Mr. Rhodes was on the spot, without its being believed both in Africa and at home that he was acting at the instigation or under the inspiration of the founder of Rhodesia. Even here in Holland the Dutch persist that Mr. Rhodes is at the back of it all, and when I say that he is in London, they ask sarcastically whether the cables have been cut since Cecil Rhodes arrived in London.

A DIFFICULT POSITION.

Sir Alfred Milner is no doubt in an extremely difficult position. He stands between the devil and the deep sea. On the one hand, he has to bluff the Boers into establishing something like a decent Government in the Transvaal; on the other, he has to keep the Jingo pack well in hand, and this he can only do by posing as their leader. If only the whole of South Africa could be suddenly cut off from the rest of the Empire for the next six months and Sir Alfred Milner was left to settle the question with the local forces existing on that continent, there would be no war, and there would be some settlement which, although not all that might be wished for, would nevertheless be infinitely better than the best settlement that can be obtained by overrunning the Transvaal with a British force.

A WORKING HYPOTHESIS.

It is a difficult and invidious thing to criticise a governor who is placed in such a delicate and difficult position; but if I were to endeavour to construct from the materials supplied by telegram in the last month a working hypothesis of a High Commissioner whose policy I could support, I should say that Milner at the Bloemfontein Conference succeeded in extracting from Paul Kruger a series of concessions which, although inadequate in themselves, nevertheless afforded a good basis for a durable settlement. The difference between five years and seven years as the term for naturalisation was trivial, and it no doubt did not count for much in the final rupture : but the other conditions with which President Kruger clogged his concession in the matter of the Franchise robbed his first concession of much of its virtue. But certainly, looked at from this distance, there seemed to be no reason whatever for regarding the effort of President Kruger as so hopelessly inadequate as to justify breathing out threatenings and slaughters immediately he refused to accept our proposals.

ALL MERE HIGGLING OF THE MARKET.

But if I were to judge Milner by what I knew of him in the past, I should say that he recognised this as keenly as any one, and that all the subsequent agitation and demonstration was merely intended to strengthen his own hand in the further negotiations which are certain to take place. It is a dangerous game, no doubt, appealing to the passions of one race in order to play a bold game of bluff with the representatives of another race; but so long as it is only bluff no one would interfere with Milner's liberty of action. Such methods of bargaining may be indispensable in the position in which he finds himself. Certainly if as the net result he should secure some adequate concessions for the Uitlanders, some reasonable prospect of real redress for the bitter grievances of which they complain, he will have reason to consider that, however dangerous the road by which he has journeyed, he has deserved well of his country and of the Empire. If, however, as the outcome of his negotiations, he should find it necessary to appeal to the sword, no military success however brilliant, no conquest however complete, will prevent us from regarding his governorship of the Cape as a disastrous failure.

h is

able et to nary

rent

y to

20US

olicy

war

ceal.

got

nds,

able

the port heir

evil

lner

the y a

do l bust

rica

ten.

ohn

tle-

its;

or t is inst

or is a

s to cus

me

He

has

hat

nd.

in iry ild ny or or ce

th of ot bt by an en, of ef s-

Photograph by]

PRESIDENT PAUL KRUGER

[Herwick Bros.

refu and thei Free of the stat sent Eng you Gov posit bad buck an a these as your stan defe posa latic sove

you happa a n previous file of their their their their their their their their selves a first the selves first their the pop to gold pop not mad muc bein

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

WAR OR PEACE WITH THE TRANSVAAL.

I.-POINT OF VIEW.

"IF Ireland were to be overrun by French workmen, who insisted upon being governed by French laws, refused to have their children taught English, refused to pay income tax, no matter how rich they were, and then appealed to the French Government to secure their rights, what would you think of it? Further, if the French Government were always to adopt the complaints of these French immigrants, were to keep a French fleet stationed off the Irish coast, and make menacing representations whenever any Frenchman was maltreated by English policemen, how would you like it? Do you think that under such circumstances you would regard a French complaint that the English Government did not show a friendly and trustful dis-position in its dealings with France as other than a very bad joke? Further, if, after all this, some French buccaneers made a raid upon Dublin, and came within an ace of seizing the castle, what would you think when these men were hailed as heroes and patriots in France, as you may remember Jameson and his men were treated in England? What would you do under such circumstances? Would you or would you not arm in selfdefence? Would you or would you not regard any pro-posal to enfranchise the whole French immigrant population as equivalent to a demand for the surrender of your sovereignty in Ireland? To make the parallel complete, you ought to imagine that after such circumstances had happened, France justified the surrounding of Ireland by a naval cordon on the plea that it was necessary to prevent the Irish invading France!"

"PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE."

So writes to me a Dutch lady, whom I had the pleasure of meeting the other day in a charming country house in the neighbourhood of Amsterdam. The parallel may or may not be inexact; but it will help us to put ourselves in the place of the Boers. Of course the answer to my correspondent's argument is that while there is no doubt that, although we should not like the presence of the French immigrants in such numbers in Ireland, if we had invited them to come in, had promised them equal rights with our own people, and then had refused to keep our word, if we had refused to reform a government admittedly corrupt and detrimental to the best interests both of the Irish and the French, and if, further, we were drawing almost the whole revenue of the State from the wealth and industry of the immigrants, we might feel very vexed with the French, but we could hardly deny that they had a good deal to say for them-

THE UITLANDERS.

I have no very great admiration for the Uitlander population. As Mr. Garrett reported, after his first visit to Johannesburg, the heterogeneous population of the gold-reefed city is not exactly an ideal community. A population that is given to wine, women and gambling is not the stuff out of which successful revolutions can be made. Nevertheless the Johannesburgers, although much inferior to the God-fearing old Boers, are human beings after all, and they have a claim to be treated as such. Taxation without representation is tyranny.

Resistance to tyrants we are always told is one of the first duties which the free man owes to his Maker. No doubt it is hard upon the Boers that a territory which they had marked out as their own, should have contained such vast deposits of gold as to have attracted to that country a swarm of foreigners, alien in blood, in language, and in religion. But they admitted these men within their borders under the express engagement that they would let them share the rights of their own people. These men have built up a great industry; they have filled the exchequer of the Transvaal Government, and all that they ask in exchange is that they should be governed decently, that they should not be fleeced unmercifully, and that they should have some security for the elementary rights of human beings. Instead of this they are subjected to arbitrary legislation, passed by an assembly in which they have no voice, and they are maltreated by a corrupt police. Hence agitation, unrest and continually recurring crises threatening to culminate in war.

THE OBJECTION TO THEIR CLAIMS.

"But," reply r y Dutch friends, "Se foreigners have no need to come into the country at all. It is not their country, and if they don't like the conditions which prevail there, they can stay away. They have no right to enter another people's country, and then insist upon revolutionising the Government merely to suit themselves."

THE BOERS UITLANDERS THEMSELVES.

Underlying this contention are several principles, none of which can be taken for granted. The first of these is that the Transvaal is the Boers' own country. How did it become their own country? Their title-deeds are quite recent. The Boer simply went into the black man's country and revolutionised it in order to suit his own needs. If the black man objected, he killed him if he could, or reduced him to a position not very easily distinguished from that of slavery. The Boer, in short, fifty years ago, was the Uitlander in the Transvaal. He dispossessed the original inhabitants, and if the Uitlanders were to dispossess him to-day they would but be meting out to him the same measure which he meted out to his predecessors.

HAS THE DOG IN THE MANGER A DIVINE RIGHT?

Another principle assumed is that because a handful of men establish themselves as the owners of a great tract of territory, therefore they have a Divine right to exclude others at their own will from the use and enjoyment of that territory. This right, it is further assumed, is not impaired in the least by their utter inability themselves to utilise the mineral resources which lie under their feet. This principle may be sound, but it is not the principle upon which England has ever acted in relation to her own colonies or dependencies. The colonies which we occupy have always been thrown open to all the world, and those who take part in the developing of the resources of the colony are admitted as citizens freely with men of our own breed.

THE RIGHT TO THE FRANCHISE.

The claim of the Dutch runs counter to the fundamental principle upon which the English-speaking race proceeds wherever it finds itself in a local majority. Everywhere and always English-speaking communities resent being compelled to obey laws and pay taxes which they have had no share in enacting or levying. George III. forgot that principle more than one hundred years ago, and we lost our American colonies in consequence. Since then we have never ventured to tax or control a local majority of English-speaking men, in whatever land they may have settled, without allowing them full and equal representation in the governing assembly. This rule is acted upon so invariably by English-speaking men that it has come to be regarded as an axiom in politics. The contention of the Boers is absolutely at variance with this doctrine. They hold that although they are outnumbered by two to one, the minority has a perpetual right to govern the majority. This conflict of rights can only have one result. Sooner or later the majority will overturn the minority, and until the pyramid is placed upon its base instead of standing upon its apex, things will be in a condition of unstable equilibrium in the Transvaal.

CAUSE FOR REVOLUTION, NOT FOR WAR.

At the same time, whilst holding this general principle, from which probably no English-speaking man will dissent either in Britain or the United States, that is a very different thing from approving of outside interference in order to secure the majority its rights. If the majority is worth its salt, it will organise to secure its rights for itself. We shall be very glad to give them our moral support to the uttermost, but armed intervention in order to subvert the rule of the minority is not at all to our taste. There is good reason to believe that the constant dread of this outside interference has aggravated the local conditions of distrust and disorder. If the Uitlanders and the Boers had been left face to face with each other in an island in mid-ocean, without any fear of outside interference, they would probably have arranged a modus vivendi long ago. Unfortunately the Transvaal is not in the midst of the ocean, but is surrounded with communities which are inhabited by people of the same blood, the same passions, and the same languages as those which inhabit the Transvaal. The unrest of the Transvaal creates unrest throughout the whole of Africa. Hence the action taken by Sir Alfred Milner in order to induce President Kruger, if possible, to make some solid concession on the question of the Franchise which would enable the Uitlanders to do something to protect themselves.

II.-SIR ALFRED MILNER'S CASE.

These general considerations indicate the standpoint from which I approach the question. I do not expect that it will be regarded as satisfactory either by my Dutch friends or by the thorough-going Imperialists; but unless both sides of the question are taken into account it is impossible to arrive at anything but a very partial and distorted judgment. 'Instead of discussing at length the various points raised in controversy between the Boers and the British, I shall perhaps serve the public interest best by reproducing here the most important utterances on the subject, namely, a summary of the proposals made on either side at the Bloemfontein Conference, and Sir Alfred Milner's speech on returning to Cape Town. As a corrective of this exclusively British statement of the case, I quote at length from Olive Schreiner's "Words in Season," in which she sets forth the arguments in favour of patience.

THE PETITION TO THE QUEEN.

The present ferment in the Transvaal arose out of the killing of an English working man of the name of Edgar by a policeman who was afterwards acquitted. The victims of police violence abound in many countries beside the Transvaal, and if the incident had happened in Chicago, where the administration of justice is by no means altogether free from the influence of political pulls, nothing would have been said about the matter. As it was in Johannesburg, the Edgar incident, taken together with the unpunished murder of the wife of a Wesleyan minister of the name of Applebee, gave point and edge to the general discontent. The Uitlanders got up a great petition to the Queen setting forth their grievances in a document to which some twenty thousand names were appended. Other Uitlanders—according to President Kruger, equaling in number those who sent the petition to the Queen—got up a counter memorial; but with that we need not at present concern ourselves.

OUR RIGHT OF INTERFERENCE.

The Uitlanders' petition to the Queen, calling upon her to redress their wrongs, could be justified on three grounds. The first and weakest was that which invoked her interference as suzerain of the Transvaal; but as her suzerainty was abolished in terms by the Convention, and only exists in shadow in the stipulation forbidding the conclusion of treaties with foreign Powers without our consent, no further stress need be laid upon that. Much more substantial is the ground of appeal which is b zed upon the fact that President Kruger, at the time of the restoration of the independence of the Transvaal, entered into explicit engagement with the representatives of Her Majesty, promising equal rights to British subjects, which promises have not been fulfilled. It is therefore legitimate and right that those persons who entered the Transvaal relying upon his assurances should appeal to the Power to which they were given to see them righted. The third plea upon which we can rely is the general right which British subjects in every part of the world have to appeal to their sovereign to secure them justice and to protect them against wrong.

SIR ALFRED MILNER'S DESPATCH.

This petition having been forwarded to the Home Government, Sir Alfred Milner, on May 4th, sent the following telegram to Downing Street:—

High Commissioner Sir Alfred Milner to Mr. Chamberlain.

(Received I a.m., May 5th, 1899.)

May 4th.—Having regard to critical character of South African situation and likelihood of early reply by her Maj sty's Government to petition, I am telegraphing remarks which under ordinary circumstances I should have made by despatch. Events of importance have followed so fast on each other since my return to South Africa, and my time has been so occupied in dealing with each incident severally, that I have had no opper cunity for reviewing the whole position.

The present crisis undeubtedly arises cut of the Edgar incident. But that incident mr.ly precipitated a struggle which was certain to come. It is possible to make too much of the killing of Edgar. It was a shocking, and, in my judgment, a criminal blunder, such as would have excited a popular cutery anywhere. It was made much worse by the light way in which it was first dealt with by the Public Prosecutor, and by the attitude of the Judge at the trial. By itself, however, it would not have justified, nor, in fact, prevoked the present storm. But it happened to touch a particularly sore place. There is no grievance which rankles more in the breasts of the mass of the Uillander population than the conduct of the police, who, while they have proved singularly incompet nt to deal with gross scandals like treat have color that facti Leag by E ance that who disre on W ence W of a verte the then have

muc chan the . min any insta grie insta Voll regu Tne Justi whil latio Legi the shou o:he white T by wo of the it is size. mea unawnigh enfrand

11 subj

have

and is or as a agita defer grieve that becauthed Moronly possimate large pr s if th

A

not

like the illicit liquot trade, are harsh and arbitrary in their treatment of individuals whom they happen to dislike, as must have become evident to you from the recurrent ill-treatment of coloured people. There are absolutely no grounds for supposing that the excitement which the death of Edgar caused was factitious. It has been laid to the door of the South African League, but the officials of the League were forced into action by Edgar's fellow-workmen. And, the consideration of grievances once started by the police grievance, it was inevitable that the smouldering but profound discontent of the population who constantly find their affairs mismanaged, their protests disregarded, and their attitude misunderstood by a Government of which they have absolutely no means of exercising any influence, should once more break into flame.

We have, therefore, simply to deal with a popular movement of a similar kind to that of 1894 and 1895 before it was perverted and ruined by a conspiracy of which the great body of the Uitlanders were totally innocent. None of the grievances then complained of, and which then excited universal sympathy, have been remedied, and others have been added. The case is much stronger. It is impossible to overlook the trem:ndcus change for the worse which has been effected by the lowering of the status of the High Court of Judicature and by the establishment of the principle embodied in the new draft Grondwet that any resolution of the Volksraad is equivalent to a law. The instability of the laws has always been one of the most serious grievances. The new Constitution provides for their permanent instability, the Judges being bound by their oath to accept every Volksraad resolution as equally binding with a law passed in the regular form and with the provisions of the Constitution itself. The law prescribing this oath is one of which the present Chief Justice said that no self-respecting man could sit on the Bench while it was on the Statute-book. Formerly the foreign population, however bitterly they might resent the action of the Legislature and of the Administration, had yet confidence in the High Court of Judicature. It cannot be expected that they should feel the same confidence to-day. Seeing no hope in any other quarter, a number of Uitlanders who happened to be British subjects have addressed a petition to her Majesty the Queen. I have already expressed my opinion of its substantial genuineness and the absolute bona fides of its premoters. But the petition is only one proof among many of the profound discontent of the unenfranchised population, who are a great majority of the white inhabitants of the State.

The public meeting of January 14th was indeed broken up by workmen, many of them poor burghers, in the employm and of the Government and instigated by Government officials, and it is impossible at present to hold another meeting of a great size. Open-air meetings are prohibited by law, and by one means or another all large public buildings have been rendered unavailable. But smiller meetings are being held almost nightly along the Rand, and are unanimous in their demand for enfranchisement. The movement is steadily growing in force and extent. With regard to the attempts to represent that movement as artificial, the work of scheming capitalists or professional agitators, I regard it as a wilful perversion of the truth. The defenceless people who are clamouring for a redress of grievances are doing so at great personal risk. It is notorious that many capitalists regard political agitation with disfavour because of its effect on markets. It is equally notorious that the lowest class of Uitlanders, and especially the illicit liquor dealers, have no sympathy whatever with the cause of reform. Moreover, there are in all classes a considerable number who only want to make maney and clear out, and who, while possibly sympathising with reform, feel no great interest in a matter which may only concern them temporarily. large and constantly increasing proportion of the Uitlanders are not birds of passage; they contemplate a long residence in the country or to make it their permanent home. These people are the mainstay of the reform movem nt as they are of the pr sperity of the country. They would make excellent citizens if they had the chance.

A busy industrial community is no naturally prone to political unrest. But they bear the chief burden of taxation; they constantly feel in their business and daily lives the effects of chaotic local legislation and of incompetent and unsympathetic administration; they have many grievances, but they believe all this could be gradutly removed if they had only a fair share of political power. This is the meaning of their vehement domand or enfranchisement. Moreover, they are mostly British subjects, accustomed to a free system and equal rights; they feel deeply the personal indignity involved in a position of permanent subjection to the ruling caste, which owns its wealth and power to their exertion. The political turnoil in the Transvaal Republic will never end till the permanent Uitlander population is admitted to a share in the government, and while that turnoil lasts there will be no tranquillity or adequate progress in her Majesty's South African dominions.

The relations between the British colonies and the two Republics are intimate to a degree which one must live in South Africa in order fully to realise. Socially, economically, ethnologically, they are all one country, the two principal white races are everywhere inextricably mixed up; it is absurd for either to dream of subjugating the other. The only condition on which they can live in harmony and the country progress is equality all round. South Africa can prosper under two, three, or six Governments, but not under two absolutely conflicting social and political systems, perfect equality for Dutch and British in the British colonies side by side with permanent subjection of British to Dutch in one of the Republics. It is idle to talk of peace and unity under such a state of affairs.

It is this which makes the internal condition of the Transvaal Republic a matter of vital interest to her Majesty's Government. No merely local question affects so deeply the welfare and peace of her own South African possessions. And the right of Great Britain to intervene to secure fair treatment of the Uitlanders is fully equal to her supreme interest in securing it. The majority of them are her subjects, whom she is bound to protect. But the enormous number of British subjects, the endless stries of their grievances, and the nature of those grievances, which are not less serious because they are not individually sensational, makes protection by the ordinary diplomatic means impossible. We are, as you know, for ever r monstrating about this, that, and the other injury to British subjects. Only in rare cases and only when we are very emphatic do we obtain any redress. The sare between us and the Transvaal Republic is thus inevitably kept up while the result in the way of protection to cur subjects is lamentably small. For these reasons, it has been, as you know, my constant endeavour to reduce the number of our complaints. I may sometimes have abstained when I ought to have protested from my great dislike of ineffectual nagging. But I feel that the attempt to remedy the hundred and one wrongs springing from a hopeless system by taking up isolated cases is perfectly vain. It may easily lead t) war, but will never lead to real improvement.

The true remedy is to strike at the root of all these injuries—the political impotence of the injured. What diplomatic protests will never accomplish, a fair measure of Ui.lander representation would gradually but surely bring about. It seems a paradox, but it is true, that the only effective way of protecting our subjects is to help them to cease to be our subjects. The admission of Uitlanders to a fair share of political power would no doubt give stability to the Republic. But it would at the same time remove most of our causes of difference with it, and modify and in the long run entirely remove that intense suspicion and bitter hostility to Great Britain which at present deminates its internal and external policy.

The case for intervention is overwhelming. The only attempted answer is that things will right themselves if left alone. But, in fact, the policy of leaving things alone has been tried for years, and it has led to their going from bad to worse. It is not true that this is owing to the raid. They were going from bad to worse before the raid. We, were on the verge of war before the raid, and the Transvaal was on the verge of revolution. The effect of the raid has been to give the policy of leaving things alone a new lease of life, and with the old consequences.

The spectacle of thousands of British subjects kept permanently in the position of helois, constantly chafing under undcubted

the

gar The ries

ned

no

ills,

vas

rof

ral

ion

ent

ed.

al-

-

at

ier

ree

ed

er

n,

ng

ut

at.

15

of

al,

es

S,

re

1e

to

d.

al

ld

1e

1e

h

h ·

1.

d

0 ır

of

y

grievances, and calling vainly to her Majesty's Government for redress, does steadily undermine the influence and reputation of Great Bri ain and the respect for the British Government within the Queen's dominions. A certain section of the Press, not in the Transvaal only, praches openly and constantly the doctrine of a Republic embracing all South Africa, and supports it by menacing references to the armaments of the Transvaal, its alliance with the Orange Free State, and the active sympathy which in case of war it would receive from a section of her Majesty's subjects. I regret to say that this doctrine, supported as it is by a ceaseless stream of malignar! lies about the intentions of her Majesty's Government, is producing a great effect upon a large number of our Dutch fellow-colonists. Language is frequently used which seems to imply that the Dutch have some superior right even in this colony to their fellow-citizens of British birth. Thousands of men peaceably disposed, and, if left alone, perfectly satisfied with their position as British subjects, are being drawn into disaffection, and there is a corresponding exasperation on the side of the British.

I can see nothing which will put a stop to this mischievous propaganda but some striking proof of the intention of her Majesty's Government not to be ousted from its position in South Africa. And the best proof alike of its power and its justice would be to obtain for the Uitlanders in the Transvaal a fair share in the government of the country which owes everything to their exertions. It could be made perfectly clear that our action was not directed against the existence of the Republic. We should only be demanding the re-establishment of rights which now exist in the Orange Free State, and which existed in the Transyaal itself at the time of and long after the withdrawal of E. itish severeignty. It would be no selfish demand, as other Uitlanders besides those of British birth would benefit by it. It is asking for nothing from others which we do not give ourselves. And it would certainly go to the root of the political unrest in South Africa, and, though temporarily it might aggravate, it would ultimately extinguish the race feud which is the great bane of the country.

In response to this emphatic despatch, Mr. Chamberlain wrote a long letter echoing more or less Sir Alfred Milner's remarks, but which need not otherwise concern us. So far as Mr. Chamberlain's personal contribution to South African policy is concerned, it counts for evil, not for good. What we have to do with is Sir Alfred Milner and not Mr. Chamberlain.

THE CONFERENCE WITH MR. KRUGER.

Within three weeks after the despatch of this telegram, Sir Alfred Milner, at the urgent advice of the Ministers at the Cape, consented to confer with President Kruger at Bloemfontein. The Conference began on May 3rd. Sir Alfred Milner, who spoke Dutch, seems to have impressed President Kruger as favourably as he impressed every one who used to see him in the old days at Northumberland Street. He was suavity itself, and his discourse with the old President was pitched in a very different key to that of the telegram of May 4th, which at that time fortunately had not seen the light: After various conversations the two parties failed to come to an agreement. I print in parallel columns the demands made by Sir Alfred Milner and the concessions offered by President Kruger:-

The High Commissioner

proposed:"(1) That the number of years for the acquisition of the franchise should be fixed at five, with retroactive effect.

"(2) That the naturalisation oath shou'd be modified.

"(3) That a fair representati n should be granted to the new population.

President Kruger's counter- : proposal contained in the Memorandum which he handed in on June 2 provided first for naturalisation as follows :-

" (A) New-comers registering themselves within fourteen days after arrival to obtain naturalisation after two years on complying with following conditions :-

"(4) That naturalisation should immediately carry with it the full right to vote.

Sir Alfred Milner said :—
"He had to bear in mind on the one hand prejudices of old burghers and necessity of convincing them that they would not be swamped by new-comers, and on the other hand uselessness of proposing anything which would be re-jected by Uitlanders as totally insufficient, and would not bring them on to the side of the State, throwing in their lot with it and working in future with the old burghers as one people; bearing both these points in mind he proposed that the full franchise should be given to every foreigner who (a) had been resident for five years in the Republic; (b) declared his intention to reside permanently; (c) took an oath to obey the laws, undertake all obligations of citizenship, and defend independence of country; franchase to be confined to persons of good character possessing a certain amount of property or income; finally, some increase of seats in districts where the Uitlanders principally reside; the number of these was a matter for discussion, but it was essential that they should not be so few as to leave the representatives of the new constituencies in a contemptible minority."

" (I) Six months' notice of intention to apply for naturalisation.

afi

on

an

wh

and

the

rel

is 1

ma

wi

sul

COL on

COL

sec

the

to ena

and ren

rad

WO

a s pec

wit

COL

nev

acc

side

ma

to a del

bur

ma

to 1

pre

WO

and

WOI

tue

nun

they beg

var

opi

Gov

sign

WOL

now

bec:

onc

toge

N

" (2) Two years' continuous registration.

" (3) Residence in the South African Republic during that period.

" (4) No dishonouring sentence.

" (5) Proof of obedience to the laws, no act against government or independence.
"(6) Proof of full State citizenship and franchise or title to it in former country.

" (7) Possession of fixed property to value of £150, occupation of house to annual rental of £50, or yearly income of at least £ 200, Government to have the power of granting naturalisation persons not satisfying this condition.

" (8) Oat!. similar to Orange Free State.

"(B) Residents in the Republic before 1890, getting naturalised within six months of the promulgation of this proposed law, and giving six months' notice of their intention to apply for naturalisation, to obtain the full franchise two years after naturalisation on complying with the conditions for the full franchise mentioned above, substituting two for five years; those not getting naturalised within six months to fall under the already mentioned conditions for new-

"(C) Those already resident two years or more to be allowed immediate naturalisation on the above-mentioned naturalisation conditions for new-comers, and to obtain the full franchise five years after naturalisation on compliance with the above-mentioned full franchise conditions.

"(D) Those already naturalised to obtain the full franchise five years after naturalisation on the last mentioned conditions."

E SIR ALFRED MILNER'S SPEECH.

-0: 1 *

After the failure of the Conference, Sir Alfred Milner returned to Cape Town, where he was received with great enthusiasm. A deputation of his supporters waited upon him, presenting him with a congratulatory address, to which he replied in a speech the tone of which was entirely free from all the objections taken to his

On June 10th, after the conference, Sir A. Milner, after thanking a deputation which had waited upon him on his return to Cape Town, said :--

As you are all aware, the recent conference led to no result. It led to no result because the whole discussion turned on the question of the franchise, and on that no agreement was possible. It may be asked, why was so much weight attached to this one question? Well, I fully admit the franchise is only a means to an end, and the end is to obtain fair play for the Uitlander population in the South African Republic. (Lcud cheers.) That is the main concern which her Majesty's Government has in the matter—the protection of the Uitlander population, of which so large a proportion are British subjects. My view was, and is, that the best way to help those people—the best for them, the best for the Republic, and the best for the good relations between the Republic and her Majesty's Government—is to put them in a position to help themselves. (Cheers.) It may be that I conceded too much. It may be that I went too far in giving other questions the go-by for the moment and directing all my efforts to secure for the Uitlanders a position within the State ("No, no"); but my view was this. It was a unique opportunity. To have pressed for the redress of the Uitlanders' grievances one by one, to say nothing of the other subjects of difference, would have been to engage in an irritating controversy, and to spoil the chance of an amicable compromise on broad lines going to the root of the differences.

That controversy which I was so anxious to avoid may have to come yet, but my object at the conference was to avert it. It seemed best to strike straight at the root of the evil by giving the people whose interests her Majesty's Government is bound to defend (cheers) such a share of political power as would enable them gradually to redress their grievances themselves, and to strengthen, not to weaken, the country of their adoption in the process. But just because I was relying on a single remedy it was absolutely essential that that remedy should be a radical one. It was useless, indeed, worse than useless, and would only have led to worse trouble later on, to have accepted a scheme so framed-I do not say so designed-as not to bring people in but to keep them out (laughter), a scheme hedged in with restrictions of the most elaborate kind and hampered with conditions which I knew that numbers of the people would never accept, and which one could not reasonably urge them to accept. If this Reform Bill was not going to bring a considerable number of Uitlanders into the State, if an enormous majority, including all the leaders, were still to remain cutside, how was it possible to feel any confidence in such a solution or to accept it as a comprehensive settlement?

As against this it is urged that my simpler plan would have deluged the State with new citizens. I am convinced that this is not so. (Hear.) Having regard to the obligations of burghership and to other reasons which will in any case deter many Uitlanders from applying for it, and to the conditions as to length of residence and property qualification which I was prepared to make, I feel sure that the number of new citizens would not have been anything like so great as was supposed, and, however numerous they might have been, the old citizens would have controlled for a long time the bulk of the consti-(Cheers.) They, too, are increasing rapidly in number, and long before they could have been outnumbered, if they ever were outnumbered, the process of fusion would have begun to set in. (Cheers.) Moreover, it is not as if the Uitlanders were all of one kind or one mind. They are of various nationalities and represent different interests and opinions. The President tells me—he was very strong on the point—that he had a petition from Uitlanders in favour of the Government signed by an even greater number of people than signed the petition to Her Majesty. Well, then, what was there to fear? Half the new-comers, on his own showing, would have been on his side, and many, I am sure, who are now opposed to him-opposed, you may say, to the State, because they are excluded from it-would be loyal citizens if once they were let in.

No doubt it is a bit of a business to get different races to pull together inside one body politic. That is the problem over all South Africa, but it is solved in other parts of South Africa, more or less. It would be solved altogether and for ever if the principle of equality could be established all round. (Loudcheers.) It is the one State where inequality is the rule which keeps the rest in a fever; and that is found to be universally recognised in time.

Meanwhile, for the moment, the attempt to get things put on their true basis has not succeeded, and we have to face the resulting situation. Some remedy has still to be found to remove, at least in some measure, the grievances of the Uitlanders and to allay their discontent. I am absolutely convinced that those grievances, though sometimes stated in exaggerated language, are very real. It has over and over again been my duty to call attention to them. And there is another aspect of the case which has been forced upon me as High Commissioner having to bear in mind the interests of Scuth Africa as a whole. Is it consistent with the position of Great Britain in regard to this country, nay, is it consistent with the dignity of the white race, that a large, wealthy, industrious, and intelligent community of white men should continue in that state of subjection which is the lot of the immigrant white population of the Transvaal? (Loud cheers.)

That is the position by which we have by some means or other, however gradual, however pacific, to get them cut of. (Cheers.) I see it is suggested in some quarters that the policy of her Majesty's Government is one of aggression. ("No, no.") I know better than any man that their policy, so far from being one of aggression, has been one of singular patience, and such, I doubt not, it will continue. (Cheers.) But it cannot relapse into indifference. (Renewed cheers.) Can any one desire that it should? It would be disastrous that the present period of stress and strain should not result in seme settlement to prevent the recurrence of a similar crisis in the future.

Of that I am still hopeful. It may be that the Government of the Scuth African Republic will yet see its way to adopt a measure of reform more liberal than that proposed at Bloemfentein. If not, there may be other means of achieving the desired result. In any case, it is a source of strength to those who are fighting the battle of reform, and will, I believe, contribute more than anything else to a peaceful victory, to feel that they have behind them, as they perhaps never had before, the manimous sympathy of the British people throughout the world.

SUBSEQUENT NEGOTIATIONS.

Since the delivery of this speech Mr. Chamberlain has thrown more oil upon the fire, in the shape of a speech which it has been charitably assumed was not intended to provoke war, because it was made with a certain knowledge that negotiations were going on for a settlement which he believed would terminate satisfactorily. There has been much warlike talk in some of the newspapers, and the Daily Mail ventured to announce that the garrison in South Africa was to be raised to forty thousand men, a statement which, although it received immediate contradiction in Parliament, has nevertheless done a good deal to inflame feeling in South Mr. Fischer has been busily engaged in endeavouring to secure some improvement in the concessions offered by Mr. Kruger, and there seems at present to be good hope that the franchise will be conceded after six years' residence. Six years is the term of naturalisation insisted upon in Holland; and the concession of the franchise after six years, and the disappearance of most of the conditions with which Paul Kruger clogged his original offer, will probably be accepted on all hands as a very reasonable solution. Meanwhile a great deal of mischief has been done and a good deal of the unregenerate old Adam has been displayed on the part of many of our newspaper writers.

of

ply

ous

uth

olic

d.

enact

ent

ate

an-

it

ced

of

of ual

or

at rn-

he

ng

to

re

le-

ng

hs

his six

n-

n.

CW

on

ns ed

for

ng

hs

nsi-

be 12-aq

or

he

er

ce

all

11-

n-li-

ed

er

at

n

to 15

is

r,

III .-- A PLEA FOR PATIENCE BY OLIVE SCHREINER.

As a corrective of the criminal folly which has been spoken and printed the last few weeks, I am glad to have an opportunity of quoting at some length from the letter which Olive Schreiner contributed to the Standard and Diggers' News of Johannesburg, which I am glad to see has subsequently been reprinted by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton in a shilling pamphlet under the title of "Words in Season." I do not by any means always agree with Olive Schreiner. It is possible to love her very sincerely without accepting her conclusions; but what she says is well considered and is based upon a very keen appreciation of the human element in the affairs of mortals, which bachelors unattached like Sir Alfred Milner and Mr. Garrett are sometimes in danger of underestimating. She is besides a woman of genius, who wields a pen instinct with life and light.

"Words in Season: an English South African's View of the Situation"-Olive Schreiner's contribution to the discussion of the topic of the day—begins with a comparison between the sentiments of the English and Dutch South Africans, and incidentally tells the history of South Africa from the Dutch point of view. Olive Schreiner thinks that love—the love of man for woman and woman for man-is rapidly amalgamating the English and Dutch into one South African people. She says :-

THE SOUTH AFRICAN DUTCH.

In the Cape Colony, and increasingly in the two Republics, are found enormous numbers of cultured and polished Dutch - descended South Africans using English as their daily form of speech, and in no way distinguishable from the rest of the nineteenth century Europeans.

Our most noted judges, our most eloquent lawyers, our most skilful physicians, are frequently men of this blood; the lists of the yearly examinations of our Cape University are largely filled with Dutch nam.s, and women as well as men rank high in the order of merit. It would sometimes almost seem as if the long repose the people have had from the heated life of cities, with the large tax upon the nervous system, had sent them back to the world of intellectual occupations with more than the ordinary grasp of power. In many cases they go home to Europe to study, and doubtless their college life and English friendships bind Britain close to their hearts as to ours who are English born. The present State Attorney of the Transvaal is a man who has taken some of the highest honours Cambridge can bestow. Besides, there exist still our old simple farmers or Boers, found in the greatest perfection in the midland districts of the Colony, in the Transvaal and Free State, who constitute a large part of the virile backbone of South Africa. Clinging to their old seventeenth century faiths and manners, and speaking their African taal, they are yet tending to pass rapidly away, displaced by their own cultured modern children; but they sill form a large and powerful body. Year by year the lines dividing the South Africans from their more lately arrived English-descent brothers are passing away.

LOVE AS A FACTOR IN POLITICS.

Love, not figuratively but literally, is obliterating the line of distinction; month by month, week by week, one might say hour by hour, men and women of the two races are meeting.

In the Colony there are few families which have not their Dutch or English connections by marriage; in another generation the fusion will be complete. There will be no Dutchmen then and no Englishmen in South Africa, but only the great blended South African people of the future, but speaking the English tongue, and holding in reverend memory its founders of the past, whether Dutch or English. Already, but for the sorrowful mistakes of the last years, the line of demarcation would have faded out of sight; external impediments may tend to delay it, but they can never prevent this fusion: we are one people. In thirty years' time, the daughter of the man who landed yesterday in South Africa will carry at her heart the child of a de Villiers, and the son of the Cornish miner who lands this week will have given the name of her English grandmother to his daughter, whose mother was a le Roux. There will be nothing in forty years but the great blended race of Africans.

Photograph by]

MRS. CRONWRIGHT-SCHREINER. (OLIVE SCHREINER.)

to its shores a large popula-tion which is not and cannot, at least at once, be South African. This body is known under the name of Uitlanders (literally "Foreigners").

To those who know the great mining camps of Klondyke and Western America, it is perhaps not necessary to describe Johannesburg. Here are found that diverse and many-shaded body of humans, who appear wherever in the world gold is discovered. The Chinaman with his pigtail, the Indian Coolie, the manly Kafir and the Half-caste, all forms of dark and coloured folk are here, and outnumber considerably the white. Nor is the white population less multifarious and complex. On first walking the streets, one has a strange sense of having left South Africa, and being merely in some cosmopolitan centre, which might be anywhere where all nations and colours gather round the yellow king. Russian Jews and Poles are here by

THE UITLANDERS. But during the last few years a new phenomenon has started up in South African life. The discovery of vast stores of mineral wealth in South Africa, more especially gold, has attracted suddenly tha lane

all

whi

are stra perl

the beir

nati adn

of a You a H

the

Chi

dear

ima

tute

disle

Joha

thro

Gan

ever

of a

R

Rep

of I not that orig

m re

Eng

that cour

prod

matt

hand

the o atter

to st

of h

her

this nuts

men

If

incu

com

one

rum

yet,

mino

love

of th

up h repel

to lo

on S

answ

W

thousands, seeking in South Africa the freedom from oppression that was denied that much wronged race of men in their own birthland; Cornish and Northumberland miners; working men from all parts of the earth; French, German and English tradesmen; while on the Stock Exchange men of every European nationality are found, though the Jew predominates. The American strangers are not larger in number, but are represented by perhaps the most cultured and enlightened class in the camp, the mining engineer and large importers of mining machinery being often of that race; our lawyers and doctors are of all nationalities, while in addition to all foreigners, there is a certain admixture of English and Dutch South Africans. In the course of a day one is brought into contact with men of every species. Your household servant may be a Kafir, your washerwoman is a Half-caste, your butcher is a Hungarian, your baker English, the man who soles your boots a German; you buy your vegetables and fruit from an Indian Coolie, your coals from the Chinaman round the corner, your grocer is a Russian Jew, your dearest friend an American. This is an actual, and not an imaginary, description. Here are found the most noted prostitutes of Chicago, and that sad sisterhood created by the dislocation of our yet unco-ordinated civilisation, and known in Johannesburg under the name of continental women, have thronged here in hundreds from Paris and the rest of Europe. Gambling, as in all mining camps, is rife; not merely men, but even women put their money into the totalisator, and a low fever of anxiety for chance wealth feeds on us.

A HELPFUL ANALOGY.

Rightly to understand the problem before the little Transvaal Republic to-day, it is necessary for Englishmen to imagine not merely that within the space of ten or twelve years, forty millions of Russians, Frenchmen and Germans should enter England, not in driblets and in time extending over half a century, so that they might in a measure be absorbed and digested into the original population, but instantaneously and at once; not m rely, that the large bulk of them did not intend to remain in England, and were there merely to extract wealth; not merely, that the bulk of this wealth was exported at once to other countries, enriching Russia, France and Germany out of the products of English soil; that would be comparatively a small matter-but, that the bulk of the wealth extracted was in the hands of a few persons, and that these persons were opposed to the continued freedom and independence of England, and were attempting by the use of the wealth they extracted from England to stir up Russia and France against her, that through the loss of her freedom they might the better obtain the command of her wealth and lands. When the Englishman has vividly drawn this future for himself, he will hold, as nearly as is possible in a nutshell, an image of the problem which the people and Government of the Transvaal Republic are called on to face to-day.

THE THREAT OF WAR.

If it be asked, why at this especial moment we feel it incumbent on us not to maintain silence, and what that is which compels our action and speech, the answer may be given in one word—WAR! The air of South Africa is heavy with rumours; inconceivable, improbable, we refuse to believe them; yzt, again and again they return. There are some things the mind refuses seriously to entertain, as the man who has long loved and revered his mother would refuse to accept the assertion of the first passer-by that there was any possibility of her raising up her hand to strike his wife or destroy his child. But much repetition may at last awaken doubt, and the man may begin to look out anxiously for further evidence.

We English South Africans are stunned; we are amazed; we say there can be no truth in it. Yet we begin to ask ourselves, "What means this unwonted tread of armed and hired soldiers on South African soil? Why are they here?" And the only answer that comes back to us, however remote and seemingly impossible, is—WAR! To-night we laugh at it; and to-morrow when we rise up it stands before us again, the ghastly doubt—war! War—and in South Africa! War—between white men and white! War!—Why?—Whence is the cause?—For whom? For what? And the question gains no answer. We fall to considering, Who gains by war? Has our race in Africa and our race in England interests so diverse that any calamity so cataclysmic can fall upon us, as war? Is any position possible that could make necessary that mother and daughter must rise up in one horrible embrace, and rend, if it be possible, each other's vitals? . . Believing it impossible, we fall to considering, who is it gains by war?"

THERE IS PEACE TO-DAY.

There is peace to-day in the land; the two great white races, day by day, hour by hour, are blending their blood, and both are mixing with the stranger. No day passes but from the veins of some Dutch South African woman the English South African man's child is being fed; not a week passes but the birthery of the English South African woman's child gives voice to the Dutchman's offspring; not an hour passes but on farm, and in town and village, Dutch hearts are winding about English and English about Dutch. If the Angel of Death should spread his wings across the land and strike dead in one night every man and woman and child of either the Dutch or the English blood, leaving the other alive, the land would be a land of mourning. There would be not one household nor the heart of an African born man or woman that would not be weary with grief. should weep the friends of our childhood, the companions of our early life, our grandchildren, our kindred, the souls who have loved us and whom we have loved. In destroying the one race he would have isolated the other. Time, the great healer of all differences, is blending us into a great mutual people, and love is moving faster than time. It is no growing hatred between Dutch and English South African born men and women that calls for war. On the lips of our babes we salute both races

Then we look round through the political world, and we ask ourselves what great and terrible and sudden crime has been committed, what reckless slaughter and torture of the innocents, that blood can alone wash out blood? And we find the blood.

And still we look, asking what great and terrible difference has suddenly arisen, so mighty that the human intellect cannot solve it by means of peace, that the highest and most noblest diplomacy falls powerless before it, and the wisdom and justice of humanity cannot reach it, save by the mother's drawing a sword and planting it in the heart of the daughter? We can find none.

THE MUUR KAT OF THE TRANSVAAL.

It may be said, "But what has England to fear in a campaign with a country like Africa? Can she not send out a hundred thousand or a hundred and fifty thousand men and walk over the land? She can sweep it by mere numbers." We answer yes she might do it. Might generally conquers; not always. have seen a little muur kat attacked by a mastiff, the first joint of whose leg it did not reach. I have seen it taken in the dog's mouth, so that hardly any part of it was visible, and thought the creature was dead. But it fastened its tiny teeth inside the dog's throat, and the mastiff dropped it, and, mauled and wounded and covered with gore and saliva, I saw it creep back into its hole, in the red African earth. But might generally conquers, and there is no doubt that England might send out sixty or a hundred thousand hired soldiers to South Africa, and they could bombard our towns and destroy our villages; they could shoot down men in the prime of life, and old men and boys, till there was hardly a kopje in the country without its stain of blood, and the Karoo bushes grew up greener on the spot where men from the midlands had come to help their fellows fell, never to go home. I suppose it would be quite possible for the soldiers to shoot all male South Africans who appeared in arms against them. It might not be easy, a great many might fall, but a great Empire could always import more to take their places; we could not import more, because it would be our husbands and sons and fathers who were falling, and when they were done we could not produce more.;

VICTORY THE WORST DEFEAT.

Then the war would be over. There would not be a house in Africa, where African-born men and women lived, without its mourners from Sea Point to the Limpopo; but South Africa would be pacified—as Cromwell pacified Ireland three centuries

the

of old

eir

ay,

hey

nes

ved

of

say

nen

ng.

ew

eir

ons

ne-

m-

no

ng-

but

uth

re,

ish

ve-

of

for

the

of

nts

ney

n:

riy

of lay at

de

the

his

me

her

her vill but

of

has

an ast

in

lly

la-

ın. lly

be

ed

is

ie,

nd

te.

On

eft

re, ier

by

ago, and she has been pacified ever since! As Virginia was pacified in 1677; its handful of men and women, in defence of their freedom, were soon silenced by hired soldiers. . A hundred or a hundred and fifty thousand imported soldiers might walk over South Africa; it would not be an easy walk, but it could be done. Then from east and west and north and south would come men of pure English blood to stand beside the boys they had played with at school and the friends they had loved; and a great despairing cry would rise from the heart of Africa. But we are still few. When the war was over the imported soldiers might leave the land-not all. Some must be left to keep the remaining people down. There would be quiet in the land. South Africa would rise up silently and count her dead and bury them. She would know the place where she found them. South Africa would be peaceful. There would be silence, the silence of a long exhaustion—but not peace! Have the dead no voices? In a thousand farmhouses black-robed women would hold memory of the count, and outside under African stones would lie the African men to whom South African women gave birth under our blue sky. There would be silence, but no peace.

OLIVE SCHREINER'S 5000.

You say that all the fighting men in arms might have been shot. Yes, but what of the women? If there were left but five thousand pregnant South African born women, and all the rest of their people destroyed, those women would breed up again a race like to the first. Oh! Lion-Heart of the North, do you not recognise your own lineage in these whelps of the South? who cannot live if they are not free!

The grandchildren and great-grandchildren of the men who lay under the stones (who will not be English then nor Dutch, but only Africans), will say, as they pass those heaps, "There lie our fathers, or great-grandfathers, who died in the first great war of independence," and the descendants of the men who lay there will be the aristocracy of Africa. Men will count back to them, and say: My father or my great-grandfather lay in one of those graves. We shall know no more of Dutch or English then, we shall know only the great African people. And we? We, the South Africans of to-day, who are still English, who have been proud to do the smallest good so it might bring honour to England, who have vowed our vows on the honour of Englishmen and by the faith of Englishmen. What of us?

EMPIRE: BANYAN OR UPAS?

Do not think that when imported soldiers walk across South African plains to take the lives of South African men and women that it is only African sand and African bushes that are cracking beneath their tread: at each step they are breaking the fibres, invisible as air, but strong as steel, which bind the hearts of South Africans to England. Once broken they can never be made whole again: they are living things: broken they will be dead. Each bullet which a soldier sends to the heart of a South African to take his life, wakes up another who did not know he was an African. You will not kill us with your Lee-Metfords: you will make us. There are men who do not know they love a Dutchman, but the first three hundred that fall, they will know it.

Do not say, "But you are English, you have nothing to fear: we have no war with you!" There are hundreds of us, men and women who have loved England; we would have given our lives for her; but rather than strike down one South African man fighting for freedom, we would take this right hand and hold it in the fire, till nothing was left of it but a charred and blackened bone.

OLIVE AS AN AFRICAN FRANKLIN.

I know of no more graphic image in the history of the world than the figure of Franklin when he stood before the Lords of Council in England, giving evidence, striving, fighting, to save America for England. Browbeaten, flouted, jeered at by the courtiers, his words hurled back at him as lies, he stood there fighting for England. England recognises now that it was he who tried to save an empire for her; and that the men who flouted and browbeat him, lost it. There is nothing more pathetic than the way in which Americans who loved England, Washington and Franklin, strove to keep the maiden vessell moored close to the mother's side, bound by the bonds of love and sympathy, that alone could bind them. Their hands were beaten down, bruised and bleeding, wounded by the very men-they came to save, till they let go the mother ship and drifted away on their own great imperial course across the seas of time.

England knows now what those men strove to do for her, and the names of Washington and Franklin will ever stand high in honour where the English tongue is spoken; the names of Hutchinson, and North, and Grafton are not forgotten also; it might be well for them if they were!

Do not say to us: "You Englishmen, when the war is-over, you can wrap the mantle of our imperial glory round you and walk about boasting that the victory is yours.

We could never wrap that mantle round us again. We have worn it with pride. We could never wear it then. There would be blood upon it, and the blood would be our brothers'.

We put it to the men of England. In that day where should we be found; we who have to maintain English honour in the South? Judge for us, and by your judgment we will abide... Remember, we are Englishmen!

WHAT SIR ALFRED MILNER NEEDS.

After referring to Sir Alfred Milner's task, Olive Schreiner concludes as follows:

When a woman rules the household with none but the children of her own body in it her task is easy; let her obey, nature and she will not fail. But the woman who finds herself in a large strange household, where children and step-children are blended, and where all have passed the stage of childhood and have entered on that stage of adolescence where coercion can no more avail, but where sympathy and comprehension are the more needed—that woman has need of large and rare qualities springing more from the heart than from the head. She who can win the love of her strange household in itsadolescence will keep its loyalty and sympathy when adult yearsare reached, and will be rich indeed.

There have been Englishmen in Africa who had those qualities. Will this new Englishman of ours evince them, and save an empire for England and heal South Africa's wounds? Are we asking too much when we turn our eyes with hope tohim?

Further off also, across the sea, we look with hope. The last of the race of great statesmen was not put into the ground' with the old man of Hawarden; the great breed of Chatham and Burke is not extinct; the hour must surely bring forth the man.

We look further yet, with confidence, from the individual tothe great heart of England—the people. The great, fierce, freedom-loving heart of England is not dead yet. Under a thirveneer of gold we still hear it beat. Behind the shrivelled and puny English Hyde, who cries only "Gold!" rises the great-English Jekyll, who cries louder yet, "Justice and honour!" We appeal to him; history shall not repeat itself.

Nearer home we turn to one whom all South Africans are proud of, and we would say to Paul Kruger, "Great old man, first but not last of South Africa's great line of rulers, you have shown us you could fight for freedom; show us you can win peace. On the foot of that great statue which in the future the-men and women of South Africa will raise to you let this stand-written, "This man loved freedom and fought for it; but his-heart was large; he could forget injuries and deal generously."

And to our fellow Dutch South Africans, whom we have learnt to love so much during the time of stress and danger, we know how to fight, show it you know how to govern; forget the past; in that Great Book which you have taken for your, guide in life, turn to Leviticus, and read there in the 19th chapter, 34th verse: 'Be strong, be fearless, be patient.' We would say to you in the words of the wise dead President of the Free Sette which have become the symbol of South Africa. Free State which have become the symbol of South Africa, . 'Wacht een beetje, alles zal recht kom.'" (Wait a little, all . will come right.)

On our great African flag let us emblazon these words, never to take them down, "FREEDOM, JUSTICE, LOVE"; great are: the two first; but without the last they are not complete.

ye

Pa

CO

Co

lea

the

mo

pri

Atl

Str

cen

no

the

alil

De

Tir

of a

kno

froi

son who wis

bee

Pea

wit pro

F

mei assa deli

thei and all hea

cou

hosp

king

on hap the

prai

Con

was Qua

AT THE HAGUE: A MONTH'S DOINGS AND SAYINGS.

MORE PACES FROM A BUSY LIFE.

SINCE last I addressed my readers I have been continuously resident at the Hague—a fact which will, I hope, be accepted as some excuse for any delay that may occasionally have arisen in answering my correspondence. I have been very busy; I have not yet spared the time to enter a museum or a picture gallery. I do not propose to attempt any diary of my life at the Hague, but merely mention that I have been there, and that I have put in my time as follows.

I.- "WHO'S WHO" FOR THE CONFERENCE.

I have compiled and published a kind of "Who's Who" to the Conference, under the title of "The Parliament of Peace and its Members." This publication contains personal details of all the members of the Conference and character sketches and portraits of the leading representatives. Its motive is thus described in the opening chapter:—

THE HAGUE, June, 1899.

Ultimus ante omnes de parta pace triumphus.

"The greatest victory is that by which peace is won" is the motto inscribed on the scroll in the Orange Hall, beneath which the Angel of Peace confers her benediction upon the warrior prince whose victories secured the Peace of Munster. Pallas Athene - personified Wisdom - with Hercules - personified Strength-open the doors of the Conference to the same beneficent Genius of Peace. Strength is represented in its members, no doubt. Hercules is there in force. All the cannon in all the world, with a miserable remnant of exceptions, can only speak by leave of the Governments represented in the House in the Wood. The embattled might of all the Children of Men alike on land and sea is wielded by the Delegators of the Delegates. But Wisdom? Is Pallas Athene equally in evidence? Time will show, and very brief time. But if the wise daughter of Zeus is present, she must be sought in the collective wisdom of a composite group of men, of each one of whom something is known, by each one of whom something has been done, and from each one of whom something is expected. To furnish some clue to the identity and personality of the Delegates in whom collectively it is to be hoped resides the fulness of the wisdom of the divine Minerva, this sheaf of personal notes has been put together in the hope that it may at least help the Peace Makers of the Huis ten Bosch to become better acquainted with each other, and so to contribute, however slightly, in promoting the object of the Conference.

For Pallas Athene, with her stately mien and sedate brow, we look in vain for visible embodiment among the throng of But in the young Sovereign who acts as host to the assembled Delegates, who provides them with a palace for their deliberations, and places all the resources of her kingdom at their disposal, there is that fair embodiment of Youth and Grace and Beauty in female form which, more than all the wisdom of all the Minervas, has inspired the imagination and thrilled the heart of mankind. The Conference, which meets under the courageous initiative of the youngest man who sits on one of the greatest of European thrones, is welcomed with gracious hospitality by the girl-queen of one of the smallest of European kingdoms. The suggestion that the Conference should meet on the birthday of the Tsar came from Queen Wilhelmina, a happy thought which incidentally brought with it in its train the opening of the opening day by a solemn religious service of praise and thanksgiving in the Russian Church. Otherwise the Conference would have met unblessed by prayer or psalm. It was the first, but by no means the last kindly service which the Queen has rendered to her guests.

The Conference is composed exclusively of men—perhaps it may be the last Conference whose members are drawn solely from one-half of the human race. But although no lady sits in the Orange Hall, not even the greatest misogynist can deny the importance of the part which women are playing in Europe to-day in the maintenance of peace. Over the foaming Northern Sea the aged and beloved Sovereign who gave her people lasting peace, celebrates her eightieth birthday amid the enthusiasm of her loyal subjects. In St. Petersburg the Empress stands, radiant as a guardian angel, beside the Tsar who summoned the Parliament of Peace. And here in Holland that Parliament assembles in the Palace in the leafy glades of the Wood as the guests of the Girl-Queen of the Netherlands.

"The Parliament of Peace" contains portraits of the members of the Conference, a portrait of the Queen of Holland, a diagram of the Orange Hall, showing how members sit, and a plan of the Hague. Most of the personal details have been read in proof by the delegates concerned. The publication is therefore an authentic record of the personality of the notables of a famous assembly.

MORE MEMS. ABOUT MEMBERS OF THE CONFERENCE.

Owing to an unfortunate accident, the notices of some of the members of the Conference failed to find a place in "The Parliament of Peace," while the portraits of others were also unfortunately omitted. One of the worst of these omissions was that of M. Pompilj, one of the Italian plenipotentiaries, whose portrait I intended to reproduce.

M. Guido Pompilj is another of the interesting figures at the Conference. M. Pompilj, who comes of a noble Italian family, distinguished for its patriotic part in the liberation of Italy, was educated at the Universities of Bologna and Rome, where he finished his studies before reaching his twentieth year. His first essay in public life was made under peculiar circum-Some speculators had formed a scheme to dry up the famous Lake Thrasymene, and M. Pompilj, to prevent such an act of vandalism, threw his whole energy into forming a society for the preservation of the lake, the Consorgio del Trasimeno, of which he has now been president for twenty-two years, and which has preserved and regulated the lake. M. Pompilj entered the Italian Parliament at an early age, and soon acquired a reputation for oratory and ability, which has resulted in his being selected five times successively, and has been offered on more than one occasion the Under-Secretaryship of Public Works, Treasury, and Finance. In one of the recent ministerial crises in Italy it was proposed to call him to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but M. Pompilj preferred to represent his country at the Hague. In Parliament M. Pompilj is member of the two great Giunti Permanenti, that of the Budget and that of the Electors. He is President of the Council General of the Province of Umbria, Rapporteur du budget des Affaires Etrangères, and holds various other positions. He is also a Colonel in the Landwehr; and has been decorated with the orders of St. Maurice and Lazare, the Crown of Italy, and

M. Pompilj's reputation has not been gained in politics and diplomacy alone. He has engaged with equal success

ssell

ove rere nen ited me.

and in

of

it.

rera

ind

ave

ere uh

the.

le.

ve

the

elf

en

od

OIL

are

id.

its ars.

ose

nd

s?

to

he

nd'

nd

ın.

to

ce.

im.

nd.

at

re

n,

ve

in

he

nd

nis...

ve

we ouv

et ur.

th

Ve.

he

ill .

er

re :

in literature and science, and writes much in Italian reviews, translates from German; and every year reads a Discourse before the Queen at the Collegio Romano. He has published a collection of his Dis-M. Pompilj is a good classical scholar, and speaks several modern languages perfectly. He is

I was unable to obtain the portrait of M. Stancioff, the first Bulgarian delegate, in time for publication last month. I am glad to be able to present it on the same page, together with the portrait of his military delegate, Captain Hessaptchieff.

During the last month some newspapers have amused themselves by printing abourd stories about a fracas among the Turkish delegates. There is not a word of truth in the whole statement. The Turks have acted like gentlemen throughout. In "The Parliament of Peace" I published most of their portraits. The accompanying portrait of Abdullah Pasha completes the delegation.

11.—THE CHRONIQUE OF THE CONFERENCE IN THE "DAGBLAD."

Besides this, I have edited a daily Chronique of the Conference in the Dagblad, a paper published at the Hague in Dutch. At the opening of the Conference, the Dagblad had begun, on the initiative of Baron Sunta von Altonstadt, the publication of a column or two in French dealing with the Peace question. This paved the way to an arrangement with the Dagblad by which I undertook to edit a daily Chronique of the Conference in its

I did this for several reasons:—(1) It was necessary to break down the absurd system of secrecy by which, to its own detriment, the Conference had persisted in shrouding its own proceedings. By editing a paper on the spot I was able effectively to baffle the conspiracy of oldfashioned diplomacy to keep the public in the dark as to what was going on. (2) It seemed desirable to create an organ in which the issues debated in committees by a few could be discussed in the hearing of all the delegates of the Conference; and (3) it was useful and expedient to have a daily opportunity of reminding all and sundry of the members of the Conference of the existence of the great public outside which was watching their proceedings with impatient interest, and whose earnestness and determination were the best means of keeping them up to their work. The publication of the Chronique in the Dagblad began on June 4th, and continues every day since then, excepting on Sundays, when the Dagblad is not published. The Chronique, which never has fallen below two columns, and occasionally fills twelve, is in French. I write my leaders and notes in English, which are translated into French by Madame Lera, a French lady who has afforded me invaluable assistance in this way. The official papers of the Conference which were officially issued as "confidential" and "absolutely confidential" a day or two before I published them in the Dagolad were, of course, in French, and needed no translation. The task of the Dutch compositors, who had to struggle by turns with French, English, and Dutch MSS., was no easy one; and although there were often misprints, they acquitted themselves on the whole marvellously well. At the beginning an attempt was made to burke the publication of these official secrets on the part of some members of the Dutch Government. This led me to address the following letter to Dr. Kuypers, the editor of the Standard of Amsterdam :-

June 7, 1899 Sir,—The whole world, whose representatives are assembled at the Conference of Peace, owes a debt of gratitude to the Dutch in whose capital assembles for the first time the Parliament of the world.

But even the members of the Conference themselves appear not to realise the immense significance of their mission, the sublime grandeur of their mandate.

They have endeavoured to shroud their deliberations in secrecy, as if they were conspiring in the dark against the liberties of nations, instead of endeavouring to confer upon humanity the inestimable blessings of a settled peace.

To tear away this absurd veil, the inheritance of an antiquated diplomacy, I have undertaken to write a daily Chroniqueof the Conference, not in order to frustrate, but solely in order to support its beneficent labours.

Baron J. P. von Schmidt auf Altenstadt has chivalrously undertaken to publish this Chronique in the Dagblad, three numbers of which have already appeared.

But already those who love darkness rather than light have taken alarm to fill the air with their outcries.

Nay, more, I am assured that strenuous efforts are being:

made by some misguided men, who for the moment are "drest in a little brief authority," to stifle this brave effort of von Schmidt auf Altenstadt, and to gag the Dagblad. I hope that the entire Dutch press, regardless of party, will rebuke this outrage upon the liberty of the press, and show to the civilised world that the Dutch of to-day are faithful to the great traditions of their heroic ancestors who conquered liberty, not only for themselves, but also for all the free nations of the world. WILLIAM T. STEAD.

I should add that the greater part of the Chronique of the Conference was regularly translated next day into Dutch, for the Dutch readers of the paper. But this Dutch translation lay outside my responsibility. I used over again some of the cliches which were prepared for War against War, and was glad to find them so much appreciated in their Dutch dress.

III.-LECTURE ON "THE CONFERENCE-AND AFTER."

At the request of Madame Wasklewicz and other friends I addressed a public meeting at the Salle Diligentia at the Hague, on Thursday, June 22nd. The Conference began at nine and ended about a quarter to eleven. The hall was well filled and the interest was kept up till the

Mr. Stead after some introductory remarks concerning the absence of a chairman, said that he hoped at the close of the meeting his hearers would take part in the discussion. He then spoke as follows:

First of all dismiss from your minds any idea that I am going to make an oration. I never have made an oration in my life; I only talk to people who are good enough to listen to me, just as if I were talking to a friend or two or three friends in my own room. My first duty is to apologise for having to speak at all, but I was asked to speak by my friend Madame Wasklewicz, who has taken an honourable and leading part in the Peace movement in Holland from the first, and as I have always-endeavoured to speak when I am asked to speak, and hold my tongue when I am not wanted, I am here to-night.

AT ANTWERP IN 1883.

The first time I ever spoke on the Continent was not in your country, and yet I cannot help but regard it as part of your country historically, namely the City of Antwerp. That was fifteen years ago, I think, just before I went to gaol. I am somewhat like the prophet Mahomet, who always dated his calendar from the day of the Hegira. I always date every event in my life from whether it happened before I went to gaol or after I came out of gaol. As I happened to go to gaol in 1885, this fixes that year as that in which I was in Antwerp. I then spoke upon the subject which led me to gaol—what is usually kne

wo COL

Co

but

COL

suf

firs

to WO

poi

itse

que

vie Ih

for

by

Ch

tio

yo

car

ev re

m

br

CO

of

A by

its

lin

b

to

P

10 lo

it

of 1

WA

gi

known as the "trade in white slaves," or the traffic in young women for purposes of vice. For many years it was only in connection with that question that I was known at all on the Continent. Now I am here not in connection with that question, but in connection with another which to my mind is very closely connected with it, for of the two great curses from which-humanity suffers at present, one falls upon woman, the other upon man. The first is Prostitution, the second is War. Here in Holland I have to speak more particularly on the subject of Peace. I think it would probably conduce to a better understanding of my standpoint if I were to explain, before speaking of the Conference itself, a little of the point of view with which I approach this question of peace.

MY STANDPOINT.

I do not approach it from the ordinary conventional point of view of a believer in peace as Count Tolstoi believes in peace. I have endeavoured in all things to look facts in the face, and to form my estimate of what things are to be in the future by looking at what things have been in the past. Neither do I approach this question solely from the standard of the Christian. If you have to form a correct philosophical conception of the world, and where mankind is going to in this planet, you need to start far further back than the Christian era. Christ came at what we may call the eleventh hour in the history of the world. Even if we go back to the time of Moses, that is still comparatively recent.

SEX THE SINAI OF ALL RELIGIONS.

If you wish to find a working hypothesis that will explain the progress of humanity and enable us to understand the trend of events, you need to go far further back than all the revealed religions. Only in the remotest past can we discover the mainspring which in every age has impelled the human race along the infinite ascending spiral which leads from matter up to God. It may startle some of you if I say that as the result of much brooding over these questions, I have come to the definite, clear conviction that sex and the attraction of sex is the original Sinai of the human race. From that all our religions have sprung. All altruism begins in the love of man for woman, and develops by love of mother for child. But the corruption of the best is the worst, so the fundamental revelation of God to man has in no way so foul, so hidecus a distortion as in the vice which flaunis itself in all our cities. Conjugality, maternity—these are the great words by which God has taught man something of Himself.

FRATERNITY BY THE SWORD.

But there is another word, and that word is Fraternity. yet fraternity in itself, as cur earliest records show, did not prevent the murder of one brother by another. But as it was said in Milton of one whose honour rooted in dishonour stood, so our hopes of the triumph of peace in the world are based not upon any idealistic or Utopian idea in the triumph of the sublime ideas of fraternity as laid down by the founders of all religions, but in the conviction that in the course of events, the force of circumstance, the will, if you like, of the Destinies are driving us towards a greater and greater realisation of fraternity, not by peace, but by war. Selfishness—the selfishness of the individual who cares only for himself, and for nothing in the world excepting himself-is first combated by the love of wife and the love of child; but the consciousness of human fraternity, of love between individual men, has been attained, strange though it may seem, by the operation of the law of war. It was said of old time that the law was a schoolmaster to lead us to Christ. I say to you that the sword has been the effective instrument by which mankind has learned something of human brotherhood. At the time of the French Revolution it was said that the great message of the French Revolution was, "Be my brother or I will slay you." What the French Revolution did was but to formulate in that sentence the law by which we have learned the truth of human brotherhood.

FROM THE FAMILY TO THE EMPIRE.

When the original family was formed it defended itself against all comers. The families who gathered themselves together in a clan defended that clan and all the members of it against all comers. The conception of brotherhood was limited to the clan, and those who did not belong to the clan were enemi s who might be slain as wolves. Within the limits of the clan the idea of brotherhood grew, and it was fostered by the very cogent and potent argument that if you did not stand by the clan and help the clan in its struggles with its enemies, you got your throat cut, and there was an end of you, and so much the better. For believe me it is no use looking at those questions from a purely theoretical or fanciful point of view. Force has ruled the world, does rule it, will rule it; and it has been by the use of force in continually extending limits that the sentiment of human brotherhood has widened more and more. From the clan it passed, when civilisation gained some hold on man, to the city. Then you had your walled towns, and within the walled town each man felt brotherly to his brother burghers. After a time the conception of brotherhood widened until it extended to the province, or to all the retainers of a prince or feudal lord. After that it extended until people began to feel that within the boundaries of that nation all men were brothers. From that again there has been a further departure in the growth of these empires which, whether we like them or whether we dislike them, are nevertheless great factors and forces in the life of the world to-day.

THE EMPIRE OF BRITAIN.

I am a subject of the British Empire. I daresay there are many in this hall who do not love the British Empire very much—(laughter)—and therefore I am glad to be in sympathy with a portion of my audience, for I also do not love the British Empire very much in many of its details. But if ever you knew any friend of yours, whom you love altogether, from the top of his head to the sole of his foot, you are very fortunate in your friends, and you are still more fortunate if you know any national entity or imperial entity which in all its totality you can love. I have spent most of my life in opposing the Governments of my own country, and I expect I shall do so until I die. There is nothing does a Government so much good as to be well opposed. (Laughter.) Governments do not always appreciate that; but very few of us know what is But on the whole, take it as a whole, I think that the British Empire with all its faults, and they are many, is at this present moment one of the greatest, possibly the greatest, agencies which make for peace and civilisation throughout the greatest part of the world. course I can speak to you friendly-wise, because after all we are all children of Dutchmen. You gave us your help to win our liberties 200 years ago, and it is always a scurce of great regret to me that you ever lost hold of us. (Laughter.) I think that, great as the British Empire is to-day, it would have been still greater if it had continued in close union with Holland, and we had been able to pool cur Colonial pessessions. (Laughter.) However, whether that is your fault or ours, I will not discuss; but there is no question to my mind that all of yeu, Hollanders though you may be, and opposed though you may often be to cur policy, share equally in our Empire with every man that was born under the deminion of the Queen. It is true that we do not tax you to maintain the Empire, but I never knew any one grumble because he was not visited by the British taxpayer; but all the dominions of our Queen are as free and open to every man of Dutch birth and Dutch nationality as if they had belonged part and parcel to the Dutch I cannot help saying when I contemplate the British Empire, and I feel, looking at it dispassionately, and making liberal allowances for all that is ill in it and all that is bad in it, that it does maintain the Reman peace among a quarter of the human race; and what is more, there is no portion, there is no rood of salt sea where the keel of a sea-going ship may float where the freedom of the seas for the ships of all nations is not secured by the British Fleet. It is well for one who spends his time for the most part in doing penance for the sins of his countrymen to say just once in a way how proud he is of that Empire.

SUBSTITUTE THE POLICEMAN FOR THE SOLDIER!

But that Empire maintains peace within its own frontiers not on Quaker principles, by the disuse of force, but by the use of force, as a police force. If I wished to sum up in one phrase what seems led

the

lia-

ear

the cy,

the

ti-

ue

ler

sly

ee

ve-

ng:

re

of

III

at 1.

of 0

is

d

S

e

e

to me a truth that we all have got to take to heart, it is this: As you vaccinate for smallpox, as you endeavour to cure diseases of a virulent character by inoculations that are of a third or fourth dilution, so I will say that if you have ever to free this world from the plague of war and militarism, you must inoculate it with the police. Replace the soldier by the policeman—that is what we are aiming at, not at the disuse of all the force which, as m:n now are, is a vain fantasy.

EXAGGERATED EXPECTATIONS.

This brings me to consider more immediately the Conference of Peace. I hope that no one here is so foolish and so misguided as to imagine that the Conference of Peace has any hope or idea that it is going to establish the universal reign of peace throughout the world, because if you do, you will be disappointed very much. I have taken a good deal of trouble and paid a great deal of attention to the investigation of occult phenomena of all kinds. One of the difficulties of that study is this, that when you begin to talk to an ordinary man concerning the possibility of any one returning from beyond the grave to communicate with those who are alive, he first of all tells you it is impossible. Then if, by patient accumulation of well-authenticated facts you prove to, him that it is at least exceedingly probable, he at once jumps to the other extreme, and the moment he finds he can communicate with the other world, he insists that the communicating spirit shall tell him everything that ever has been, everything that is, and everything that is going to happen. It is just so with the Conference. People declared that the Peace Conference could not meet, and that if it did meet it would break up in confusion, and that it could do nothing at all. But when the Peace Conference met, and it began to do something, they immediately turned round and expected it to do everything. This is absurd. Nevertheless, the Peace Conference constitutes a great fact in the evolution of the human race, the full significance of which very few of the delegates of the Peace Conference adequately

DELEGATES AND EARTHWORMS.

When I look at some of these men, good men in their way, and intelligent men, who are spending hours of labour in a work in which some of them have but little interest, I remember that famous monograph of our great scientist Darwin upon the earthworm. He tells us how the earthworm-poor blind creature is it-spends all its little life in eating and in voiding, and that is all that the earthworm thinks that it is doing. But in reality, if it were not for the earthworm, there would be no soil fit to cultivate upon the surface of this planet. The earthworm is the universal agriculturist which renders it possible for us all to live. So I look at these poor men, working, dimly perceiving what they are after. They think that they are only come here, some of them, in order to save the face of the Tsar-in order to make some kind of semblance of pretending to do something, and in reality they are helping to fulfil the prophecies of the seers of all ages, and they are working, little though they know it, to bring in a new and better era fer our war-worn humanity.

THE AUTHOR OF THE CONFERENCE.

First of all, I would like to speak concerning the Sovereign to whose courageous initiative we owe the meeting of the Conference at the Hague. I do not know how many there are in this audience who have had the privilege of meeting the Emperor Nicholas II. face to face. Some there are; but as I have seen him and met him on three different occasions and had an opportunity of talking to him as man talks to man, without any obstacles of rank or station, I think it possible that you might like to hear from me my own impression of the man. I hope that no one will do me the injustice of thinking that I, Radical and Democrat, born a Republican, and taught from my earliest youth to look to the United States of America as the Mecca of true English Liberalism, a land in which there is neither Crown nor House of Lords, nor Established Church, nor landed aristocracy, was influenced by the mere fact that the man to whom I talked was an Emperor. I do not think of him as an Emperor. I know him as a man. For twenty-five years and more it has been my lot to go to and fro among my fellow-men, interviewing people. I have met a very great number of the foremost men in this world. Since I came to the Hague I have had the opportunity of meeting a considerable number of very eminent diplomatists and notable statesmen; and this I say, that to have an hour's talk with any of them, and to have an hour's talk with the Emperor of Russia, I think it is more interesting to talk to the Emperor of Russia. (A Voice: "Why?") I will tell you why: Because, first of all, he is far keener-witted than most of them. He is much more keen'y interested in the movement of the world than most of them, and he has a far wider grip and a deeper sense of responsibility than most of them. (Applause.) I do not say that he is a Nestor in statesmanship. On the contrary, he is a young man who is profoundly convinced of his own deficiencies, and who possesses that first great desideratum for all who have to do much in the world, of knowing that he knows very little. There is no such fool as the man who thinks he knows everything. The Emperor of Russia, when he came to the throne, and upon his young shoulders was cast the frightful burden of having to act as terrestrial Providence for 130,000,000 of the human race, felt as any man with heart and soul within him would feel. "Who is sufficient for such things?" He did not, as some young sovereigns have done, signalise his accession to the throne by ordering all the drums to beat and making speeches at the top of his voice to all persons who would listen to him. He was not a shouting Emperor. On the contrary, he was that rare thing—a modest Emperor. And he set himself to learn his work. He had the advantage in the early years of his reign of having as his guide and mentor the ablest Russian statesman of our time in the person of Prince Lobanoff. He walked humbly and soberly and quietly among men, learning his business and mastering the elementary facts which every sovereign ought to know. Not until last year did he make his début on the European stage by framing that Rescript in viriue of which the Conference is assembled to-day.

THE TSAR ON THE RESCRIPT.

I had the opportunity of talking with him about that Rescript peatedly. No person could be more free from all the illusion of a fanatical Utopian. What he felt was that Europe, and not Europe alone, is drifting at continually accelerating ratio towards the abyss. He wrote that out; he sent it to every Government, and as he said to me, "Have I received one letter or one remonstrance saying that I have exaggerated the danger? Not one. They all admit it." But until he spoke, they all stood paralysed before their doom. So without any intention or wish to dictate to Europe or to the world, but solely with the feeling that we are all-all nations, all Governments, all Empires—speeding ever faster and faster down an inclined plane at the end of which there is nothing but Bankruptcy, War, and Revolution, he asked Representatives of all the Powers to meet together, to see whether in concert together they could devise some method of arresting this terrible progress to ruin. So far from wishing to dictate to the rest of the Governments, I found in him an almost impatient resentment at the fact that so many people, while they admitted the danger and the ruin which was before them, said, "Yes, it is all true, and what do you propose in order to prevent it?" "As if," he said, "it was my business and only my business to prescribe a remedy for this malady which afflicts all nations." So they have come together, the members of the Conference, in order to see whether the collective wit and wisdom of the world can devise any remedy for that state of things.

THE TASK OF THE CONFERENCE.

And woe be to those Powers or the representatives of those Powers who in face of what they admit is an impending cataclysm of destruction, deal with a question solely as if it was a question of whether Russia wanted this or Russia wanted that, whether they will please Russia, whether they will give in to Russia! Russia is a great entity, but greater than Russia is the human race; and what the delegates of this Conference have got to consider is the human race, not the amour propre of an Emperor. They have committed to their hands the task of devising some method by which this ever-increasing competition in armamen's may be checked. Do not think for one moment of n put exce arma Mur prop prop very redu abou the t to er then have time s.en an l wha thos or i Emp it w that

that

mani

citiz the a la only artic bett I de fere that of t met Pen char mor here fron of g

1

the

nea Hu infa mon sup bod resc the din tha pur del tog del assi it c alth

that the Emperor ever proposed disarmament. "Disarmament" was put into his circular by the editors and sub-editors of newspapers, who having to find some taking title to put on the top of the Rescript, could hit upon nothing excepting the word "disarmament." But the word "dis-armament" is not in the Rescript, neither is it in Count Muravieff's circular. The Emperor said to me, "I have never proposed disarmament. I well know that if any one were to propose disarmament at this moment, it would bring about the very evil which we all dread. Neither have I proposed any reductions in armaments, at present. What is the use of talking about reducing armaments, while we are all increasing them all the time? Surely it would be more sensible and more reasonable to endeavour to see whether we can arrange to stop increasing them for four or five years; and if at the end of that time we have proved that we can keep our word to each other, then the time will come for proposing a reduction of armaments." It s.ems to me that these words are words of wisdom, even although an Emperor spoke them. I think that these words represent what commonsense would dictate. What is more, I know all those who have any experience of popular feeling, either in this or in any other country, will admit that those words of the Emperor have roused an echo in the universal human heart; and it will go ill with any Government or any Power that baulks that philanthropic desire.

THE CHARACTER OF THE CONFERENCE.

I do not think that we have any reason to complain of what the Conference has done so far. I spoke to-day to an eminent citizen of your country, who told me that he was quite certain the Conference had done nothing and could do nothing. I had a letter from a representative of a leading American periodical only this morning, who said: "I wish you would write an article, and tell us whether or not the Conference is anything better than an international junketing picnic party." (Laughter.) I do not know by what you measure the importance of a conference, but I think after a fairly long experience of conferences that have been held of late years, that, with the solitary exception of the Berlin Congress of 1878, when all the rulers of Europe met in order to decide what should be the future of the Balkan Peninsula, there has not been any conference which, from the character and weight and reputation of its personnel, can for a moment be compared with this Conference. We have here in our midst the Nestors of the diplomacy of the world. We have here the representatives of governments charged with instructions from the sovereign peoples of republics and from the sovereigns of great Empires. Do you think that these men have all been sent here on a fool's errand?

AN ECUMENICAL COUNCIL OF HUMANITY.

The Conference, little although its own members think, is the nearest approach we have yet seen to an Ecumenical Council of Humanity. It is not puffed up with any conception of its own infallibility. It would perhaps be a little better if it had a little more faith in itself. But what it lacks in faith in itself we supply from the outside. The people of the world look to this body to do whatever human wisdom, human courage, human resolution can achieve, in order to save the human race from the evils which are only too apparent to us all.

WHAT THE CONFERENCE HAS DONE.

And the Conference has not begun badly. In the first case, although the delegates, to my regret, are not so chummy as they might be with one another, preferring for the most part to dine and lunch with members of their own nationality rather than embrace the opportunity of this international junketing party in order to make the personal acquaintance of their fellow delegates, still they have come together, they have worked together, and the Conference to-day, after a month of work and deliberation, is a very different body from the Conference that assembled one month ago. It is a body which has shown that it can not only deliberate, but that it can act. It has resolutely put its foot down upon a whole series of propositions emanating from the Russian Emperor, which were all, aimed at the interdiction of improvements in rifles and cannons and all manner of weapons of war. You may say that is a very curious thing for the Peace Conference to have done as the first step in its work. I do not think that it is a bad thing to have done.

A VIA DOLOROSA LEADING TO PEACE.

Rudyard Kipling wrote to me at the beginning of the Peace Crusade, and he said, "War will go on until some inventive genius discovers some machine which will kill 50 per cent. of the combatants as soon as ever they come within range, and then," he said, "war will cease of itself." Bulwer Lytton, in his history of "The Coming Race," describes how war ceased from the world by the discovery of a new explosive which he called "vril," a kind of compound of dynamite and electricity, so potent that any child pointing a tube in the direction of an army could, by touching a spring, destroy 100,000 men. Do not let us be under any delusion of thinking that wars are going to cease by rosewater. They are not going to cease by rosewater, and they are not going to cease because we are all going to learn to love one another. That would have been the shortest road, no doubt; but because we have chosen to go the long and roundabout way of our own will, we have to go along a Via Dolorosa marked by the Gethsemane of the barracks and the Calvary of the battlefield; hence I think that the action of the Conference in refusing to interdict improvements in weapons has ministered, not towards war, but towards peace; but whether for war or for peace, it at least shows that the Conference is an entity with an opinion of its own, resolute to act upon its own convictions, even although those convictions be directly hostile to the wishes of the Emperor. But the destructive part of its work is but a small thing.

THE RULES OF WAR.

For twenty-five years the Brussels Rules of War, drawn up in 1874, have never been carried into effect. These rules, amended and medified, have now been accepted by this Conference, and although they may not be embodied in any formal act or convention, they will remain on record before the world as the declaration of the collective wisdom of the human race as to the conditions under which war ought to be waged. We may depend upon it that every Power that does wage war will, of its own motion, adopt those rules. There is another question which for even longer, for thirty years, has remained without anything being done till now. In 1868 there was a recommendation made that the protection of the Red Cross which had been secured by the Geneva Convention for soldiers in land war should be extended to sailors in naval battles. I think it was Great Britain which ought to have taken the lead-being foremost among naval Powers-in securing the acceptance and adoption of those rules, but we did not do so. Let us give honour to whom honour is due. It is the Conference summoned by Russia, the greatest of land Powers, to which we owe the agreement as to the method in which those Geneva rules shall be applied to naval warfare. But those things, Brussels rules and Geneva rules, are bagatelles. They only relate to the conduct of war, which the object of this Conference is not to facilitate but to prevent.

ARBITRATION.

Hence much the most important part of the work of this Conference has been that which has been begun already, and which will be carried through to an end, all obstacles notwith-standing, namely, that of providing a Permanent Tribunal for the adjudication of international disputes. There are those who say it is nothing; it is nothing, because, as one said to me tonight: "Until we establish a High Court of Justice among the nations, with absolute power to compel all disputants to submit all disputes to its decision, and with absolute force to compel them to abide by that decision when it is delivered, you have done nothing." There is nobody such a great enemy to progress as those who insist upon jumping up to the top of the ladder before they put their foot upon the first rung.

THE PERMANENT TRIBUNAL.

This Conference, I think I may predict, without any fear of my prediction being falsified, will establish, whether or not one or more Powers dissent from its decision—will establish here in your City of the Hague, a Permanent Bureau of Arbitration composed of skilled officials whose duty it will be to keep in composed of skilled officials whose duty it will be to keep in perfect readiness all the machinery for calling into existence, whenever disputes arise, Arbitration Tribunals which will adjudicate upon any question that is submitted to them by the freewill of both parties. Unless you have both parties willing to submit, it is no use drawing up a project that they shall submit. In this Permanent Bureau there will be kept a roster or panel or list of the wisest and most judicially-minded men whom each Government in the whole world can select as their representatives for settling disputes that may arise between nations. Whenever two Powers differ, the Permanent Bureau will lay before both the list of these persons fit to be arbitrators and ask them each to select their own arbitrators from that list. The four so selected arbitrators will then choose, also from that list, a supreme arbitrator or umpire or chairman; and before the tribunal so established the case will be pleaded. The code of arbitration which is now under the discussion or will come before the Committee of Examination next Friday, provides the method of procedure, sets out how the whole case shall be tried, who shall pay the expenses, and everything else. I ask you whether any man or woman in this audience twelve months ago would have dared to hope that such a tribunal would have been within the reach of the human race to-day. I am a pretty sanguine person, but I have never ventured to hope for such a thing, nevertheless it is coming into existence. It is objected that the obligatory questions for arbitration are all twopenny-halfpenny questions about which no one will ever go to war. That is true; it is quite true that the obligatory clauses deal with questions relating to the interpretation of conventions which are not those on which peace and war usually hang. But they are questions upon which a great deal of international friction depends, out of which questions of peace and war are very apt to arise. But I look at it far more broadly than that.

THE SHRINKAGE OF THE WORLD.

Have you ever thought how it is that war is ceasing to exist amongst us? It is because of the shrinkage of the world. The great means by which mankind is being brought together in one family have been supplied us by the mechanical and the electrical engineers. The uttermost ends of the world are now next door. It is no longer possible for nations to go apart and fight as duellists do in an out-of-the way corner, where no one can see them and it interferes with nobody's business. No two Powers can come to blows when their influence is being felt in every part of the world. It has always been so to a certain degree, Gibbon tells us how the victories of Timour the Tartar in Central Asia raised the price of herrings in the London market; but that was a long time ago, and it took a long time before the influence was felt. Now a banking firm cannot fail in Amsterdam without its spelling blue ruin in Java, and every failure in London acts and re-acts through the whole of our great Empire. The world has become too small for man to have room to fight in it. At the same time that it is shrinking, men have made a whole body of treaties,-they call them conventions,-conventions dealing with post-offices, telephones, submarine cables, collisions at sea, with everything in which the nations have a common purpose, These conventions represent the filaments of a great network of international law which is covering the whole planet. But although these conventions are growing, hitherto they have had no court, no supreme court to interpret them when differences of opinion arise. It will be the glory of this Conference at the Hague that it has supplied the missing court necessary for the adjudication of these cases.

HOW THE TRIBUNAL WILL AVERT WAR.

Further, and this is the last point that I wish to make, here there will exist a tribunal with picked and chosen men, fit to be arbitrators, in the centre of the world. No questions relating to honour or vital national interests are supposed to be sent before that tribunal; but I tell you what will huppen. I can see it as plainly as I can see you here to-night. As soon as any question arises upon which honour and vital national interests depend, and when there is a clamour arising in one ccuntry or in another country to settle that question by the arbitrament of war, the whole of the forces of peace in each country will make an appeal to that existing tribunal their rallying cry and their battle-flag. At present when a dispute arises, whatever it may be, between two nations, the question for those who wish for peace with honour, what shall they do? they are usually presented with this alternative—fight or surrender. But if there exists a tribunal of arbitration, which has won the respect of the world for its impartiality and its authority, all those parties in every country, and I believe they are almost always in a majority, will rally round that tribunal, and insist that before that tribunal, rather than before the Tribunal of Mars, the question shall be sent for decision.

At the close of the Conference in the Salle Diligentia Mr. Stead invited any members of the audience to ask any questions or to make any observations they pleased on the subject of the Conference.

FINLAND: AN IMPEACHMENT.

Dr. T. KERN, of the New Rotterdam Courant, then rose and read the following paper:—

In my opinion the realisation of the idea of peace cannot and will not be brought on otherwise than by the victory of right and law; so everybody who sincerely wishes for the realisation of the idea of peace has to start from the conviction that the legal and constitutional rights of nations, most of all those of small ones, must be sacred. Putting the matter thus, as I think we ought to put it, I do not understand, and I hope and presume the majority of this assembly do not understand how any one could ask Mr. William Stead to lecture on this subject in this country, and at this mement, and also how that gentleman could comply with the invitation. Why? Because Mr. Stead's attitude towards a valiant, loyal little nation has been, and is still, utterly hostile to the principle that peace first of all depends on the acknowledgment and the maintenance of right, the victory of which is indispensable for the ultimate triumph of the cause of peace. I am speaking of Finland. (Applause.) Is there any civilised and enlightened man or woman in the Netherlands or elsewhere who has his doubts about the meaning of what is going on in Finland? Is there any one who does not know that in Finland right and law are being trampled upon? Surely there is not such a man-perhaps Mr. Stead excepted—who is doubting still about the purport of the measures which for almost a year the Russian Government has been taking against those poor Finns, who are not even its subjects? Who does not see that those measures bear witness to an excessive contempt of all laws and sworn constitutional rights, and the Russian Government are offending against those laws and rights for military and Jingo purposes, thus sinning doubly against the sacred cause of peace. (Applause.) The nation against whom those iniquitcus measures are directed forms an infinitesimal State when compared with the immense State of Russia, its superior by culture and civilisation, and in many other respects. Mr. Stead, who has come to us in the shape of an angel of peace, should have been the very last to approve of measures which are of a nature to endanger the existing peaceful relations. Has he therefore disapproved of them? He repeatedly, for reasons of his own, has tried by all means to palliate and to whitewash the doingsof the Russian Government, and that is why I, confident of the approval of my countrymen, want to clear my conscience, and will not go hence without having uttered a strong protest against Mr. Stead's appearing as a lecturer on peace in this place, because he least of all is qualified for the position, as he showed several times his unqualified and unjustifiable attitude towards

MR. STEAD'S REPLY.

Mr. STEAD rose with alacrity and made the following reply:-

I owe personally my warm thanks to the gentleman who has just sat down for having given me an opportunity of explaining how entirely I concur with him except upon those questions in

wh

per I a

W

cot

on

you pol

tha

wh

just tha

qua

jud

Ih

had hat

nev

saw

stic

seci

W

rela

said

it h

Eng

ture

tha

loca

sho

Mr.

Did

Wh

bee

Thi

the

the

all I

Rul

heig

Ho

Irel

tion

fund

que

Êm

defi

coir

ther

has

we hi.n

of v

to d

Rus

which he is entirely wrong in his facts. First of all, as I am personally attacked, let me say a word in my own vindication. am told that I am a very improper person to speak here. Well, I daresay you could have got a better one, but you never could have got one who has spoken out more plainly and strongly on the subject of Finland than I have done. I do not think that you do the cause of freedom and liberty any good by standing up before prejudiced audiences to denounce the conduct of a Government against whom you may excite passion, but whose policy you cannot possibly influence by that means. I think that the first condition necessary in order to have any influence whatever with any Government is to show that you wish to be just, that you wish to know the facts; and if you should come to a distinct conclusion, hostile to the policy of that Government, that you should express that judgment calmly, strongly, in quarters where it is most likely to be listened to.

Now in relation to this question of Finland, I can say that, judged and tried by the standard which I have just laid down, I have done what I ought to have done, and what I hope if you had been in my place you would have done. I found in our country, in England, a great desire to speak about Finland on the part of many people who have spent their lives in exciting hatred, animosity and distrust towards Russia. Most of them never even knew that Finland enjoyed a free constitution and free laws under the ægis of the autocrat of Russia, until they saw a chance of using an interference with those liberties as a stick with which to belabour the Russian bear. I found these people using this question at every meeting that I addressed in order to thwart the effort which the Emperor was making to secure peace; and what did I do? I said to my countrym:n, "Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. When you have taken the beam out of your own eye in relation to your dealings with Ireland, it will be about time to begin to throw stones at Russia about Finland." said that again and again to our people, and I am free to repeat it here.

One hundred years ago Ireland had a legislature of her own. England by the foulest-to use Mr. Gladstone's own wordsthe most blackguardly means possible, destroyed that legislature. Since that time the Irish people has in vain appealed to us to restore that legislature. We have refused always. I say that those persons who refuse to restore to Ireland her right of local self-government are the last people in the world who should get up in public and denounce the Russians for doing something of the same kind in Finland. Secondly, some years ago we had a great statesman in our country whose name was

Mr. Gladstone. (Applause.)

Mr. Gladstone proposed to give Home Rule to Ireland. Did Mr. Gladstone propose to give Home Rule to Ireland upon the principles on which Finland has been governed hitherto? What is the difference between the way in which Finland has been governed and the way in which, according to the decree of the Russian Government, Finland is to be governed in future? This, and this only. That in all matters which concern equally the interest of the Russia Empire as a whole and of Finland, the predominant partner shall have the predominant voice. all local affairs Finland is to continue to enjoy complete Home Rule. Yet this is shrieked at and denounced as if it was the height of all villainy. When Mr. Gladstone brought in his Home Rule Bill, what did he do? Did he propose to give to Ireland an equal voice with England in the deciding of questions relating to the Empire? On the contrary! the first fundamental thesis of the Home Rule Bill was that in all questions in which Ireland and the Empire were interested, the Empire had to have the deciding voice. Those questions were defined as being naval questions, military questions, questions of coinage, questions of post-office and others. Mr. Gladstone therefore proposed for Ireland exactly what the Russian Emperor has now offered or declared shall be the rule in Finland. Yet we English found Mr. Gladstone's bill much too liberal. We cast him out and put in a Unionist Government, the first foundation of whose policy is that Ireland shall not have a local legislature to decide her local questions by herself as Finland, as this very Russian Ukase declares, has full right to decide all local Finnish questions without any interference from without. Therefore I say that if we are to be just before we abuse our neighbours, if we are to endeavour at least to make our own conduct square with the principles which we propound for other people'sacceptance, I have done exactly as my friend would have done

if he had been in my place.

But do not let us make any mistake about the subject. I regret this Finnish business as much as any one here. I have publicly stated my regret on numberless platforms and in every publication which I have anything to do with. What is more, in the headquarters of power in Russia itself I have expressed my grave regret that anything should have been done to interfere in any way with the Finns.

THE QUESTION OF THE TRANSVAAL.

Mr. Stead then asked if there were any more questions.

Mr. SPIJKMAN asked, what were Mr. Stead's views about the Transvaal. He said it was useless talking of stopping increase of armaments when the House of Commons last night had just voted four millions sterling for making war.

Mr. STEAD replied: Let me say in the first place that I donot know anything about those four millions for war; I am very sorry to hear about it.

Mr. SPIJKMAN: They were passed by a large majority last night, in the House of Commons.

Mr. STEAD: Well, this is very bad news, I am very sorry tohear it, but you cannot expect me to give any information upon that subject. I think that any one speaking upon a question of which issues of peace or war may hang, should speak with very great reserve and very great caution; but at the same time I have no hesitation whatever in telling you exactly how the question seems to me. There is one broad aspect of the question which I think will appeal to all of you. We English have been in many respects very highly favoured. We have covered the world with our colonies, and when we so far forgot ourselves as to endeavour to govern those colonies on un-English, Hanoverian principles, those colonists were good enough Englishmen to send us packing. The American revolution established the principle that wherever English-speaking men go beyond the seas, they should be allowed to govern themselves. Our American kinsmentaught us that lesson in a way that we have never forgotten, and we are very grateful to them for having taught us. They whipped us and they whipped us badly, and it served us very well right. Since that time we have taken that lesson so much to heart, that wherever English-speaking men have gone, they have never had any reason to complain of any attempt of the British Govern-ment to tax them without their consent. The Imperial Government to tax them without their consent. ment never denies them the free rights of free citizens to governe themselves in the country to which they please to go. The result is that nowhere in all the world's surface are a number of English-speaking men in a local majority where that local majority does not govern itself, make its own laws, elect its own representatives and, to use an expressive Americanism, does "as it darned pleases," with one exception. When from Westminster we look out over the world, we see there is one community, and only one, in which a majority of Englishspeaking men are denied what we have been taught by our American colonists of old time to consider as the unalienable right of all English-speaking men-the right to choose their own representatives, to levy their own taxes, and make their own

That country is the Transvaal. Now I will put it to you : if we learned so well one hundred years ago the lesson that it was-what may be called fixed in the eternal decrees of Providence that a local majority of English-speaking men have a right to govern thems: lves and are prepared to vindicate that right, even against ourselves. (Cries of "Ireland.") I have pleaded guilty to Ireland, and you know my views about it; but one of the wrongs about which the Irish cannot complain is that they are not allowed to elect their own representatives. But to return to the Transvaal; we consider it treason to the English idea if we ventured to deny to our own colonists the right to make their own laws, to elect their own representatives : do you think that we, who insist upon that rule being applied even when it operates in the diminution of our own sovereignty, can think

her

the

peal

ag.

een.

ith

this loi

im-

illy

her

for tia

isk

ed

se

nd

ght

on

the

of nk

me

ne

his

ıld

d's

nd

rst

ce

of

ed

nis

Is

W

he

m

re

es

m

ıg

s,

e.

us.

n-

re

10

re

re

re

rs.

ď.

d

S

g

tamely or quietly of the existence of a great English-speaking community in the Transvaal which is not allowed to make laws for itself or to elect representatives to fix its taxes? (A Voice: "How do you reconcile that with your first speech?")

I am putting you the broad general question, that we

I am putting you the broad general question, that we consider—we may be quite wrong—we consider that a large local majority of English-speaking men ought to make its own laws; we have acted upon that principl; even when it operated against our own apparent interests; and therefore we cannot help but sympathise with those people in the Transvaal who are working for leave and liberty to be allowed to elect members to the assembly which taxes them, and makes their laws. If these people were Dutch you would sympathise with them, and you would think that there was very good reason for another battle of Bunker's Hill, and another revolt on the part of your good Dutch people who were taxed without being allowed a share in the electing of their taxing assembly. Every man who accepts modern democratic ideas of government must sympathise with the Uitlanders, and must be against Paul Kruger. (Cries of "No, no," hisses, etc.) I am not arguing the case as between the British Government and Paul Kruger in the least. Let us suppose that the Uitlanders are all Hollanders. (A Voice: "Never mind what they are!") Never mind! But that is vital; because you do not sympathise with them because they are not Hollanders, and I do sympathise with them because they are Englishmen. I want you to understand clearly my standpoint. I am in sympathy with the Uitlanders. J think the Uitlanders have a right to representation in the Volksraad. I think that Paul Kruger would consult his own interests if he were to allow them, under reasonable restrictions, to elect their own representatives.

TAXATION WITHOUT REPRESENTATION IS TYRANNY.

But when you go further and ask me whether I sympathise enough with the Uitlanders to go to war for them, I say, so far as I am concerned, certainly not! I think that if the Uitlanders had been worth their salt, they would have sent Paul Kruger packing a long time ago; and if these good people have not got pluck enough to make a fight for themselves, I do not feel very much inclined to go and fight for them.

Mr. SPIJKMAN: Granted that you sympathise with the wrongs of the Uitlanders, how can you sympathise with the constant teasing and provocation of England against the Transvaal?

(Applause.)

Mr. STEAD: Constant teasing I think is bad—very bad. I do not only say it here. I have said it over and over again in my own country. I think it is very bad. I said to our representative who had just returned from Pretoria, "Don't you think that if any honest, straightforward effort had been made to win the confidence of Paul Kruger and the Boers, we might have arrived at a better settlement?" (A Voice: "The happiest married couple in the world.") I agree with you; I think we could have managed better than we have done, although I confess the idea of Oom Paul as a blushing bride requires considerable effort of imagination. (Laughter.)

Mr. STEAD then asked if any other person, man or woman, wished to say anything else. No response having been made, Mr. Stead declared the meeting closed.

Mr. STÉAD stated that he would, on a subsequent occasion, address a meeting on what he thought ought to be done after the Conference to carry on a propaganda of peace throughout the world.

THE

PARLIAMENT OF PEACE

AND ITS MEMBERS.

Seited by W. T. STRAD

Price STEPSHO

SEALER OL SEALERS. OLLICE

the

mo

ma

he

Br

In

CO

tio

In

of we At isa all an De A lint sympai of vid to at In Circ Ab cot The form in more

fro

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE WOMEN'S INTERNATIONAL.

THE holding of the second quinquennial session of the Women's International Council in London last month gives occasion to several articles in the July magazines.

ITS GENESIS.

In the Fortnightly Mrs. May Wright Sewall describes the genesis of the movement. In 1882 Elizabeth Cody Stanton suggested the organisation of an International Woman Suffrage Society, which Miss Susan B. Anthony her friend approved. In November, 1883, at a meeting called in Liverpool to bid these two ladies farewell, a resolution was carried on the motion of Mrs. E. E. Parker, of Scotland, supported by Mrs. Priscilla Bright McLaren, appointing a Committee of Correspondence preparatory to forming an International Woman Suffrage Association. This Committee consisted of forty-one men and women, but was never convened. In January, 1887, Mrs. Stanton's plan was explained by Miss Anthony at Washington, D.C., before a convention of the National Woman Suffrage Associa-In pursuance of resolutions then passed, "an International Council of Women, to which all associations of women in the trades, professions and moral reforms, as well as those advocating the political emancipation of women," was convened and sat in March and April, 1888. At that first "transient" Council fifty-three different organisations of women, "most of them national in scope, and all national in value," were represented by eighty speakers and forty-nine delegates from England, France, Norway, Denmark, Finland, India, Canada and the United States. A committee of fifteen, with Miss Willard as chairman, was appointed to make the Council a permanency. On March 31st, 1888, the constitution suggested by this committee for the International was adopted.

ITS PURPOSE.

Mrs. Fawcett was the first president. .ts first quinquennial session was held at the World's Fair, Chicago, in 1893, when thirty-two nationalities were represented by seventyeight delegates. The second quinquennium has had one year added to it. It has seen the rise of many National Councils. Mrs. Sewall concludes :-

The double purpose of every Council, Local, National, and International, is: (a) To promote greater unity of thought, sympathy and purpose among women workers of all classes, parties, creeds and nationalities. (b) To further the application of the Golden Rule to society, custom, and law.

Hitherto the Golden Rule has been recommended to individuals only. It is the function of the Council to apply this test to society in the aggregate, and to hold the State to a standard at least not lower than that prescribed for the individual citizen. In short, the International Council is the harbinger of the New Civilisation; its leaders, to use the happy phrase of Lady Aberdeen, are International Women, who do not love their own countries the less for having learned to love humanity more. The International Council is the feminine counterpart and the forerunner of that permanent International Parliament suggested in that International Court of Arbitration, which the Conference now in progress at the Hague lifts into nearer view.

Mr. Gilbert Parker, also in the Fortnightly, remarks on the fact that this modern movement has sprung up not from society ladies, but from working women, largely from working gentlewomen who found association necessary to secure free and legitimate outlet for women's energy. He adds :--

The immense restlessness, the sound activity of that energy is apparent everywhere now, particularly and largely in the Englishspeaking world, and, curiously enough, more in England than in America, and in practical advancement more in the Colonies -that is, Canada and New Zealand notably-than in England.

ITS RECORD: BY LADY ABERDEEN.

The President of the Council is the Countess of Aberdeen, and she gives her estimate of its value in the Nineteenth Century. She refers at the outset to the recent origin, as also to the extraordinary multiplicity, of women's agencies and associations, and lays stress on the need of promoting co-operation. She appeals to the results achieved by the banding of women's societies into National Councils. She takes as illustration the National Council of the Women of Canada. She speaks of its unifying influence on Canadian society :-

Again and again during the past five years have I had the opportunity of seeing packed halls of earnest-faced women-Roman Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Liberals and Conservatives, rich and poor, sitting side by side, listening eagerly to explanations of the Council's aims, or to reports of the work carried on by different bodies in different districts, or descriptions of work which is needed to be done; and bending together in silent prayer to our common Father in Heaven to bless and direct our various labours.

ACTUAL RESULTS.

But it may be asked whether there are any actual results. (1) It obtained the introduction of manual training and instruction in domestic science in the public schools of Ontario, and the training of teachers so that they may be able to give instruction in these arts. It has also initiated or stimulated the same movement in other provinces.

(2) It has obtained the appointment of women factory inspectors for factories and workshops where women are employed, in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

(3) It has obtained the extension of the provisions of the Factory Act to the Shop Act in Ontario as regards the supervision of women workers.

(4) It has obtained the appointment of women on the Boards of School Trustees in New Brunswick, and the amendment of the School Act so that they may be elected in British Columbia.

(5) It has brought about very desirable changes in the arrangements for women prisoners in various places, notably in the city of Quebec, where matrons are now in charge of the women, and young girls are sent to a separate institution.

(6) It has organised in various centres boards of associated charities or other systems of co-operation in the relief of distress.

(7) It has established hospitals in some of its smaller centres. (8) It originated the Victorian Order of Nurses, and has taken a leading part in its establishment in different centres.

(9) It has organised cooking schools, cooking classes, and at Quebec is helping in the formation of a training school for domestic servants.

(10) It has spread sanitary knowledge, especially by means of health talks for mothers, given by physicians in Montreal. This has been specially successful both among the French and English mothers.

(11) It has held an inquiry all over the country into the circulation of impure literature, and has been able to do something to lessen it already, as well as to warn parents and teachers as to the very great danger that exists in this direction. It hopes to be able to do more by legislation and by the circulation of healthy and interesting literature. It also inaugurated in Canada the Home Reading Union to promote habits of good and systematic reading.

thise o far nders ruger t got very ongs

tant

aal?

n in pre-

you

ade

ight

iest

we h I

on-

or

ing

ent

ght

da

(12) It instituted inquiries into the conditions surrounding working women in various centres, and urges on its members various methods whereby they may work for their amelioration.

(13) It conducted an inquiry into the Laws for the Protection-of Women and Children, and has laid certain recommendations before the Minister of Justice which it hopes he will adopt when amending the Criminal Law.

(14) It is at the present moment earnestly concerning itself in the care and treatment of the aged poor.

(15) At the direct request of the Dominion Government it is now engaged in drawing up a handbook regarding the women of Canada, their position, work, education, industries, etc., for use at the Paris Exhibition of 1900.

The possibility of making a practical reality of the International Council will be tested by this Congress. We believe, however, that this Congress will prove the possibility of our aims.

University Extension and Priggishness.

IN the last (May) number of the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago, writes on the work of the social settlement in our great cities.

The settlement itself Miss Addams defines as "an attempt to express the meaning of life in terms of life itself, in forms of activity." In this form of educational effort the public school accomplishes little. "There seems to be a belief among educators," says Miss Addams, "that it is not possible for the mass of mankind to have experiences which are of themselves worth anything, and that accordingly, if a neighbourhood is to receive valuable ideas at all, they must be brought in from the outside, and almost exclusively in the form of books." The children are taught to read and write, but the problems of their own industrial and social life are left untouched.

University extension, too, according to Miss Addams, must plead guilty to the charge of bookishness and of failure to teach the large and important things that This she illustrates from the concern humanity.

experience of Hull House :-

It was inevitable that the old charge should occur to me, that the best-trained scientists are inclined to give themselves over to an idle thirst for knowledge which lacks any relation to human life, and leave to the charlatans the task of teaching those things which deeply concern the welfare of mankind.

The most popular lectures we ever had at Hull House were a series of twelve upon organic evolution, but we caught the man when he was but a university instructor, and his mind was still eager over the marvel of it all. Encouraged by this success we followed the course with other lectures in science, only to find our audience annihilated by men who spoke with dryness of manner and with the same terminology which they used in the class-room. Simple people want the large and vital—they are still in the tribal stage of knowledge, so to speak. It is not that simple people like to hear about little things; they want to hear about great things simply told.

A Milk-and-Water Joke.

MR. JOHN A. BRIDGES contributes to Cornhill his recollections of student life at Christchurch under the heading, "At the House in the Fifties." He refers somewhat slightingly to the student and senior censor of Christchurch, Oxford, whom Ruskin panegyrised, and finds his humour especially far to seek:—

Of this humour but few examples survive, and of these the following is a fair specimen. Oddly enough, it appears to be the sole one that the memories of his most ardent admirers have been able to retain. "There is the cow story," they tell you triumphantly. His milkman wanting help to replace a cow that had died of feeding on a mackintosh cape, he pointed out that her diet had not had the effect of making her milk waterproof.

THE PRACTICAL RESULTS OF THE CONFERENCE. BY A RUSSIAN DIPLOMATIST.

In the North American Review for June, a well-known Russian diplomatist, who is wrongly described as "a diplomatist at the Hague," writes at some length on the Peace Conference: its possible practical results. The article was written by M. Lessar and contains the substance of counsels which bore good fruit at the Hague. He begins by describing the reception accorded to the humanitarian proposals of the Russians. At first they were ridiculed, but afterwards the public discovered at least a part of the proposed measures not only can be fulfilled, but are absolutely necessary in the face of existing international relations. This sentiment brought about the opinion, expressed at first tentatively, but during the last months with full certainty, that the result of the Conference can and ought to be the development of the principle of arbitration in cases of international disputes.

WHY A TRIBUNAL IS NEEDED.

The new state of international relations requires a new instrument to regulate it. Such an instrument must be a regularly constituted international tribunal.

But, it might be replied, arbitrating tribunals already exist. From 1815, there have been more than 130 cases submitted to them. Let them work as before; the Conference has nothing to do here.

The answer is easy, because all students of the question know the deficiencies of the present arbitrating tribunals

They are always freshly appointed for each individual case. When a misunderstanding arises, recourse to arbitration always presents the greatest difficulties, even after the efforts of diplomacy to arrive at a settlement have been in vain. To many this method of arranging international disputes seems extraordinary and even humiliating. When at last arbitration is decided upon, the appointment of the tribunal and the working out in each case of the mode of procedure occupy a long period of time, sometimes years, during which period the relations between the disputants become so strained, that even when a satisfactory agreement is arrived at, a return to the normal state of affairs comes slowly. In short, the present tribunals are a heavy, bulky mechanism very difficult to set to work.

DEFECTS OF THE EXISTING SYSTEM.

The arbitrators appointed for one single case are diverted from their usual occupations, and unavoidably consider the case submitted to them as something temporary and casual, and devote to it only a part of their time. This leads to tardiness of procedure and protractions which prejudice even the principle of arbitration.

The sense of justice is inherent in man, but impartiality is given to few; the development of it requires training and education of character. A private person deciding a case between a fellow-countryman and a foreigner is in most cases unable to discard national sympathies and inclines to the side of his compatriot. A professional judge in any civilised country is above such inclinations, and without hesitation decides against his countryman if he be in the wrong. In the present arbitrating tribunals, impartiality is expected only of the presiding umpire; the members of the court appointed by each side are usually advocates for their country. It would be difficult for them to be otherwise than partial. When an international dispute commences to agitate a country, the future possible arbitrators do not usually suspect what task awaits them; they take part in the agitation, and when appointed are already imbued with preconceived opinions, to rid themselves of which is always very difficult. One can say even more than that: not only is impartiality not expected of the arbitrators, but there is little doubt that the public opinion of a nation would severely condemn its representative, whose decision would be contrary to the interests of his country.

Very naturally the above-mentioned deficiencies, as well as some others of minor importance, lessen the authority of arbitration and limit its application.

in

-01

tie

th

0

m

b

WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE.

The task of the Conference is to remove these deficiencies, and even if it accomplish nothing else, it will have done a great work. For that purpose it has to do away with the present casual character of the international tribunals. It is indispensable that the Powers should arrive at an agreement as to the institution of a permanent international court, to which, with the mutual consent of the two sides, the rising dispute could be referred.

This tribunal should be invested with the authority which ought to belong to an institution called upon to decide the disputes of nations. The members should be given a position identical with that of the greatest state dignitaries, and be chosen from among men of the highest morals, character and learning, well known to their own country and to other nations.

When once a permanent tribunal of such high authority exists, recourse to it will rapidly become a part of international morals; it will be quite natural to submit disputes to it which diplomacy is unable to settle. Only particularly important cases will form the exception.

There will be no more protractions resulting from a new appointment of a tribunal in each new case; rules of procedure will be established once for all, precedents and traditions will guide the court, no delays will take place in the hearing of the

It is probably impossible at present for the Powers to arrive at a general agreement, binding them to have recourse to arbitration, if only in certain classes of disputes.

THE TRIBUNAL AND ITS LIMITS.

It is obvious that the permanent tribunal will not interfere with, but will facilitate, the conclusion of separate agreements between States, defining the class of dispute in which reference to the projected permanent tribunal will be obligatory.

The number of the members who shall constitute the tribunal is a very important matter. Will it consist of a limited number of judges, for ins ance, three or five, or will all the great Powers, and in some way the minor States, be represented? If governments could agree to nominate in rotation a limited number of members, that would be preferable.

Once the tribunal is resorted to, the broadest jurisdiction can be given to it. Governments can refer their cases to it, upon the understanding beforehand that its decision must be submitted to. That will be ordinary arbitration. Reference can also be made to it with no such obligation: then the court will become a kind of adviser or mediator, whose decision may in some cases be disregarded by the disputants. But such cases would be quite exceptional, and probably very rare, especially when the court consolidates its authority.

The court, especially in the beginning, will take cognisance principally of cases of secondary importance, but with the increase of its authority its sphere of action will broaden, and on exceptionally grave occasions the number of its members, by the mutual consent of the parties concerned, could be increased by the addition of competent persons; and even a sovereign or president of a republic could be invited to assume the position of honorary umpire. Thus the permanent court, in accordance with circumstances, could, from a consulting body, rise to the importance of these solemn assemblies to which the decision of great international questions is confided.

The permanent court could, in the course of time, also undertake and guide the codification of international law. This problem is too vast and complicated to form part of the work of the Conference; it can only be dealt with by a permanent institution.

WHAT A COURT WILL DO.

An international court is necessary, not for the definite abolition of war, but for the removing of irritating disputes, which are so dangerous in view of the increasing frequency of international intercourse, and which, under unfavourable circumstances, could even lead to useless wars. When the tribunal attains its full growth, decision by arms will remain only for quistions of real national honour, integrity of territory, or problems of such importance as the fate of decaying states or the change of the political status of whole continents. As an example of the latter could be quoted the last wars of Prussia with Austria and France, when the edifice of the Holy Roman Empire was replaced by the new German Empire. Such questions can scarcely be settled by a tribunal so long as the present conditions of life in the world are not radically changed.

The importance that was attached to the idea of international tribunals in the Russian proposals shows that its realisation ought to form the principal task of the Hague Conference, and that this problem should be its first consideration.

WHAT LORD C. BERESFORD WOULD PREFER.

In the Pall Mall Magazine for July Lord Charles Beresford pits against the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which he describes as a British surrender, the unwritten but deeply real agreement between the United States and this country. The writer is at no pains to conceal his doubt of anything like permanent goodwill between England and Russia. Lord Charles might almost be mistaken for a Radical as he declares:—

The hundred and twenty-five millions of English-speaking people throughout the world have begun to learn that all the movements which have made for the spread of Imperialism, of civilisation, of personal liberty, national freedom, and representative government, are movements which have sprung primarily from the English-speaking peoples, and not from crowned heads or cabinets.

Not European comity, but Anglo-American comradeship, seems to him the path of peace :--

The Peace Conference could not effect half as much as a thorough understanding between the United States and Great Britain could accomplish. Geographically, and by virtue of character and numbers, such an alliance would be irresistible in promoting peace. Who can doubt that the heavy sword which the united Anglo-Saxon race could throw into the balance would constitute them the arbiters between contending nations? And what race has ever shown itself more fitted for such power, so honestly likely to wield it with honour and justice?

No wonder that Europe, with its decaying institutions and its autocratic governments, fears such an understanding. Europe fears it, knowing how potent would be its effects; how the two nations which have done most for civilisation and freedom would not, and could not, rest content till the world at large was as free and prosperous as their own people.

Neither country desires war, unless something more powerful than territorial aggrandisement is the aim sought after; and I have always held that the line upon which our friendly relations will move is that of a commercial alliance on a defensive basis.

ANOTHER SOLDIER'S VIEW.

Major-General H. M. Bengough, C.B., writing in the United Service Magazine on the ethics of war, says:—

The establishment of the principle of arbitration on a solid and workable basis seems likely to be the one practical outcome of the labours of the Peace Convention now in session at the Hagne. Should the principle be definitely adopted, the century will close in striking contrast with its predecessor; the dove of peace resting where a short hundred years ago hovered the eagles of war. This important point gained, minor failures and anomalies in the proceedings of the Conference may be disregarded.

LONDON seen through foreign spectacles is the title of a paper in Gentleman's by C. W. Heckethorn. A French visitor in 1765 refers to "the liquid stinking mud three or four inches deep" which constantly covered the finest part of the Strand. The same observer announced that "there are no poor in London, a consequence," says our visitor, "of its rich and numerous charitable establishments and the immense sums raised by the poor-rates, which impost is one which the little householders pay most cheerfully, as they consider it a fund from which, in the event of their death, their wives and children will be supported."

CE.

own "a

the

Γhe

the rue.

the

hey

red

led,

nal

sed

ity,

the

ter-

ew

a

st.

to

ng

W

se.

ys

0.

is

ry

n,

se

es

ts

is у.

m

n

)-

e

f

THE COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA.

HOW IT HAS COME TO BIRTH.

A VALUABLE survey of the federative movement in Australia is contributed to the National Review by Mr. B. R. Wise, Q.C., M.P., one of the New South Wales delegates to the Federal Convention. The writer considers the struggle for American union the only political movement of modern times among English-speaking peoples equal to this in permanent importance. recalls at the outset that Earl Grey in 1849 included in his Bill for the better government of the Australian Colonies some clauses empowering two or more of the Colonies to unite under one government. They were struck out by the Lords. In 1884 the Federal Council came into existence. In 1889 Sir Henry Parkes launched his demand for "a Dominion Parliament in the Dominion of Australia." The response it awakened led him to convene a conference of Prime Ministers with a view to arranging a National Convention which should draft a Federal constitution. The Convention met in Melbourne in 1890, and reassembled in Sydney in 1891. Sir Henry Parkes reluctantly surrendered his preference for the Canadian model to the overwhelming feeling in favour of the less centralised type of the United States. The draft constitution of the 1891 Convention had substantially the framework of the draft of 1898. It was to have been submitted to the several Colonial Parliaments. Mr. Reid, Sir Henry Parkes' opponent and successor in office, found it expedient, after furious Anti-Federal agitation, to take up with the Federative movement. He invited the other Prime Ministers to meet him at Hobart at Christmas, 1895. The Convention at last met at Adelaide in March, 1897 (after Sir Henry's death), and spent four and a half months with many interruptions in drawing up a Federal Constitution. The final sitting was held in March, 1898.

ITS PRINCIPLE.

Of the constitution then drafted, the writer says :-

The cardinal feature of these resolutions is the preservation of responsible government in a Federal system. The Commonwealth of Australia will offer the first instance in political history of a Federal Government acting on the peculiarly British principles of Ministerial responsibility. In the United States no member of the Executive can hold a seat in Congress; while in Canada the appointment of Senators by Ministerial nomination, and the provision that the residue of unallotted powers is with the Dominion and not with the States, make that form of government rather an example of a limited unification than a Federation. In Australia, however, the Federal idea has been rigidly adhered to, except where it has had to yield to the exigencies of the Cabinet system.

ITS CONSTITUENTS.

As finally constituted, the Federal Parliament will consist of two Houses, both elected upon an absolutely popular basis, viz., manhood suffrage without plural voting, and in the case of South Australia, with womanhood suffrage as well. The Federal Parliament will subsequently make a uniform suffrage of its own. The House of Representatives will be returned by the several Colonies according to population, with one Member to about 50,000 voters; but no State will have less than five Members. According to the latest figures of population, the Members of the House of Representatives will be as follows:—New South Wales, 26; Victoria, 23; Queensland, 10; South Australia, 7; Tasmania, 5; West Australia, 5. Total, 76. The Senate will consist of six Members from each State which adopts the Constitution from the beginning, but the representation of any Colony which comes in afterwards will be matter of arrangement. The Federal Parliament can only exercise the authority expressly conferred-upon it by the Constitution.

ITS ADOPTION.

Mr. Wise then recounts the progress of the Federation struggle among the people. The referendum yielded the following result:—

- (+ -) - w , l , p 4	N.S.W.	VICTORIA.	SOUTH AUSTRALIA.	TASMANIA.	TOTAL.
For Against	71,595 66,228	200,520	35,800	21,706 2,716	219,621
Majority for the Bill}	5,367	78,421	18,480	8,990	111,258

The re-opening of the negotiations by Mr. Reid in view of the majority—though an insufficient majority—of votes in New South Wales is then reviewed. The General Election which followed in that Colony reduced Mr. Reid's Parliamentary majority from thirty-seven to two, and made him eager for Federation. A Conference with the other Colonies took place last January, minor compromises were agreed to. Mr. Wise's survey ends with the opening of the N.S.W. Parliament which was to authorise the holding of a second referendum. We know how that Act was finally passed, and moreover we know the triumphant majority with which New South Wales at last approved of Federation.

ODDITIES OF AMERICAN DICTION.

Mr. K. M. SILLARD shoots, as it were, a scuttleful of his sweepings among "Transatlantic Whimsicalities" into the pages of the New Century for July. He says:—

It has been well said that we English have everything in common with the United States except the language. The paradox is not extravagant, for a vast number of words, and phrases, and conventional metaphors in general use across the "Big Drink," as Mark Twain christened the Atlantic, are as Greek to us.

Here is a select assortment of American slang:-

If we are to be wide-awake, we are enjoined to keep cur "eyes skinned"; to "face the music" is to meet an emergency; probably the exceeding atrocity of most American bands accounts for the special significance of the last expression. "Bone-pit" is their elegant metaphor for a cemetery; "On top of dirt" is certainly charming for being on this side of the grave; Artemus Ward always called Mother Earth his "footstool," but is it not to him we are indebted for "biled rag"? "The Shakers axed me to go to their meetin', as they was to have sarvices that marnin', so I put on a clean biled rag and went." In this connection it may be noted that the middle-class "boss," or head of the household, in most American cities, always presides at dinner in his shirt-sleeves—sometimes vestless—and is "riled" if his male visitors do not dolikewise and so "splurge" (display) their "biled rag." What a model community! "Painted-box" is one of their tasteful synonyms for a coffin; "to paw the ivories" is a charmingly realistic way of asking a pianist to "operate" on her Erard-Grand. In the same category may be placed the adjuration. "pull down your vest!" found in some of Mark Twain's. works; "idea-pot" for head, "dry party" for prohibitionist (i.e., followers of Sir Wilfrid Lawson in our country); "tooth-carpenter," for dentist; "drummer," for commercial traveller; "lame duck," for defaulting stockbroker. "Move up, Ananias, don't crowd the form," is said to be a polite (?) way of casting doubt upon any statement; and "to wake up the wrong passenger" is to mistake your man—or, as Henry VIII. said to Wolsey, "he had the wrong sow by the ear."

An American might be tempted by this paper to theobvious rejoinder that a similarly obscure vocabulary could be compiled out of Oxford 'Varsity slang, which of all corruptions of the Queen's English is about the most debased. "I new great when the Engl Miln the v He high of all Mr. (and

H delik The lold s old s 1. gold 2. Euro 3. and large settle

a da

Pres

4.

T

of M every

is, a Tra Fra inte It the Stat and idea capi This beca dend the prov Afri men was in I was

the kind

Eng

dou

less

Joh

am

selv the Alf

THE TRANSVAAL TROUBLE.

(1) IN SUPPORT OF SIR ALFRED MILNER.

"DIPLOMATICUS" in the Fortnightly discusses "the 'new situation' in South Africa." He remarks on the great change in public opinion since the very recent days when the Raid and its stockjobbing promoters still gave the cause of the Uitlanders an unpleasant odour in English nostrils. The change was wrought by Sir Alfred Milner's Report of May 4th. Of this High Commissioner the writer says:—

He was selected not only because he was an administrator of high and proven ability, but because he enjoyed the confidence of all parties. It is true that he had been Private Secretary to Mr. Goschen, but he had also served as a colleague of Mr. Morley and Mr. Stead. He left England under the combined blessing of Mr. Asquith and Mr. Chamberlain, and with the approval of every organ of public opinion in the country.

His report contains the outcome of his two years' deliberation. The writer summarises the effect:—

The results of Sir Alfred Milner's mission, as embodied in the last viue Book and the Bloemfontein protocols, modify the old situation in four essential particulars. They show:—

 That the bulk of the suffering Uitlanders are neither gold-bus nor carpet-baggers.

2. That their equitable naturalisation and enfranchisement on European lines would not swamp the burghers.

3. That the local problem is much worse than we imagined, and that the hostility of the Boers to the Uitlanders is animated largely by hostility to the Paramount Power and the political settlement of 1884, and further that this hostility is stimulating a dangerous disaffection among the Dutch in Cape Colony.

4. That, although Dr. Leyds is no longer State Secretary, the President is as intransigeant as ever on the Franchise question, and consequently there is no prospect of an early settlement.

HAVE WE LEGAL RIGHT TO INTERVENE?

The advice of Sir Alfred Milner under these conditions is, according to the writer, tantameunt to saying, "The Transvaal is to be coerced into granting a moderate, fair Franchise." "Diplomaticus" asks, Have we a right to intervene? and answers—

It is a nice question in international law, more especially as the right of intervention for the protection of aliens in foreign States is nowhere very clearly defined. That it exists, however, and can be enforced in a very drastic way against States whose ideas are alien to those of European peoples, are shown by the capitulations and consular jurisdictions in Oriental countries. This legal difficulty, however, scarcely arises in the Transvaal, because, by virtue of the suzerainty, it is not a complete sovereign state, and the circumstances under which its independence was granted pre-suppose a condition of responsibility to the Paramount Power to act justly and so shape its policy as to prove a source of peace and strength to the whole of South Africa. This was clearly laid down by the Imperial Govern-ment in the Proclamation by which the Sand River Convention was revoked, and the independence of the Republic abolished, The chief offence of the Transvaal on that occasion was that, by its ill-treatment of the Kaffirs, it was jeopardising the peace of South Africa. Its offence to-day is of the same kind, but on a much larger scale. Instead of Kaffirs it is Englishmen. . . . Apart, however, from any legal right, it is doubtful whether any State would tolerate that a community of its nationals should be treated-even by a foreign State, much less a semi-feudatory-in the same way as the Uitlanders of Johannesburg are now treated by the Boers. On the whole, I am inclined to think that there is a legal right to intervene.

IS IT WISE TO INTERVENE?

The next question is, "Would it be well to avail ourselves of the right?" So far as South Africa is concerned, the Colonial Dutch are more likely, according to Sir Alfred's Report, to be alienated from our sway by our making concessions to the Boers than by resolute firmness. Imperial considerations forbid us to encourage disaffection in South Africa. The moral effect on our subjects in Asia is also to be considered. But "the great need of the local Colonies and States is Confederation." And according to the writer—

The one hope of Confederation lies in a firm enforcement of the British supremacy. When once the Transvaal is made to feel that the suzerainty is a real thing, there will be a chance for the Dominion of South Africa, but, if ever the suzerainty is abandoned, the Dominion will never be. It may be doubted, indeed, whether in that event a British South Africa would long endure.

The form of firm intervention proposed by Sir Alfred is approved by the writer: a demand for the immediate and effective franchise he has asked for. He continues:—

That this end will be attained without war, so long as we make it manifest that we are resolved to employ coercion failing gentler methods, I am convinced. The Boers do not want war, and indeed they have nothing but an impracticable aspiration to fight for. Neither the independence of their Republic, nor their predominance as a caste, is threatened. That their leaders are really anxious for peace is shown by the desperate bargaining of President Kruger himself during the last three weeks, and the alacrity with which the Raad and the Burghers have sanctioned each fresh concession.

THE TRANSVAAL STILL BRITISH TERRITORY.

"The Voice of the Uitlanders" is uttered in the Contemporary, by Mr. Frank Safford. He boldly challenges the common "assumption that the Transvaal State and the British Empire were several and distinct nations." This is the writer's version of the facts:—

From the Peace of 1814 Cape Colony has formed part of the dominions of the Crown. The people became thereby British subjects. At the time of the great Trek those who trekked were such British subjects, or were, like President Kruger, subjects by virtue of birth within the dominions of the Queen. Such status carries with it its rights of citizenship and its obligations of allegiance, neither of which can be removed except by express lawful enactment or by mutual consent. These subjects of the Crown of England migrated across the Vaal River. The Sand River Convention guaranteed "in the fullest manner on the part of the British Government to the immigrant farmers north of the Vaal River the right to manage their own affairs and to govern themselves according to their own laws, without any interference on the part of the British Government." In this there was nothing, on the one hand, releasing the subject from allegiance, or, on the other, depriving him of the right of approaching the Crown by way of appeal in virtue of its prerogative.

In marked contrast, when the Orange Free State was formed, the British Crown government and territory. The writer furthermore observes:—

It is important here to note that, after the Pretoria Convention of August 3rd, 1881, the above Letters Patent of 1879 and of 1880, which were confined to dealing with the nature of the government to which the people of the Transvaal Republic should be subject, were revoked by the Queen's Letters Patent of February 6th, 1882, but that, on the other hand, no Letters Patent were issued, nor has any document under the Queen's sign manual been issued, revoking the proclamation of 1877 or her Majesty's sign manual, which acts had the effect of annexing the territory of the Transvaal to the British dominions, and were so construed and understood by both parties to the Convention of Pretoria in 1881.

The writer further argues :-

The fact that the Queen accords or grants the government of the territory proves that the territory was the Queen's. Except so far as the words "subject to the suzerainty of Her Majesty, her heirs and successors," may be taken to limit the right of the Crown or the privileges which the inhabitants take under the

ion

the

L.

3

8 ew

es

ral

i's

nd

th:

or ds.

as-

le:

ve

h

n

e

Convention, there seems nothing in the grant of complete self-government which has not been granted to many of the self-governing colonies known as proprietary governments.

LIFE OR DEATH FOR THE EMPIRE.

"Are We to Lose South Africa?" is the title of Sir Sidney Sheppard's contribution to the discussion in the Nineteenth Century. As late Administrator and chief magistrate of British Bechuanaland, who was on excellent terms with the Dutch population, he speaks with some authority. He says:—

We are at the parting of the ways, and if we take the wrong way we may lose South Africa. If we lose South Africa we shall inevitably lose India, and therewith our whole colonial empire. The question for England is one of life or death. No British Ministry honestly desirous of maintaining the integrity and safeguarding the future of the Empire could hesitate for a moment as to the duty of supporting the High Commissioner in his fair and reasonable demands. The wretched Englishman in the Transvaal has appealed to his Queen. What answer is he to receive? •Is he to be told that England can do nothing for him, and that she has cast him off utterly? If such be England sanswer, it is not only the English in South Africa, but the English in every colony in the Empire, that will want to know what is the use of professing allegiance to an effete State so honeycombed by intrigues and so split up by party differences at home as to be powerless to protect her sons abroad. The question comes to this: Who is to be master in South Africa? If England is to be and remain the Paramount Power in reality and not merely in name, the time is come for her to assert and maintain her sovereign rights—by peaceful mans if possible, by force of arms if need be. If the Pretorian oligarchy imagine and act on the belief that they, and not we, are the masters of South Africa, and that they have the power, as they undoubtedly have the will, to wrest from us the true centre of our Colonial Empire, then the issue between us can only be settled in one way, and the sooner we have a fleet in Delagoa Bay and an army of occupation in the Transvaal, the better for us and for all who come after us.

(2) LIBERAL "CHAFF."

Mr. Herbert Paul writes in the Contemporary on "The Conservatism of President Kruger." It is a clever piece of partisan banter: the main purpose of which is to score off points against Conservatives and Unionists from the bigoted Toryism of the Boers. Persons who see something else in Imperial difficulties than an opportunity for smart party "chaff" will not find much to help them. There is, however, one practical suggestion in Mr. Paul's thirteen pages of raillery:—

Some people who know South Africa quite as well as the High Commissioner believe that the root of the matter is not the suffrage for the Raads, but the municipal government of Johannesburg. It will be remembered that immediately after the Raid Mr. Chamberlain proposed a scheme of Home Rule for the Rand. But Mr. Kruger, whose head seems to be a storehouse of political fallacies, is a bigoted Unionist, and would not hear of it. Now, however, the question is being raised again. . . . The Boers hate a democratic municipality almost as much as our Tories hate the London County Council. . . . Since the Conference at Bloemfontein Mr. Kruger has proposed an increase in the Parliamentary representation of the Gold Fields. While he is in a conciliatory humour he might be induced to concede a municipal constitution to Johannesburg.

Mr. Paul declares that Liberal principles "preclude the idea of armed intervention except in the case of deliberate cruelty and tyranny." The exception is amusingly significant after the writer's admissions of Boer misgovernment. Mr. Paul laughs at the idea of "a war for the extension of the franchise promoted by the Marquis of Salisbury." Conservatives will doubtless equally enjoy the humour of Liberal solicitude for the undisturbed sway of the Tory President.

THREE UNIONISTS ON OLD AGE PENSIONS.

" DON'T!"

"Is the Unionist Party committed to Old Age Pensions?" is the question discussed in the National Review by three Unionist members of Parliament. All three writers unite in advising that the pension project should be dropped.

CONSERVATIVES HAVE SACRIFICED ENOUGH.

Mr. C. A. Whitmore cites the Reports of Commission and Committee to show that the demand for State-aided pensions has no authoritative judgment behind it. He also questions whether a preponderance of the Unionist party is really in favour of such legislation. He grants that between the two wings of the party there must be give-and-take. Under stress of the Home Rule peril, with Mr. Gladstone alive and active, the Conservatives made many sacrifices and acquiesced in "popular" legislation which they disliked. But now the need is not by any means so great. Why should they plunge into this great socialistic experiment? And where will they get the money from? So he concludes:—

Let our Conservative reformers bend their energies to the discovery of new sources of national revenue, to a reconstruction of our system of local taxation, and to the problem of securing adequate house accommodation for the industrial classes in the towns. They will then be doing more to meet the real needs and desires of the nation than by prematurely pressing upon this Parliament some Bill for State-aided pensions.

PENSIONS WITHOUT STATE AID.

Sir John Dorington has got a scheme in effective working which "covers the ground." This is the system inaugurated by Mr. Holloway and the writer at Stroud more than twenty-five years ago. He says:—

The novel idea involved in Mr. Holloway's rules is of extreme simplicity, viz., that the payments to the society in respect of sickness are only for one year, in the same manner as in annual or breaking-up societies, but contrary to the practice of such societies, the surplus at the end of the year, instead of being handed back to each member to be spent or got rid of, as is usually the case, is not allowed to be drawn, but the proper share of it is credited in the books of the society to each member and carries such interest as the society can earn on its investments. On reaching the age of sixty-five, or on death, the whole sum standing to the member's credit is payable to the member or his representatives, or is, at the member's option, convertible into an annuity. At any period, also previous to the age of sixty-five being reached, the member can withdraw his accumulations, subject to a fine of the last two years' accretions. It might be supposed that such a society was beyond the reach of the agricultural labourer and lower-paid town labourer; but in practice this is not found to be the case. All classes join, and it is clear that if such a system as this were in general operation the possibility of old-age pensions would be settled by a self-acting and self-reliant agency without State aid of any kind. It has already made enormous progress, and within the Unions of Stroud, Dursley, and Wotton has practically covered the

WHY NOT LEAVE IT ALONE?

Mr. Edward Bond dismisses Canon Blackley's Compulsory Insurance Scheme, and regards Mr. Charles Booth's universal endowment scheme as a reductio ad absurdum of the pension idea. He looks to increase in provident habits and general progress in the community to enable citizens to support themselves throughout their life. He says, "I find it difficult to believe that the agitation which has been so conspicuous of late is a genuine spontaneous movement of the great body of the people." Those who would try legislation as a bid for popular favour, he reminds of Bismarck's experiments in State Socialism and its effect on the Socialists.

rem achi ally and begi who Sen wor thei evil naïv

first

sent

S

T violatever a last than Schrinsti restrant

con

in l

T

him com bur app our fave (ste; sav jud wh

by I to cea

fro

is In ali

tio

Ge pri ha rec the

A JEW ON JEWS.

ISRAEL AMONG THE NATIONS.

THE North American Review for June contains a remarkable article by Max Nordau on Jews and their achievements in the world. M. Nordau's article naturally falls under two headings, "Why Jews are Hated" and "What Jews have done to be Loved." M. Nordau begins by declaring that "the problem of the Jew," whose best known and most brutal form is anti-Semitism, has arisen in every civilised country in the world, and asks the reason. The statement made by their enemies that the Jews are hated because of their evil qualities will not bear examination. It shows the naïve self-deception of those who hate instinctively at first, and then seek for plausible grounds to justify the sentiment to their own consciences.

THE TESTIMONY OF STATISTICS.

Statistics in all countries are in favour of the Jews:—
The worst and most despicable crimes, murder, manislaughter, violation of the sexual code, robbery and burglary are scarcely ever committed by Jews. They have a smaller death rate, a larger number of marriages and a smaller number of divorces than the average. They have a larger representation in High Schools and Normal Schools, where their entrance to such institutions is not restricted (in Russia and Roumania it is restricted, as is known), than corresponds to their relative numerical proportion in a nation, or even in a metropolis.

THE ROOT OF THE MATTER.

The root of the matter, says M. Nordau, is that man considers inimical all that differs from him in nature and in habits:

It is enough that some one differs from us; we will then find him disagreeable to us, for he disturbs our organised habits and compels us to new efforts of adaptation, which are always burdensome and trying. If those who differ from us are a disappearing minority, we feel under no compulsion to suppress our antipathy, or even to screen it; and absence of restraint favours development.

Once this resentment has been awakened, it goes a step farther. For it is a physiological law that children, savages, and those in civilised life who are devoid of judgment, hold responsible for their misfortunes those who have aroused resentment in them. All this springs from the fact that they differ from other men. It is only by ceasing to differ that the question can be solved:—

In order to suffer hatred and persecution no longer, in order to attain to normal conditions of life, the Jews must either cease being a minority, or they must cease being distinguishable.

They must either emigrate till they form a majority in Palestine, or assimilate with the peoples among whom they live. Between these alternatives there is nothing to choose. But the half-concession of partial assimilation will help nothing.

WHAT HAS THE JEW DONE?

The answer to "What has the Jew done to be loved?" is based by M. Nordau on his services in political life. In one respect the Jews differ from other unassimilated aliens. They do not organise their political strength:—

In no country where the Jews enjoy political rights is there a Jewish vote, in the sense in which the United States has a German or an Irish vote. The Jews who exercise their voting privileges belong entirely to the second category, of which I have spoken above, that is, to those who do not wish to be recognised as a distinctive group of the population. They therefore avoid anxiously everything that might call attention to their Judaism. They do not organise; they create no Jewish election committees; they seek to gain no control in campaigns.

They even vote openly for anti-Semitic candidates. England is the only exception:—

These English representatives of the Jewish race have grown manly, frank and magnanimous, evidently by reason of their Anglo-Saxon training and the example of their Christian environment, and can be held up as an example for imitation to the Continental cowards, who grow pale at the thought that their Judaism might be noticed.

ENGLAND THE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH STATESMEN.

The result has been that England has trained more Jewish statesmen than any other country:—

Of Disraeli everything has been said that can be said. I wish merely to add that the lustre of his name is constantly growing. The voices which have stigmatised him as adventurer and charlatan have been silenced. Sober criticism recognises that what has been called his "Oriental imagination" was actually an almost prophetic depth of penetration, and that he foresaw the development of the colonial policy of all the Powers twenty years in advance of his most sharp sighted contemporaries. Baron Henry de Worms received his peerage for services rendered his party and his country. Lord Herschell will be immortalised in the history of the Liberal party of England. Sir Drummond Wolff has the preference of election when England is called upon to solve some peculiarly difficult diplomatic problem. Sir Julian Vogel, late ex-Premier of New Zealand, brought a deteriorated, impoverished colony from the verge of bankrupicy to cultural and financial prosperity.

THE JEWS' PLACE IN POLITICS AND COMMERCE.

But even in Germany in politics Jews have played an astonishingly prominent part:—

The first German Parliament, in the Church of St. Paul, in Frankfurt, which consisted of such men as Uhland, Arndt, Jahn, of the greatest poets, students, and statesmen of the German people, knew of none more worthy of its presidency than the baptized Jew, Eduard Simson. The same assembly, the most brilliant, and spiritually the most prominent Germany has ever witnessed, elected the Jew, Gabriel Riesser, Vice-President; Simon as a member of the Committee of Thirty, etc.

In France, in 1848, the Jew, Goudchaux, held the portfolio of finance when the 4 per cent. rentes stood at 34 and the 3 per cent. at 33'75, and thus saved the country from disaster. Fould secured happy financial conditions for Napoleon III. Jules Simon was the son of a Lorraine Jew.

The Jews, Marx and Lasalle, stood sponsors to one of the most important political movements of the day—Socialism; that one of the three leaders of German Social Democracy is the Jew, Singer; that the Jews, Dr. Adler and Dr. Ellenbogen, organised the Socialist party in Austria, and that Russian Nihilism numbers among its leaders, apostles, heroes and martyrs, a large contingent of Jews.

It is a mistake, says M. Nordau, to think that the instincts of the Jews are commercial:-

His natural talents tend to politics. Whenever he is free to act in public affairs, he readily advances to the front rank of parliamentarians, statesmen and diplomats; and the community derives its largest advantages from such fruitful use of his native gifts. Trade to him is merely a "pis aller." True, most Jews to-day still carry on trade, and in some countries commerce is almost entirely in Jewish hands. But it is known that the Jews turned to this vocation, in the first place, not from inclination, but from bitter necessity, simply because it was the only one left open to them by their cruel oppressors in the Middle Ages, and in some great countries it is the only one left open to them to this day.

During the fifteen centuries in which they have devoted themselves to trade they have not produced a single fruitful commercial idea, and no great item of material progress is coupled with a Jewish name.

S.

ons?"

three riters

d be ssion

ided

He

ants

t be eril.

ives

lar "

d is inge

will

the

tion

ring

the eeds

this

ive

em

oud

of

in

as ice

of 25 per

m-

its

the

he

n.

to

his

ns.

ch

ut n,

a-

a đ.

ns

1e

S

ď

n

r

THE MAKING OF MODERN GERMANY.

IT is a brilliant article which Mr. Henry Cust contributes to the National Review under the heading of "The Genesis of Germany." He begins by remarking that during the last forty years a new Europe and a new world have been created. The world of to-day is more different from the world of 1860 than that from the world of Queen Anne. Most amazing is the emergence of Germany. He indulges in a curious comparison between the rise of modern Germany and the rise of modern Japan. "The date and period of their evolution is the same."

1500 TO 1700 : FROM ZENITH TO NADIR.

But he focuses his attention on Germany; for "Germany has got to be understood." So "for rough consideration" he takes three years in the history of Germany and groups his searchings about them-the years 1500, 1700, 1900.

In the early years of the sixteenth century Germany stood first among the nations of Europe. . . Yet . . . the thought, the daring, and the great protest that were to half Europe as a pillar of fire, lighting forward to freedom and to strength, spread over Germany a thick and blinding darkness. It needed the scourging and the agony of the War of Thirty Years to teach the doctrine of control.

WHAT LED TO THE ABYSS.

Mr. Cust then traces to geography and history the two opposing tendencies of the German spirit. The vast spaces between the communities and the difficulty of communication developed a localism which became particularism, while the memory of the Empire fostered a curious cosmopolitanism. The intense passion for liberty which belonged to the race intensified the particularism; but concentrated particularism must needs become absolutism. So political tyranny flourished, and under it an unrestrained freedom of personal thought. These processes brought about the failure of the Reformation, and all but ruined Germany. The writer proceeds :-

The year 1700 finds Germany in her lowest abyss. . . . If nations have a soul, the soul of Germany was dead. One thing alone prolonged a choking and flickering life-the individual man; local, particularist, mock-cosmopolitan, and hardly conscious, yet alive; with his mind the more active and more open, whether to reason or error, because of the impossibility of effective public life. And it was the individual who was to save Germany, and his sword was literature. The history of the next century lies in the education of the German man, at first by books alone, and later by the schooling of external facts. was the divorce from facts that had brought him to the pass of Half-guessed ahead lay the goal of free and united Germany. The burden to be removed was Absolutism and Localism. "From the clash of this weight and force were born the central motives of Modern Germany. These were Free Thought and the House of Hohen-

THE THREE GREAT MAKERS.

"In the absence of all other possible subjects of which to think or write, the German thought and wrote of himself." Whence pietism and rationalism. Leibnitz gave his people an ideal, convinced them they were alive, taught them that the world was a living organism. Mr. Cust describes the advent of the New Makers in these vivid sentences, which recall Mazzini at his best :-

The House of Hohenzollern was narrow, tyrannical, and violent. Prussia was poor, unloved, unlovely. Berlin in 1648 was a ruined village of 300 souls. But at the appointed time there came a king, a maniac's son, who took Germany by the throat and shook her body into life. To meet him came another man, who called all Germany within his lecture-room and woke her mind, and to the shaken body and the blinking mind there came a third, who cried, "You have a soul."

To make work willing: thought conscious: action responsible: this was the task of the makers of Modern Germany; and Frederic, Lessing, and Kant, with proper and almost conscious solemnity, assumed so great an undertaking.

THE ESSENCE OF MODERN GERMANY.

Frederic explained by precept, by practice, and by chastisement, that a king and a subject were both servants, that a German was as good a man as any other, and that if the German thought otherwise he would suffer and make others suffer, each German being a part of the State. Lessing said : To feel is good; to think is good; but all thoughts and feelings are not good or even expedient. Germans must distinguish or they will suffer and make others suffer, each German being a part of the world. Kant taught that ideals were good and experiments were good, and human institutions were good, but that beyond and above all was another law to be recognised and reverenced; for in default of obedience Germans will suffer and cause suffering, each German being part of the universe. In these three doctrines, tempered, abased, exaggerated, as the years would mould them, has lain and lies the essence of Modern

THE SHOCK OF NAPOLEON.

The swift steel teeth of Napoleon snapped upon the Germans as they dreamt; and it was for them to learn, through bitter years, from Frederic self-suppression and the service of the whole; from Kant the spirit to endure such training with willingness and self-respect. For a while the red sea of a blind revolution seemed closing on the German people. But the appointed leaders did not fail. Time assured their tread and experience their authority. There has been, perhaps no generation of men when high service was so needed and so and found sobriety. They challenged all religion and built a faith. They took humanity to pieces and left it an organic whole. They tore down all tradition, and they established law.

"SERVICE AND SACRIFICE."

Fichte, Stein and Hardenberg showed what was to be

Service and sacrifice were the text of their sermon, a doctrine which would have been as alien as abhorrent to all German generations since 200 years. The king must give away his kingship to the people, the people their selves to the king. Both king and people made but one. Neither existed apart: together they were stronger than the world; apart they were German names: together they were the German nation. The least as much as the greatest had his life to give, and his life was all his country asked of him; but that it asked imperiously, and to make it worth the living he must give it all and freely. In the very blackness of the veriest despair Fichte shouled this truth and courage to the Germans . . And the nation answered. The mechanic individualism, weary and surfeited with its own monotonous cud, turned eagerly to fresh and nourishing pastures. The life of Self found at last a larger and a freer being in that life of many selves we call the State. The individual was not abolished, but, being one, was more than one as part of many. Only so might individual life be life at all. Fichte translated Kant's rules for the individual into terms of the national existence. For the first time that mysterious force which we call Public Opinion was heard, and loudly heard in Germany. . . . For the first time since the migrations Germany was one.

So Mr. Cust brings us to the glorious national dawn of the War of Liberation. He has done good service to the British public by recalling at this time of sordid competition in commerce and diplomacy the sublime enthusiasms which preceded and attended the new birth of the Vaterland.

RECI TH July inves Impe is th Hes cont Bull. deve pres > with preve weal posit had this in th lean D cour > > vast new

Th

mer plan the mer expe who indu slov The min cou beco > this Con pov con to wit fres

add cap our

tra bot sea the it pro

no her im wh 28

do

ENGLAND AS THE WORLD'S LANDLORD,

RECEIVING HER RENT IN THE EXCESS OF IMPORTS.

other woke

there

sible:

and

cious

stise-

at a thers

aid:

lings

h or ng a

and

but

and

and

In

the lern

ans tter

the

rith

fa

But

ead

no

SO

up

t a

nic

W.

be

ne

n

is

t:

ne

fe

d

d

YIIM

THIS is the prospect held out by "Ritortus" in the July Contemporary. Landlord, not by conquest, but by investment of capital. So he calls his theme "The Imperialism of British Trade." His point of departure is the much-talked-of excess of imports over exports. He sees nothing to be alarmed at in this excess, quite the contrary. It marks to him the growing rent-roll of John Bull, landlord of the planet. He surveys our commercial development from the days of Queen Elizabeth to the present time, and reaches these conclusions :-

The rising rivalry of our competitors in manufactures, together with our one-sided Free Trade policy, would not only have prevented us from progressing any further in manufactures and wealth, but would surely have landed us in a most undesirable position, if the expanding and conquering power of our capital had not come to our rescue. We ought never to lose sight of this momentous fact. . . . Our chief power no longer consists in the supremacy of our industry. It is shifting gradually, and leaning more and more on capital.

NO LONGER THE WORKSHOP OF THE WORLD.

Disraeli, in his "Sybil," remarks that, in a commercial country like England, every half-century develops some new and vast source of public wealth which brings into national notice a new and powerful class. A couple of centuries ago a Turkey merchant was the great creator of wealth; the West India planter followed him; in the middle of last century appeared the nabob. The above types described by Disraeli in turn merged in the land, and became English aristocrats... The expenditure of the revolutionary war produced the loan-monger, who succeeded the nabob, and the application of science to industry developed the manufacturer. He in his turn is now, slowly but surely, disappearing before the foreign investor. The balance of power removes from Manchester and Birmingham to St. Swithin's Lane and Lombard Street. England could not remain the workshop of the world; she is fast becoming its creditor, its mortgagee, its landlord.

JOHN BULL AS FOREIGN INVESTOR.

The writer finds, "more or less, the starting point of this our latest development" to be the Limited Liability Companies Act of 1862. "It gave our capital the great power of combining, and the courage for starting on its conquering career." He gleefully quotes Ricardo's letter to Malthus :-

Accumulation of capital has a tendency to lower profits. If with every accumulation of capital we could tack a piece of fresh fertile land to our island, profits would never fall.

He exclaims :-

That is just what our capital has done for us. It has been adding one piece of land after the other to our islands, until our capitalists may triumphantly say, "The world-the world is

The superabundant capital of Great Britain finding no longer profitable employment in the agriculture, manufactures, and trade of her own territory, began, by necessity, to overflow her boundaries, to take possession-first of the carrying trade on the seas, and then of the soils, the industries, and the commerce of the countries beyond the seas. It laid its hands on everything it could develop and make profitable. It thereby kept up profits and increased England's wealth.

Mill expresses this very happily when he writes: "England no longer depends on the fertility of her own soil to keep up her rate of profit, but on the soil of the whole world." It is important that this be understood to the letter. It is truly the whole world, and not only that part of it which is mapped out as our Colonial possessions, which is fast becoming England's domain and empire.

AGAINST KAFFIR CIRCUSES.

The writer draws a distinction between real and nominal extensions of our investments abroad :-

Glad, indeed, may the colonies be if English investors send out their investments—as they happily do for the mest part—in the shape of commodities. In such cases there is "value re-ceived"; but there is no "value received" if no actual capital be transmitted to a country, and if, nevertheless, it be saddled with debts running up to millions of pounds by mere share transactions on the London Stock Exchange. Such is the special privilege of the pitiable countries on which modern Imperialism is allowed to experimentalise and to peg out claims for posterity.

"OUR CAPITALISTIC GLORY."

By virtue of our invested capital, Australia is ours: Canada also is ours: but "we have helped to build up the United States on a grander scale than any of our colonies, and, from a merely economic point of view, we may look upon this country as upon our largest and greatest colony." In Argentina are invested some two hundred millions sterling of British capital. Concessions worth £20,000,000 have just been secured for us in China. So the writer exults, "The industrial glory of little England may be departing; its capitalistic glory is certainly rising."

IMPORTS, NOT INTEREST MERELY, BUT RENT.

This is the secret of the rapid growth in excess of imports :-

If since the middle of the century we have sent our capital to produce abroad, if we have farmed with it the soil of foreign countries, if by means of it we have dotted the whole globe with our industrial establishments-then we must of necessity import an increasing share of the produce of our capital abroad without exporting for it in return. Our imports from abroad were bound to increase; our exports from home were bound to suffer. It was a radical change which upset the equilibrium of international exchange.

"Ritortus" complains that economic writers have not grasped the meaning of the change. "They do not see, however, that England is no longer a mere creditor who draws interest, but is also a landlord and proprietor who draws rents and profits."

SOME PORTENTOUS FIGURES.

He cheerily declares :-

The fact is, the trade of the world, as well as its soil, if we do not foolishly disturb it, or meddle with it from unwarrantable ealousy, is becoming more and more one, and becoming more and more British, in whatever country it is going on and under whatever flag it sails.

We are every year getting richer. This is best shown by the statistics of the increase of cur national wealth since the time when this importation began. The general wealth of the United Kingdom was estimated by Porter in 1840 at £4,000,000,000 sterling. According to Mulhall it rose in 1882 to £8,720,000,000 sterling; in 1888 to £9,400,000,000; and in 1895 to £11,806,000,000 sterling... We cannot be far from the truth if we estimate the whole value of British property and investments abroad at least at from £4,000,000,000 to £5,000,000,000.

THE Revista Portugueza Colonial e Maritima is a well-written review full of interesting matter. Considering that the Portuguese daily papers are, as a whole, more go-ahead than their Spanish contemporaries, it is strange that the smaller country should be so wanting in magazines and reviews. The Revista Portugueza shows what could be done. It contains articles on the Anglo-French Agreement, the Trans-African Railway, the Christianisation of Africa and the Influence of the Pope or, rather, his successor-in the solution of the problem, the Town of Canton, and other interesting subjects. This is a welcome addition to the foreign reviews.

THE REAL MOTIVE FOR EXPANSION.

FRESH fields for the investment of capital and not simply new markets for finished goods: that, according to Mr. C. A. Conant's thoughtful essay in the June Forum, is the true objective of "the struggle for commercial empire," and of the modern passion for colonial expansion.

THE SWIFT GROWTH OF CAPITAL IN GERMANY.

Mr. Conant calls attention to the extraordinary speed with which capital accumulates under modern conditions. He says:—

One of the most striking phenomena of the new economic conditions is the rapidity with which capitalisation proceeds, when once a country has entered, to any considerable extent, upon the career of machine production. This has been illustrated in a remarkable manner by the history of Germany and Russia during the last twen y-five years. In 1870, Germiny was a comparatively poor country. . . The estimated wealth of Germany in negotiable securities in 1895 was 18,000,000,000 dols.; and she ranked second among European nations. . . The capital of the 11 large Berlin banks, exclusive of the Imperial Bank, increased from 586,000,000 marks, at the close of 1896, to 844,000,000 marks (200,000,000 dols.) in 1898.

IN RUSSIA.

The developm at of Russia has been, in some respects, even more remarkable than that of Germany.... The issues of the shares of stock companies in Russia amounted in 1895 to 129,363,000 rubles, in 1896 to 232,640,000 rubles, and in 1897 to 239,424,000 rubles (120,000,000 rubles.) The issues for 1898 probably exceeded 300,000,000 rubles. The savings-banks deposits, which as recently as 1885 were only 26,619,440 rubles, w.r. 508,512,000 rubles (260,000,000 dols.) in August, 1898.

IN GREAT BRITAIN.

The vast balance in the United Kingdom of imports over exports suggests something of the extent of British capital invested abroad:—

Great Britain, according to recent estimates, has capital invested abroad to the amount of £2,000,000,000, or nearly 10,000,000 dols. The interest upon this sum, at 4½ per cent., would bring her an annual revenue of 450,000,000 dols.; and she derives a like amount from the passenger and freight earnings of her merchant marine. So far as these foreign investments are safe and well chosen, ... the result is much more beneficial to British interests than if the increasing savings of the country were kept at home to bid against each other in the stock market.

"THE SALIENT ECONOMIC LESSON."

This survey of expanding capital leads the writer to affirm:

The necessity of sending capital abroad to obtain profitable returns is the salient economic lesson of the closing days of the mineteenth century. In recent years interest and discount rates have been declining, as the result of the excess of loanable capital beyond the effective demand of European markets and of the diminishing return paid by first-class investments at hom:

. . . The real opportunity afforded by colonial possessions is for the development of the new countries by fixed investments, whose slow completion is the only present means of absorbing saved capital without the needless duplication of existing means of production. Whether trade invariably follows the flag or not, the real question of the benefits of Australia, India, Canada, and Egypt to Great Britain, and of Algeria, Tunis, and Madagascar to France, relates to the fields which have been and will be opened there for the profitable investment of capital, and not merely to the quantity of finished goods hid down annually in the export trade.

THE GOLD HOARD OF UNCLE SAM.

The writer draws the moral for his own country, which last year sent out more manufactures than she imported:-

The United States is rapidly approaching the condition of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Belgium, where she will be compelled to seek free markets and opportunities for investment in the undeveloped countries, if she is not to be crowded to the wall by the efforts of the other great civilised Powers. . . . If the Treasury gold were added to that of the New York banks, making a total of more than 400,000,000 dols., their combined gold holdings would be more than twice those of the Bank of England.

UNITED AMERICA v. DISUNITED EUROPE.

The writer quotes Professor Dubois' paper in L'Economiste Européen on "the United States of America and the Disunited States of Europe." The Professor closes with a warning to the Old World—"disunited, divided, absorbed in quarrels stimulated by the ardour of historic traditions rather than by consciousness of real interest' -to unite "against the monopolists of the ocean and of colonial commerce, whether they be of one nation or of two." Mr. Conant advises his countrymen to prepare for this struggle by adapting or abandoning Protection, and by securing greater unity and continuity of Government policy. If the Constitution stands in the way, then "the Constitution, like other human instruments, should be amended. This has been the secret of the preservation of the British Constitution. It has not been a set of rigid formulas inscribed upon mouldering parchment. The Constitution has kept pace with the steady upward march of the British people." Times are changed when such a comparison can be made in a leading organ of American opinion.

The Relaxations of Royalty.

MRS. SARAH TOOLEY, in the Woman at Home for July, describes some Royal amusements. "The Queen's favourite amusements throughout her life have been equestrian exercise, sketching, and simple round games, notably Patience." "Patience" is now her chief diversion, and Her Majesty takes her Patience table with her wherever she journeys, by sea or land.

The Princess of Wales used to be specially devoted to dancing. Latterly her favourite amusements have been spinning—on a black ebony spinning wheel—and photography.

Of her daughters, the Duchess of Fife is quite an expert with the camera, and the Princess Victoria has taken to photography and fishing; Princess Charles of Denmark is a great cyclist.

The two Princesses Louise are famous "fishermen." Princess Louise of Great Britain finds her chief recreation in housekeeping. Princess Christian cycles and plays

The Prince of Wales enjoys most sports, but detests fishing. His principal hobbies at Sandringham are horsebreeding and battue shooting. Bowls and recently golf are among his favourite pastimes.

The Duke of York, on the other hand, is an enthusiast for fishing. "Lady Mary" states in her Glass of Fashion:—

Not everybody is aware that the Duke of York is a capital player on the banjo, and when in the company of his own and his wife's chosen friends, will sing comic songs to his own accompaniment by the hour together. The Duchess, like her mother before her, is fortunate in the possession of a sweet contralto voice, and warbles with no little taste and feeling, to the delight of the home party at Sandringham.

The Duke of Connaught, says Mrs. Tooley, excels in

"TH Joseph Fortni matica from " calcula begins When combine Mr. C.

But to for gen "sum which of and protion is

Arra

town in dwell in towns of a town each cohe find counties. He find West Loughb according percent be receallowing amount amount of the counties. The counties were the counties of the the writ his ima Willia 12th, 18 mother on Aug Davies January father h were ma first tim critical p have to before sh 1875, w standard standard a bright to say, v

Proce

Our he can pull and his c naturally 62 in. in Both are as the " Notwi anon), th are toler sickness THE TYPICAL ENGLISHMAN.

she

on of

will s for

o be ilised

f the lols.,

those ono-

and

oses ded.

toric

est '

d of or of e for

and

nent

the

l be

tion

t of

ent.

rard

hen

n of

for en's

een

nes, ver-

her d to

een

oto-

an

has

s of

en."

tion

ays

ests

are ntly

iast

of ital

and

own

her veet

, to

in

"THE Mean Englishman" is the title which Mr. Joseph Jacobs has given to his suggestive study in the Fortnightly Review. But he uses "mean" in the mathematical not the moral sense. He distinguishes "mean" from "average" by saying that "the average is an ideal calculated figure, the mean a concrete example." He begins with the remark:—

When we think of the typical Englishman, we probably combine together in our minds Lord Kitchener, Mr. Kipling, Mr. C. B. Fry, and (perhaps) Canon Gore.

But these eminent exceptions can scarcely form a basis for generalising. So Mr. Jacobs makes an attempt to "sum up all those qualities of the Mean Englishman which can be conveniently put in a quantitative form": and presents a picture of the type which English civilisation is turning out to-day.

HIS NATIVE PLACE.

Arranging all Englishmen according to the size of the town in which they live, the writer finds half of them dwell in cities of above 30,000 inhabitants, and half in towns of less size. So the Mean Englishmen will live in a town of 30,000 population. By "crediting the centre of each county with the number of square miles it contains, he finds that "the centre of gravity of the forty English counties is somewhere in the neighbourhood of Warwick. He finds the centre of the population to be in the North-West Midlands, in the neighbourhood of Hinckley. Loughborough in Leicestershire, with a population of 30,931, is therefore chosen as the abode of the Mean Englishman. Arranging all heads of English families according to their income, the Mean man, or "the fiftieth percentile," would fall within the artizan class, and would be receiving about 30s. a week nominal wages, which, allowing for an average of weeks out of work, would amount to a real wage of 24s. 9d. a week.

HIS LIFE-STORY.

Proceeding on the basis of statistics of various kinds, the writer ventures on this biography past and future of his imaginary hero:—

William Sproggett was born at Loughborough on January 12th, 1864. His father was born in the same town, but his mother migrated thither from the country. He was married on August 20th, 1892, at the age of 28.6 years, to Jane Davies (of Celtic descent), born also at Loughborough, January 18th, 1866, and therefore 26.6 years old. Her father had come thither from the Welsh borders. They were married in church, which Sproggett then visited for the first time since his boyhood. In the seven years since that critical period they have had five children—three boys and two girls. One of the boys has died in the interim, and I regret to have to prophesy that the girl that is still to come will die before she attains five years of age. Sproggett left school in 1875, when he was eleven years of age and in the fourth standard, and his wife in 1878, when twelve, and in the fifth standard. Only his eldest boy is at present at school. He is a bright lad, quite up to the average, but the other boy, I regret to say, will shows signs of nerve trouble when he comes to school age.

Our hero is 5 ft. 7 in. in height, and 150 lbs. in weight. He can pull 70 lbs. when in the attitude of drawing the long bow, and his chest girth is no less than 36 inches. Jane, his wife, is naturally inferior to him in all these categories, being only 62 in. in height, 120 lbs. in weight, and can pull only 40 lbs. Both are of the same physical type, known to anthropologists as the "C." or "Anglo-Saxon" type.

Notwithstanding their meagre diet (of which we shall hear anon), their habit is stout and well-covered. On the whole they are tolerably healthy. William has only had eight days of sickness in the last year, and will live on till the age of 68.

when he will die on March 15th, 1932, of a disease connected with the nervous system. Jane will survive him nearly three years, and die of bronchitis.

Sproggett is in a hosiery manufactory, and began work, as we have seen, at his trade at eleven years old. He is (as we have also seen) at present earning 24s. 9d. a week, to which high eminence he has reached after having commenced on 6d. a day. Mrs. Sproggett's housekeeping money would probably be 15s. He works 54 hours a week, and notwithstanding the claims of his family, he has managed to save no less than £21 (average), which is securely placed in the Post Office Savings Bank.

HIS FINANCES.

From returns of "family budgets," the writer informs us precisely that the Sproggett family spends each week out of its exiguous income 13s. 7\frac{1}{4}d. on food and drink (including 10\frac{1}{4}d. on alcoholic drinks), 3s. 6d. on rent, 8d. on insurance, and on other items 6s. 11\frac{1}{4}d. Mr. Jacobs goes on to estimate that Mr. Sproggett is probably the member of a trades union, or at least a benefit society. He "lives in a house of four rooms, two of which are at present used as bedrooms, one as a kitchen, and one as a living room." His capitalised value to the nation would be about £400. He sends on an average every year 55 letters, 10 post-cards, and 23 newspapers.

HIS CONDUCT AS CITIZEN.

He voted at the first General Election after receiving a vote, but will probably vote never again in any election, local or national. He does not take in any daily paper, except occasionally a sporting sheet. His library consists of a Bible and prayer-book (his wife's) and a few odd numbers of Virtue's "Shakespeare" and Cassell's "Popular Educator." As a rule he bets:—

Sproggett does not wear a collar, except occasionally a paper one on high days and holidays; the neckerchief is the mark of all his tribe. He does not use toothbrush or handkerchief (except the latter for carrying his midday meal), but he generally gets shaved Saturday night.

The writer concludes of his hero :-

It is he that has to bear the White Man's burden in the long run. It is up to his standard that we are aiming to raise the duskier nations.

Mr. Jacobs's paper may perhaps supply a hint to novelists in search of a plot, and not afraid of hard statistical investigation. Why not carry out the method further, and write the complete history of the Mean Englishman?

Helen and Isabel.

"OUR English Names" is the title of a fresh and entertaining study by Lady Verney in the July Leisure Hour. How the writer traces the meaning and fortune of words may be seen from what she says of two:—

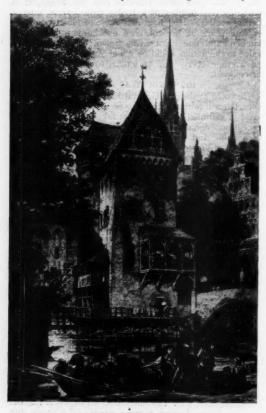

Helen, a name made up of sunshine, has assumed as many colours as the rays of light in the rainbow, and has a strangely chequered story. . . . This sunny name has reigned in England as Ellen, Elaine, Eleanor, Elinof, Leonora, and Alianora, with the lovable abbreviations of Nelly and little Nell; in Scotland as Helen; in Wales Ellin; in Ireland Eileen; in France, Germany, and Italy, with slight variants; in Spain as Helena and Leon; in Hungary as Elenka; and in the far north Sweden has a (welfth-century Helene, a saint and martyr of her own.

A striking instance is the fall and rising again of the name of Jezebel. For centuries it lay where it had been flung to the dogs and trodden underfoot; then, in slightly altered form, it was borne by the heroic Queen who freed Spain from the Moors, and sent Columbus forth to win the New World; and from thenceforth Isabel (the oath of Baal) was redeemed from heathen darkness, and consecrated to the service of Christ.

MR. AXEL H. HAIG AND HIS ART.

THE extra Jubilee Series of the Art Journal has already reached the sixth number, and the letterpress contained in it seems to be selected from the Art Journal in the years 1871-5. The engraving after Lord Leighton's picture, "The Odalisque," forms the frontispiece, and we note that the picture was exhibited at the Academy as far back as 1861. Mr. Axel H. Haig's art is of a totally different type. Having been educated as an architect, one is not surprised that he selects architectural scenes for his subjects. His etching "An Old German Mill," which forms the second plate in this Jubilee number, is dated 1880. It is thus referred to in a note on the plate:—

Mr. Axel H. Haig, whose work is here shown, has achieved deserved fame for etched plates of striking individuality of

AN OLD GERMAN MILL.

(Reproduced by permission of the proprietors of the "Art Journal.")

character, and highly imaginative, in respect that they are built up from notes and sketches gathered in the course of his tour of study. Whilst this "Old German Mill" may not represent any actual scene, it satisfies the eye by its fulness of incident and accuracy of detail, while its merit, in point of technical execution, stands very high. The group in the foreground, interested in a fruit-laden boat, is nicely drawn, and natural in pose and action. The bianchissenses across the water, who have hung clothes on a rail of the bracket-supported gangway, the bairns on the stairs, the miller at his door, the man hastening off with a bag of flour, the figures on the street and bridge, and those in the boat beneath it give the necessary vraisemblance and human interest to the scene.

In the architectural detail, we note the statue of an ecclesiastic on the bridge, the shaded balcony on cantilevers, the quaint butterss of the middle building, the rounded ornament at the wall head, the hexagonal tower with open gallery, and the varied buildings beyond, those on the right terminating in two light spires. The heavy foliage on the left and the trees beyond give the needful artistic offset to the stiffer works of human labour.

THE FEMININE FASHION OF FAINTING.

"THE Decay of Sensibility" is the topic of an interesting discussion by Stephen Gwynn in Cornhill for July. He contrasts life as it now is with life as faithfully reflected in the pages of Miss Austen. He says:—

My object is merely to point out the total disappearance of one quality, so well marked in Miss Austen's day that it gave a title to one of her novels, yet now, in so far as concerns its outward manifestations, nearly as extinct as the dodo. I mean, of course, what was called sensibility, the attribute which used to display itself by rapturous joy, by copious tears, by hysterics, and principally by fainting fits, upon the most inadequate occasions. The change is so marked that one inclines to ask oneself whether the physical constitution of woman be not altered within the last half-century. The modern young woman does not swoon promiscuously. . . A virago can scold and a minx can endure to be scolded nowadays without either hysterics or a fainting fit resulting. Tears still flow freely, but women as a rule are not proud of them. On the contrary, a young lady, I believe, will generally apologise for "making such a fool of herself." It is no longer considered to be an attraction, or even an amiable weakness, to be so feminine as all that.

The same fashion is borne witness to in Miss Ferrier's works. The writer says:—

These instances appear to me sufficient to prove that temporary loss of consciousness was an ordinary incident in the life of a well-bred female. The malady was confined to the upper classes, though it was imitated, as was natural, by ladies' maids. The severity of the attacks would appear, from Miss Ferrier, to have been proportioned to the moral worth of the character. Less estimable persons fainted oftener, but not so thoroughly.

WHY IT HAS GONE OUT.

The writer's explanation of the change will doubtless give rise to very decided differences of opinion. Speaking of the old days, he says:—

On the contrary, man, as man always will do, taking woman at her own valuation, had held upon the whole that these soft emotions proved irrefragably a kind of kinship with the angels. And so the interesting creatures swooned, and screamed, and wept, and sobbed from generation to generation, harrowing the hearts of their lovers and reducing their husbands to despair. It was only when woman herself took up the pen and began basely to open men's eyes to a sense of the ludicrous in this particular situation that all these tender susce ptibilities shrivelled like a maidenhair fern exposed to an east wind, and man began to revise his position. There were women who sympathised with man's sufferings under the tyranny of tears and the despotism of hysteria; there were women who, when a lady swooned in public, were ready to dash cold water over her best bib and tucker; and man profited by their example. Woman, that acute strategist, realised that her flank was turned, and shifted her ground; only a few belated stragglers still fight with the old weapons and upon the old lines.

PERHAPS the chief interest in Cassell's for July is supplied by Mr. W. B. Robertson's sketch of "where gunpowder is made" at Faversham, Kent. Among other precautions observed, "on the approach of a thunderstorm the works are stopped, and the operatives repair to the different watch houses."

by the home problemen, oblig back

Ta

Th famili are al These comn cultiv burde are le child father sake call; their of a t of sti Ther they future they count TI Can Th resournew ears, the r religing feeling.

H and Lithealt the hathe ears the ears the religing feeling f child

taugh were and tried other Caput s woul

week prev
lodg
Cour
men
Or

may anoth but t will home

THE SELFISH OLD BACHELOR.

CANON BARNETT'S CENSURE OF THE SINGLE MAN.

"THE Abodes of the Homeless" is the title of a paper by the Rev. Canon Barnett in the July Cornhill. The homeless, he says, are the disturbers of the social problem. He divides them into three classes:—single men, who have either refused or thrown over family obligations; loafers; and broken-hearted and brokenbacked men and women.

THE TRUE IMPERIALIST.

Taking the classes separately, he says :-

se in

ıman

astic

uaint t the aried

light

give

est-

uly.

utly

e of

ve a s its

ean.

used

rics,

uate

ask

not man

nd a rics

nen

ung

h a

ion,

er's

ary

of a per

ids.

to

ter.

ess

k-

20 oft

els.

nd he ir.

an

his

ed

211

n-

nd

ly

st

n,

id

th

S

e

r

ır.

There are the single men who have deserted their wives and families so as to be free for idleness and enjoyment, and there are also single men who remain unmarried to escape obligation. These, even if they work hard, are not of such service to the community as those who make homes and send out children to cultivate the world. The married man may carry a heavy burden on his shoulders; but it is the homes in which the virtues are learnt which preserve the land God has given us, and it is children who make empire possible. The true imperialist is the father of a large and healthy family. Those who for selfishness' sake escape marriage are, first of all, traitors to their country's call; then, led by the same selfishness, they become disloyal to They as blacklegs undersell labour, or as members of a union often force on strikes in mere irresponsible exercise of strength, without considering either justice or expediency. There may be single men who make themselves homeless while they preserve a home for their parents or provide a home for the future; but the great majority of the single men are so because they are selfish with a selfishness which is dangerous to their country and their class.

The problem is to turn the homeless into home-makers. Canon Barnett says:—

The object can, of course, be best reached by education. If children were all brought under the best influences; if they were taught to like work rather than fear the rod; if their dispositions were considered, so that lovers of wandering were sent to sea and lovers of nature sent to the country; if their powers of resource were developed so that they could adapt themselves to new conditions; if the weak-bodied were properly treated, eyes, ears, teeth, and limbs brought under the same care applied by the rich to their children; if education were efficient, and if religious education were understood to include the cultivation of feeling, the homeless would be fewer and the home-makers more.

LIFE IN LODGINGS UNHEALTHY.

He inquires into the effect of casual wards, shelters and lodging-houses. He says :— $\,$

Life in even the best of common lodgings is not morally healthy... The law, charity and commarce have thus dealt with the homeless; the law by making its provision deterrent has tried the effect of coercion, charity by giving free shelters has tried the effect of conciliation, commerce by meeting the demand has tried the effect of a let-alone policy. But neither one nor the other has tended to convert the homeless into home-makers.

Canon Barnett would close casual wards. He would put shelters under the control of local authorities. He would have furnished lodgings, which are let for 10s. a week and under, registered and inspected so as to prevent overcrowding and immoral occupation. Modern lodgings should be annually licensed by the London County Council. In conclusion he reverts to his fundamental message:—

Organisation, constructive or destructive, can do little, but it may make it easier or harder for one human being to help another. Nothing but human individual treatment, nothing but the grace of God acting through the call of man on man, will stem the drift which in all classes seems to make for homelessness.

And he turns the tables on West End critics :-

Men and women who have shaken themselves free of obligation to family, to neighbourhood, or to servants will never commend home-making to their poorer neighbours, who, following their example, now show the results in poverty, wretchedness and crime. Homelessness in West London is one cause why homelessness in East London is so ineffectively dealt with.

MARRIED SOLDIERY.

A SOLDIER'S PLEA FOR OUR BLACK EMPIRE.

THE Soudan recollections contributed to the July Cornhill by Lieutenant Hopkinson, of the Seaforth Highlanders, contain much that is striking both in the way of fact and of reflection. What he has to say about the family life of the black soldiery possesses not merely human interest, but also moral significance. He says:—

The black is an extremely uxorious man, and in the Egyptian Army they were all allowed to marry, and a certain percentage were placed on the married strength and received an allowance for the maintenance of their wives and families. With his wife and family near him, the black is absolutely happy. The woman waits upon him, cooks for him the savoury messes his soul loveth, and ministers generally to his comfort; the children are his heart's delight, and he never seems so happy as when he is playing with them. The surest way to a black man's heart is through his family, and, with judicious allowance for his feelings in this direction, he is the easiest creature in the world to manage and control. It is to be hoped that in the "Black Empire" of the future no man will think himself strong enough to arbitrarily sever the black troops from their families.

HOW THE SIRDAR SOLVED THE WOMAN QUESTION.

Even Lord Kitchener had to let his black troops have wives, and more than one apiece. The lieutenant says:—

When the forward movement commenced, in the beginning of 1896, of course the wives and families had to be left behind. But as we advanced into the Dervish country their black sisters flocked from slavery to join the troops, and as the Dervishes retreated or were defeated they left numbers of women and children behind them, amongst whom our troops discovered many sisters, mothers, and even former wives. The woman question soon became a serious one. The Mohammedan law allows a man a plurality of wives; our men had not seen their families for months, and were anxious to form new ties; many women had died at Assouan and Halfa in the cholera epidemic, and there were corresponding widowers in our ranks ripe for consolation. So, wisely enough, men, under certain conditions, were allowed to marry, and soon little villages sprang up round all the cantonments. The men who had permission took unto themselves their dusky brides, and in many cases adopted the small Dervish children, and all went merry as a marriage bell. The little villages, built of dried grass or mud, were kept scrupulously clean, military police were made responsible for order, and the most prominent lady was elected Sheikha, and, with the assistance of the oldest non-commissioned officer and some black commissioned officer, settled all disputes; and never were there more orderly, law-abiding communities. When the troops left the Dongola province for further operations south, the grass widows were sent down to Wadi Halfa to join the other families.

WHAT ABOUT THE WHITE ARMY?

The writer then draws a practical inference of the utmost value in the opening up of a vast black empire:—

A useful moral may be deduced as to the great secret of dealing with black troops. Respect his one great weakness, give him a wife and family and home life, and he is the most genial, contented, easily managed being in the world; deny him this, and he rapidly becomes restless and discontented, spends his leisure in wandering about in search of adventures, brawls and loots in the villages, and gives endless trouble.

Will our military authorities in India, one wonders, ever think of applying the same principle to their white army? It is something to have a soldier extolling the imperial value of a married soldiery.

WAGGON OR BOAT:

WHICH SHALL CARRY OFF THE EMPIRE OF THE WORLD? "ENGLAND'S Decadence in the West Indies" is the sombre title of a brilliant piece of historical generalisation contributed to the June Forum by Mr. Brooks Adams. He treats the West Indian problem as only one phase of an age-long struggle. He says :-

Since the dawn of history two forms of centralisation, evolved through different processes of transportation, have contended for supremacy. The one, which may be called the Continental system, based upon the highway, found its amplest expression in Rome; the other, which may be described as the Maritime, is the offspring of the sea, and has served as the vehicle for the consolidation of that economic system which has centralised the modern world, and whose heart has been London. Before the discovery of the compass and the quadrant made the ocean navigable, the Continental system usually predominated. From the Crusades to the collapse of France in 1870, the Maritime had the advantage. Recently, the railroad, by bringing the cost of land- and water-carriage nearer an equality, has tended to inflam: the conflict, without, as yet, deciding the victory.

THE CHIEF CHAMPION ON ONE SIDE

Having resolved human history into the simple terms of a contest between boat and waggon, Mr. Adams goes on to sketch the contest as it has developed in the last hundred years or so :-

The Continental system becam: incarnate in Napoleon. With the eye of genius he saw that between movement by land and movement by water there existed a conflict which could know no other arbiter than battle; and he fought to the end.

He would wound England through her colonies, through India, through her sugar islands. His most deadly arm was neither horse nor foot nor artillery; it was the beet :-

From an early period Bonaparte speculated on the possibility of making sugar from the beet; and in 1808 he wrote to scientific m n pressing them to investigate the subject. In 1811 he had becom? certain of success, and early in that year he outlined for his Minister of the Interior a policy of State encouragement of the domestic sugar industry which, in substance, has been adopted by the chief Continental nations, and which survives to this day.

WHO WIELDS HIS WEAPON TO-DAY?

Slowly his policy advanced. Not till after 1850, when the railroads began to be effective, and England established uniform duties on foreign and colonial sugar, did French production of sugar reach 100,000 tons. 1862 England imported 40,000 tons of French and 193,000 tons of West Indian sugar; in 1870 she took 232,000 tons of Continental beet and 213,000 tons of West Indian cane. Mr. Adams proceeds :

The migration eastward of the centre of the Continental system, whose focus, under Napoleon, had been at Paris, occasioned the rise of Germany. But, though the capital city might change, the instinct of the centralised mass remained constant; and the Emperor of Germany, in assuming the position of the Emperor of France, assumed his methods and his attitude toward England. The chief difference between the two distributions law in a difference of constant.

civilisations lay in a difference of energy.

The figures which tell of the impact of this new Power upon its maritime rival may well be called dramatic. Within less than a generation from the coronation at Versailles of the German successor of Napoleon, English sugar had been substantially driven from the English market, the West Indies had been ruined, Cuba had been ravaged with fire and sword, Spain had been crushed by the United States, the United States had been thrown upon the coast of Asia, and the world had been sent plunging forward toward a new equilibrium. Meanwhile, sugar had been forced down to £9 a ton... Taken in all is ramifications, this destruction of the sugar interest may, probably, be reckoned the heaviest financial blow that a competitor has ever dealt Great Britain, unless the injury to her domestic agriculture by the fall in the price of wheat be esteemed a loss through competition.

WHAT THE MANCHESTER SCHOOL HAS COST ENGLAND.

This blow might, in Mr. Adams's opinion, have been warded off by imposing tariffs on bounty-fed sugar. But the undisputed economic supremacy of England, which only lasted from 1835 to 1870, coincided with the ascendency of the Manchester School, with the preponderance of the urban population, and with the rule of the industrial class. As at all times the powerful class exploited the weaker: the industrial population-capitalist and wage-earner—sacrificed farmers at home and colonists abroad for the sake of cheap food for themselves.

· Mr. Adams questions the advantage of cheap food obtained at this cost. England consumes 84 lbs. of sugar per head of the population, while the United States, next highest in the list, are content with 35 lbs. There is a similar "extravagance" in other articles of

ENGLAND GOING THE WAY OF SPAIN.

Meantime the fall in the price of sugar precipitated the agony in Cuba. "But," says Mr. Adams, "if the Spanish civilisation in the West Indies has fallen amid blood and fire, the English shows every sign of decrepitude." It accepted the bribe of bounty-fed sugar. The centralisation which is so eminently profitable in sugar manufacture was not encouraged by the British Government in the West Indies. The waste force of the hillstreams was not utilised for cheap and swift electric traction. Quick sea transit was also discouraged. So West Indian sugar is handicapped in its contest with beet and the well-organised State railways of the Lastly, Great Britain, while abandoning the colonists to the Germans, has used them to support an exceedingly costly system of government, whose chief object has been to provide a long pay-roll and pension-list. This system has broken down. It has proved only less disastrous than that of Spain. The inference from these considerations is, that the British Empire in the Western tropics is disintegrating, and that it is disintegrating because a governing class has arisen in the Kingdom which, from greed, has compounded with its natural and hereditary enemy.

THE MORAL FOR THE UNITED STATES.

As the extent of area involved increases, Eastward and Westward, London and Paris are no longer the rival centres, nor English and French the rival nations. The new foci are drawing towards Russia and towards America. The struggle now lies between Americans and Germans. Of these wide generalisations the practical upshot is put as follows:-

Unless the Maritim: system can absorb and consolidate mankind as energetically as the Continental, the relation which the two have borne to each other since Waterloo must be reversed. The West Indies are gravitating toward the United States; therefore, the West Indies must be consolidated, and the lines of communication with them be shortened and cheap ned. fore a canal to the Pacific must be built; and Central America must become an integral part of the economic mass, much as Egypt has become a part of England in order to guarantee her communications with India. Lastly, adequate outlets for the products of this huge centre of energy must be insured. . . . If expansion and concentration are necessary, because the administration of the largest mass is the least costly, then America must expand and concentrate until the limit of the possible is attained; for Governments are simply huge corporations in competition, in which the most economical, in proportion to its energy, survives, and in which the wasteful and the slow are undersold and eliminated.

WHAT THE Rise of the res the An in forn charac literati Englis develo Yanke in repr

He pro

But

the inf develoj as disti it was " story transm in the mouths politic even t current tinctly it was story." but its vet sug underof tha slang. colum statem no fine point. irravar origina often, or a unnece feature Ameri The found But press but th editor get cl He life wl

but di

Mexic

afterw popula make Roari purpo that charac mint e The 1 and p of su aband langu protes

BRET HARTE ON THE SHORT STORY.

her

be

D.

en

ut

ch

nce

S-

d

d

ts

d

of

d

of 1

WHAT AMERICAN LITERATURE OWES TO ITS HUMOUR.

THE first paper in Cornhill for July is that on "The Rise of the Short Story," by Bret Harte. He disclaims the responsibility often imputed to him for the origin of the American short story. He says it was familiar enough in form in the early half of the century, but it was not characteristic of American life. "So-called American literature was still limited to English methods and upon English models." "It took an Englishman to first develop the humour or picturesqueness of American or Yankee dialect, but Judge Haliburton succeeded better in reproducing 'Sam Slick's' speech than his character." He proceeds:—

But while the American literary imagination was still under the influence of English tradition, an unexpected factor was developing to diminish its power. It was Humour—of a quality as distinct and original as the country and civilisation in which it was developed. It was at first noticeable in the anecdote or "story," and, after the fashion of such beginnings, was orally transmitted. It was common in the bar-rooms, the gatherings in the "country store," and finally at public meetings in the mouths of "stump orators." Arguments were clinched, and political principles illustrated, by "a funny story." It invaded even the camp meeting and pulpit. It at last received the currency of the public press. But wherever met it was so distinctly original and novel, so individual and characteristic, that it was at once known and appreciated abroad as "an American story." Crude at first, it received a literary polish in the press, but its dominant quality remained. It was concise and condensed, vet suggestive. It was delightfully extravagant-or a miracle of under-statement. It voiced not only the dialect, but the habits of thought of a prople or locality. It gave a new interest to slang. From a paragraph of a doz n lines it grew into a half column, but always retaining its conciseness and felicity of statement. It was a fee to prolixity of any kind, it admitted no fine writing nor affectation of style. It went directly to the point. It was burdened by no conscientiousness; it was often irreverent; it was devoid of all moral responsibility-but it was original! By degrees it developed character with its incident, often, in a few lines, gave a striking photograph of a community or a section, but always reached its conclusion without an unnecessary word. It becam :- and still exists as -an essential feature of newspaper literature. It was the parent of the American "short story."

The national note was always struck by the humorist, but did not appear in the current narrative fiction. The Mexican War, the Anti-Slavery Struggle, the Civil War, found no echo in the romance of the period.

HOW "THE LUCK" WAS BORN.

But from California deliverance came. The Pacific press sparkled with satire and developed its humorists, but the short story arose when Bret Harte took over the editorial control of the Overland Monthly. He tried to get characteristic American fiction and could not:—

He failed to discover anything of that wild and picturesque life which had impressed him, first as a truant schoolboy, and afterwards as a youthful schoolmaster among the mining population. In this perplexity he determined to attempt to make good the deficiency himself. He wrote "The Luck of Roaring Camp." However far short it fell of his ideal and his purpose, he conscientiously believed that he had painted much that "he saw, and part of which he was," that his subject and characters were disinictly Californian, as was equally his treatment of them. But an unexpected circumstance here intervened. The publication of the story was objected to by both printer and publisher, virtually for not being in the conventional line of subject, treatment, and morals! The introduction of the abandoned outcast mother of the foundling "Luck," and the language used by the characters, received a serious warning and protest. The writer was obliged to use his right as editor to save his unfortunate contribution from oblivion. When it appeared at last, he saw with consternation that the printer and publisher had really voiced the local opinion. . . . However, its instantaneous and cordial acceptance as a new departure by the critics of the Eastern States and Europe enabled the writer to follow it with other stories of a like character.

So the foundling of the West owed its preservation to the East. The writer concludes by declaring the American short story to-day to be the germ of American literature to come.

"BRITISH NOVELISTS ON SHOW."

THE Atlantic Monthly for June contains a great deal of interesting matter. Mr. A. M. Knapp discusses Japan and the Philippines, and concludes that Japan does not grudge the United States their new possession, but would welcome an American alliance. Japan also, he says, sees that "if England is a land-grabber, she is also, everywhere and always, a land-grubber and cultivator: that in some large and generous way she has blessed every people upon whom she has laid her powerful hand." - Jacob A. Riis writes hopefully of the passing of the tenement blight. Mr. H. W. Lanier contributes correspondence between Bayard Taylor and Sidney Lanier, which show how two poets can criticise and fortify and improve each other, Mr. H. P. Williams, writing on the outlook in Cuba, grants that if "the consent of the governed" were asked, a majority would vote for the departure of the United States; but he pronounces the minority to be more worthy of consideration, and looks forward to the present situation gliding into permanent control.

There is a bit of a sting in the tail of the half-yearly volume which ends with this number—a note headed, "British Novelists on Show." Here are a few of the pointed sentences:—

We should like to know if the British novelist has not at last worn out his welcom: as a public reader in the United States. Not his welcome as a visitor and a friend—that is quite another matter. Public readings themselves were of interest many years ago.

But in addition to the loss of minds adapted to the peculiar requirements of the old reading desk, the audiences also have changed. Instead of giving the reader an environment of thoughtful attention, they envelop him in a sudden breeze of vapid curiosity.

The world has a quaint suspicion that a waning literary reputation furnishes the motive of these advertising pilgrimages.

The author must feel the injustice which treats him as if he were a specimen astray from som: museum. To be the plaything instead of the master of fashion is fatei. The only recourse is to evade the fashion.

The outcome of the kind of exhibition to which Americans have been treated of late cannot fail to be unpleasant.

The writer somewhat maliciously recalls that while the great Greeks stayed at home, the Greeklings came over West and created an impression in Rome of ineffaceable contempt for everything Greek. He goes on:—

It is an open question, among English men of letters who have influenced American life in the last half-century, which class was the more powerful—that which never visited America, or that which came often and stayed late. But the business of exhibition and instruction is overdone.

THE jubilee of Bedford College for Women, celebrated last month, occasions a sketch by Mrs. Stepney Rawson in the GirTs Realm of the origin and growth of that institution.

A "PUNCH" ARTIST: Mr. Arthur Hopkins.

In the July number of the Art Journal there is an interesting notice of Mr. Arthur Hopkins and his work by Mr. J. A. Reid. As the article takes the form of an interview, Mr. Hopkins may be permitted to give some particulars of his career in his own words. He says:—

I have quite decided to spend no more of my energies on the particular branch of black-and-white work that has monopolised so much of my time during the last twenty years: I mean that class of artistic hack-work that I did for the Graphic, Illustrated London News, etc.

But while I was doing this sort of work, I always found time to do a certain amount of work in colour, both water-colour and

A PENCIL STUDY: BY ARTHUR HOPKINS.

(Reproduced by permission from the "Art Journal.")

oils. And during the eighteen years or so that I have been associated with the R.W.S. I have never missed exhibiting at a single show.

With regard to black-and-white, I still enjoy making a facsimile drawing for Punch when I feel in the humour, and when I think I have a good object to treat. And this is the only class of black-and-white work I shall do in the future.

As a beginner at black-and-white I was originally largely influenced by the work of the late George Du Maurier, who gave me much good advice, and who remained one of my greatest friends to the day of his death. I was also under the spell of the charm of G. J. Pinwell, A. Boyd Houghton (whose work was masterful in the extreme, but not known to the majority to-day), and Fred Walker. The latter I had the pleasure also of knowing personally. All these four men, but especially the latter, also influenced very much my early water-colour work. And my admiration in oil-painting was-and ever will be-Millais.

I think now I go my own way in water-colour work, and look at nothing but Nature. I try—as I think every honest worker should—to avoid all mannerisms, and to eschew every transient fashion which sways the art world, or is said to be doing so. And so long as the artist sticks to the truth, and learns from Nature to be faithful and modest, he will always have his reward, though he may never be the fashion.

THE AMERICAN CONVICT LEASE SYSTEM.

A TALE OF HORRORS.

It is a peculiarly sickening story which Mark Drayton tells in the July Humanitarian in his paper on "the colour problem in the United States." The worst part of his narrative deals with the Convict Lease System. This varies in different States, but, he says:—

In the South, the lessees have absolute power over their priscners, and can work them when and where they choose. They are also free to administer punishment ad libitum; in hundreds of cases the convicts are actually worked to death, the sole object of the lessees being to make money out of their wretched victims. Some States let out all their prisoners to lessees for fifteen or twenty years, who in their turn sub-lesse them to others for more gain. The hardships of the convicts are moreover increased in proportion to the profits they earn for each fresh taskmaster. There are no State officials, and consequently no public supervision; fearful abuses therefore prevail.

Prisoners are let out by means of advertisements—"that on a certain day so many able-bodied convicts will be leased to the highest bidder desiring their labour." Convicts are then driven to a stockade, and sold from an auction-block, exactly as slaves were sold in the old days before their emancipation. . . In these sales, the blacks enormously outnumber the whites.

Their hardships are almost indescribable. Women and children undergoing punishment for their first offence, work side by side with hardened men and occupy the same quarters at night. They are often herded together in the open air with no resting place save the bare ground. Accommodation is indeed provided in some camps, but it is horribly inadequate. Here, sixty or more prisoners—men, women, and children—sleep in rooms eighteen feet square, by seven in height. These have neither windows nor any proper ventilation, and are frequently without beds or furniture of any kind. The natural result of this forced comradeship is that hundreds of children are born and brought up to be criminals. All convicts are punished in public, both sexes being treated alike. Women and girls, stripped naked, are whipped in the presence of men and boys. Perhaps the hardest cases are those of the children—little boys and girls being frequently arrested and sold for long periods. By means of this institution some States receive an annual income varying from 21,000 dols. to 250,000 dols., after the lessees and sub-lessees have reaped a large profit.

The writer claims that the Howard Association Report on "The Coloured Race in America" fully confirms all that he has stated. He quotes this ghastly incident:—

The fate of the women and girls may be best exemplified by the case of one young girl—a white prisoner—seventeen years of age, "who, after being repeatedly outraged by the officers of a camp, fled to the woods. She was hunted by bloodhounds, stripped, and publicly flogged amidst jeers!" The numbers of illegitimate children born in the camps are, the Report states, permanently retained as slaves!

Harmsworth's for June is chiefly noticeable for Mr. J. G. Horner's account of the commissariat of the Oceanic, "the largest ship in the world," under the title of "Feeding a Town at Sea." The pictures suggest to the least attentive eye the enormous nature of the undertaking. Mr. Chas. G. Harper contributes memorials, with excellent photographs, of historic spots on British soil, "Where Battles Raged."

"TE the pr of obs with a is notl a cess to dru direct sugge would reform tion I causes workn restra sober in eve his vi a mai saluta

AGA

Mr. comp. for the He as Wh transfe which person the tin accided were cases,

Mr

privile Silesi repea serve the p by pr would He w from drunk sober

Mr many would now o Sur legisla

whoever neight obligation me enactive effect and s

oppo comi proje duty deser

AGAINST "LETTING OFF" THE DRUNKARD.

ever

look orker

sient

oing earns

have ton

the

t of

his heir

ose.

in

the heir

to ase

icts

for

on-ail.

n a

the

ven

ves

In

nd

ork

at

no

ed

re,

in

ve

tly

of

rn

in ls,

75.

ls.

al

he

11

"THE Legal Advantages of being a Drunkard"-so runs the provocative title of a paper in the Fortnightly by Mr. E. D. Daly. The writer speaks from "several years of observation in a large City police court." He quotes with approval the Duke of Wellington's saying, "There is nothing so cruel as impunity for crime." He pleads for a cessation of this kind of cruelty towards men tempted to drunkenness. He complains of the Temperance Party directing all its energies against the publican, and suggests that penal legislation against the drunkard would be a wise, a kind, and an effective means of reform. He would like to see a healthy moral indignation roused against the drunkard for the suffering he causes to wife and child, as well as for injury to employer, workmates, and neighbours. He is convinced that legal restraints, and the loss of many privileges enjoyed by sober men, the loading of drunkards with disadvantages in every station of life, would be an act of mercy both to his victims and to the drunkard himself. He shows how a man steadily sinks into drunken habits for want of the salutary restraints imposed by criminal law.

WHAT THE TEMPERANCE PARTY MIGHT DO.

Mr. Daly urges the Temperance Party to agitate for a comprehensive statute "against common drunkards and for the better protection of persons aggrieved by them." He asks:—

Why should not Parliament be asked to change all this, by transferring to the Criminal list all cases of wilful drunkenness, which cause actual, even though accidental, hurt or damage to the person or property of other people, whether the drunkard be at the time in a public place or not? That simple move of treating accidental damage, consequent on wilful drunkenness, as if it were wilful damage, would load drunkenness, in innumerable cases, with a new disadvantage.

Mr. Daly would take away from the drunkard the privilege of being served with drink. In Prussian Silesia the police give each innkeeper a list of persons repeatedly convicted of drunkenness whom they may not serve again. Mr. Daly suggests that a wife might have the power of preventing a publican serving her husband by presenting a certificate of his previous conviction. He would make drunkenness during work hours a crime. He would authorise a constable to eject drunken servants from their masters' premises. He would deprive the drunkard of the power over wife and child which the sober man possesses.

THE POLICE COURT AS TEMPERANCE AGENT.

Mr. Daly holds that to group as crimes these and many other offences of the drunkard in one public statute would rouse a sense of national shame which does not now exist. He exclaims:—

Surely it is time to teach each city population by peremptory legislation, to be expounded day by day in Police Courts, that whoever by wilful and deliberate drunkenness injures his neighbour directly, or betrays a family trust of recognised obligation, merits some criminal form of procedure, and is sure to meet it whether he be in a public street or not. One careful enactment on such lines would probably have a greater educative effect on the conscience of the nation than thousands of tracts and sermons.

The writer contends that such legislation would not be opposed by "the trade," and would have a chance of coming into existence, which cannot be said of prohibition projects. It would also be part of the most elementary duty of Government, which is bound to protect the deserving and the weak against the unruly strong.

THE REVISION OF CRIMINAL TRIALS.

It is remarkable that the Revue des Deux Mondes is the only French review which had the courage to refer, in its June numbers, to the famous affaire, and even so, what M. Brunetière gives us is a paper by a well-known international jurist, M. Arthur Desjardins, on the revision of criminal trials, which is not directly concerned with the Dreyfus case, though it is no doubt suggested by it.

M. Desjardins begins by showing how, from the earliest times, lawyers have agreed to regard any chose jugée as equivalent to the truth, and as not to be reopened indefinitely; but he also points out that the world is not governed by logic, and that cases may arise in which the security of the State demands a re-examination of wh t has been already judicially decided. M. Desjardins passes on to deal with particular cases in which revision has proved necessary. In 1409 Jean de Montagu, Lord of Marcoussis, was condemned to death unjustly, and was beheaded in Paris. Afterwards he was discovered to have been innocent, and the confiscation of his property was annulled; so, too, the heirs of Joan of Arc were allowed to clear her memory by letters patent in 1449. Up to 1667 in France a revision of sentence could only be obtained on the direct interposition of the Crown, and, of course, such a system was liable to abuse in the case of important and highly placed criminals. The system was abolished in 1667, and a more regular legal procedure was substituted. The ten years which preceded the French Revolution were notable for several judicial errors. In 1780, five persons accused of burglary were condemned by the Parliament of Burgundy; one of them was hanged and another died in the galleys. Afterwards it was found that they were all innocent, and the characters of both the living and the dead were formally cleared. More remarkable still was the case of a girl named Salmon, who was condemned as a poisoner by the Parliament of Normandy. This judgment was revised; public influence becoming excited and large sums of money being sent from every part to the prisoner. She had an ovation in the streets of the capital, and ultimately the Parliament of Paris acquitted her. It is needless to follow M. Desjardins in his technical discussions of the procedure of revision. It will be sufficient to mention some more of the particular cases to which he alludes. There is the famous case of the murder of the Lyons courier, for which six men were placed on trial, of whom three were condemned to death. One of these, a man named Lesurques, protested his innocence on the scaffold, and prophesied that his character would one day be cleared; and a popular agitation, which was taken up in the Press and on the stage, was set on foot. Ultimately the heirs of Lesurques obtained pecuniary compensation amounting to nearly half a million francs, but they did not obtain a formal rehabilitation of the condemned man's character. The affair went on for many years, and before it was concluded the popular attention was diverted to another scandal. Two men, who had been condemned to penal servitude for robbery and had died in confinement, each strongly protesting his innocence, were found to have been really innocent by the discovery of the real culprits. M. Desjardins concludes his interesting paper with an analysis of the various steps in the process of revision of the sentences on Dreyfus, written from the point of view of a scientific jurist.

An international symposium on War and Militarism, in the form of an extra number of L'Humanité Nouvelle, has been issued at Paris under the editorship of Prof. A. Hamon. It is a valuable contribution to "Peace" literature.

PLEA FOR DEMOCRATISING THE PAPACY.

BY A ROMAN CATHOLIC DIVINE.

DR. BARRY's paper in the July Contemporary on "The Troubles of a Catholic Democracy," supplies eloquent proof of the way the English leaven is working within the Roman Church. "The Kingdom of God," he avers, "is not a scheme of metaphysics." But he also insists it is "something more than a bureaucracy to be recruited always from one people or one section of a people." The introduction of new elements involves readjustment of its executive. He proceeds:—

What, I ask, is the new element which has broken an entrance into the Catholic Church? I reply in a single word. It is "Democracy."

THE CHURCH A CONSTITUTIONAL REALM.

Of course, from a certain point of view, the Church has always exhibited some of the features which distinguish a popular as contrasted with an absolute Government. All the forms, in short, of a true representative system are extant within the Church. The Church is a society, a congregation, self-governed, elective, and free within as without—free as against Cæsar, free likewise in all her members, who must not be governed despotically but according to the Canons; not, therefore, by the personal pleasure of any man, were he the Pope himself; not ex arbitrio, but with due forms and procedures, or, to say it in English, constitutionally. The law is supreme over all, and the proudest title which the Roman Pontiff bears is, "Servus servorum Dei." He is not a master lording it over slaves, but the minister, the steward, appointed to dispense good things to the heirs of salvation.

INTRUSION OF THE SPANISH SYSTEM.

Dr. Barry maintains that "in the Middle Ages there was, on the whole, a very large and constant exercise of the popular privileges by the laity as well as by the clergy." But with the second half of the sixteenth century "came in the Spanish influence at Rome." The Spanish system "passed over the democratic or mediæval elements in the Church's existence as though they had never been." But in the new era the Spanish system is felt to be out of place:—

If the English-speaking races are to com: under Catholic influence, men ask us, what does that involve? Absolute surrender on the one side and triumph without conditions on the other? Impossible. Not so are the great movements of the world carried on to a satisfactory issue. Again, if the Democracy, which has learned in its own order the secret of self-government, is to be reconciled to Rom; can the temper, the methods, of the sixteenth century avail under circumstances so novel and unprecedented? That is the larger meaning of "Americanism."

"THE DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT OF THE PARISH."

There is no intention in Dr. Barry's mind of thrusting foreign methods and principles upon the Church:—

The forms are actually incorporate with her being; they existed long ere the Renaissance trampled down the people and set up, so far as Providence would allow, an oligarchy or a despotism which sacrificed the many to caste and privilege....So far as I am aware, the simple acknowledgment as living forms, and not as mere formallities, of these institutions—they are the Church's own creation—would satisfy all who are lovers at once of Catholicism and the Democracy. The democratic management of a parish and its resources—how ver to be accomplished—is, no doubt, the one solution. At all events, if the laity are not organised in church, they will be attracted by systems and societies out of church.

DEMOCRACY INEVITABLE IN CHURCH AND STATE.

Coercion is, Dr. Barry contends, no longer possible:— Persuasion is the only Christian method, and force makes martyrs or hypocrites, not converts. In our day, the Catholic Church is the largest voluntary association existing among mankind. It simply has not the power in fact of compelling bishop, priest, or layman to abide within its borders. Moral suasion is the air which it breathes; and, allowing for the presence of interests which tell in its favour, and for the associations of a long-established worship, still there is no country in which it has not to compete with rivals and enemies, none where it must not approach every man individually and solicit his adhesion, precisely as in a Democratic State the powers that be rely for their existence on his suffrage. That he is under a strict obligation to hear the Church makes no more difference, as regards the manner of persuading him, in one instance, than the parallel duty of obeying the law does in the other. He cannot be coerced, he must be convinced, if he is to give his vote and interest in either case. Such is now the inevitable form of Democracy in Church and State.

ANALOGOUS AMERICAN AND PAPAL CONSTITUTIONS.

Dr. Barry goes on to advance a plea for a larger representation of British and American Catholicism at the Vatican:—

Now the obvious rem'dy—unless misunderstandings are to keep Rome and the English world apart for ever—is that Britons and Americans should be allowed their full share in the Central Executive....The Catholic bishops bear a striking resemblance to the Governors of States in America, as does the Ceria to the Federal authorities at Washington. Indeed, between the American Constitution and that of the Roman Church analogies meet us at all points. Who would call it a satisfactory condition of things if, while each State chose its own Governor, the White House was filling the Executive with natives of Maryland and Virginia, throwing in occasionally, and as it were by chance, one man from Illinois and another from New York?... A Federal or Œcumenical Government should be as wide in its selection of the persons composing it as in the jurisdiction which it exercises... The permanent Council, which has its seat in Rome, will be effective so far as it virtually includes every portion of the Church, and weak as it is wanting in any one of them.

"NOT BOND-SLAVES OF ANY CÆSARISM."

Dr. Barry puts his case very cogently when he says:— Freedom according to law is a Catholic idea, and arbitrary government has no foundation in the Canons or the Councils. . . . Though the servile may affect an unmanly, nay, even a Byzantine adulation of rulers whose claim on our reverence is their office, not their persons, yet, in spite of all this, Christ has made us free, and we are not the bond-slaves of any Cæsarism. . . . Should the number of American and other English-speaking Catholics increase, as it surely will, how is their influence not to be felt, or their idea of self-government and open justice to be defeated? They have the secret of orderly political progress, than which none is more favourable to Catholicism.

Under these conditions the Church must deliver her message. Ought she to prefer Tiberius Caesar or the tyrants of the Renaissance to a Republic which guarantees her freedom and respects her moral dignity? The Catholic faith is, in our view, concrete religion, as it is historical Christianity. Again, English liberty is the highest achievem nt of civilisation regarded in its judicial and political aspects. These two gifts of Providence, at present put asunder, we desire to see joined together for the good of the world. United, they should prove equal to the establishment of a higher and happier state of mankind than has hitherto been known.

The article concludes with the desire "that all nations should be Catholic, and all Catholics be delivered from the dead hand of Cæsarism."

The descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers will probably smile to see a Roman Catholic divine pleading for the democratic government of each parish, comparing Bishops to elective State Governors, finding analogies between the College of Cardinals and the Congress at Washington, and generally substituting the American for the Roman system as the mundane model of the Papacy.

North revolute to Rutier of of Do out. ... the w most finish distanunder

C

Mack of Mi of ice at Co Wals Non the gr cities. power Trans

Pe

Carn

Th

merc

"the built had broad, which with the getting really The down;

there

sides a

she pre

If she we much a set to water; about The skins a bulkhe of stee practic unsink tight of of an id water is any ord

If the three he crane two go would

Her

THE ICE-CRUSHING BOAT:

COMMERCE BREAKING HER FETTERS OF FROST.

ing

ral

the ria-

in ere

his

he rict

as

the

not

and

of

re-

he

to

hat

in

ing

the

ed.

an t a

its ith

ind

her

ent

as cil.

lly

ing

ary

ine

ce,

us

uld lics

elt,

d?

ich

ge.

the

ind

w. ish

its

ce,

the

the

has

ns

oly

he

ng

ies

at

for

cy.

THE long tyranny of winter over the waterways of the North seems at last to be threatened with a successful revolt. In Cassier's for June Mr. George E. Walsh tells the tale of "fighting the ice in river and lake":—

Russia, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Canada, and the northern tier of States of North America are ice-bound from the beginning of December till the warm weather of spring thaws them out. . . . The canals affected by King Ice, and closed up during the winter by his iron hand, represent some of the largest and most important water-ways of the world, and when Russia finishes her great canal from the Baltic to the Black Sea—a total distance of 1080 miles—another great artery of travel will come under his dominion.

AMERICANS AS PIONEERS.

The first effort to unlock the frozen corridors of commerce in the North West was made in the straits of Mackinac, nine miles wide, which part the two peninsulas of Michigan. The experiment proved a success. A fleet of ice-crushers has sprung up. Russia has had one built at Copenhagen, and another on the Tyne. Says Mr. Walsh:—

Northern Europe will soon make a systematic effort to unlock the grip of ice on the lakes, canals, and bays near the principal cities. Not less important may this prove to her (Russia's) power in the East than the construction of her great canal and Trans-Siberian railroad.

THE RUSSIAN ICE-BREAKER.

Pearson's for July publishes an account by Levin Carnac of the Ermack, "the strongest ship afloat," "the largest and most powerful ice-breaker yet built," built by Messrs. Armstrong on the Tyne. He says:—

Imagine, to begin with, a hull of steel 305 feet long, 71 feet broad, 42 feet 6 inches in depth, and 8,000 tons displacement, which is capable of being hurled on to an ice-pack Io feet thick with the concentrated energy of 12,000 horse-power without getting hurt, and you will have some idea of what the Ermack really is.

The ice-breaker does not break the ice up—she breaks it down; and fore and aft amidships she is so constructed that there is not a single angle that the ice can get hold of. Her sides are as round as those of an apple, and every surface that she presents to the ice is that of an unbroken curve.

HOW SHE WORKS.

If she were caught between a couple of closing masses of ice she would just begin to rise slowly and easily, and without so much as a shiver. Meanwhile her powerful pumps would be set to work, certain of her compartments would be filled up with water; and in the end the ice would have to support a weight of these in the compartments with the weight of about 10,000 tons,—or give way. It would probably give way. The Ermack is a double ship from end to end, and her two skins are so connected and fortified by transverse and longitudinal bulkheads or, as we should say, in landsman's language, partitions of steel framed in girders of enormous strength, that they are practically uncrushable, while the ship herself is practically unsinkable. She is divided into forty-eight absolutely watertight compartments. She gets water for her boilers by means of an ice-box, an open tube from the main deck down to the water under the ship's bottom which is far below the level of any ordinary ice.

HER ENORMOUS STRENGTH.

Her unique strength appears from the following estimate:

If the Ermack were lying on her beam ends alongside a quay three hundred feet long, at each end of which there was a giant crane with a lifting capacity of four thousand tons, and these two got hold of her and lifted her clean out of the water, she would hang between them as rigid as a bar of steel. If the same test were applied to the most strongly built ship in the Britis't Navy she would crumple up by her own weight like a structure of wet cardboard.

THROUGH THE ICE-BOUND BALTIC.

Her first voyage was a complete success :-

The Ermack, during a period when the Billic was more blocked by ice than it has been for sixteen years, steamed from the Tyne to the Neva practically without lit or hindrance, meeting ice varying from eighteen inches to twinty-five feet in thickness. When she got to Kronstadt she was plugging at six and a half knots through ice eighteen inches thick with a lot of snow on top of it. After leaving Kronstadt she went to Reval, where the ice was twenty feet thick. She broke this up and released nine frozen-up steamers, and then proceeded to smash up the ice outside the harbour, and bring others in which had been waiting ou side.

When the trials were over, the ship was examined inside and out. The outer skin, where she had come into contact with the ice, was polished perfectly bright, but there was no sign of strain or leakage. When she has done her work in the Baltic the Ernack will probably be sent round to the White Sea to attack the ice in the great port of Archangel. . . Later on she, or other crafts like her, will probably be the means of keeping the North-east Passage clear, and thus not only providing Russia with a new water-way to the Far East, but also opening up the great river-mouths of Northern Siberia to an almost all-the-year-round trade.

Woman in Central Africa.

THE Peers, who are so mortally afraid of admitting women to a share in municipal and national government, have evidently much ground to cover before they come up, in this respect at least, to the level of the natives of Central Africa. For Mr. L. A. Wallace, in the Geographical Journal for June, describing his journey over the Nyasa-Tanganyika plateau, tells us that several of the tribes there have women for chiefs, and pay them great respect. The husbands of these chieftainesses are, it appears, relegated to "a back seat." Mr. Wallace says:—

Amongst the Awanda also I had seen women acting as chiefs of villages under the paramount chief Kasonso, whose daughters they were said to be, and in all cases they were treated with respect and some ceremony by their people, and were generally accompanied by from ten to fifteen headmen, amongst whom I supposed was the husband; but as he was never pointed out to me nor referred to in any way, I presume that amongst these tribes the husband of a chieftainess may be a man of little or no receiver.

He reports that the natives are now generally friendly to the English. Such being the temper of the people, we are hardly surprised to read what Captain Boileau reports in the same Journal of his travels in that region:—

Let me say that on return to England many people seemed to think we had been through many hardships and risks. As far as the inhabitants are concerned, there is no more difficulty than there is here. One day, while encamped close to the road beyond Fife, our boy put his head into the tent and muttered the magic word "Donna." This turned out to be Miss Caddick, who was travelling up to Tanganyika for pleasure. This she successfully did without any more serious adventure than an interview with a surly chief, who would not supply carriers. He came off second best.

THE article in Blackwood's which deserves most attention is Laurie Magnus' study of the modern German drama. Gerbart Hauptmann's "Sunken Bell"—an allegory of the artist's trials—is said to correspond most closely to the nation's life at this hour. "The time is not yet ripe for the birth of a national literature." Says the writer: "The organism which Bismarck created still wants the breath in its nostrils."

PORTRAIT-PHOTOGRAPHY.

"THE first law of portraiture in any kind is to produce a likeness recognisable on sight by any one who knows it, has seen, and observed the person portrayed." Thus Mr. J. T. Nettleship, writing in the Art Journal for July,

Photograph by]

17. Caswall Smith,

MR. J. FORBES-ROBERTSON.

introduces his article on Mr. Caswall Smith, the eminent photographer. The writer continues:—

But the personality of the artist, which goes for so much in the painting or drawing of a portrait, and which finds an apologist in the dictum that no painter can put into a portrait more than his own mind contains, is really as important, though more subtle a factor, in the art of portrait photography.

The only solid distinction between the two arts as to final result, is, that while a poor or inaccurate draughtsman can never produce a convincing likeness, the most mechanical photographer may, under favourable conditions of light, and a chance happy mood in the sitter, blunder into producing a fine portrait.

In both arts, personality, intuition, the gift of seizing the right mood, are equally essential. Nor in photography is the process nearly so instantaneous as is generally imagined, for the artist photographer makes as many trial negatives as the portrait-painter makes sketches or studies, while in either case the craftsman's intuition finds the right moment, the touch or management of light, which fixes and epitomises the subtlest characteris ics of face, expression and gesture.

Mr. Caswall Smith owes his success to this personality, to his rapid and penetrating observation, to his power of seizing the best mood, and noting and selecting the characteristic contours and expressions of his sitters. Probably no one else, except

Mr. Hollyer, aims at these results by the simple process of taking the negative at a moment when the sitter is quite unconscious of being victimised.

Mr. John Caswall Smith was born in 1866, but it was not till 1888 that he started his photographing career by entering into partnership with Mr. Cameron, and for some time the two artists carried on the tradition of Mrs. Cameron. In 1894, however, the partnership was dissolved, and Mr. Caswall Smith opened his studio at 305, Oxford Street. An innovation, perhaps a unique experiment, is this photographic studio, "with brick or opaque walls, a large north light in the slope of the roof, and two large windows below in the wall itself, either or both of which can at will be darkened with blinds." Among the photographs, by Mr. Caswall Smith, illustrating the article are portraits of Mr. G. F. Watts, Miss Ida Nettleship, and Mr. Forbes-Robertson (reproduced here by permission). Equally interesting as his portraits are Mr. Caswall Smith's photographs of pictures, notably the works of Mr. G. F. Watts, Sir Edwin Burne-Jones, Albert Moore, Lord Leighton, Rossetti, and others.

CURIOUS CYCLE IN AMERICAN WHEAT.

THREE YEARS GOOD CROPS: THREE YEARS BAD.

THE United States, according to Mr. Maurice Lowin the National Review, are very probably entering on a period of depression. He cites certain facts which suggest a singular generalisation:—

Statistics show, what on their face may be merely a coincidence, but which may be the result of some natural law as yet not understood, that poor wheat crops and good wheat crops appear to run in cycles of three years. From a report recently issued by the Agricultural Department I find that the years 1890, 1891, and 1892 were fat years, the yield averaging 508,997,000 bushels, the price 76 7 cants per bushel and the value 390,119,423 dols. The three following years were lean for the farmer, the average of the crop being 441,167,362 bushels, the average 51 2 cents per bushel, and the value 225,670,801 dols., an average shrinkage of 165,000,000 dols. These were three years of business depression which bred the great discontent and distress which manifested itself so potently in 1896. The last three years the farmer has been prosperous, the crop increasing in size each year. The average was 544,327,406 bushels, the average price per bushel 70 5 cents, and the average value 377,306,660 dols. Now we are entering upon another triennial period, and curiously enough all reports thus far received from the wheat growing states indicate that the yield this year will be below last year's crop and not up to the average.

Mr. Low repeats that last year's great boom was due to the large crops, the Government's extraordinary military expenditures, and the artificial stimulus of the Dingley Bill, but that soot, the nation will experience what corresponds to the morning headache after a night of dissipation.

ADVICE "How to become rich?" is tendered in Pearson's, by millionaires representing a combined fortune of £65,000,000. The writers are Mr. C. B. Rouss, once clerk, now worth £1,200,000, and blind; C. P. Huntington, once small merchant, now worth £10,000,000; Russell Sage, once grocer's errand boy, now worth £20,000,000; D. O. Mills, once small merchant, now worth £5,000,000; Andrew Carnegie, once telegraph clerk, now worth £14,000,000; Mrs. Hetty Green, worth £12,000,000; John Wanamaker, once clerk, now worth £3,000,000. Much stress is laid on warning against over working.

a pa and division find: "the invision Card God joy, with Re the I

> in li bridg

> > Th

at its

and heard an A virile 66 Parli " beg this p men and weul speci groat abuse If He heart glory shall shall

of Go

other tion critics into a We Purits fact Excep was litera Common can be have of joy

findir of th his cl garb derive prose expo

and illustration i

THE TRUE ART OF PURITANISM.

of

iite

as

by

for

of

as

at

ue

or

of,

or

S. 22

15-iss

ed

its olv

es,

he

be

a

n-ret

ly

rs

ng

he

an 62

ue

ls.

ed

so

en

he

er

ls.

nd

at

W

ie

ry

ie

e

nt

n

);

h

W

h

h

h

PROFESSOR DOWDEN contributes to the Contemporary a paper with many noble passages in it on Puritanism and English literature. Following Dr. Martineau's division of all men into Catholic or Puritan, the writer finds the central idea of Puritanism in its contention that "the relation between the invisible spirit of man and the invisible God was immediate rather than mediate." Its cardinal error lay in "a narrow conception of God as the God of righteousness alone, and not as also the God of joy, and beauty, and intellectual light." Yet it was not without a lofty ideality of its own:—

Religious ideas and religious emotions, under the influence of the Puritan habit of mind, seek to realise themselves not in art, but, without any intervening medium, in character, in conduct, in life. It is thus that the gulf between sense and spirit is bridged.

CROMWELL'S IDEA OF A NATION'S WORK.

Through what was practical in the Puritan spirit, when seen at its highest, a noble ideality breaks forth. Its canticles of joy and thanksgiving, if heard meanly in the church or chapel, are heard nobly on the battle-field. If Puritanism did not fashion an Apollo with the bow or a Venus with the apple, it fashioned virile Englishmen.

"We that serve you," writes Cromwell to the Speaker of the Parliament immediately after the amazing victory of Dunbar, "beg of you not to own us—but God alone. We pray you own this people more and more; for they are the chariots and horsemen of Israel. Disown yourselves;—but own your authority; and improve it to curb the proud and the insolent, such as would disturb the tranquillity of England, though under what specious pretences soever. Relieve the oppressed, hear the groans of poor prisoners in England. Be pieased to reform the abuses of all professions:—and if there be any one that makes many poor to make a few rich, that suits not a Commonwealth. If He that strengthens your servants to fight, please te give you hearts to set upon these things, in order to His glory, and the glory of your Commonwealth,—besides the benefit England shall feel thereby, you shall shine forth to other nations, who shall emulate the glory of such a pattern, and through the power of God turn in to the like."

And since the instinct of beauty works indefatigably in man, other arts may be looked for in time to grow upon the foundation of a life of righteousness. Continental, if not English, critics have recognised the fact that a Puritan strain has entered into much that is most characteristic in our literature.

We have seen some of the formative influences from which a Puritan literature might arise. But we must bear in mind the fact that Puritanism was only for a short time triumphant. Except for a few years, Puritanism was militant or Puritanism was depressed. We can only conjecture whether a great literature would have developed on a Puritan basis if the Commonwealth had existed even for one entire generation; we can only surmise on the question whether righteousness would have flowered in beauty, and severity have worn the garments of joy.

The writer selects Milton and Bunyan as typical exponents of Puritanism. The difficulty which it felt in finding an imaginative body for the deepest experiences of the soul Milton only partly succeeded in solving by his classic culture. "The Hebraic ideas and the classical garb" do not always fit. "'The Pilgrim's Progress' is derived from only one of the two antiquities: it is the prose-epic of English Hebraism."

THE Maharajah of Durbhunga, prince of British India and trusted adviser of the Viceroy, is the subject of an illustrated sketch in the Royal for July, by A. L. Cotton. It is a glimpse of regal magnificence such as recalls the ancient ideas of India.

PLANS FOR A CHRISTIAN DAILY.

THE Puritan for July publishes three contributions on the need of starting a Christian daily newspaper. Rev. Dr. Fitchett, our Australasian editor, tells "how a Christian newspaper succeeded" in Australia. The Melbourne Daily Telegraph was begun partly because of the insufficient attention given to religious news by the other papers. It did not exclude liquor advertisements. It succeeded. It was discontinued simply because of the heavy losses of its proprietors in the great bank crisis. Lord Overtoun thinks the proposed Christian daily would have to take a clear line in politics and be of a Liberal complexion. He reckons it would need a capital of £100,000, which should be spread over a large constituency. Mr. Fredk. A. Atkins, editor of the Young Man, would include dramatic criticism, and would not give politics a back seat. He goes on:

How could we make sure of a good paper? Let me suggest very briefly what I should consider an ideal newspaper staff. I would make Mr. Stead Editor-in-Chief. He is the most brilliant journalist in England; and, barring a few fads, he would be a perfect editor. But I would not allow him to be a mere armchair editor. I would send him on long and frequent journeys to all parts of the world, gaining information, and interviewing kings and queens and statesmen. He would send home letters which would alone give the paper an enormous sale. Mr. John Derry, of The Sheffield Independent, would make a good Assistant Editor; so would Mr. Hammerton, of The Birmingham Weekly Post. I would secure Mr. Hill of The Westminster, as News Editor; and Mr. William Clarke, M.A., of The Speciator, as Principal Leader-Writer. I would get Dr. Robertson Nicoll to take charge of the Literary Page; and I would engage Mrs. Tooley as Lady Representative and Interviewer. I would secure the serial rights in the next novels by Mr. Hall Caine and Miss Ellen Thornycroft Fowler. And the money? I really do not think we should need more than £100,000 to start with, and this could be raised in a week.

Mr. Sheldon's Latest.

REV. C. M. SHELDON'S new story, "For Christ and the Church," begins in the July Puritan. It opens with an interview between a minister and the devil; and the pulpit sensation is launched by the preacher announcing that he had been talking with the devil and reporting what the devil said. The charge advanced is that the church is full of liars—because they do not attend weeknight prayer meeting. The first chapters give an impression as if Mr. Sheldon were trying to do for the old ecclesiasticism what he has done for the social gospel. This may perhaps appeal to a certain clerical type of mind. But the advent of the devil and the week-night prayer meeting in the forefront of a new novel is rather apt to cool the ardour of the ordinary reader.

AMID much variety of contents in the Windsor for July may be mentioned Wilfrid Klickmann's sketch of "Two Hundred Miles by Coach," from Minchead to Land's End, with attractive views. Mr. W. A. Sommerville gives a short personal reminiscence of John Bright as an angler. He was impressed with Mr. Bright's perpetual earnestness, but could not call him a very good angler. Mr. O'Reilly recounts his visit to the strong rooms of the Safe Deposit Company in Chancery Lane. Sometimes one of the safes contains as much as £40,000,000 of value. It is surprising to learn that it is used as a "sort of club" by quite a number of people who have no other address in London.

THE LATEST HEIR TO THE BRITISH CROWN.

AND ONLY FIVE YEARS OLD.

"PRINCE EDWARD OF YORK, Our King to be," is the subject of a good sketch by Mrs. Tooley, in the Lady's Realm for July. The fierce light which beats upon a throne softens into a tenderer radiance when it strikes into the Royal nursery; but Mrs. Tooley carefully keeps her appreciation from sinking into sycophancy, or, to use her own phrase, "fulsome ecstatics." She reports that, though only five years old, "Prince Edward is of an exceedingly friendly disposition towards strangers, and bears himself with a fearless and courteous manner." He has been put through the Royal drill from babyhood.

He has been trained from his infancy to return the salutes of passers-by. When a mere baby out driving on his nurse's lap, his veil was always raised, and he was taught to shake his chubby little hand when any one was encountered on the road who appeared to know him. Now he salutes in the most approved military style, and his quick eye will discern a soldier or a policeman far across Sandringham Park, and he looks for an exchange of courtesies.

LITTLE " DAVY."

Although Prince Edward is the boy's public and official title, yet, Mrs. Tooley explains-the Princess of Wales could not endure to have her heart-strings torn by a name which would recall her own lost Prince Eddi; of a name which would recau ner own lost Prince Eddi; so in the family circle Prince Edward is called by his last name of David, abbreviated into "Davy." One wonders why this name, so singularly appropriate to a Prince of Wales, has never been borne by an heir to the throne.

WAR IN THE ROYAL NURSERY.

Among other gossip of the nursery we hear that Prince Edward was much put out by the arrival of his brother, Prince Albert: "He did not like the new baby," and showed his dislike freely. The advent of a baby sister caused him no such grief. "He patronises little Princess Victoria, but seems very fond of her." Here is a glimpse into the methods of his parents' management:

The Royal nursery is not without skirmishes between the two young princes, who are evenly matched in the matter of spirit. Prince Edward makes the most of his slight seniority, but Prince Albert has no intention of accepting the place of younger son when it is a question of riding on a rocking-hors:.

One day the Duchess of York was quite shocked, on entering the nursery, to find the two young Princes "having it out" in proper siyle, and was about to have them punished, but the Duke said, "Oh, let them fight it out; they will make the better men for it."

AN ANGLO-RUSSIAN ALLIANCE.

Mrs. Tooley reminds us of the special affection Her Majesty shows to this wee great-grandson of hers, and says, "Prince Edward always calls the Queen 'Granny," while the Princess of Wales is 'Grandmamma.'" is a pretty little story :-

The longest journey yet undertaken by our future King was to "Granny's" Castle in the Highlands . . . This memorable visit took place in the autumn of 1896, at the time when the Czar and Czarina, with their infant daughter, the Grand-Duchess Olga, were visiting the Queen at Balmoral. It was very pretty to see the two children together. The Grand-Duchess Olga was just beginning to walk, and Prince Edward. having in the far distant past overcome the initial difficulties of locomotion, supported the uncertain footsteps of his fair play-mate in a most chivalrous fashion. The story goes that the Queen, seeing Prince Edward and the Grand-Duchess Olga toddling across the room together, smiled and said, "La belle alliance." However, the matrim mial intentions of Prince Edward have not yet been declared, and we should be sorry to compromise the little Grand-Duchess by any further reference to the subject.

SINGING ON THE RIVER.

THE Girl's Realm is to be commended for laying stress on the delights which may be won on the river. Only we need to remember that the Thames is not the only stream which can be utilised for joy. "A naiad" recounts some of her experiences of "the pleasures of the river," and gives good advice to intending boatwomen. Bessie Hatton contributes quite a prose idyll entitled "Music on the River," which seems to suggest that sometimes, at least, our English songs find their true environment. We too often forget that singing is not primarily a thing of drawing-room or concertroom: it is native to the open air. The writer tells her

At Cookham, a year or two back, I was having tea on the lawn of the hotel, which slopes down to the river, when a distant voice, accompanied by a mandoline and a guitar, caught my ear. The boat was some distance away, but it was making for the landing-stage of the hotel. As it came nearer, the sweet strains of "Barbara Allen" silenced the chattering groups of men and women who were regaling themselves with tea, lemonade, and "shandy-gaft". The pathetic air came floating down the river, borne on the summer breeze, nearer and nearer. ... There seemed to be a spell upon the listeners, as the girl's sweet voice rose and fell and eventually ceased.

All present watched with interest as the two young ladies of the party were handed out of the boat . . . I presently found myself talking quite familiarly with the sweet-voiced singer, who was as pretty as she was charming. I learned that she and her married sister, together with her brother-in-law and some friends, were enjoying a summer holiday. They had started from Abingdon, staying a day or two at Streatley, and then had made their way by easy stages to Cookham. "And then had made their way by easy stages to Cookham. "And we have sung all along the river," she said. I wish that I had followed in their wake to have heard the sweet English ballad music that had greeted the silver stream from Abingdon to Cookham.

SHAKESPEARE SONGS ON THE THAMES. "It is a pastoral river and needs pastoral music," she said; " all the Shakespeare songs suit it admirably: they might have been written to be sung on the Thames. Shakespeare must often have heard them trilled by milkmaids and village swains, along the banks of his native Avon, three hundred years ago. , , , Yesterday," she continued, sipping her tea, "we had quite a Shakespeare concert; we anchored in the backwater above Marsh Lock—one of the most beautiful spots on the river -the whisp-ring willows, lazy lilies, and a bank of meadow-sweet and long purples formed a delightful background for our 'Under the Greenwood Tree' was perhaps the most successful of the songs. It is such a perfect picture of summer, and yet has its warning note of the winter that is to be. Then followed that sweet song of spring which comes in the same play, so suggestive of the happy, irresponsible love of the young:

"It was a lover and his lass, With a hey, and a ho, and a hey nonino," succeeded by 'Blow, Blow, thou Winter Wind,' 'Come Live with Me and be my Love,' 'When that I was and a little Tiny Boy,' 'Sigh no more, Ladies,' 'Where the Bee Sucks,' with its memories of dainty Ariel."

THE Samoan national drink is described by Mr. Wardlaw Thompson in his interesting travel paper in the Sunday at Home as a somewhat peculiar beverage. It is called Kava. He says :- "It is prepared from the dried root of the piper methysticum, is non-intoxicating, and, taken in moderation, is a good tonic. When taken to excess, it is said to produce paralysis of the lower limbs. To a European it is distinctly an acquired taste, the mode of manufacture being decidedly peculiar, and the palate having to be trained to like a decoction which has a strong suggestion of soapsuds flavoured with ginger ! "

OVER

SOM unlame one or

In t on the aggres some 1 He ow

The formist even jo despoti the de fact.

The "cam nation argue, condit preser Purita Englis matte obliga

> On to be I ca holida sense d servati popula would preser learne social from holida 66 F appal almost

Mr a curi man after that l I ha

for m attem there He > tion v Mi of the

Th be re It is a view, day is

OVER THE GRAVE OF SEVEN DAYS' JOURNALISM.

ress

)nly

only

ad"

s of

oat-

dvll

gest

heir

ging

ert-

her

the

my

for veet of tea,

ing

er.

rl's

the

elf

ho

she

nd

ad

nd

nd

ad

ad

to

d :

ve

ist

ge

irs

id er

er

ar

st r,

n

1e

VIIM

SOMETHING like funeral sermons over the late and unlamented experiment of seven day newspapers appears in one or two of the magazines.

A FORMIDABLE "TRIPLE ALLIANCE."

In the National Review, the Rev. H. H. Henson writes on the "British Sunday" and its victorious repulse of aggressive journalism. "For the moment," he says, "the institution has been saved; it will pay nobody for some while to outrage popular sentiment on the subject." He owns the potency of the fact:—

The triple alliance of the Anglican Hierarchy, the Nonconformist Conscience, and "Labour" can dispose of forces which even journalists must respect. In the last resort, as we all know, despotisms rest on the basis of a plebiscite; and it is good for the despots occasionally to have their attention called to the fact.

The time proved to be badly chosen; the innovators "came into contact with the Protestant reaction and the national pride." Nevertheless, Mr. Henson goes on to argue, "the British Sunday survives in a dilapidated condition amid unkindly surroundings." Should it be preserved? "The religious obligation of Sunday in the Puritan sense is no longer the belief of the majority of Englishmen." The question must be considered as a matter of social utility, therefore, and not of religious obligation.

AN AWESOME PROSPECT.

On this ground he holds "the case for conservatism" to be very strong indeed:

I cannot doubt that the jealous protection of the weekly holiday is the true policy of the working-classes in the widest sense of the term. . . But scarcely less necessary is the preservation of Sunday from frankly falling into the category of popular holidays. Fifty-two "Bank Holidays" in the year would be destructive of all the best possibilities of Sunday, and almost infinitely mischievous. The weekly holiday must be preserved under lock and key until the working-classes have learned how to use it. . . My main contention is that the social worth of Sunday is largely contingent on its exemption from the vulgar and exhausting enjoyments of ordinary holidays.

"Fifty-two Bank Holidays in the year" is truly an appalling prospect.

A CURIOUS PREDICTION.

Mr. T. H. S. Escott recalls in the New Century Review a curious prophecy uttered about 1871 by a pious Frenchman named Alphonse Esquiros, on revisiting London after twenty years' absence. He remarked on the change that had come over Sunday observance, and said:

I have lived to see the British Sabbath become the dies festus for middle class English banquets: if I live, I shall see the attempt to issue Sunday editions of the morning papers. But there your countrymen will draw the line.

He died in 1876, twenty-three years before his prediction was fulfilled.

THE PREACHER THE WORST SECULARISER.

Mr. Escott puts a rather severe "click in the gallop" of the triumphant pulpiteer. He not only says:—

The check given to seven day journalism ought not to be regarded as the triumph of any particular religious sect. It is rather the practical assertion of the common-sense English view, consecrated by long, religious associations, that a cessation from the labours and employments of the rest of the week on one day is as necessary for the body as for the soul. He goes on to charge the pulpit with the increasing secularisation of Sunday!

The Sunday sermons that classes and masses alike, quite as much in churches as in chapels, are constrained to hear, really do more to destroy the distinction between Sunday and week-day teaching and reading than would the issue of half a dozen morning papers. Ingenuity and originality are the methods by which these homilists seek to attract and instruct their faithfully peripatetic flocks. The formality of the scripture text may be retained—it is used chiefly as the peg on which to hang a moral essay or, rather, a leading article such as, very probably, the preacher hims: If was writing a day or two ago. Up-to-dateness, keen and universal sympathies with, as well as knowledge of, the very latest secular writings, travels, history, comedy, tragedy, poetry, science, essay, novel—these are the "notes" of the popular preacher of to-day, who often seems to be a literary logroller as well.

It is absurd hypocrisy for professional pictists to complain of the first day of the week losing its distinctive features and honours when their representative teachers—if they touch on religion in their pulpit discourses—make themselves mere echoes of Lux Mundi and of the New Criticism; or, if they aim at being social reformers, find the inspiration for their sermons just as much in the newspapers as Charles Reade used to find his facts for his novels. It is less in the preachers themselves than in those who sit under them, that a security may be found against the Sunday sermon becoming nothing more than the echo of the Saturday article or the rechauffe of the Saturday criticism.

THE MEDIÆVAL SUNDAY.

In the Nincteenth Century Father Thurston, of the Society of Jesus, writes on the Mediæval Sunday. He quotes from a dialogue between Dives and Pauper, published in 1405:—

The holy day is ordained for rest and relieving both of body and of soul. And therefore in law of kind, in law written, in law of grace, and ever from the beginning of the world, the holy day hath been solacious (comforting) with honeaty, both for soul and body, and for worship of God, whose day is that day, solacious in clothing, in meat and drink, in occupation honest, with mirth making. And therefore the prophet saith, This is the day that God made, make we now merry and be we glad.

This Jesuit divine goes on to say :-

The principle of encouraging reasonable amusement was nevertheless surely a sound one. There was not more, but less, drinking when the Sunday afternoons were spent, as the statutes directed, in the use of the bow and in feats of strength and skill. In the London of our own days much change for the better has taken place of late years, and the bicycle is effecting wonders everywhere. But there must be many country clergymen who would welcome cordially a return to the freedom of the Middle Ages, and would find such occupations as cricket, football, volunteer drill, or practice at the rifle-butts an improvement on the Sunday afternoon which at present prevails over a great part of England.

THE Nouvelle Revue Internationale, to which the late Emilio Castelar contributed a monthly survey of Foreign Affairs for so many years, has issued a special Castelar number. This interesting monograph by Madame Rattazzi deals with the life and work of its subject and the part he has played in the making of history. We have the early years of Castelar, then the politician, the patriot, the orator, the writer, the mystic, Castelar at home, Castelar in France, Castelar and Italy, Castelar's religion, etc., etc.; the whole forming an admirable collection of Castelar's opinions, ideas, and interests. In the Nouvelle Revue Internationale of June 1st, it may be added, Castelar includes an interesting notice on the Peace Conference in his list review of European Politics of the Month. This is followed by a study of Castelar, contributed by Marie-Létizia de Rute.

"A PALMERSTON-WITH NERVES."

SUCH is the ingenuous title given to the July instalment of that study of Lord Rosebery's character which promises to become almost a serial feature in the Fortnightly Review. The writer, who veils himself in anonymity, seems disposed to play the part of the Ghost to the hesitating Hamlet of our political drama. He adopts for the most part, however, a tone of genial banter, with a frequent spice of satire. Here are a few of his opening epigrams:—

Realistic and nervous, Lord Rosebery gives for the first time the modern type to politics that prevails in literature. He is a Palmerston: but a Palmerston of the period—a Palmerston sensitive to criticism; and this is so obvious a weakness that it is hard for criticism to refrain.

LORD ROSEBERY'S RULING MOTIVE.

It is open to the enemy to say, with the hint of cruth which is the sting of caricature, that Lord Rosebery's principles amount to a desire to be the most popular Premier of his time, and that his programme amounts to a conception of the Liberal Party as it ought to be, which is not very certainly distinguishable from the Unionist Party as it is. This is one of the unfavourable criticisms which are not fair... The truth is, that Lord Rosebery's desire to become a popular Premier is not nearly so great as it might be with advantage. His more ruling motive is the most intense dislike of unpopularity under any circumstances. The indefinable absence of seriousness in his present position cannot be lost upon the fine nerves of Lord Rosebery, and must prevent him from feeling altogether happy... Levity was never more unconquerably human than in Lord Rosebery. It is not the least of his sympathics with democracy.

A ROYAL RÔLE?

There is something indeed about Lord Rosebery's present position irresistibly suggestive of the functions and prestige of Royalty. What Lord Rosebery perhaps does not realise is that it is impossible to combine the prospects of a party-leader with a genial vogue resembling that of the Prince of Wales. . . . He must make up his mind that the sacrifice of a little of his popularity is indispensable to the serious resumption of his career. . . . The subtle opposition between Lord Rosebery and the older school of his party is really this: that while their tendency is to exaggerate ideals, his is to exaggerate reality.

OUR ONLY POLITICAL SENTIMENT.

The writer next sketches the characteristics of parties. "Hideous political apathy" is the fundamental fact in which "with the increase of social comfort, politics in England are following those of France":—

The only political sentiment which strongly moves the imagination of the nation as a whole at this period, is the passion for empire. Nothing that Mr. John Morley or Sir William Harccurt can say, will remove the fact that Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Rudyard Kipling are more influential and representative personages of the age than either of them.

The great strength of the Unionist Party is that it is sound and solid upon Imperialism. The weakness of the Liberal Party is that it is not so sound and solid upon Imperialism.

THE MEANING OF "AS BEFORE 1886."

What is lacking to Liberalism is not numbers. It is quality. In spite of all its difficulties and losses, the vast vote which the Liberal Party can still command at the polls is one of the most astonishing phenomena of politics. It must put an end to the habit of shedding its members lightly as leaves. . . That Liberalism, at any cost, must replace fission by fusion is, for the present, Lord Rosebery's last word. . . With Lord Rosebery, "as before 1886" is the real formula of progress. He means that Liberalism must recover the former richness and variety of its social composition to promote, with the old sanguine activity, not an old policy, but a new.

MR. JOHN MORLEY A CLERIC REVERSED.

Of Mr. Morley the writer has certain incisive things to

If the facts are against his theories, so much the worse for the facts. They are bad facts, and Mr. Morley purses his lips against them. Mr. John Morley, though opposed to clericalist views, has much of the best clericalist temperament. His attitude in politics is very much that of the cleric reversed. He has his creed, and his instinct is rather to defend the dogma than to admit that it was based upon a state of knowledge which has ceased to be modern. Lord Rosebery, on the other hand, is not a doctrinaire, but a pure statesman who aspires after successful administration rather than righteous innovation. There is as much difference between the two habits of mind as between those of an astronomer and the driver of a London bus.

"THE TRANSFUSION OF PARTIES."

Of the new democracy the writer gives this delineation:-

Imperialist feeling and a continuous foreign policy must be the common virtue and necessity of both political parties under democracy. Democracy, which abhors complexity and detail, and demands the simplification of things, tends to be either nationalist or socialist, or to be both at once, with a magnificent disregard of the incompatibility of theories. In foreign policy, democracy demands a satisfaction of national pride. In domestic legislation it no longer cares for anything which is not touched by socialistic emotion. The key to the politics of the closing years of the century may be found in one illuminating phrase—the transfusion of parties. . . . For the transfusion of parties, two men above all others share the responsibility—Mr. Chamberlain, who inoculated the Unionist Party with the humanitarian programme, which derives from Birmingham, and Lord Rosebery, who inoculated the Liberal Party with the grandiose Imperialism, which derives from Lord Beaconsfield.

WHEN LORD ROSEBERY MUST DECIDE.

The writer predicts that when depression and discontent follow the present prosperity and lethargy, then will come the mending or ending of the party system:—

The battle will move round the question of property, as for sixty years it moved round the question of the extension of the franchise. Both parties will either form into groups more extreme in temper than it is possible for either of the two great sides to be under the present system of organised compromise; or parties will re-form upon the permanent line of cleavage, the rough distinction between the Haves and Have-nots. . That the Legislature will become more and more the cockpit of future struggles between capital and labour seems certain enough.

Then Hamlet will have to act: "it will remain for Lord Rosebery to choose sides for good, or finally lose touch." The writer believes he still retains "the power of conjuring up the vivid imagination of social misery, the power of giving a more sombre and agitating impulse to humanitarian emotion than any other statesman of the time."

The paper ends with the words :-

But it is not certain, after all, that Lord Rosebery cares enough even for the attainment of his great ambitions to overcome his horror of the brutal but necessary brawl of party politics.

"A Home for the Shabby Genteel" is what Mr. A. Goodrich, in the Royal Magazine for July, calls the Rowton House in King's Cross Road. Among its occupants he mentions men who had been a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Guards, a naval officer, a Colonial judge, a number of broken-down barristers and architects. Working men, though possessing more money, are looked down upon, and made to feel themselves inferiors and interlopers. But this decayed gentility forms no mass of smouldering sedition. The fact in the paper is that, in a discussion of a politico-economic kind, all the guests who took part proved to be thoroughgoing Conservatives. The anarchist was treated with the utmost scorn.

THI which "Scho

The national spent schools thus sp

The which intend

The Englan machin schools, opened, the san knowle minds a many a totally age whefrom so part for an expe

The labour. alleged that the assista He sa ing cl. and it actuate down t conside of all employ a shoo declare asks, " schools

Sir J by elen of scho they a employ The highly p highly r (1) S 144,000 years oo existing school. (2) T are very (3) T desirable develop (4) Tong. T

SIR JOHN GORST ON CHILD LABOUR.

s to

lips

alist

His He

han

has

d. is ifter

ion.

d as bus.

eat be

ider

tail.

ther

cent

icy,

not

the

ting

1 of

Mr.

the

and 1.

ent

me

for

the ore

reat

se :

the

'hat

ure

ord

h."

ing

of ni-

ires

ver-

ics.

the cu-

nt-

ge,

cts.

ced

and

s of

n a vho

es.

THE educational reformer is evident in every paragraph which Sir John Gorst contributes under the heading of "School Children as Wage-Earners" to the Nineteenth Century. He opens with the two-edged assurance:—

The reality of the desire of the people of Great Britain for national education is vouched for by the millions cheerfully spent on the establishment and maintenance of elementary sohools. . . . But everybody knows that a great deal of the money thus spent is wasted.

Not only are the wrong subjects taught, but the buildings are often defective and the teachers ill qualified.

A WOEFUL WASTE.

There is not a proper supply of the raw material on which the existing machinery, however defective, is intended to operate:—

The public cannot deny that at least a million children in England and Wales are never reached at all by our education machinery; that of those whose names are on the books of the schools, about one-fifth is absent every time the schools are opened, and that this fifth consists very largely, day by day, of the same children; that scholars who attend the schools have knowledge crammed into them at too early an age, when their minds are immature and unfit to assimilate what is taught; that many are sent to school in a state of hunger and weariness which totally unfits them to profit by instruction; and that just at the age when children are fit to begin to study they are removed from school—the necessary result of which is that the greater part forget everything which has been taught to them at so great an expense.

EXCUSES MADE.

The reason is to be found in the demand for child-Sir John Gorst examines the three grounds alleged for this practice. That parents are poor; that the work cannot be done without children; that the "convenience of the richer classes requires the assistance of school children in their amusements." He says only an insignificant minority of the working classes send out their children as wage-earners, and it is a question whether greed, rather than poverty, actuates them. Economists say child-labour forces down the wages of adults. The second excuse the writer considers to be unreal, in view of Continental prohibition of all child labour under 14 or 15. The third-the employment of children as caddies in golf, or beaters at a shooting party, or in other amusements - Sir John declares to be injurious alike to child and school; and asks, "Would any of the masters of the great public schools allow absence on such grounds?"

A DISMAL SUMMARY.

Sir John is much dissatisfied with the returns sent in by elementary schools, as to the number and occupations of school children earning wages. But incomplete as they are, they report 144,000 school children as in employment. The writer epitomizes:—

The evidence of the return establishes, or at least renders highly probable, the following facts:—

(1) School children are employed at very early ages. Of the 144,000, more than half are returned as being under eleven years of age, which is the age at which, according to the existing law, all children ought to be in regular attendance at school.

(2) The standards attained by the school children employed are very low; more than half are in or under Standard IV.

(3) The occupations are for the most part not in themselves desirable; they are not instructive, and are not calculated to develop an intelligent and skilful worker.

(4) The hours of labour of school children are inordinately exhausted by labour, is an offence a ong. There are 60,268 employed from ten to twenty hours a be made an offence against the law.

week, 27,008 from twenty-one to thirty, and 12,961 employed for more than thirty hours a week; many are employed the whole of Saturday, and some constantly on Sundays.

(5) The wages earned are contemptibly small: 64,357 earn less than 1s., and of these 17,084 less than 6d. a week. A small sum for which to sacrifice the future of a child.

REMEDIES-SUMMER CLOSING.

The inelastic nature of our school attendance laws is, in the writer's judgment, largely to blame for the entire withdrawal of children from school. Laws abroad are less rigid:—

The little children in Bavaria, in Switzerland, in Norway and other countries where elementary education is much more advanced than here, can assist in haymaking, harvesting, fruitpicking, and light work of that kind. As the outdoor life of summer alternates with a very regular and constant attendance at school during the winter up to the age of thirteen, fourteen and fifteen, the result of the system is an advantageous to the mind as it is to the body. Strict obedience to the law in country districts in England entails loss to farmers of the children's services, and loss to parents of the wages which the children earn. The consequence is that, during hay and harvest time, the law is almost universally broken. It would be much to the advantage of the schools if there was an elastic system similar to that in Switzerland, by which at certain seasons, and for certain purposes, the whole school could be entirely closed.

HOW TO CHECK OVERWORK.

The case of children sent to school exhausted by toil is next considered. People forget that young children are not only injured by the strain of learning following on the strain of labour. They require time to play:—

The old adage that "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy" seems to be thought inapplicable to the poor, and our arrangements are to be made as if recreation were not a necessity for all children, but a luxury appropriate only to the children of the rich.

How to prevent the cruel or thoughtless parent from inflicting this kind of injury is a problem which Sir John Gorst would leave to regulation by local authorities: "In this regard far more confidence can be placed in local authorities than in the wisdom of Parliament."

WHAT LIVERPOOL IS DOING.

He quotes an important precedent :-

In Liverpool regulations have lately been made by the Corporation under their Local Act of 1898, with reference to children trading in the streets. No child is entitled to trade at all without a licence and without wearing a distinctive badge. These badges, which are given out on the issue of the licence, are of two sorts, one to be worn by children who are by law exempt from attendance at school, and the other by those who are still under the obligation to go to school, so that every policeman in Liverpool can at once distinguish to which class the child belongs. . . No licensed child may trade in the street after nine o'clock at night; no child which is not exempt from school attendance, and no girl, may trade after seven o'clock between the 1st of October and the 31st of March. The licensed children must be decently and suffici nily clothed. They must not enter any public-house or any place of public entertainment. . . . Why should not every municipal authority in the United Kingdom be invested by public Act with similar power, and be encouraged by the Home Office to make similar regulations?

PUNISH THE PARENT.

To check other abuses scarcely sufficient use is made of the teachers' intimate personal knowledge of the condition of the children. Sir John Gorst suggests:—

For a parent who can help it to wilfully send a child to school starving, or wet through, or dirty, or insufficiently clad, or exhausted by labour, is an offence against morality, and should be made an offence against the law.

THE REVERSES OF BRITOMART.

It is not strange at a time when a Parliament of Women, assembled from all parts of the world, is sitting in London discussing in plain, business-like language the things that women can do and have done, that a counterblast should come from those poor men who tremble for their supremacy. In the North American Review for June, Mr. Edmund Gosse takes up the task of sweeping back the Atlantic with vigour. Now, a delicate style and a mass of pretty figures of speech are no equipment for such a task; and Mr. Gosse, having apparently nothing but generalities on which to rest his case, has been driven to borrow the brooms of others. So he takes the books of Miss Arabella Kenealy and Madame Anna Lempérière as his text.

Madame Lempérière, says Mr. Gosse, whose work on "Le Rôle Social de la Femme" made a sensation in Paris, is a practitioner in the Parisian schools of philosophy, and until recently was regarded as a bulwark of the extreme feminist party. Recent analyses of the arguments on which that party bases its claims have led her irresistibly to reject them. In her new book she denounces what she considers the errors of the advanced Women's Rights party, and expounds what in her opinion should take their place. The French Women's Rights party has been making the family the object of their attack, Madame Lempérière replies that the family must come first of all:

Her view is briefly this. All consideration of woman's duty must start with the family, which, so far from involving any degradation or want of dignity, offers her the finest possible sphere of activity. But, in the family, it is not necessary or desirable that she should take a dependent or a secondary place. Her place there is not dependent, but interdependent. That is to say, in the normal family neither man nor woman can succeed without the other; absolute interdependence of each upon the other, on all points, in all conditions, in all circumstances, being the only safe path towards practical perfection.

The physical muscularity of man, his activity, his freedom from all accidents which hamper movement and prompt action, point him out as the acquirer, and producer, of resources:—

The mistake of the extreme feminists is to assert that they also must, before all else, strive to produce and acquire. This their organisation will never permit them to do in a manner which will be adequate for direct rivalry with man. If, therefore, they were to succeed in breaking down all the traditional barriers which distinguish the sexes, if the formulas of gallantry were to be so absolutely destroyed that man and woman worked in direct physical emulation, woman would be nowhere in the struggle.

Miss Kenealy inflicts another dint on the armour of

She tells the women who boast of the marvellous addition to their muscular energies, that they have acquired these powers at the expense of others, at least as valuable and more characteristic. She tells them that they need not be so proud of being able to scour the country on their bicycles and smash their neighbour's windows with their hockey, because in attaining this muscularity they have destroyed the harmonious balance of their faculties. She asks them whether they have reflected that muscle, which they deify, is nothing but means to an end, and whether they justify the neglect of that end. She accuses the tall, fleet girls of to-day of fostering athleticism at the expense of sympathy, emotion and delicacy. Their countenances, a few years ago, were gentle, refined and full of expression; they have now gained the hard "bicycle fage." which comes from prolonged muscular tension.

All this Mr. Gosse approves and emphasises. And the war with Spain he thinks has given the last blow to Women's Rights. Women, he declares, have fallen into the background in recent times of storm and stress. It does not seem to have occurred to him that perhaps the explanation is that men's doings have latterly been more notable, not women's less. But Mr. Gosse as Paridell contending with Britomart is not a success. So he takes refuge a third time behind his opponent of the new movement, the late Mrs. Lynn Linton. And it is a good thing, for its results are a pen-picture of that redot bt the lady which is quite the best thing in the article:—

An indomitable warrior in the front rank of anti-feminists was the late Mrs. Lynn Linton. It was magnificent to see her sitting, erect, at the tea-table, an apocalyptic light fiashing from her spectacles, and to hear her incisive tongue smiting the whole regiment of froward women, hip and thigh. She was no palterer; she put into words everything on the subject which a man might think but never dare to say. Indeed, her weakness was, that she said (and wrote) so much that no man in his senses would ever wish to say.

WILL PRESS SUPERSEDE PARLIAMENT?
A FORECAST FROM JAPAN.

PARLIAMENTARY government in Japan is traced from its inception ten years ago down to the present time, in a valuable article which Mr. H. N. G. Bushby contributes to the Nineteenth Century. He reports how something like a genuine party system is springing up in place of the clan rivalry which has hitherto taken its place. His paper closes with a criticism and a prophecy, both from Japanese sources, and both significant to Western readers. He quotes Mr. Kataoka, who, with the exception of one short term, has been in the House of Representatives since its foundation:—

As for specches, he says that whereas form rly members were too fond of showing cff to please their constituents, they have now gone to the other extreme, considering it beneath their dignity to make speeches and waste of time to listen to them. The Japaness Dist, especially the Lower Heuse, cannot compare in point of decorum with the British Parliament. But at the same time, proceeds Mr. Katacka, "nobody will charge us with partiality when we say that our legislative body need not be afraid of comparison with any of its compeers on the continent of Europe."

The prophecy is by Mr. Yujiro Miyake, editor of the Nippon. He say: "Political Japan is about to accomplish in a few decades what is taking Europe centuries to effect. England, having passed through the House of Lords period towards the end of the last century, is now in a transition stage from the House of Commons period to that of the Press. Japan, with a parliamentary experience of less than ten years, is already giving infallible signs of the same tendency." . . "Some people in Japan, as in England, may consider this transference of political power from the Dict to the Press prejudicial to the system of representative government. The idea is due to ignorance of the national tendency of civilisation. Further development of popular education and further increase of the influence of newspapers and magazines will constitute the Press the best counsellor, controller and companion of a Government." It will be gathered from this that the ancients of the earth are also in the morning of the times.

THERE is a very spirited description in Harper's, by Mr. H. C. MacIlwaine, of the experiences and expertness of the Australian horseman—the counterpart, and in some respects contrast, to the American cowboy. Mr. W. C. Ford, late chief of Bureau of Statistics at Washington, writes on trade policy with the Colonies. He insists if there is to be any future for the Philippines, Americans must grow what Asia wants and make what Asia will buy. He advocates free trade in the Philippines, and in Puerto Rico a tariff for revenue only.

paper South on this cylinder from b an imm stones. "Kiml action diamo: These from a the sur their undergrant of the sur their undergrant south of the sur their their surface of the surfa

6

THE

alone transp easy a tempe bustib But or mence difficu genera media diamo liquefa

Her

chemi

made

among

variou This under and cry is carb organic world. apart i outcom Now i its pri awaitii it to h gressed hydroc which ever, o explain Ther: constit

the affid-velop of the stance nickel, it separation, nof grap the on intimate

"THE RECIPE FOR DIAMOND-MAKING."

llen

. It

ore

dell

kes

ove-

ing,

adv

ists

her

rom

ole

no

h a

iess nses

om

n a tes

ing

the

His

om

ers.

ne

res

ere

ave

neir

em.

not

Bu!

rge

ody

on.

few

nd,

the

the

ha

ing

in cal

of

the

of ws-

or,

be

the

by

ess

in

Ar.

ng-

sts

ins

uv.

rto

THE Edinburgh Review for April has a very instructive paper on "the origin of diamonds." It appears that the South African diamond mines have thrown much light on this once obscure subject. These mines are "colossal cylinders, two hundred to five hundred feet across, pierced from below through a granitic substructure surmounted by an immense overlay of carbonaceous shales and sandstones." They are gorged with a blue rock named "Kimberlite," which was evidently flung up by volcanic action from unfathomed depths, and which contains the diamonds; the latter grow more abundant as you descend. These facts lead to the conclusion that diamonds haif from a subterraneous and not a celestial source. "On the surface of the earth, they are adventitious arrivals; their proper home is at some considerable distance underground."

FIRST GET YOUR CARBON LIQUEFIED-

Diamonds, of course, consist of pure carbon. "Hence alone among gems, spurious or true, they are perfectly transparent to the Röntgen rays"—which supply "an easy and infallible test for genuine diamonds." At a temperature of 750 deg. Centigrade the diamond is combustible. It is, in a word, carbon perfectly crystallised. But crystallisation, so far as experience goes, only commences with a substance in the liquid state. And the difficulty has been to get carbon liquefied. It has generally passed from solid to vapour, skipping the intermediate liquid state. "The key to the enigma of diamond-production should, accordingly, be found in the liquefaction of carbon."

-AT THE REQUISITE HEAT AND PRESSURE.

Here lies one of the triumphs of high-temperature chemistry. The invention of the electric furnace has made possible temperatures up to near 3,600 deg. C., and among other discoveries has shown unforeseen effects on various metals of carbon:—

This fundamental material is met with on the earth's surface under three elementary forms, definable as amorphous, foliated, and crystalline, or as charcoal, graphite, and diamond. Charcoal is carbon of the ordinary current kind, the residuum of charred organic matter, the universal caput mortuum of the organic world. Graphite is the sam; substance modified by strong heat apart from extraordinary pressure. Diamond, finally, is the outcome of high temperature combined with great pressure. Now in pre-geological times, when our globe was still liquid, its primitive store of carbon must have lain near at hand, awaiting the imperious calls of vitality; and M. Moissan opines it to have existed in the shape of metallic compounds, such as those produced with facility in his furnace. As cooling progressed, aqueous reactions set in, carbides were replaced by hydrocarbons, and eventually by carbonic acid, huge volumes of which originally encumbered the atmosphere. Carbides, however, doubtless survived in subterranean cavities, and perhaps survive even now. Many volcanic phenomena might be explained by inrushes of water upon such Plutonic "foundries." There is, moreover, strong reason to believe that they actually constitute the long sought matrix of the diam and.

BUT HOW LIQUEFY CARBON?

That fused iron dissolves carbon is no recent discovery; but the affinity, illustrated in the Bessemer process, has been widely developed and investigated by M. Moissan. At the temperature of the electric furnace he finds this ordinarily intractable substance to be freely soluble in aluminium, chromium, manganese, nickel, uranium—above all, in b. iling silver and iron. Unlu-kily it separates from them in cooling, as it is deposited after sublimition, not in the radiant crystalline form, but merely indult flakes of graphite. Only by main force can the desired substitution of the one for the other be effected. It would seem that the intimate marshalling power in this kind of matter is virtually annulled by a trifling separation of the centres from which it emanates. It acts only when they are brought within striking distance by mechanical means. The difficulty thus raised is formidable; yet it must be overcome before the manufacture of the gems enters upon a practical stage.

COOLING MOLTEN CARBURISED IRON.

M. Moissan was the first duly to estimate and successfully to cope with it. His exp.riments were grounded upon careful inquiry into South African mining conditions. disclose great profundity of origin for the excavated objects was at once apparent to him, and underground factories, if placed deep enough, can avail to an almost unlimited extent of geo-centric heat and geogonic pressure. The crux was to produce the same results without the same facilities. Sufficient heat was indeed at hand; the needful pressure was less easily evoked. But here a certain anomaly in the behaviour of cooling iron came to the rescue. Pure iron follows the common rule of contraction in solidifying; but iron saturated with carbon expands, after the manner of water turning into ice. Silver shows the same peculiarity. Now, by suddenly refrigerating a mass of carburised iron; a hard superficial shell would obviously be formed, powerfully constricting the interior, and hindering its natural expansion. Frost-burst water-pipes but too familiarly exemplify the all but irresistible strength of the molecular effort to get room under analogous circumstances. The tremendous interior pressure created by the restraint imposed upon it in M. Moissan's crucibles suffices to liquefy the carbon contained in them; and crystallisation ensues.

GENUINE DIAMONDS MANUFACTURED.

For cooling purposes the French chemist found water unsuitable, because of the cushion of vapour which formed between the water and the heated crucible; so he took as refrigerator in place of water—boiling lead! The drop required in temperature being from 3,500 degrees to 1,100 degrees, the melting point of iron, it is easy to see that liquid lead at 325 degrees is comparatively a cooling bath.

By these means, genuine diamonds have been made. But the largest was only one-fiftieth of an inch across, and within three months broke up:—

Laboratory-diamonds are then unlikely soon to figure in trade returns; although it may prove possible to fabricate, on a remunerative scale, those imperfect varieties known as "bort" and "carbonado," which, being no whit inferior for rock-drilling exigencies to the "serenest" gems from Grao Mogor, command a steady market-price.

A TRUTH SET IN DIAMONDS.

Diamonds are, however, derived not merely from "fiery underground pools," or "electrically heated furnaces," They fall from the sky, as in a rocky mass seen to descend at Novy Urej, in Siberia, in 1886. The reviewer concludes with a reference to the Canon Diablo diamonds, at first held to be aerolites, now found to be earth-horn.

They assure us that in the bowels of the earth, in the electric furnace, and on the unknown bodies disintegrated into meteoric dust, similar conditions have prevailed, or do prevail. Everywhere alike, carbon crystallised out from an intensely hot ferric solution under great pressure. The recipe for diamond-making is the same in the Sirian as in the Solar system. The universe is one, chemically and physically.

MR. A. G. TEMPLE, Director of the Guildhall Art Gallery, supplies some interesting notes on the Turner Exhibition organised by the Corporation, in the Magazine of Art for July. The collection comprises thirty-seven oil-paintings, 1799-1849, eighty-six water-colour drawings, 1790-1845, and etchings, and an effort has been made to arrange them in chronological order that the public may have an opportunity to study the painter's various styles as they succeeded one another.

LORD SALISBURY. A Pencil Sketch of the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary.

T on A port cent west and Turl Ana two MR.

> A scen and grea hori com 0 take polie cont resor of a dem ing a peri the tion

but that hers —fo if w bloc

tha Ros we Ma

Tur

ASIA MINOR, PAST AND FUTURE.

THERE is a very good article in the Edinburgh Review on Asia Minor. It opens with insistence on two important facts too frequently overlooked—that for four centuries Asia Minor was the Roman Empire, after the western half had been overrun by the northern race; and that the same region has practically been the Turkish Empire. The Anatolian peasant and the Anatolian taxes have been the mainstay of the Porte for two centuries.

MR. GLADSTONE RESPONSIBLE FOR THE ARMENIAN MASSACRES!

After remarking upon the beauty and variety of the scenery in which few countries can surpass Asia Minor, and after commenting on its chief defect, the absence of great rivers, the writer deals with the nearer political horizon. He grants that our policy of 1878 has proved a complete and signal failure, but he observes:—

One thing is certain, that the Disraeli policy, whether mis-ken or not, was never given a fair trial. The object of that taken or not, was never given a fair trial. policy was to bring Turkey in Asia completely under British control-to reform its government, to develop its natural resources, and to utilise its armies as a check on the possibility of a Russian advance upon India. It was an ambitious policy, demanding continuous efforts, and involving great risks, implying also most serious obligations. The efforts needed to convert the influence acquired by the Cyprus Convention into a virtual protectorate of Turkey in Asia were not continued long. The peripatetic military consuls, who formed the very keystone of the new policy, and who in a very short time had acquired an enormous influence in the country, were withdrawn by Mr. Gladstone. The only efficient means of fulfilling the obligations incurred by the Convention-viz., the safeguarding of the Armenians, and the introduction of reforms-were thus deliberately taken away. The obligations themselves remained.

-AND LATER RUSSIA.

The guilt of the Armenian massacres lies not at our door, but at the door of Russia. Men who ought to know believe that Russia deliberately encouraged the Sultan in his policy of massacre, aiming thereby at ultimately getting Armenia for herself without the Armenians. And there can be little doubt—for nothing else can explain Lord Rosebery's attitude in the spring of 1895—that Russia deliberately threatened us with war if we should dare to do our duty and coerce the Sultan. The blood-guiltiness is Russia's, but the discredit of it has been all our own.

The writer mentions with respect the opinion of many that, in spite of what both Lord Salisbury and Lord Rosebery said, Russia would not have gone to war had we insisted on a cessation of Armenian massacres. Many of the Turks would have welcomed any action on England's part which would have enabled them to put an end to Abdul Hamid's misgovernment. But, says the reviewer—

Englishmen have learned from their experience in Egypt and elsewhere that if they upset existing authority they become responsible for what is to take its place, and Europe was hardly ready to permit British influences, however admirable our motives, to take in hand the establishment of an improved Turkish Government at Constantinople.

THE HIGHWAY FROM EUROPE TO INDIA.

So much for the past. For the future he argues :-

Sooner or later the Eastern Question will force itself upon us again, and the commercial and political interests of Great Britain in Turkey, or, to speak more correctly, in Asiatic Turkey, are too great for us to allow the question to be entirely decided by others. Sooner or later the highway from Europe to India will lie through Turkey and Persia, and it is impossible for us to regard with indifference the fate of countries capable of such vast development, and likely to be brought into such near political and commercial relations with our great dependency.

BRITISH AND GERMAN AIMS THE SAME.

He considers that the new German policy is perfectly compatible with the interests of this country:—

Stated in its wildest terms, that policy means the strengthening and the commercial development of Turkey. Both these terms imply, as the very conditions of their fulfil-ment, the reform of the Turkish administration. They do not of necessity imply the support of the Sultan's iniquities; in the long run, they cannot imply it. There can be little doubt that, as German industry expands in Turkey, the German Government will be compelled to throw its weight on the side of law and order, and to interest itself in the safety of the peaceful. population. And the more that takes place, the more will the policy of the English and German Governments coincide. Both must desire the moral and material development of Turkey; neither thinks, for the present at any rate, of annexing the Turkish Empire, or any large part of it. Asiatic Turkey lies halfway between Germany and India; its commercial development must benefit both; the German scheme of a railway to the Persian Gulf must largely depend on Indian trade for its success; as a military ally, Asiatic Turkey could be equally useful to India or Germany. Russian annexation would close the door to British and German trade alike. But Germany is not so backward commercially as to depend for its success on a policy of exclusion.

WHAT MAKES THE MARE TO GO.

The reviewer grants that the development of German influence in Asia Minor and Mesopotamia would not be tolerated by Russia unless England supports it. Here is a sentence which might lead John Ruskin to exclaim how thoroughly damned a condition nations must be in of which such words could with truth be written:—

It is in the purely practical and selfish need of the two great industrial Powers, England and Germany, to find a new field for their manufacturers and engineers to conquer, and in the duty of protecting the interests that have already been established—not in treaty obligations, however strict, or in popular sentiment, however strong—that a really effective and continuous motive can be found for reforming the Ottoman Government.

The Wisest International Rivalry.

In what appears to be the last of the valuable series of papers which Mr. H. F. L. Orcutt has contributed to the Engineering Magazine on "Machine Shop Management in Europe and America," he ends with a sort of lay sermon to employers. He has pronounced that America leads the world industrially, but thinks she has not all the elements by which she can retain her industrial supremacy. Division of labour is tending to make the shop hand the slave of the automatic machine and the model shop; and "it is from the mass of workers that most of the American inventions and improvements in machinery have come. He says:—

Both Europeans and Americans are straining every nerve to increase the productivity of their machinery, but there is no competitive strife amongst manufacturers which aims at creating a class of well fed, well clothed, sheltered and educated, and consequently strong and intelligent, operatives. Yet without such, good machinery and useful inventions are impossibilities. It is from the ranks, those who come in daily and hourly contact with the realities of production, that improvements come. The human being, which forms the most important part of amanufacturing establishment, receives too little consideration from the employer. . I believe the nation will advance most rapidly which grapples with these questions first, and combines the study of the welfare of its workers with that of improvements in its mechanical equipment.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY IN BRIEF.

EPITOMISED IN HEINE.

THE Quarterly Review has a brilliant article on the ideals of Heinrich Heine. It is thus the writer sets his theme:—

To understand Heine we must understand the Nineteenth Century transition. He is its epitom:. What is the "modern spirit" about which we talk so much and so glibly? Our century began with apolaustic rationalism; its next phase was a scientific materialism; its last hours are becoming more spiritual. In the political plane Liberalism has corresponded to rationalism, the utilitarian creed to the materialism of science. Democratic ideals are at length tending to pervade of science. Democratic deals are religin tending to pervate the manifold forms of administration. Materialism, and the sentimentality which is materialism's literary offspring, have only been exorcised in its old age. Its struggles towards the light, its return to "nature," its wanton exuberance in emancipa-tion, led it to secularise the holy. It is only just determining, by a leaven of selfless altruism, by cosmopolitan free trade in ideals, by more appreciative intercommunication, to hallow the secular. But throughout the medley of its movements—through the dry utilitarianism of the English school, the metallic hedonism of the French, the dreamy pantheism of the German—the spirit of self-sacrifice, which is the true essence of Christianity, has irradiated it. In no age has there been more comfort and more suffering; in no age has duty prompted comfort to share so much with suffering. The consequence has been a startling sense of contrast—a cleft—which has impressed individuality on thought and feeling. Now, irony is the very humour of contrasts, the electric spark of ideals in concussion with facts. Poetry, like nature, seeks to heal the ruin by garlanding the rift. It was almost inevitable that a great ironic piet should arise to personify the "Weltschmerz" which has all along been groaning and travailing, a weird minor of dirgeaccompaniment to the paeans of liberation and invention still ringing in our ears. Conflict and contrast are the recruiting sergeants of our age. Art and philosophy may no longer be dandled as hallowed playthings; genius must subserve life; there is no escape from conscription in the cause of humanity.

ITS TWO COLOSSAL EGOISMS.

In the early part of this century two colossal egoisms were constraining Europe: the one that of Goethe, the other that of Napoleon. We have purposely ranked Goethe first, because his influence has proved more permanent. The full drift of Goethe's personality has been misappreciated in this country, owing to the blue spectacles of cur own near-sighted Carlyle. . . To realise one's highest capacities was his gosyle. Napoleon's egoism was of an opposite order: it was egotism as distinguished from egoism. . . Napoleon discarded the bygone. He shot through the globe like a pitiless meteor, dealing destruction, his eyes riveted on the future. . . The Bastille of Europe was overthrown. Out rushed the ideas. . . . Among the ideas that thus exultant bounded into the free air—was Heinrich Heine.

THE GOAL OF HEINE'S PILGRIMAGE.

Heine's passion was Freedom. Not the mechanical equality of the French Revolution, nor Byron's idolatry of personal and national independence, but an inward, a spiritual freedom. There was "the passive freedom of Goethe" over against "the active slavery of the Romantics." "Heine set himself to make freedom active," but "he was impetuous and insurgent." He lacked that "divine conversion of the will "which Amiel makes the claim of Christianity. He became "a tiger of Bacchus." But this is Heine's own later confession:

Yes! I have returned to God like the prodigal son after my long swineherdship among the Hegelians. Is it misery that sends me hom? Perhaps a less miserable reason. A heavenly home-sickness overtook me, and urged me on through gorge and forest over the dizziest peaks of Dialectic. On my way I found the God of the Pantheists, but he was of no avail. This poor dreamy being is cramped into the web and growth of the world—the world's prisoner. He gapes on you without will or power. To have a will one needs personality, and free elbowroom is indispensable for its manifestation.

On which the reviewer remarks :-

Yes! "God is all, but all is not God." This formula of his glowing youth he had at length learned to interpret. But the "new birth," "the conversion of the will," this he could not learn. His genius hovers in a borderland between the spiritual and the sensuous. If his body could not emancipate itself from the spirit, neither could his spirit entirely renounce the body. This borderland, which sheds such a charm over his every word, is the region with which we set out—the domain of ideas.

The poet's patriotism and family affection are warmly vindicated by the writer.

"The Three Finest Comic Characters."

Who are "the three finest comic characters" in all literature? That is a bold question to raise. But it is raised in Gentleman's by Mr. J. B. Hadley. And this is his answer:—

If I were asked to name the three finest comic characters that human genius has yet familiarised to the imagination of mankind, I should unhesitatingly select "Sir John Falstaff," "Don Quixote," and "My Uncle Toby"; and though the decision of such a question must be, to some extent, a matter of individual taste and predilection, I think few competent judges would be found to cavil at my selection. Some, perhaps, would be inclined to advance the claims of "Sir Roger de Coverley" and "Parson Adams," or to "hark, back" to Gargantua and Pantagruel and the earlier Rabelaisian humour . . . But, for me at least, the trio I have named will always stand pre-eminent, forming, as it were, the upper hierarchy of the Comic Immortals.

So he heads his paper "The Comic Immortals: a Comparison and a Contrast." The antitheses suggested are innumerable. Here are a few:—

Sir John Falstaff and Don Quixote equally excite our mirth, but the former is not only the cause of wit in others-he is witty himself and relishes a joke. Whereas the latter never smiles. Nothing but his wit and good-humour save the English knight from absolute contempt, and nothing saves the Spaniard but his virtue and valour. We as often laugh with Falstaff as at him, but Quixote never shares the joke. He gives it up to us entirely. But though there is more wit than humour in Falstaff, and no wit and infinite humour in the character of the lean Knight of La Mancha, it would not be right to say that Shakespeare's creation excels in wit alone. A higher compliment cannot possibly be paid to the fine genius of Sterne than to associate My Uncle Toby with Falstaff and Don Quixote. It would be prepostercus overpraise to compare Sterne as a man of genius with Shakespeare and Cervanies; but the single character of My Uncle Toby would not have been unworthy of any comic writer the world has yet produced. But, exquisite as is the hum ur displayed in the delineation of my Uncle Toby's character, it is not the point of the picture that is the most precious. It is his unaffected goodness of nature that leaves the strongest impression on the mind amidst all his amusing eccen ricities.

MR. SAMUEL HARDEN CHURCH contributes "a Tricentenary Study" of Cromwell to the Allantic Monthly for April, and joins issue with Dr. Gardiner—whose eminence he cordially acknowledges—on two points. The massacre at Drogheda he cannot reprobate as Dr. Gardiner reprobates it. It was in accord with the spirit of the times. Cromwell only did "what every other English commander who has fought in foreign wars since his time has done in greater or less degree." Dr. Gardiner contends that "Cromwell was not a constructive statesman, but only a destructive force." Mr. Church rejoins that Cromwell "was the most constructive of all the statesmen that England has producest."

. ...

I

inte

Pec

eig

hov

nol

Ga

wa

cas

Lo

the

tha

giv

stu

aff

wo Ar

an

as wi

Ellig

he

pa Gi

hi

SO

bu

to

no

m

ne

m

re al m th

w

n

b

fa

A SPANISH POET AND NOVELIST.

In Nordisk Tidskrift (No. 3) Adolf Hillman gites the interesting life-story of the Spanish poet and novelist, Pedro Antonio de Alarcon, who died at Madrid some eight years ago, after a stormy and eventful career, which, however, was not destitute of the success and triumph to which his genius entitled him. He was born of noble family in the little town of Guadix in Granada. Gaudix was at that time in an impoverished state, but was nevertheless in possession of a cathedral, an Arabian castle, a river, gardens, fertile fields and olive-yards, a Lower Court, two monuments from the Roman time. and a Phoenician relief. "The cathedral, however, was the one relic of its former greatness, and it was here" that Alarcon received his first impression of art, of architecture and painting, of music and poetry. He was given a preliminary schooling and sent to Granada to study law. His parents, however, being too poor to afford the costly examination, and believing that they would see him a bishop at least, it was decided that Antonio should become a priest.

MAGAZINE EDITOR AND JOURNALIST.

Antonio, however, had little taste for such a career, and, after a hard struggle between filial duty and his own aspirations, fled from his home to Cadiz. Here, together with the novelist Tarrago, he founded a literary review, El Eco de Occidente, where his first poems saw the light of day. The review was successful enough, but Alarcon's heart was set on Madrid, and to Madrid he went with a baggage composed chiefly of MSS. and ambitious hopes. Later, these rosy hopes paling as his purse became emptier, he returned to Granada, and, with the consent of his parents, continued his review. El Eco de Occidente. He here joined a society of smart littérateurs and artists called La Cuerda, but his own magazine and the work of this club appears to have been insufficient for Alarcon's energy. He was now on fire with a longing to join the revolutionary movement, and to this end published La Rendención, a newspaper which made fierce attacks on priesthood and militarism. Obtaining little support, he wearied and returned to Madrid. La Cuerda moved thither also, altered its name to Colonia Granadina, and took for its motto "Sin un Cuarto!" ("Without a farthing!") From the garret, on the door of which this significant motto was with cheery defiance emblazoned, the gay Bohemians showered over the capital prose, poetry, songs, sketches, novels, and anecdotes, all of which were eagerly devoured by the cultured Madrid society, and made the authors famous and popular, but by no means rich. They were still sin un cuarto. More often than not they starved, and, when they had money, they flung it about with oriental contempt. It was a Bohemian life founded on the programme of George Sand.

A SOLDIER CRITIC.

It was a troubled time for Spain. The iron hand of Narváez had saved her from any severer shock, but mischief was in the air, and young lungs drank it in. Isabella's popularity was in its decline, and the downfall of the dynasty was aimed at, though not accomplished until fifteen years later. Alarcon was offered the editorship of a lampoonish paper, entitled El Látigo (The Whip), which became the model of Rochefort's La Lanterne. This paper was under the protection of several influential persons, and had for its aim the dethronement of Isabella. Alarcon was only twenty-one, of fiery Andalusian blood, of adventurous temperament and-sin un cuarto. He accepted to his cost the perilous position, was deserted in his direst need by his newspaper accomplices, who washed their hands of the whole affair, and was glad, indeed, to withdraw from politics and betake himself to Segovia, there to give himself wholly to literature. He became a popular novelist and a stern, much-feared dramatic critic, the salons of the aristocracy being everywhere open to him. Suddenly, however, he vanished from the pomp and glitter. He had joined the Spanish army as a simple soldier in the war against Morocco. He fought gallantly, and was rewarded with a medal for bravery, the order of knighthood, and a small pension. Later, he published his battle experiences. In the revolution of September, 1866, he was banished, having once more meddled with politics, and spent his exile in Paris. In 1869 he was made Spanish Minister at Stockholm, but did not accept the post, preferring to remain in his own country. In 1865 he married Paulina Contreras y Reyes, a beautiful woman, and the hot-blooded student, Bohemian littérateur, soldier, and man of the world became a most exemplary husband and father. He was a prolific writer and possessed a fascinating style.

WHEN DOES THE NINETEENTH CENTURY END?

THE question whether the twentieth century begins on January 1st, 1900, or on January 1st, 1901, is already a much-debated one. A writer in the Irish Monthly for April disposes of the difficulty as follows:

Many writers seem to think that we are getting through the last year of the century; but surely the year wrong. The first century of the Christian Era, like every other since, did not consist of ninety-nine years, but of a hundred, and was not completed till December 31st, A.D. 100; and, therefore, January, A.D. 101, was the first month of the second century; for, as far as the present question is concerned, we may suppose the year to have always begun as it begins now. And so for every century since then; and 1899 is not the last year of the nin-teenth century—not the ultimate but the penultimate, pene ultimass, almost the last, the last but one. Nearly two years still between us and the twentieth century—too long for some of us to wait.

A month or two ago the question was taken up by Dr. Monro Gibson in the Free Church Chronicle. By the aid of a series of diagrams he sought to prove that the century would close with the year 1899. According to his reckoning the dating through the first year after the birth of Christ is by fractions of a year, and the first year of the new century is dated 1900. At the end of 1899 we seem to need another year to complete the nineteenth century: but it is not so, for we had our first year in the shape of twelve months before we began to reckon years. The dating of the first year being by months only, the second year in dating is the year 1, and the 1900th year is the year 1899. To put it another way, a man may say he is in his hundredth year as soon as he has completed his ninety-ninth year.

In the number issued in April of the Allgemeine Konservative Monatsschrift the whole question of the year of the birth of Christ is gone into in a very learned manner. The writer discusses in considerable detail the Ecclesiastical Calendar which dated the year from the Easter full moon, and draws attention to the various errors and changes in the different cal-ndars—Ecclesiastical, Roman, Astronomical, etc. He, too, decides finally that the new century begins on January 1st, 1900.

EVOLUTION AND THE MYSTERY OF EVIL.

MR. JOHN FISKE, who has been called "the American Herbert Spencer—with a difference," contributes to the Atlantic Monthly for April an essay on "The Mystery of Evil." He holds that "the Calvinist is much more nearly in accord with our modern knowledge than are Plato and Mill." The advance of modern science, he says, "carries us irresistibly to what some German philosophers call Monism, but I prefer to call it Mono-

In getting rid of the Devil, and regarding the universe as the multiform manifestation of a single all-pervading Deity, we become for the first time pure and uncompromising monotheists,-believers in the ever-living, unchangeable, and allwise Heavenly Father, in whom we may declare our trust without the faintest trace of mental reservation.

A NECESSITY OF CONSCIOUSNESS.

Mr. Fiske then plunges into the depths of psychology, and argues that consciousness, the bed-rock of all our knowledge, is only possible through difference :-

That ceaseless flutter, in which the quintessence of conscious life consists, is kept up by the perpetual introduction of the relations of likeness and unlikeness. . . . It is an undeniable fact that we cannot know anything whatever except as contrasted with something else. . . . In just the same way, it follows that without knowing that which is morally evil we could not possibly recognise that which is morally good. . . . In a happy world there must be sorrow and pain, and in a moral world the knowledge of evil is indispensable. . . . God is the creator of evil, and from the eternal scheme of things diabolism is for ever excluded.

WHERE NATURAL SELECTION CANNOT WORK.

From these more familiar regions Mr. Fiske passes into the realm of biology. He thus illustrates the genesis

If an individual antelope falls below the average of the herd ... speed, he is sure to become food for lions; and thus the high average of speed in the herd is maintained by natural selection. But if an individual man becomes a drunkard, though his capabilities be ever so much curtailed by this vice, yet the variety of human faculty furnishes so many hooks with which to keep one's hold upon life that he may sin long and flagrantly without perishing; and if the drunkard survives, the action of natural selection in weeding out drunkenness is checked. There is thus a wide interval between the highest and lowest degrees of completeness in living that are compatible with maintenance

Now it is because of this interval that men can be distinguished as morally bad or morally good.

THE FUNCTION OF CONSCIENCE.

Morality comes upon the scene when there is an alternative offered of leading better lives or worse lives. And just as up to this point the actions of the forefathers of mankind have been determined by the pursuit of pleasure and avoidance of pain, so now they begin to be practically determined by the pursuit of goodness and avoidance of evil. This rise from a bestial to a moral plane of existence involves the acquirement of the know-ledge of good and evil. Conscience is generated to play a part analogous to that played by the sense of pain in the lower stages of life, and to keep us from wrong-doing.

THE FUNCTION OF RELIGION.

To the mere love of life, which is the conservative force that keeps the whole animal world in existence, there now comes gradually to be superadded the feeling of religious aspiration, which is nothing more nor less than the yearning after the highest possible completeness of spiritual life. In the lower stages of human development this religious aspiration has as yet but an embryonic existence, and moral obligations are still but imperfectly recognised. It is only after long ages of social discipline, fraught with cruel afflictions and grinding mis-ry, that the moral law becomes dominant and religious aspiration intense and abiding in the soul. When such a stage is reached,

we have at last in man a creature different in kind from his predecessors, and fit for an everlasting life of progress, for a closer and closer communion with God in beatitude that shall endure.

EVIL-WHAT IT IS, AND WILL BE.

As we survey the course of this wonderful evolution, it begins to become manifest that moral evil is simply the characteristic of the lower state of living as looked at from the higher state. Its existence is purely relative, yet it is profoundly real. In the process of spiritual evolution evil must needs be present. But the nature of evolution also requires that it should be evanescent. In the higher stages, that which is worse than the best need no longer be positively bad. From the general analogies furnished in the process of evolution, we are entitled to hope that, as it approaches its goal and man comes nearer to God, the fact of evil will lapse into a mere memory, in which the shadowed past shall serve as a background for the realised glory of the present. Many are the pains of life, and the struggle with wickedness is hard; its course is marked with sorrow and tears. But assuredly its deep impress upon the human soul is the indispensable background against which shall or set hereafter the eternal joys of heaven!

IS LAPLACE'S NEBULAR THEORY UPSET?

"THE Solar System in the Light of Recent Discoveries" is the heading of a paper by Mr. T. J. J. See in the "the law of temperature," as he calls it, which was fore-shadowed by Helmholtz in 1854, by Lane in 1869, and by Ritter in 1881, but discovered by Mr. See in 1898. It relates solely to gaseous bodies, and describes a feature of their contraction under gravitation. It runs: "The increase in the total amount of heat generated by the mass in condensing from infinite expansion varies inversely as the square of the radius."

From this consideration, it was plain that the production of heat would become a maximum when the radius had attained the smallest value consistent with the laws of gaseous constitution. . . . After the star has attained a certain very great density, it ceases to act as a gas, becomes liquid or solid, and the law of temperature thenceforth ceases to hold true.

But with gases, "when the radius is infinite the temperature is zero, and when the radius is zero the temperature is infinite." In the case of the diffused nebulæ, the radius is taken to be infinite, and the temperature is near the absolute zero, 273° C. "We may therefore suppose the diffused and irregular nebulæ, as well as the milky nebulosity so abundantly scattered over the sky, to be intensely cold."

Laplace, on the other hand, "assumed that our system originated from the condensation of a fiery nebula of immense extent which at one time stretched beyond the orbit of the outermost planet. This nebula was supposed to be a gaseous mass, heated to a high temperature." continuous cooling, zone after zone of heated vapour was thrown off, and condensed into planets. The future of the sun is thus foretold :-

The secular shrinkage of the sun's radius will cause a steady rise in its temperature, and when the body has reached the stage of Sirius, where the temperature is perhaps doubled, the light emitted will become intensely blue. The temperature may be expected to go on rising till a small radius is attained, and finally, when the dense mass, intensely hot, becomes incapable of further shrinkage, on account of increase in the molecular forces resisting condensation, a cooling will gradually ensue, after which the body will liquefy, and then rapidly decline in splendour. The sun will thenceforth be wrapped in everlasting darkness, and the chill of death will overtake the planetary

But when the sun's temperature is still rising the decrease of its disk will diminish the heat received from it by the earth.

of s con Mo Mit the wei of I Gre col the the sin

I

Lor

kno

dis pri Mi tic the tia

U

wi

D

M pe de fir M

of ar tw W to a ec

di w h d th tr

tv

0 h tl m CI

d

tl

THE MYSTERIES OF MITHRA.

IMPERIAL Rome presents a curious analogy to the London of our day in that it became the receptacle of all known religions, the centre to which flowed every variety of strange beliefs, rituals, and superstitions. M. Gasquet contributes to the first April number of the Revue des Deux Mondes a paper on the worship and the mysteries of Mithra, which formerly exercised so much influence in the Imperial City. Under the Empire the old beliefs were dying, and the moment was ripe for the propaganda of new deities. The people were not attracted either by Greek philosophy or by the political cultus of the person of Augustus. They demanded something more full of colour, symbolism, and spiritual consolation. Thus was the ground prepared for the religions which came from the East. Judaism enjoyed a fleeting popularity, but the simplicity of its dogma and the purity of its ethics repelled the populace, while the worship of Cybele was discredited by the charlatanism and immorality of its priests. There remained the two religions of Isis and of Mithra, which continued to exist even to the fifth century of the Christian era. Of the two, that of Isis was practically absorbed by the cult of Mithra, and at one moment there seemed to be a question whether it would be Christianity or Mithriacism which would be adopted by Europe.

CHRISTIANITY A MITHRAIC HERESY!

It may well be asked what was this Mithraic religion. Unfortunately, none of the special treatises which dealt with it have come down to us except in fragments, and other sources of information are equally incomplete. M. Dupuis formed the extraordinary notion that Christianity was a branch of Mithriacism—a sort of Mithraic heresy. More recently Professor Cumont has endeavoured to penetrate the mysteries of Mithraic doctrine.

What then are the origins of Mithriacism? The Romans appear to have regarded it indifferently as derived from Persian or Chaldean sources. Certainly we find the bull of Zoroastrian legend, which may very likely be also related to the astronomical bull of Babylon. Moreover, on Mithraic monuments we find the dog, the crow and the serpent of the Avesta, and the twelve signs of the Zodiac, which recall the religions of Nineveh and of Chaldea. The reader of Milton is familiar with the two great principles of good and evil, represented by Ormuzd and Ahriman respectively. Surrounding Ormuzd are twenty-eight Izeds representing the elements of fire, air, water, etc., and Mithra is one of these Izeds. He belongs to the oldest Aryan mythology, and appears to have been a direct creation by Ormuzd, who places him on an equality with himself. He is at once the dawn and the twilight. Lord of the vast pasturages of Heaven, he distributes richness and fertility. He wages perpetual warfare with the darkness and the works of darkness. He has 10,000 eyes and 10,000 ears, so that nothing that is done on earth escapes him, and he knows the most secret thoughts. His special aversion is lying; he is the god of truth, presiding over contracts and the pledged word of men. He presides also over social relations and over those ties which assure the stability of the domestic hearth. Still more interesting is his position as the friend and the consoler of mankind; he is the mediator between men, and between the creature and its creator. After death it is he who assists the souls of the departed to pass the fatal bridge, and it is he who weighs their actions in the scales of justice; in fact, he is the triple divinity of heaven, of earth, and of death. The conception of such a divinity is undeniably a lofty one, and in some respects affords a remarkable anticipation of the Christian conception of the Messiah. The worship of Mithra spread first to Phrygia, then to the shores of the Mediterranean, and so to Rome.

ASTRONOMY AND RELIGION.

What, it will be asked, were the so-called mysteries o. the worship of Mithra? Briefly, they were designed to explain this present life of mankind, to calm the fear of death, and to free humanity from future doom by a purification from sin. The ritual of Mithra was largely astronomical, and the heavenly bodies were conceived of as exercising a direct influence on human destiny. Thus, the divine essence of the soul falls into materialism and forgetfulness of the eternal light by a gradual process, which is often represented by a figure of a staircase with seven stopping-places, where are found open doors. These doors are the planets, each of which in turn endows the soul with the faculties necessary for earthly existence. The soul goes up the staircase again, and at each point it sheds a portion of material element, and arrives at the top in a purely spiritual condition. It is impossible to follow M. Gasquet through every section of his long and learned article. Enough to add that Mithriacism owed its success to two principal causes. In the first place, it purified paganism by presenting a religion of a single god; secondly, it furnished an active and practical moral code, it stood on the whole for good against evil, for light against darkness, and yet it did not encourage asceticism or withdrawal from the things of the world, for it taught that life is the means which God has given us in order to earn the rewards of eternity.

THE END OF MITHRIACISM.

This creed, though it was still flourishing at the end of the fourth century, had become but a memory by the middle of the fifth. It was swallowed up whole in the shipwreck of paganism, though traces of it are to be found in the beliefs of various obscure Christian sects, and in the astrological speculations of the scholastic theologians. It may be said to have failed partly because its tendency was too individualistic. It inculcated the necessity for personal holiness, but it did not inculcate the great Christian law "Love thy neighbour as thyself." The religion of Mithra limited the law of love to the members of its own faith, whereas Christianity made the application of that law universal. The religion of Mithra was, however, absolutely unique amid all the religions of antiquity in excluding women from its mysteries. Thus, though Mithriacism was well advised in breaking with the sensualities of Assyria and Babylon, yet it erred in rejecting not the least noble heritage of paganism—the conception of the majesty of maternity. Christianity, in its triumph over the religion of Mithra, was strong enough to adopt some of the practices of that creed in minor details; thus we celebrate the anniversary of the Nativity on December 25th, which was the day of the Natalitia of Mithra.

THE Girl's Realm is doing good work in encouraging its readers to a study of Ruskin. It has just awarded its Ruskin prize for the best essay on "Ruskin's Ideal of Girlhood." To Society girls it offers high precedent for this study. For in a sketch by "Sybil" of Princess Alice of Albany, the writer says:—

I have no doubt that Princess Alice has many times been held in the arms of John Ruskin, for he was an intimate friend of her father, and occasionally visited at Claremont, and his teaching was much valued both by the Duke and Duchess of Albany. His "Sesame and Lilies" was one of the first books which was placed in the hands of Princess Alice when she was old enough to understand it.

When Society women are reared on Ruskin, what may we expect Society to become?

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE AMERICAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE July number opens with anticipations of the issues to be fought out in the presidential election next year. Dr. Shaw reports the Republican party to be very compact, while their opponents are "still very much at sea." He suggests that the best strategy for the Democrats would be to drop the project of free silver coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1, and to demand the repeal of any protective duties which have created or pampered "trusts."

35,000 COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS OUSTED!

The rapid formation of great "trusts" has, among other upsetting results, seriously affected commercial travellers. Dr. Shaw says:—

Under the old system it was indispensable to keep on the road an army of American commercial travellers, taken as a body, are a most creditable factor in our national life and citizen-ship. Mr. P. E. Dowe, president of the Commercial Travellers' National League, testified before the Industrial Commission at Washington on June 16th that not less than 35,000 commercial travellers would be thrown out of employment as the result of the American trust movement up to date. This, he explained, would mean a loss to the men of $60,000,000 a year in salaries. An almost equal amount, he further explained, would be lost to the railroads and hotels of the country by the disappearance of all these commercial travellers from their accustomed routes and stoppingplaces. Mr. Dowe might also have mentioned the fact that the livery stable business as well as the hotels will suffer to the extent of many millions a year in the West and South

That this immense saving can be effected without lessening the consumption is a proof of the fearfully wasteful methods of the competitive system, which is not likely to be lost upon the world. At present, as Dr. Shaw points out, the saving swells the profits of the monopoly, and does not reduce the price to the consumer. He asks that these benefits should be shared with the community. He anticipates that "in some industries, without a doubt, there will soon appear the international trust, controlling the whole planet as respects a particular line of production."

SELF-GOVERNING CAPACITY OF THE FILIPINOS

Among the special articles attention falls to be given to "Phases of the Philippine Situation," by Mr. John Barrett, late United States Minister to Siam. He reports very favourably of the self-governing powers at present displayed by the Filipinos. He savs:—

The government which was organised by Aguinaldo at Cavite, and continued first at Bakor and later at Malolos, developed into a much more elaborate affair than its most ardent supporters had originally expected. By the middle of October, 1898, he had assembled at Malolos a congress of one hundred men who would compare in behaviour, manner, dress, and education with the average men of the better classes of other Asiatic nations, possibly including the Japanese. These men, whose sessions I repeatedly attended, conducted themselves with great decorum, and showed a knowledge of debate and parliamentary law that would not compare unfavourably with the Japanese Parliament. The executive portion of the government was made up of a ministry of bright men who seemed to understand their respective positions.

The army, however, of Aguinaldo was the marvel of his achievements. had over twenty regiments of comparatively wellorganised, well-drilled, and well-dressed soldiers, carrying modern rifles and ammunition. I saw many of thes: regiments executing not only regimental, but battalion and company drill with a precision that astonished me. Certainly as far as dress was concerned the comparison with the uniform of our soldiers was favourable to the Filipinos. They were officered largely, except in the higher positions, with young men who were ambitious to win honors and were not merely show fighters.

In the government which the United States will finally set up, Mr. Barrett would give the Filipinos a greater share than is generally suggested. He says :-

This fighting may have rather proved that they have an executive capacity, a power of organisation, and a persistency of effort for which otherwise we would probably never have given them credit.

OTHER ARTICLES.

M. Pierre de Coubertin writes on modern history and historians in France. He hails M. Taine as the founder of the modern scientific school. Before him "art was everywhere, science nowhere." Thiers, Lamartine, Chateaubriand, Renan, and Lavisse wrote history not as in was, but as they wished at to be. M. Taine brought the new principle—the writer does

ROSA BONHEUR.

not by M South reade copio Knau

TH New now press are v of ca excite appre greate obser certifi itself. world kinds their the fi Engla great

"Auto
At 1
cars in
By Jar risen style 1
Master
not be,
The F service
Januar mission
has ex.
No

this kin men re and the Fron to trai compan employ

the im

Abs shortly is exp

THI

"A M quoted Mr. P. "Mod have hand fa time t "containdige ingly in by H. C. the Date of the not hesitate to say—from Germany. A travel paper, by Mr. G. W. James, sketches scenery and life in "Our South-West," where Spain once ruled. What strikes the reader at once in glancing through the number is the copiously illustrated sketch of Rosa Bonheur, by Ernest Knaufft.

THE AUSTRALASIAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE May number is all alive with anticipations of the New South Wales referendum on June 20th, which we now know decided in favour of Federation. There are pressing messages from Mr. Reid and Mr. Barton; there are vigorous editorial appeals; and there are all kinds of cartoons on the subject. General Booth's departure excites attention. A full-page portrait is given of the General, and Mr. Bramwell Booth adds an appreciation of his father. He says the General's greatest power lies in his sympathy. He shrewdly observes that "the Church Army is perhaps a greater certificate to his sagacity than the Salvation Army itself. The attitude of a large part of the religious world has been totally changed towards efforts of all kinds for Christianising the people and for ameliorating their social miseries." The enthusiasm expressed over the first match played by the Australian cricketers in England makes one wonder what kind of ecstasy their great victory of June 17th will have called forth.

The Automatic Coupler in America.

Cassier's for June has an article by Mr. H. G. Prout on "Automatic Couplers for Goods Trains." He says:—

At the end of June, 1889, about six per cent, of the freight cars in the United States were equipped with automatic couplers. By January 1st, 1899, the proportion of cars so equipped had risen to 77 per cent. These couplers are all of the general style known first as the Janney type, and now usually called the Master Car Builders' coupler. This quick development . . . did not begin with legislation, but it has probably been accelerated. . . . The Federal Act of 1893 provided that cars running in interstate service must be equipped with automatic couplers before January 1; 1898, but gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to extend the time for cause, and the commission has extended the time until January 1, 1600.

has extended the time until January 1, 1900.

No class of men in the community felt so keenly and seriously the importance of saving railroad employees from accidents of this kind as did the officers of the railroads themselves. These men realised, as nobody else could, the suffering among the min and their families, and the pecuniary loss to the railroads.

From the latest statistics . . . it appears that the accidents to train hands in coupling have decreased 50.6 per cent, as compared with 1893. But in the same time all accidents to employees fell off 37.9 per cent.

Absence of uniformity and efficiency in couplers will shortly be removed, when a greater reduction of accidents is expected.

THE Pall Mall Magazine for July is chiefly distinguished for its opening photogravure of Rembrandt's "A Man in Armour," and Lord Charles Beresford's paper, quoted elsewhere, on "The Anglo-American Entente." Mr. Peter B. Wight supplies a well illustrated article on "Modern Architecture in Chicago," which he declares to have been "less influenced by foreign schools and the fads and fashions that have prevailed in the United States from time to time, than that of any other American city," to "contain elements of originality." The only approach to an indigenous architecture is found in its homes. The seemingly inevitable—article on wireless telegraphy is furnished by H.C. Marillier. Mr. W. E. Henley revels in criticism of the Daily Telegraph's list of the "Hundred Best-Novels."

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THE chief distinction of the July number is Mr. Henry Cust's fine essay on "The Genesis of Germany," which, with several other articles, asks for separate treatment. The contents generally leave a vivid impression of their actuality.

THE PARISIAN BEDLAM.

"The Civil War in France" is the title taken by Admiral Maxse for his paper from François Coppée's anti-Dreyfus utterance since the judgment of the Cour de Cassation. It is a gruesome picture that is presented. The writer says:—

The other day in Paris a Frenchman of some distinction, who has been a Senator and Deputy said to a friend of mine, "I believe Dreyfus is innocent, but he ought to be found guilty by the Rennes court-martial. If I were one of the judges, I should condemn him!"

A somewhat famous newspaper correspondent said to meduring a recent visit to Paris while talking of the condition of France: "I feel sometimes as if I were living in a mad-house, so inexplicable to-me is the common reasoning on this affair; or, if I am listening to sane people, whether I ought not to be shut up as out of my senses."

The perverted sentiment, of which I have given some specimens, is of course fashionable.

THE DECAY OF ALGIERS.

"A Study in Jew Baiting" is supplied by Mr. F. C. Conybeare from the horrors perpetrated by anti-Semitic mobs in Algiers in January, 1898. He says:—

The decay of the French population nowhere produces more disastrous consequences than in Algeria, where the Italian, Maltese and Spanish element is rapidly getting the better of the French. As has already been pointed out, nearly seventeen thousand of these foreigners have acquired full citizenship in the last ten years alone. They are ignorant, dirty, superstitious, and hopelessly enslaved by their priests. French traditions and aspirations are alien to them, and they will not learn the French language and history in their schools. The few immigrants from France who settle among them are assimilated by, instead of assimilating, them. It is they who are responsible for the disgraceful scenes of pillage and cruelty which have disgraced Algiers and other colonial centres.

HUMOUR VERSUS VANITY.

Mr. Leslie Stephen takes Southey's letters as a theme for his biographical study. He refers to the poet's egregiously high opinion of himself and expectation of fame. Mr. Stephens says:—

A man could hardly take himself so seriously who had any very strong sense of humour. But a sense of humour is hard to reconcile with some cardinal virtues. The true humourist sees that the world is a tragi-comedy, a Vanity Fair, in which enthusiasm is out of place. Southey, with a sense of humour, would have been alive to his own smallness in the general system of things; he would have perceived that even a Quarterly Reviewer cannot make the great current flow backwards, and that a drudging journalist had no right to drape himself in the robes of a prophet.

CANON BARNETT, writing in the Sunday Magazine on the Poor Law and the children, urges that the Poor Law should at once hand over the children to the education authorities for differential training. He tells this striking story:—

In a German town, during the Franco-German war, a large orphanage was required to hous; som; wounded soldiers. At once families in the neighbourhood offered to take the orphans and leave the building free. When the war was over and it was proposed to replace the children no one was willing to give them up; and ever since it has been recognised that the better and the Christian way is that of adopting orphans in families.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THERE is much solid and appetizing fare in the July number. Distinctly the lightest article is Mr. Herbert Paul's on the Conservatism of President Kruger, noticed elsewhere. Separate treatment is also required for Dr. Barry's plea for virtually Americanizing the papacy, for Ritortus' discovery that the whole world belongs to British capital, and for Professor Dowden's stately paper on Puritanism in English literature.

WHAT IS CANCER?

The cancer problem is discussed by Dr. Woods utchinson. He describes cancer as "treason in the Hutchinson. republic of the body," as "a rebellion of the cells." finds the conclusion to be irresistible that "a cancer is a gland turned parasite, growing and spreading at the expense of the rest of the body." "The whole process from start to finish is simply a repetition of the earlier stages of gland formation in embryonic life." It is "a health process gone wrong." The writer rejects the theories that it is due to local irritation (blow, chafe, bruise, etc.), or to parasites. Rather he traces it to disturbances of balance within the organism itself. It appears with the advent of incipient senility; and in organs that are in process of atrophy. The gland-cells, though losing their functions and income, "have still strength to inaugurate a rebellion." The writer, while quoting a high authority to the effect that the apparent increase in cancer is statistical rather than real, reports a concurrence of expert opinion that cancer is slowly increasing-thanks chiefly to the larger number of people whom modern improvements keep alive to the cancer age. Yet it is emphatically a local disease and curable by early surgical operation in 80 per cent. of

MEN OF GENIUS AND COLLEGE TRAINING.

Mr. Frederic Harrison, in the study of Lamb and Keats, which he delivered at the opening of Edmonton Free Library, refuses to either author a place in the foremost rank of writers, but grants to each the possession of "a rare unique fascinating gift of his own." He lays stress on this fact in both:—

Here are two of our brightest men of genius, one a writer of exquisite prose, the other a poet endowed with the luscious note of a nightingale. Vet both were wholly bereft of any education of the official and academic sort. They gave themselves the whole of the education they had, with scant leisure, meagre resources, cruel hindrances. How few indeed of our famous writers in prose or verse, even our men of learning or of science, owe their success to the conventional school and college curriculum! Not Shakespeare, certainly, nor Marlowe, nor Pope, nor Shelley, nor Byron, nor Burns, nor Scott. All of these made themselves, formed their own minds, their own ideals and form. And so, too, did Swift and Defoe, Goldsmith and Gibbon, Mill and Grote, Spencer and Darwin. Milton, Gray and Johnson are the few examples of those who received complete academic training, and even they gave themselves the best part of their own education. You, too, may give yourselves your own education! Nay, you must do so!

Mr. Harrison fears that our popular education, while teaching millions "the art of correct correspondence, quick arithmetic, and some popular statistics of a remunerative sort," really "deadens originality of mind, vulgarises form, dulls the desire for literature, and would cramp genius, if it ever could seize the chance."

THE APPROACHING FIGHT WITH THE DRINK TRADE.

Canon Hicks welcomes Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell's book on the Temperance Question, objects to its onslaught on prohibition, thinks his temperance friends would not advocate but might accept the author's scheme of municipal management, and fears the brewer capturing town councils. He anticipates shortly "another tremendous struggle with the liquor traffic." He concludes:—

We need not trouble ourselves overmuch about detailed schemes, nor be too anxious about ultimate plans of temperance reform. The great struggle will be at the outset, and it will be fought on "Compensation." The "Trade" will bitterly resent the claim of the public to deal with it at discretion; it will plead imaginary vested interests, it will appeal ad misericordiam, it will exhaust every artifice of intrigue, every mode of misrepresentation, every power of obstruction. But it will be beaten hopelessly, and that first victory will nerve reformers of all shades to further efforts.

DANE V. TEUTON.

George Brandes takes occasion from the Sleswick troubles to deny the Prussian charge that Danish culture is but a "mock sun" of the German. He writes eloquently and forcibly in proof of the independent intellectual life of Denmark. He maintains that Danish literature has aided the development of the German. He finds the strength of the Danish style in its cheerfulness. He traces, by the bye, the tendency to irony and satire in Danish literature to its modern founder, who was a comic dramatist. He claims that "the best public" has a finer sense of art and letters in Copenhagen than in Berlin. As a sign of the general diffusion of culture in Denmark, he cites the yearly circulation of eighty thousand subscribers possessed by the scientific journal the Frem.

A NEW WORLD SWITZERLAND.

Dr. Antonio G. Perez puts in a sanguine plea for "the independence of Cuba." Americans will, it is to be feared, feel his case to be stronger in rhetoric than argument. He extols, for example, the strategic importance of Cuba,—its command of the Panama or Nicaraguan canal,—and then declares that a Cuban Republic would be a guarantee of peace in the New World. He does not seem to see that the attractions he puts so eloquently would form too tempting a bait for any great sea-power to withstand in times of emergency. This is his picture of the future:—

As Cuban ports will be open to the commerce of the whole world, in time the luxuriantly lovely island with its tropical scenery, as yet little known, may perhaps come to hold the place in America that Switzerland does in Europe—viz., that of an ideal resort for tourists, and a refuge for the oppressed of every clime.

He bitterly resents the suggestion of Cuba being made a dumping ground for negro fugitives from the United States. He asserts that "the native Cubans are, we may say, almost unanimously in favour of a Republic."

THE REAL HOPE OF THE PAPACY.

c

ai si

n

in

in

de

to fr

as

to

ar

T

th

to

m

"A Modern Catholic" replies to "Voces Catholicæ," who contended in a previous number that a Catholic University was not possible. He declares both Washington and Freiburg Universities to be free and flourishing, in spite of the troubles half told. He grants that mischief has been done, owing to the ignorance of the congregations. He says:—

The Italians who man the offices of the Curia are mostly far from fanatical. They are sincere, and they are extremely able. But they are lamentably ignorant of the world outside, and particularly of that vast English-speaking world, which they are gradually coming to regard as the real hope of the Church.

"E. D." gives a gloomy account of the situation in France and of the prospects of the new trial of Dreyfus. Since the Empire France has, he says, been governed by an oligarchy of select persons desirous of helping themselves to the sweets of office.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

SIR JOHN GORST on child labour and Lady Aberdeen on the Woman's International are the chief distinctions of the July number, and along with one or two other articles demand separate notice.

THE ADVANCE OF CANADA.

The outlook at Ottawa is sketched in glowing statistics by Mr. J. G. Snead Cox. Canada has, he shows, made great advances under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's sway. Once the United States seemed not so much a natural as a necessary market for Canada. She now has had opened to her the markets of the old world, and the American market is no longer indispensable. Hostile tariffs set up by the United States have fired the spirit of Canada and made her a nation. She "has made the memorable discovery that she is dependent on none." The foreign trade per head in Canada is 56'29 dollars; in the States is 24'66. At the close of the present financial year is expected an increase of 80,000,000 dollars in her foreign trade since 1896. A surplus of 1,722,000 dollars was declared last year, and of 3,000,000 dollars is expected this year. The population is increasing more rapidly-and by immigration from the States. Exports to England have risen from 66,689,000 dollars in 1896 to 104,998,000 in 1898. So England's answer to Canada's message of goodwill was quick and decisive. As to the future, Mr. Cox suggests that in negotiations between Canada and the States, questions of fisheries and boundaries should be kept apart from tariff discussions. In the American Senate fifteen States with a population of less than four millions can veto any treaty, though approved by Senators representing the remaining sixty-six millions, and a tariff question touching these fifteen States might cause the whole treaty to be sacrificed. Mr. Cox closes by suggesting Lord Russell of Killowen as successor to the late Lord Herschell on the Commission.

A FRENCH OLD AGE PENSIONS BILL.

Mr. Arthur F. Wood discusses Old Age Pensions in France. The existing system is made use of by only 800,000 out of 12 million working men. Of many proposals now being advanced Mr. Wood selects as the soundest that of the Socialists, involving an expenditure of about £14,000,000 and formulated in a Bill drawn by M. Escuyer:—

Magnanimously allowing that the working man who is to benefit should contribute a portion of the cost, it is proposed that his share should be one franc per month. The contribution of the employers is to be 1.50 franc per month for each Frenchman, or 2.50 francs for each foreigner, employed. The charge upon the State is fixed at 33.50 francs per annum per adherent. Every member is to have a pension of 500 francs at sixty years of age, or 400 francs if unmarried; besides gratuitous medical attendance and 1.50 franc sick pay per diem. If totally incapacitated by accident or illness from working, he is to enter into immediate enjoyment of his pension; and in case of his death after reaching the age of sixty his widow will be entitled to half his pension. No one with an assured income of 1,000 francs or more is eligible as a member, and any one with an assured income of less than 1,000 francs will have the right only to such a sum as is the complement of that amount. The total annual charge upon the State for an estimated m mbership of 101 million m mbers would amount to about 358 million francs. This is to be an annual charge upon the budget, thus avoiding the difficulty of finding suitable investments; and it is proposed to meet it by (1) an income tax, estimated to produce 157 millions; (2) a succession duty which, taking advantage of an apparent indiscretion of a former Minister of Finance, is estimated to produce 150 millions; (3) 20 millions from the Pari Mutuel, and (4) a conversion of the National Debt from 3½ to 3, and later to 2¾ and to 2 per cent. This, it is estimated, will produce 168 millions per annum.

A "TRUST" NOT OPEN TO OBJECTION.

"The Open Spaces of the Future" is the title of an admirable paper by Miss Octavia Hill. She presses for volunteer workers to try and render small London playgrounds fuller of life for the children by "the introduction of games, of drill, of outdoor processions and festivals, and of gardening." She suggests the formation of grass or gravel walks leading from common to common round London, "a sort of magnified field path." She enumerates various societies for securing open spaces and preserving footpaths, ending with this account of the National Trust:—

The National Trust has not been more than five years at work, but we have made a small practical beginning which we believe will gradually develop. We are much encouraged by the deep and general interest in our scheme. We have received from one lady a gift of a beautiful cliff near Barmouth; we have purchased by 173 donations a headland of fourteen acres in Cornwall, commanding the best view of Tintagel, and are appealing now for help to secure a wooded hillside in Kent with a splendid view; we have bought and entirely preserved from ruin a lovely old clergy house in a fold of the Sussex downs; we have purchased a piece of fen land to preserve plants, moths, and birds peculiar to marsh land; lastly, we have received a gift of a spur of a Kentish hill commanding a lovely view over the country. This was given in memory of their brother by a lady and gentleman who wished to make this a memorial to him. Beautiful indeed it is, and more changeful in morning glow and evening blue, and with fair sight of sunrise and sunset from its steep slope, than any stained-glass window: free for all time to the step of every comer, a bit of England belonging to the English in a very special way.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Sir Charles Roe asks, "Is there really a crisis in the Church of England?" Protestants and Catholics, within a pale of an Establishment designed to enclose them both, have often quarrelled before; need they pull the Establishment to pieces because they quarrel now? Professor Edward Dowden writes on the English masque, which he describes as "essentially an aristocratic form of art," a flower of Italian culture grafted on an English stem, which perished in the Civil Wars. Mr. Edwin Collins insists on the importance of careful attention being paid to the teeth of the schoolboy; he holds up the sensible ideal that extraction of teeth should be regarded like the amputation of a limb, to be resorted to only in the last extremity. Preservation should be the aim. Miss Edith Simcox discusses the customs of the native Australian family.

The Century.

THE Century for July gives prominence to the love affairs of Sir Walter Scott and Benjamin Franklin. F. M. F. Skene writes on Sir Walter's first love, Williamina Stuart, and vindicates her from the charge of encouraging and then heartlessly jilting him. Mr. P. L. Ford recounts Franklin's relations with the fair sex, and shows him in his widowed age quite a gallant among the ladies of the French Court. His American lady friends were shocked at the free way in which the French ladies kissed the old man; he was an immense favourite with the fine dames. Men and women of letters bulk largely in this number—Rudyard Kipling, Defoe, Victor Hugo, George Eliot, Bret Harte, and Robert Louis Stevenson supplying themes for six separate studies.

ng

en-

led nce

be

ent

vill

m.

re-

ten

all

ck

ire

tes

ent

ish

He

SS.

111

nic

er

in.

rk.

nd

v.

he

ed,

nt.

of

an ild

ot

ild

to

of ole

cal

the

hat

of

de

ed

ay

e."

lic

hıg,

ief

a far

nd

arc

in

us.

by

m-

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THE passion for re-shaping most things is as marked a feature of the Westminster Review for July as of previous issues.

IOS. A WEEK AFTER SIXTY-FIVE--FORTY YEARS HENCE.

A State crutch for old age pensions is offered by Mr. A. Edmund Spender. Old age pensions he pronounces to be inevitable. His scheme is that "all must have an equal claim for a pension," and "all must have contributed before they receive. The laying by would be an act of compulsion, the receiving a substance of choice." Every one must lay by with the State an amount sufficient to give them five shillings a week on reaching sixty-five, and to this the State would add another five shillings, making the total pension ten shillings a week. But "forty years must elapse before the first pension will be paid." All payments, meanwhile, the State has in its sole control, and the payments of the fifty per cent. who die before reaching sixty-five pass finally into the coffers of the State. Every employé should either himself pay in his instalments in the Post Office, or else have the requisite sum deducted from his wages by his employer. The pension should be paid weekly through the Post Office. Mr. Spender ends his sketch of a pensions scheme with the remark: "The whole country is crying in silence for its institution, but all men are afraid to speak."

THE NEXT LINE OF LIBERAL ATTACK.

The Westminster is as anxious as ever about the future of the Liberal Party. The first article is headed, "The Rights of Property: Who are For, and Who Against?" It accepts Lord Salisbury's demarcation of Party lines if by "property" he means "property in land." That is, in the judgment of the writer, "marked out as the next object of Radical attack." He deplores the lack of earnestness in Liberal leaders, and waits for a leader who would pledge himself on accession to power to introduce a Budget including "Payment of Members and of Election Expenses; the Abolition of the Breakfast-Table Duties; Old-Age Pensions; and the Taxation of Land-Values." "An Old Radical" asks "What should be the Liberal policy?" and enumerates a formidable array of measures, of which, he says, "Land reform, State railways, and the revision of taxation must come first."

FRENCH ESTIMATE OF ENGLISH GENIUS.

H. D. Oakeley gives a valuable survey of "some French appreciations of the Anglo-Saxon genius." He says:—

To pass from the common newspaper world to the thinker's study, from the streets of Paris to the judgment of a Vacher de Lapouges, is to pass from the triumph of la déesse France to the coroner's inquest on the cause of her death. In the one we seem to have as self-evident truths the unquestioned superiority of France in the last exquisite refinements of civilisation, and the incarnation in England of all that is repulsive to a Frenchman. In the other the decay of the French and the magnificent vigour of the English life are little less than axioms. . . .

Between the extremes of over- and under-government, he says:-

The via media of M. Saroléa is the way of municipal government, through which, as it seems, at least ideally, we may look for the nearest reproduction now conceivable of the spirit of the old city-State, calling out in political life the energies of all its members. Finding the symbol of this in the County Council, he rises to a panegyric almost poetical of that body.

WOMEN ON THE WAR PATH.

Whether in honour of the International Women's Council, or not, the Westminster is almost a woman's number. No less than six papers deal with problems of the sex. "Ignota" extols Frances Swiney's "Awakening of Woman" and her forecast of a paternity and a maternity equal in rank and equal in purity. Emma C. Hewitt insists on the same moral code being applied to both sexes. Effic Johnson discusses the respective claims of Marriage and Free Love, and finds in the child the irrefragable argument in support of a permanent monogamic union. "A Philosophic Amateur" expatiates on "one cause of woman's present state of discontent,"—that marriage as now instituted by man aims at "the unison of octave notes rather than the harmony of full chords," and that the woman's side of the question, with her finer sensitiveness and clearer intuitions, is not sufficiently recognised. "The woman of the future" is sketched by Annabella Dennehy as destined to stand "on an even pedestal with man." The writer rejoices in the avenues of public service now opened to Irishwomen. The "domestic problem"-the unsatisfied demand for servants, and the unsatisfied demand by women for paid work—is discussed by Mr. Allen Ogilvie, who urges mistresses not to boycott every servant for a solitary lapse from virtue.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. James Oliphant pleads for a reformed liberal education, and argues that Latin should not be studied until the boy is lifteen years old. The learning of the abstract grammar of a dead language during the earlier years, when the mind is keenest about concrete and external things and most quickly observant, is condemned as a grave mistake. Mr. N. W. Sibley argues that the author of "The Letters of Junius" was the then Earl of Chesterfield.

Cornhill.

Cornhill for July may be described, in schoolboy's parlance, as a "rattling good number." It is full of racy and readable articles, most of which are quoted separately. Lady Broome continues her "Colonial Memories" with interesting incidents from the early life of Western Australia. Mr. John A. Bridges recalls "Life in Christchurch in the Fifties," and serves up some characteristic "'Varsity" tales. Mr. G. S. Layard has been reminded of a precedent to his experiment in translating and re-translating, and gives the version through which a quatrain passed as translated by William Selwyn into Latin, Professor Jebb into Greek, Emmanuel Deutsch into German, J. Milsand into French, and back again by Frederick Locker into English. Mr. Scarlett Potter serves up the adventures of what he calls "The Most Successful Bigamist on Record," though bigamy seems rather to be a mild word to use. For the man, William Morrell, living in the latter part of the seventeenth century, succeeded in having eighteen wives living at the same time! He kept himself by marrying and then absconding with his brides' money. Sylvan seeks to revive interest in Cowley.

MR. WILLIAM SHARP'S study of George Meredith stands out among the Good Words entrées for July. He claims for his hero the foremost place in English letters. Miss Lucy M. J. Garnett supplies a very interesting sketch of Greek matrons and maids in modern times. The miracles of St. Louis are recounted for what they reflect of the people's life by Miss F. MacGunn.

of Mr. Me defe for by disg

car

insi

con

1 goo den fair taxa pop refe mon Rul dec in i 61

by

Pee of 1
T class inclinous oblitheal course spectors with the spec

F

to hop As wou rege Gree Scalear

yea

I

Lan wea of Sixt spol and stric agai

pati If real mer fran

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE principal articles in the July number are the study of Lord Rosebery as "a Palmerston with nerves," and Mr. J. Jacobs' statistical conclusions concerning "The Mean Englishman." These, along with "Diplomaticus'" defence of Sir Alfred Milner, and Mr. E. D. Daly's plea for penalising the drunkard, demand separate notice.

POINTS FOR A PERPLEXED PARTY.

"Rallying points for the Liberal Party" are suggested by a young Liberal hiding under the initial K. He is disgusted with "the men who control the party." They care nothing for convictions or traditions, only votes. He insists that Imperialism, whether we like it or not, has come to stry, and proposes "Imperial Federation" as a good Liberal "cry." Similarly, Liberals must face the demand for social legislation, and cashier the "laissez faire" gang. More specific "rallying points" are: taxation of land-values in towns, old age pensions, popular control of the licensing system, and, later, reform of the House of Lords, which he admits is now more popular in the country than ever it was. "Home Rule must be abandoned." "Mr. Gladstone was deceived" about it, and the Irish have lost all interest in it.

THE PEERS AND THE SHOP-GIRLS.

"The Shop Seats Bill Movement" is brought forward by Miss Margaret H. Irwin, sorrowfully indignant at the Peers' rejection of the measure. She reports the result of her investigations:—

The evidence elicited showed that the hours in certain classes of sheps were in many cases excessive, sometimes including stretches of twelve, fifteen, sixteen, or even seventeen hours of work. It was found that numbers of girls were obliged to leave these shops at quite an early age with their health irretrievably injured, and testimony was given in the course of the investigations by medical men of standing and special experience to the effect that this cruel and, to a large extent, unnecessary practice of forbidding women shop-assistants to sit down was a fruitful cause of serious disorders among women of this class.

An influential appeal was made to leading shopkeepers to provide seats for their girls, but with such scant response as to strengthen the case for legislation.

"THE PROVIDENTIAL MAN" FOR FRANCE.

An Anglo-Parisian journalist pumps cold water on the hopes of those who are expecting a regenerated France. As "man never is but always to be blest," so this writer would have it, France never is but always to be regenerated. The Republic is now, as ever since the Great Revolution, a victim of the regime of the sword. Scandals similar to the Dreyfus affaire are cited from earlier generations. The nation now, as a hundred years ago, wearily longs for "a providential man":—

It is very doubtful whether the French would tolerate him in the shape of a Bonaparte. It must be a "civil Napoleon," as Lamartine had it. Is it to be Loubet, who was supposed to be weak, and is now suspected to be strong, and who, like a kind of Perretti, has thrown his crutch away on becoming a lay Sixtus V.? Or is it to be Brisson? In the past I have often spoken in terms the reverse of scrieus of M. Brisson's Puritanism and want of sociable qualities, though always admitting his strict integrity. On the other hand, while constantly on guard against Henri Rochefort's politics, I have held him up as a pattern of all that is most fascinating in the French character. If optimistic previsions of a regenerated France are to be realised, that regeneration will have to be accomplished by men of Brisson's stamp, and not of Rochefort's. Brisson frankly fears and detests the would-be supremacy of the army chiefs.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. R. S. Gundry discusses the situation in China. He sees no hope of a transformed empire from the present regime at Peking, but does not think it impossible for the Powers to agree in upholding the principle of commercial equality. Mr. W. S. Lilly contributes a study of Lammenais, whose first mistake, he finds, was becoming a priest. "His gifts were prophetic, not priestly." "In the Twilight" is the theme of a characteristic piece by "A Son of the Marshes."

The Wedding Ring Circle.

I HAVE contributed a presidential message to the June Round-About, in which I say that—

I have to express my great satisfaction that our little periodical should have survived its first year of infancy, a year as often fatal to magazines as it is to children. It is a source of regret to me that I have been so extremely busy, and have travelled so much abroad in the twelve months that have just passed as to have been unable to have given more than occasional attention to an enterprise which seeks to realise so many of my most cherished ideals, and which, as the years roll by, will, I hope, become more and more a recognised and indispensable institution in this land of curs.

In c mmon with all our members, I am sometimes given to dreaming of dreams as to what might be, and I have often hoped that from this small and modest venture there may arise a great periodical circulating throughout the British Empire, which would constitute one more of the many links which make the Old Country the homeland of all who speak the English tongue. Apart from its possible political usefulness, Round-About was established, as the circles upon which it was based were founded, primarily to meet a great human need, a need the reality and intensity of which come more and more closely home to me the older I live.

I often reflect with infinite gratitude, and yet not without a shadow of poignant sorrow, on the marvelleus help, inspiration, and support which I have received from luman companionship. * From my childhood up I have been encompassed about by a great multitude of loving hearts, and I have never known a time when I did not know many women whom I could address by their Christian names or, pessibly, by some other and more endearing term. When I think of what my life would have been had all that element been blotted out of it, and when I remember that at this moment there are literally millions of persons with hearts as warm and as sympathetic as mine who are spending lives of solitude in the midst of the wilderness of men, I feel more and more constrained to take almost any risk of being misunderstood and misrepresented in order, if possible, to bring together those whose apartness is the chief cause of their unhappiness. I am not in the least disposed to underestimate the enormous part which good material conditions play in the happiness of the world, but better a thousand times be a millionaire in love, in sympathy, and in all the sentiments which make man akin to his Maker, than to have all the wealth of Vanderbilt or Astor.

I am aware that in the Round-About and the Wedding Ring Circle we have merely touched as with a little finger the outside fringe of an enormous social problem; nevertheless, if members are all true to each other and to their Circle, it will gradually extend more and more until, who knows, we may abate to some small extent one of the miseries of the world.

On receipt of a stamped addressed foolscap envelope, the Conductor, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C., will send all particulars.

THERE are several articles on the centenary commemoration of the birth of Alexander Pushkin; but special mention should be made of that by Eugen Zabel, which appears in the June number of the Deutsche Rundschau. An interesting monograph is the "Alexander Pushkin" number of the Revue Encyclopedique (June 10th).

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

I HAVE noticed elsewhere the articles on "Israel among the Nations," "The Reverses of Britomart," and the Peace Conference. There are several other interesting papers in the June North American which can only be noticed shortly here.

THE IMBROGLIO IN SAMOA.

Mr. Henry C. Ide, formerly Chief Justice of Samoa, has an interesting article under the above title. Mr. Ide reviews the history of Samoa from the first kingship of Mataata in 1987 to the present day. The Samoans, he declares, are an interesting, picturesque and kindly people in

They have been recently denounced as "savages," and so they are, in a certain sense. They are tattooed, wear but little clothing, though enough for the climate, their land titles and system of living are communistic and patriarchal, like those of Abraham. At the same time, they have a nobility of rank, courtliness and politeness and dignity of manner. They are Christians, builders and supporters of churches. They read and write, conduct family worship every day, have their books printed in London, and play cricket, polo, and games of cards.

The quarrels of the three Powers, not the defects of the Samoans, are the cause of all the trouble. Mr. Ide has faith in the power of the new joint commission. But any attempt to instal a king without the approval of the natives will meet with fresh disorder.

THE PROSPECTS FOR CARLISM.

The Hon. James Roche, M.P., contributes an article on Carlism in Spain. Mr. Roche seems to think that Carlism has a future before it, and declares that a Carlist regime could not possibly be worse than the present rule. Of Don Carlos, Mr. Roche says:—

Whatever shortcomings may be laid at the door of Don Carlos, he has proved himself a soldier of valour, and a strategist of no mean merit. He proved himself a good tactician in the field, and with very raw material at his disposal he more than once inflicted heavy losses upon the enemy. He is credited with having a complete plan of campaign for future operations, and able officers to assist him in carrying it out.

COMMERCIAL EDUCATION.

There is a thoughtful article on Commercial Education by Mr. James Bryce. Mr. Bryce's article is chiefly notable for his suggestion that the higher commercial education should become part of the curriculum of universities, especially in America, where the number of universities is so large. He says:—

The most complete course, and that suited to the more mature minds of older persons, out ht if possible to be connected with the university (if any) of the city in which it is to be provided, while of course retaining a distinctly practical character. There is nothing low-ring to the conception of a university in its undertaking such a function. The true conception of a great seat of learning requires it to provide for the teaching of all the main branches of human knowledge and skill, of the practical arts as well as of what are called the pure sciences, in a philosophic spirit and upon scientific methods.

OTHER ARTICLES.

M. Joseph Reinach reviews the Dreyfus case from its commencement, but adds nothing to what is already known. General Miles's second article on the "War with Spain" is chiefly interesting for the number of original despatches which it brings to light. The Hon. Lyman J. Gage writes on "Condition and Prospects of the Treasury." Senator Ford has an article on "Taxation of Public Franchises," and Mr. S. N. D. North, on the United States "Industrial Commission."

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

THE article that has attracted the most attention, bothat home and abroad, during the past month is one in the Nuova Antologia by Mr. Richard Bagot, entitled. "Will England ever become Catholic?"-a question which the author answers in an emphatic negative. The interest of the article lies in the fact that Mr. Bagot is professedly at heart a Catholic, residing in Rome, and might therefore be presumed to know his facts. In his article he combats, in the first instance, the undoubtedly exaggerated hopes in which French and Italian Catholics are apt to indulge concerning the religious situation in England. Englishmen, Mr. Bagot maintains, will never accept either Papal supremacy or compulsory confession; and here the author appears entirely to agree with his countrymen. Some of the practical obstacles he suggests to the conversion of his country are comewhat controversial. One is the "intransigeance" of English Catholics concerning the Temporal Power—"a question which died and was buried thirty years ago." Another is what he conceives to be the attitude of the Irish clergy. "It is impossible to doubt (he writes) that if it had not been for the most melancholy example set by that unhappy island, in which the great majority of the people live beneath the ignorant and superstitious sway of the priesthood, Roman Catholicism might have arrived at far more favourable results in England than has been the case." Clearly Mr. Bagot is not of the opinion of the late Cardinal Manning, who repeatedly asserted that without the Irish there would be no English Catholic population at all. His most surprising statement, however, is that recent converts to Catholicism have mainly come from the small-tradesmen class. He is on safer ground when he accepts the curiously low marriage-rate among Catholics as a proof of internal weakness.

The mid-April number contains the first of a series of articles on Balzac's love-affairs by the distinguished young Italian novelist, F. de Robertó. He is of opinion that both the "Duchesse de Langeais" and "Le Lys dans la Vallée" commemorate real episodes in Balzac's-life. Other articles of interest are an address on "Science and Faith" delivered by Prof. Luzzatti before the King and Queen of Italy, and which appears to have excited some controversy, and an article by the Deputy P. Molmenti on the perennial problem of the political abstention of Italian Catholics.

In the Rassegna Nazionale the article possessed of the most actuality is an enthusiastic encomium on Mgr. Ireland, in which he is commended for his progressive ideas and democratic sympathies. The article may be taken in a sense as a reply to the many attacks of which the Archbishop of St. Paul has been the object, in certain quarters, since his arrival in Europe. What excites, above all, the enthusiasm of his Italian admirer is his outspoken patriotism, for in Italy, unhappily, patriotism and piety have long ceased to walk hand in hand.

The Civiltà Cattolica (June 3rd) publishes some striking statistics of the great French national pilgrimage to Lourdes last April. Fifty-four special trains helped to convey the pilgrims; 30,000 men were expected, over 66,000 came and took part in the religious celebrations that lasted three days. Confessions were heard uninterruptedly day and night, masses were celebrated ceaselessly at fifty altars from midnight to midday, and the great procession of pilgrims took three hours to pass a given spot.

Two conc Mr. Wes

66

Mr. thou socia unho Cana prov Onta Engl but . the The affair Fran diffic the I Th them in the institute Englacestable classes But the large will be can all

this 1

langu be mu

political mach All asks is according to the control on the control alone.

Educ

Th

Mr. and a
the be
"first
chest, length
Endu
From rope-j cultiv lungs langee Between

THE FORUM.

THE June Forum is a solid and instructive number. Two articles only call for separate treatment, both concerning the economic phase of colonial expansion,—Mr. Brooks Adams' on England's decadence in the West Indies, and Mr. C. A. Conant's on the struggle for commercial empire.

THE THREE CANADAS.

"Some Light on the Canadian Enigma" is offered by Mr. Maurice Low. One of his chief points is that though "politically united, and nominally a nation, socially (ethnologically almost) Canada is nearly as unhomogeneous as Austria-Hungary." He divides all Canada, as Cæsar divided Gaul, into three parts. The province of Quebec is French in speech, manners, games. Ontario, as centred in Toronto, is neither French nor English: it is—Scotch one might have expected to read, but Mr. Low says American. From Lake Superior to ahe Pacific everything is English, and the centre is London; as to the Ontarian Washington is the centre. The people of Quebec are simply interested in their own affairs and cherish no loyalty either to England or to France. Mr. Low thinks that Americans manage the difficult work of assimilating foreigners better than do the British:—

The United States denationalises her immi trants by forcing them to learn and speak English . . . Had England adopted this plan at Confederation, and made English the official language, Canada in general, and Quebec in particular, would be much better off materially.

THE AMERICAN PALLADIUM IN DANGER.

Professor Andrew S. Draper treats of common schools in the larger cities. He traces the common school as an institution to the Dutch settlers, and not to the New Englanders. The latter followed the old country in establishing college and Latin schools for the upper classes, but had no common schools for the masses. But this famous American institution is imperilled in the large cities:—

The danger in the larger cities is that the elementary schools will be disowned by nearly all who, by any reasonable possibility, can afford to do so, and will become the schools of the poor alone.

This lapse is referred to the schools being managed by political influence. Mr. Draper pleads for the emancipation of the city schools from the tyranny of the political machine.

A kindred subject is discussed by Mr. J. M. Rice, who asks why teachers have no professional standing such as is accorded to medical men? He finds the answer in the neglect of the exact methods of experimental research in child-study. He asks for comparative experiments on children trained under the Old and the New Education.

THE SKIPPING-ROPE CONDEMNED.

Mr. W. O. Krohn writes on physical growth periods and appropriate physical exercises. He claims that, as the body develops not all at once but in different parts: "first in length, then in girth, in breadth and depth of chest, in breadth and height of forehead, in breadth and length of face," exercise should be adjusted accordingly. Endurance should not be made a test until after 20. From 6 to 9 glad open-air recreation is commended, but rope-jumping is forbidden. Grace and skill should be cultivated between 9 and 14. From 14 to 20, heart and lungs should be kept vigorously active, but without prodenged strain; skill and daring should be aimed at. Between 20 and 30, skill, quickness, and severe tests of endurance are specially in place; graceful tactics are of no practical value.

EMPIRE AS A SCHOOL OF HEROES.

Mr. Julian Hawthorne finds a side issue of expansion in the heroes it makes of young men otherwise without much of a career. He recounts the surprise with which he discovered on a P. and O. steamer going out to India that a young and unpretentious Englishman, whom he thought of at first as a rather bored habitue of West End drawing-rooms, had been autocrat of a province in Burmah as large as France. Such was the product of Empire:—

These idle, well-born clubmen became the finest administrators, the most enlightened and self-devoted statesmen, the world ever saw: the enormous responsibilities they shouldered raised them from the stature of clubmen to that of giants. Glorious, lofty, and honorable were their lives; and in death they are not forgotten.

The moral is obvious: "all over this land there are men able to do what my young Englishman did"; and recent conquests provide the opportunity

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. R. T. Hill does not appraise the commercial value of Porto Rico very highly. He values it chiefly as providing a tropical Riviera at the door of the States and as a great experiment in human liberation. Lieutenant-Commander W. W. Kimball presses for naval expansion, especially in torpedo and submarine boats, as only insurance of property against war risks. Professor G. R. Carpenter finds many reasons "Why Dumas' Novels Last"; and Mr. F. A. Channing, M.P., explains the crisis in the Church of England from the Harcourtian standpoint.

The Lady's Realm.

Lady's Realm for July will engage the interest of a very wide circle, were it only for Mrs. Tooley's sketch of the five-year-old Prince Edward of York, which demands separate notice. Lady Jephson tells what she saw of a Turkish wedding. She says that "as a rule the Turkish women are handsome in a purely animal fashion," without a "sparkle of humour or play of thought or glimpse of soul" appearing in their faces. A Turkish lady inquired anxiously how many wives the writer's husband had, "and when she learnt their limited number, remarked that she supposed he could not afford more!" Polygamy is decreasing in Turkey, not on the score of morality, but of economy. In a symposium on the art of hospitality, Lady Grove declares "the first essential" to be "the possession of a good, or at least an expensive, cook." "Æsculapia" recounts the upward steps in the struggle of women for a recognised standing in the medical world. Mr. Sherard sketches Madame Réjane, the impersonator of Madame Sans Gêne.

~~~~~~~~~

KUMATOLOGY is the name which, according to the Geographical Journal, Mr. Vaughan Cornish, M.Sc., wishes to register in the roll of the sciences. It is simply a Greek compound to denote the science of waves—not merely waves in rivers, lakes, and seas, but air-waves, cloud-waves, sand-waves, ripple-marks, snow-drifts. Special value attaches to the account given by Captain Boileau and Mr. Wallace of their explorations in the plateau lying between Lakes Nyasa and Tanganyika. The sinking of the waters in these and other lakes is referred to a succession of years of low rainfall. The idea which has been suggested, that "Africa itself is drying up," is not accepted.

h

n

d.

n

e.

t

e,

e

e

y

e

e

e

1

1:

e

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

THE June numbers of the review edited by Madame Adam are scarcely up to their usual standard, though there is a good deal of interesting biographical matter, notably two charming articles dealing, the one with the brilliant literary woman who signed her work "Daniel Lesueur," and the other with the great artist Puvis de Chavannes, whose death has deprived the French art world of perhaps its greatest ornament. Following the example set her by the heavier French reviews, the editress gives the place of honour in the first June number to an historical study of the life led by certain members of the old French royal family in Poland. Probably few people who have not made a study of the subject are aware that the French Prince who was ultimately to be known as Louis XVIII. spent some of the years that immediately succeeded the French Revolu-tion at Mittau. The then Tsar, Paul I., treated the royal exiles with the greatest kindness and consideration, till, unfortunately for the Bourbon princes, Napoleon, at that time simply First Consul, made advances to Russia. In these pages is told very vividly the enforced flight from Mittau, not only of the unfortunate king, as he was even then called, but of the Duchesse d'Angoulême, of the Abbé Edgeworth, and of the whole of the little miniature Court, which was composed of émigrés—that is, of those Frenchmen who preferred a life of exile with a Bourbon to existence in France under a Napoleon. The great Polish nobility was more than kind to the French who had taken refuge in their midst, and the writer, Count Wodzinski, gives a most charming and pathetic picture of that section of the French world which found a home in Poland, for after leaving Mittau Louis XVIII. settled down at Varsovia. After the Restoration, the perhaps least noble scion of the Bourbons showed his kingly quality by always showering gifts and benefits on any Pole who happened to come his way; while on one occasion he wrote the memorable words, "Poland will always be very dear to me, and I hope that my successors will find the means to acquit the debt of honour that I have contracted with that country."

A NAVAL OFFICER ON THE NAVY.

In strange contrast to this historical romance is the incisive article with which opens the second number of the Revue, dealing with M. Lockroy and the French Navy. It is interesting mainly as showing how profoundly the French naval officer distrusts and dislikes the idea of the navy being confided to the hands of a man who, whatever his qualifications, has had no practical experience. The Commandant Chasseriaud has the courage of his convictions, for unlike most French review writers who attack public men he signs his full name. He considers, and perhaps not unnaturally, that the state of the French navy at the time of the Fashoda crisis had something to do with the peremptory tone taken by the British Government. The Commandant goes into the question of the submarine boat Gustave Zédé, but he evidently considers that M. Lockroy attached too much in portance to the invention.

But what strikes the British reader when glancing through even a technical French article is the perpetual attempt to present a sop to Cerberus in the form of compliments to certain individuals, and of praise now to one supposed French characteristic, now to another. The most sincere lover of France cannot but regret what must be admitted to be a kind of mania for self-praise completely absent in the writings of an earlier generation of statesmen. It is probably more a literary fancy of the moment than anything really peculiar to the French people, for individual Frenchmen and Frenchwomen are by no means apt to overestimate their own good points: but there can be no doubt that this perpetual self-glorification is injurious to France, inasmuch as it makes foreigners believe her to be, as a nation, both vain and

WAR MEMORIES AND PEACE HOPES.

The second number of the Revue opens with some most interesting extracts from a number of recollections written by a well known Havre doctor who served as ship's surgeon from 1805 to 1810. At that time France and England were at war, and seemed to have been very fairly matched. The writer describes several naval engagements, and to the student of contemporary French history even these pages help to make clear the prejudice against England which dates on the other side of the water from the great Napoleonic wars.
Under the title of "An Unappreciated Great Poet,"

M. Rodocanachi glorifies Quintus of Smyrna. Mme. Adam devotes both her letters on foreign politics. to the Peace Conference at the Hague. She is quitewilling to believe that the wars of the future may be rendered far more humane than was the case in the past, but she violently disavows and warns her readers. against the creation of an International Arbitration-Tribunal. She asks whether any country would accept a decision when really great interests were in question?

The Leisure Hour.

THE Leisure Hour for July combines in an eminent degree instruction and entertainment. Mr. W. J. Gordon's contribution is a sketch of Apothecaries' Hall. The Apothecaries' Society, it appears, received its charter from James I., and takes a special pride in being the only City corporation which has adhered to its charter. Its chief benefactor was William Delanne, a Protestant pastor of Rheims, who fled from persecution to London in 1582. The first Hall was burned down in the Great Fire. There is much information given of the present interior and what is done. It is an odd and lively account which Dr. Truby King gives of the sheep-eating parrot of New Zealand. The audacity of this destructive bird, which happily occupies chiefly mountain heights, is shown by a photograph of two of them calmly investigating a living man lying on the snow! "To Lapland by Railway" is the heading of a sketch by Mr. James Baker, who calls attention to the possibility that this Arctic land may prove to be a European Klondyke. Its known mineral wealth—chiefly iron ore—has already attracted a host of prospectors, who are shouldering out the poor Lapp and driving him further North. Dr. G. D. Matthews gives his impressions of Baku and its famous oil wells. Guards are, he says, authorised to shoot any suspicious-looking person loitering about the naphtha reservoirs, where a single lighted match might cost thousands of lives and millions worth of property. Lady Verney writes vivaciously on English names.

PERHAPS the most taking paper in Temple Bar for July is a lady's account of "a whirl through Batavia." It is a series of vivid and almost breathless glimpses of what she saw as she drove through the island. The life is sketched of one of the noblest victims of Bomba's. cruelty, the Duke of Morciano, who was sentenced to the galleys but was subsequently released. He died in 1895. "A Medley of Voices" is the title which covers a great deal of gossip about the voices of a host of speakers. the else Jur

all the her tion mu cha eye En kin

nat

M.

of

inst

san

inc hole ship pea Sin cap Sta rall of v give wea ar nat wor

itse

gre per

of a paid

littl

who

and how gen bad N con play mai ful o

sma by I is r with grea ages spec by t

but

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

THE Revue des Deux Mondes for June is fully up to the high standard of its reputation. We have mentioned elsewhere the article by M. Desjardins, in the second June number, on the revision of criminal trials.

TRADE UNIONISM IN FRANCE.

M. Benoist notes the extraordinary fact that among all the spectacles which France offers to the curiosity of the universe, perhaps the greatest paradox is that under her Republican form of government the right of association does not really exist. He is inclined to attribute much of the woes of modern France to the unorganised character of her democracy, and he looks with longing eyes to the highly organised masses of workers, both in England and in the United States, where individual effort plays so important a part in national life.

FRENCH SOCIAL PROGRESS.

M. Fouillée contributes a paper of a very philosophical kind on social progress in France, which may be naturally placed by the side of M. Benoist's article. M. Fouillée comments on the singularly even distribution of wealth in France, as compared with England, for instance. In England we have about two hundred thousand holders of Government securities, with an average income of rather less that £100 a year, while in France the holders of Government securities number four millions, each with an average income of £16. So, too, with the ownership of land, which in France is divided up among the peasantry, the great estates being few and far between. Similarly, France has not arrived at the period of great capitalist syndicates, such as flourish in the United States, and in England also to a certain extent. Generally speaking, M. Fouillée thinks that the wide diffusion of wealth in France is increasing more and more, which gives the country, in spite of its miseries, a basis of stability and of morality, for sudden displacements of wealth are dangerous to the morality of a nation, while a progressive increase of comfort in all classes favours national morality. Of course the mere fact that the working classes in a nation have high wages does not of itself necessarily mean that that nation has made progress, for sometimes it is found that high wages mean periods of trade depression and an increased consumption of alcohol. Thus, the workers of Saxony, who are highly paid, spend much of their time in drinking, and have little or no family life, whereas their comrades of Silesia, who are not so well paid, are comparatively temperate and lead happier and more moral lives. In France, however, the feeling of family life is so strong that the general diffusion of wealth has had a good rather than a

THE COMMERCIAL ARISTOCRACY OF CHINA.

M. Courant devotes an interesting article to the great commercial houses in China, and the part which they play in the national life. In Japan and Korea the tradesman belongs to an inferior class, and dwells at a respectful distance from the residence of the territorial magnate; but in China commerce pushes itself to the front, and the small traders swarm in every town, their shops being by no means hidden away in back streets. A purchaser is received without any marks of excessive humility, but with considerable politeness, even if he be a person of no great importance. Regular customers or eminent personages are treated with marked deference, are taken into a special chamber, and given tea and a light for the pipe. The employes of the shops are generally fed and lodged by the employer, and the heads of the business habitually mingle in the life of their subordinates. Women, of course, have no part in business in China.

The trading class preserves a remarkable unity and stability, owing partly to this amiable and simple fellow-feeling, partly to certain social conditions which are favourable to the growth of a kind of hierarchical sentiment. Businesses are transmitted from father to son, and so there is formed a sort of aristocracy of commerce, who possess not only accumulative wealth, but also a hereditary capacity for business together with honourable traditions. This commercial stability in China is increased by the custom of uniting the various business houses in groups or corporations, according to the particular article in which they deal. These corporations, which are at least two hundred years old, are quite voluntary, and are subject to no Government It is difficult to ascertain much about interference. them, as their members are very reticent. It appears that each corporation fixes the minimum price at which an article shall be sold, and carries on a sort of spy system in order to see that no shop undersells the others. The corporations occupy themselves also in detecting frauds, generally in each trade; thus the banking corporation, if a particular house is making heavier engagements than it is likely to be able to meet, will throw into the market, all at once, all that house's paper, so that it speedily suspends payment and disappears. The corporations also do a good deal in the way of charity, both regularly and in the emergencies of flood or famine; they subscribe, too, for religious ceremonies, and will frequently make friends with a mandarin by a present of an umbrella of honour. Each corporation has a kind of patron saint to whom sacrifices are offered and dramatic pieces performed of the enormous length which the Chinese love.

CURATIVE FORCES IN NATURE.

Dr. Berthenson has a curious article on a by-path of medical lore. The most enlightened of modern scientists are not disposed to reject without examination even the most astonishing popular remedies for human ills; for they know, better than any of us, how limited our knowledge is of the marvellous forces of nature. The tendency of modern medicine is, on the whole, in favour of what may be called preventive hygiene. Although in our day a number of specific preparations for specific diseases have been discovered, yet on the whole the use of drugs has diminished, and has given place more and more to treatment, the object of which is to prevent rather than to cure disease. The value of air and sun has been known ever since the days of Aristotle, but only now in our day have they been recognised as an ordinary prescription of the physician. Pliny the Younger tells us of a Roman citizen who derived great benefit from sun baths, and the houses of wealthy Romans seem to have been often built with a view to the enjoyment of this remedy. A Danish scientist discovered that babies grow more rapidly at the seasons of the year when light and warmth are most intense, and another learned man found out that the light of the sun accelerated the process of digestion in the case of young children. On the hygienic value of air it is scarcely necessary nowadays to dilate. It may be sufficient to say that the combination of air and light is generally fatal to the existence of the most dangerous microbes, and it is significant that in all the states of Western Europe the death-rate is markedly higher in towns than in villages or hamlets. Dr. Berthenson concludes by a detailed description of the benefits of sea-air and seabathing in the treatment of certain pulmonary and skin diseases.

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

THE editors of the Revue de Paris do not in their June numbers touch in any way on the Dreyfus case; in both numbers, however, a great part is given to contemporary politics, and June 1st opens with an anonymous article dealing with the Marchand mission, and telling a really remarkable story of the brave French soldier's march from the sea to Fashoda. The writer, who apparently speaks with authority, puts an end to the foolish legend that the French were in any sense in league with the Mahdi; on the contrary, he tells in striking language how nearly Marchand and his small group of men were themselves destroyed by the Dervishes. When Lord Kitchener wrote his famous despatch to Marchand he addressed his letter, "To the Chief of the European Mission, Fashoda." The rest is well known. The letter arrived on the 19th of September; on the 11th of December, 1898, Marchand left the spot which he had made so many sacrifices to attain for ever. The anonymous writer, taking the bull by the horns, declares that from the political point of view the whole idea of making a French settlement at Fashoda was a mistake. "Who could have been so foolish as to imagine that the mere arrival of Marchand at Fashoda would give us a right of bringing forward the Egyptian question or suffice to compel England to discuss its possible solution?" On the other hand, he says that if instead of resorting to the casus belli arguments the British Government had taken the part of discussing the case in a courteous manner, the result would have been what it ultimately was, and France would have been spared a bitter humiliation; and further, he evidently believes that the Fashoda incident led to the far more serious abandonment by the French of the rich province of Bahr-el-Ghazel.

M. Faguet deals in a sympathetic manner with two well-known Frenchmen who have lately passed away one the great dramatic critic, Sarcey, who has been called the Clement Scott of France, and Henri Becque, a typical Parisian dramatist, who, though little known in this country, was immensely popular with the French playgoing public.

TRADE OUTLOOK IN ENGLAND.

M. Bérard, under the curious title of "Peaceful England," gives a candid account of the trade outlook in the Black Country, and of the great manufacturing centres of England. He quotes from numerous Bluebooks, and he points out, not altogether with sorrow, that England has now lost for ever certain branches of trade which were once her undisputed property. To take but one item-namely, cotton. About 1872, nearly a quarter of a century ago, the whole world depended upon Lancashire for its cotton, and for a while the demand was greater than the supply. In one year alone eighty million pounds worth of cotton was exported, Europe taking rather more than half. In those days free trade seems to have been more or less universal. Austria was the first country to bring in a prohibitive tariff, Germany and Russia followed shortly, and France in 1882.

Lancashire, not to be beaten, set up factories in Germany, France, Barcelona and Italy; but, in spite of all this, British trade suffered terribly. In 1892 the German cotton trade began to make itself felt, and from Hamburg there soon sailed weekly goods offered at half, and sometimes even at one-third, the price still asked by British manufacturers. M. Bérard has many hard things to say of the selfishness of British trades unions, which he evidently believes have had a disastrous effect on British trade. Apropos of Lancashire life, he gives some picturesque and curious details. While the trade is leaving the Black Country, other countries are becoming more and more prosperous. The Lancashire artisan, or factory hand, whatever his work, will find upon examination that all the food he eats is procured from over-sea. Denmark provides him with lard and butter; France with eggs; Ireland with bacon. Meanwhile, even India and Japan are beginning to learn that they can make their own cotton; indeed, as early as 1887 a large factory was opened at Osaka, now called the Japanese Manchester.

The French writer has evidently a great admiration for the town of Manchester, and he declares that the Manchester Guardian is the best daily paper in the world -"the best informed, the most impartial, the most honest, and the least fanatic."

VICTOR HUGO'S WRITING STYLE.

Victor Hugo is still a great and picturesque figure in France, and the two brothers Glachant tell in the second number of the Revue the story of the great poet's manuscripts. Victor Hugo left all his autograph manuscripts, amounting to some thirty-four volumes, to the French National Library. Here are to be found almost all he ever wrote, with the exception of "Hernani" and "Odes and Ballads." Here is given a curious insight into the great writer's mind and method of work. It proves conclusively that the first half of his life he jotted down his ideas on any stray piece of paper lying under his hand, such as the backs of old letters and envelopes. In this way he wrote in a few weeks "Notre Dame de Paris." In those days his handwriting was very slight, clear, and small, and when he became famous he was very particular both as to the kind of manuscript paper on which he wrote, and also as to the sort of pen which he was wont to use. In after years the style of his handwriting changed completely, and became bold and large. He always used a quill pen, and when he became a middle-aged man he was fond of embellishing his manuscripts by clever drawings, of course by himself.

Those who wish to know him in his second manner should see the manuscript of the "Travailleurs de la Mer." As an old man he wrote well and clearly, and the blue paper—so well known to autograph collectors— became thicker and finer as time went on. He always left a large margin, but he rarely took advantage of this to make any serious alterations. Victor Hugo was evidently at one time a convinced spiritualist, and on one occasion he distinctly says that, without being in the least anxious to do so, he found himself writing automatically some verses which were afterwards published under his name. He seems to have always sought with some anxiety the exact word with which to express his thoughts, and he attached the greatest importance to style. Sometimes he made many rough copies of his work, on other occasions seeming to be satisfied with what he had first done. The manuscripts can now be seen in the National Library in Paris.

Scribner's for July contains letters of R. L. Stevenson in which he bewails the ineffable shame which befell England for her desertion of the Soudan garrisons and the sacrifice of General Gordon. He exclaims, "I fear England is dead of Burgessry." Mr. E. G. Chat gives a very spirited account of the energy and expedition with which the foreign mail service at New York is handled. Mr. James F. J. Archibald describes the progress of Havana since the occupation.

"THE

ar This is to the fa Embas W. H. to put fortune suppres would present general the boo are a w for a m the pul suspect

"The mously. devoted be write possible children we find who m possess the gre the old as one but she was he was Ge vring ! clue to in the week o lished i poor wi

She confida panion the Em of X. longed this int as to Rudolf to prin Court. of her Viennes interest entirely to be as the Cou

ondon ar

THE BOOK OF THE MONTH.

"THE MARTYRDOM OF AN EMPRESS." AUSTRIAN HISTORY À LA "FAMILY HERALD."

THE book entitled "The Martyrdom of an Empress," which was published last month by Messrs. Harper and Brothers, has been much talked of in London. This is partly due to the nature of its contents, but also to the fact that, according to current rumour, the Austrian Embassy has used its influence in order to induce Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son, and another well-known library, to put the book upon their Index Expurgatorius. The fortune of many a book has been made by efforts to suppress it, and "The Martyrdom of an Empress" would never have attained the notoriety which it at present enjoys but for the effort to withdraw it from general circulation. It is difficult to speak patiently of the book or of its author. Messrs. Harper and Brothers are a well-known firm of good standing, and no one would for a moment accuse them of practising any fraud upon the public; we can only regard them as being the unsuspecting victims of an astute author.

WHO IS THE AUTHOR?

"The Martyrdom of an Empress" is published anonymously. It is dedicated "To my Empress in loving and devoted memory of years gone by"; and it professes to be written by one who lived for many years in the closest possible intimacy with the Empress Elizabeth and her children. The implication, or even the assertion, which we find in its 'pages is that the authoress is a lady who made an unhappy marriage, but who nevertheless possessed a social standing, so high indeed that during the great Galician military manœuvres she entertained the old Archduke Albrecht, the uncle of the Emperor, as one of her guests. He was not only her guest, but she was on such terms of intimacy with him that it was her delight to accompany her august visitor (who was Generalissimo of the Austrian Army) to the manœuvring field every morning at five o'clock. Another clue to her identity is to be found in the statement that in the year 1879 she undertook to supervise twice a week one of the People's Kitchens which were established in Vienna for the purpose of supplying the very poor with good food at a minimum price.

WHAT SHE GIVES HERSELF OUT TO BE.

She represents herself as having been the friend and confidante of the Empress, and as having been her companion when she sojourned in Brittany. On that occasion the Empress, she says, was lodged in the ruined château of X. on the Breton coast—a château which belonged to her own family. But notwithstanding all this intimacy with the Empress—an intimacy so great as to allow her to address the Crown Prince Rudolf as "Master Rudie"—she has not hesitated to print for the amusement of a somewhat cynical world all the scandalous chronicles of the Austrian Court. It is also somewhat curious that most, if not all, of her revelations have been the common property of Viennese gossips for the last twenty years. The book is interesting reading to those to whom the subject is entirely new, but it is something of a tax upon our credulity to be asked to believe that all the familiar anecdotes of the Court were personally retailed to the sympathetic ear of this confidante, who was so little worthy of her trust as to pour them forth to minister to the curiosity of the world.

A RESURRECTION OF OLD STORIES.

"Its effect upon me," said an Austrian journalist, who first brought the book to my attention, "or upon any one who knows anything of the gossip of Vienna, is precisely the same as if you were to bring me a book in which every one of the familiar jests of Joseph Miller was told anew as having been spoken for the first time in your hearing. It is very ingenious, no doubt, to serve up a book like this upon the unsuspecting British public; but in Austria they will simply shriek with laughter at the hoax that is being practised upon you."

Whether this be so I cannot say; but there is no doubt that if the authoress really enjoyed the confidence of the Empress to the extent which she claims, then that confidence was misplaced. She herself records on page 177 a statement by the Empress to the effect that "Queens and Empresses must carry their sorrows within themselves, and not show them forth to a public always eager to see them writhe and smart under the common agonies and e-eryday sorrows common to all mankind." Notwithstanding this very natural wish on the part of the Empress, we have everything she suffered set forth with all the picturesque detail which could suggest itself to a Family Herald novelist.

KITCHEN GOSSIP.

The book is such a one as might be written about our own Court by any ready writer who had access to the file of Truth, provided that he had sufficient imagination and courage to conceive that all the more important incidents which he records happened when he only was present, which he, therefore, was alone in a position to reveal to the world. It is a genuine book of the backstairs, and its author revels in descriptions of cookery and upholstery, which strike us as somewhat out of harmony with the character of one who lived in such close intimacy with so spirituelle a person as the Empress Elizabeth. We are told, for instance, that "His Majesty the Emperor, during Lent, contents himself with fish and various kinds of omelettes. His Majesty takes his fish preferably with buttered potatoes." When the This, however, is only his Lenten fare. Church prescribes no fast, we are informed that "he contents himself in summer with a cup of coffee and sliced cold sausage and ham at 5 o'clock in the morning. At noon he lunches upon soup and a slice of roast meat. At half-past four he washes down a dinner of six courses -comprising soup, fish, two roasts, pudding and dessertwith Pilsener beer and claret. Liqueurs are also served, but Franz Josef never touches them." The description of the dinner given to the King and Queen of Italy at the Hofburg is in the highest style of Society journalism. It was, we are told, "the culminating point of luxury combined with the most refined and exquisite taste. The tablecloth was a perfect bank of fragrant violets, which only left room for plates of semi-transparent Sèvres, each of which was surrounded with a thick garland of marguerites. Before the plate of each woman was a vase of Venetian glass, mounted in finely wrought gold, containing a bouquet of marguerites and violets powdered with gold dust. The menus were engraved on thin sheets of hammered gold. Everything was served on gold dishes." The climax, however, of this feast of Lucullus was reached when the sorbets were brought in, served in large daisies made of spun sugar, which were placed upon the back of little double-headed eagles, also made of the same material, perched on a pale mauve glass ball containing a tiny electric light. In describing what she calls "the apotheosis of gastronomy," the writer reaches the zenith of her style. It must be admitted that such passages hardly convey to the reader a conception of the kind of person to whom one would naturally look for an appreciative and sympathetic biography of the Empress of Austria.

^{* &}quot;The Martyrdom of an Empress." (1899: Harper and Brothers, London and New York.)

A SINGULAR USE TO MAKE OF CONFIDENCES.

Apart from the question of literary taste, there is the question as to the decency or the humanity of a writer who could pen and publish such attacks upon still living persons as those which abound in this book. The Crown Princess Stephanie, the widow of the Crown Prince Rudolf and daughter of the King of Belgium, is made the butt of numberless passages, which, whether true or false, appear to be inspired by an ill-natured spite that sticks at nothing in inflicting pain and heaping insults upon one who is powerless to reply. The Crown Princess is not the only victim of this anonymous writer. She makes Countess Larisch, a niece of the Empress, whom she professes to adore, the object of a still more vindictive attack, and accuses her of having deliberately worked to create the misery which culminated in the tragedy of Mayerling. She expressly tells us that Countess Larisch is now living somewhere in Germany with an opera singer whom she married after her husband had divorced her. The extravagant eulogiums which she heaps upon the Empress of Austria lose very much of their value in the face of such evidence as to the nature of the eulogist.

Stripping away, nevertheless, all these excrescences, and dismissing entirely the question as to whether or not the book is a literary fake or a genuine document, it may be worth while, for the sake of the perennial human interest attaching to one of the saddest and most tragic of histories, to string together the incidents which, true or false, original or hackneyed, we find within the covers of this book. A good deal that is in it will not be new to many of our readers; for there was last November contributed to the REVIEW OF REVIEWS an article containing a good deal of material taken from the same sources from which the anonymous author has drawn. Nevertheless, ignoring all such questions of taste, let us extract from these pages, as best we can, the tragic story of a reign.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE WITTELSBACHS.

"The Martyrdom of an Empress" is a somewhat high-flown title to give to the story of a life which, although not devoid of sorrows, was nevertheless filled with opportunities of happiness, and which terminated in a death that was unusually free from the suffering which commonly attends the passing of the soul from the body. The real tragedy of the Empress's life is sedulously concealed by her biographer. The fatal taint of insanity which clings to the family of the Wittelsbachs appears to have incapacitated her from doing her duty in the position to which she was called. She had her trials, no doubt, as other women, royal and plebeian, have had before her; but she also had her consolations; and the real intensity of her misery arose from that extreme morbid sensitiveness which makes life a living torture to many persons who have never had her opportunity of sheltering herself from the pressure of unpleasant circumstances.

MISERY, 'NOT MARTYRDOM.

All life is a martyrdom for extremely sensitive souls; but in the case of the Empress Elizabeth, she had privileges and advantages which very few of her sisters could ever hope to share. Her married life was unhappy, no doubt. Francis Joseph, as our authoress is very forward to tell us, was by no means a faithful husband; but as she is equally emphatic in declaring that her Imperial heroine never really loved her husband, and was indeed by nature incapable of passionate affection, her misery on this score must have been infinitely less than that which a really devoted wife, worshipping her husband with passionate affection, would have felt under similar circumstances. We fail entirely to find in these pages that the Empress was the ideally perfect human soul, much less one whose sufferings have a right to appeal to the universal sympathy of mankind. That she was mad, poor lady, may be true, and that excuses all. But to ask us to accept a woman who spent so much of her life in a restless attempt at distraction, which she carried out on a scale only possible to those who have the wealth of an empire at their command, as the very highest type of the human race, is to insult our intelligence and affront the moral sense.

A WASTED LIFE.

That she was kind-hearted no one denies; that on many occasions she exposed herself to considerable risk of disease and of danger by her efforts to alleviate the suffering of individual cases of sickness and destitution, will be admitted without reserve; that she was beautiful, gifted, possessing infinite energy and an intellectual capacity far beyond the average—all this is true; but when we come to ask what she made of it all, and in what the world is better for the way in which she spent her time while here amongst us, one need not be a very severe moralist to find more matter for regret than for eulogy. The authoress says that it was a cruel mistake to say that she had an unbalanced mind. "There was no more accomplished, level-headed, sagacious woman in the length and breadth of Europe than she." If this be so, then indeed the regret expressed over this tragedy of a wasted life would be much sterner than facts really appear to justify.

DISTRACTION AS THE END OF LIFE.

For, reduced to its elements, what is her biography? It is the biography of a woman married as a child to a man to whom she was never passionately attached, who deserted her rightful position when she found that he was unfaithful, and from that time onwards spent years of her life in a more or less aimless and purposeless fashion. The authoress "speaks about her hatred of the "horrible incubus of perpetual show and parade." But empresses and queens have to bear their burdens as well as other mortals; and it is nonsense to pretend that the "most level-headed and sagacious woman in the length and breadth of Europe, placed in a position where she might have exercised immense usefulness, could find nothing better to do than to spend her life in long and restless travels to and fro. All this is perfectly explicable, nay, even justifiable, when once we admit that she sought distraction for a mind diseased. Her biographer says that "she had not a trace of selfishness in her grand nature, and always spared those about her as much as possible." But there is hardly a page in the book which does not describe how she devoted herself to the satisfaction of her own cravir motio sad," of oth but th would gener of our failur cious, to be with welfar tions might feath demn pronc oppor gettir sorry and atten embo

> as a with beau bride No mona crowr was Hung hearte catast Italia dictat Maga ended lost h in M taken which endu was (flagra Quee

Th

in or who the long by a seen port him The this and was and deve

failur

Ame

and l

cravings, among which the longing for perpetual motion seemed to be one of the strongest. "She was sad," we are told, "because she had to bear the burden of other people's sins, faults and lack of comprehension"; but that is a burden which we all have to bear, and it would be well for all of us if we did not add to the general burden by sins, faults and lack of comprehension of our own. Speaking broadly, as an Empress she was a failure, where, had she been really level-headed and sagacious, she might have been a success; and for an Empress to be a success means that she uses a pre-eminent position with pre-eminent skill in contributing to the general welfare of her subjects. Not any number of manifesta tions of kind-heartedness in relation to individuals who might cross her path can be counted as more than a feather-weight in the balance compared with the condemnation which, but for her mental failing, would be pronounced upon any Sovereign who wasted such opportunities. "She did not understand the art of forgetting. She did not take kindly to fools and their follies. These were her crimes." The fact is, she was always too sorry for herself. It was a sadness which was very real, and her heredity secures her from blame; but the attempt to represent her not only as sane, but as an ideal embodiment of all excellence, necessitates this protest.

HER HUSBAND.

That she was beautiful is true, and it was her beauty as a girl of sixteen which brought about her marriage with the Emperor Francis Joseph. No one was more beautiful than the bride or more unfortunate than the bride proom:—

None can deny that the cup of bittern ss of this unfortunate monarch, who for half a century has now worn the Hapsburg crown of thorns, and who ever since the day when, in 1848, he was forced by his mother to become the ruler of Austria-Hungary in lieu of his uncle, Emperor Ferdinand, "the kind-hearted," has been filled to overflowing. Misfortunes and catastrophes have overtaken him from all sides. He saw his Italian provinces wrenched from him by Napoleon III., who dictated peace to him on his own terms after Solferino and Magenta. The six weeks' war which he waged with Germany ended for him at Sadowa with humiliation and sorrow. He lost his beloved brother, Maximilian, in an ignominious fashion in Mexico; his only son, the pride and joy of his heart, was taken from him by an unrelenting fate and under circumstances which made his death especially painful for the Emperor to endure; his sister-in-law, the Duchess d'Alençon, to whom he was devotedly attached, was burnt alive at the appalling conflagration of the bazar de la Charité; his favourite niece, the Queen Regent of Spain, was humbled into the dust by the failure of her subjects to hold their own in the war against America; and, to cap the climax of his distress, his beautiful and lovely consort was foully slain by the knife of an Anarchist.

THE IDYLL OF THEIR MARRIAGE.

Francis Joseph came to her father's seat at Possenhoffen in order to celebrate his betrothal with her eldest sister, who was much less beautiful. He met Elizabeth in the wood, a mere child in a short white frock, with long chestnut hair streaming down to her feet, attended by a brace of large white deerhounds. She had never seen her cousin before, but recognising him from his portraits, she flung her arms about his neck and embraced him. That moment fixed the decision of the Emperor. The elder sister became but as Leah in his eyes beside this fairy-like Rachel of the woods. They were betrothed, and in a few weeks they were married. This child, who was described as a quaint combination of Greek nymph and Christian virgin blended in one, was absolutely devoid of human passion. Her husband idealised her, but, as the authoress naïvely says, "the one flaw in his character was a love for flirtations of a most pronounced description." His mother, the Archduchess, brooked no rival for her throne, and she spared no effort to maintain her ascendency. The Emperor, despite his chivalrous ways, did not esteem women very highly. They had made themselves too cheap, and something very like contempt took the place of gratitude where they were concerned. His wife, whom he worshipped as an incarnation of passionless beauty, seemed to him too young, too inexperienced, and too indifferent to become his real companion and comrade.

THE CHILD-WIFE AND HER MOTHER-IN-LAW.

Any ambition which the child of seventeen might have felt to play a rôle worthy an Empress was checked by the jealousy of her mother-in-law; and twelve months had not passed away before the discovery of her husband's infidelity aroused her from the childlike visions of her youth. The authoress maintains that the Archduchess, the Emperor's mother, purposely surrounded him with temptations in the shape of complacent mistresses, in order to win him from the society of his wife. Her own mother told her one day that she was one of those women who never get their own. She had remarkable abilities and talents, and a deep thoughtful mind, and plenty of character, but she had no power of stoop-ing to the level of her associates or adapting herself to the exigencies of her position. "Do not break your heart by imagining that you are a martyr," said her mother to her one day; but unfortunately the daughter, although she repeated the conversation twenty years later, did not take to heart the sensible advice of her mother. On the contrary, she seems to have come to the conviction that she was a martyr, and lived up to her martyrdom all the rest of her life.

MOTHER.

When her first child was born, every one was much disappointed that it was a daughter, and her joy at being a mother speedily gave way to regret that she had not borne an heir to the throne. The unwanted girl died, however, when she was two years old, and two years later the necessities of State were satisfied by the appearance of a son, the ill-fated Rudolf. Her delight in the baby boy, however, was soon damped by the discovery that she was not to be allowed to bring him up herself. The heir-apparent to the Austrian throne was not to be brought up by a chit of a girl, who did not even know how to behave herself, as her mother-in-law said. So he was placed in the care of other persons, where, as his grandmother remarked, "he would be much better than in the hands of his silly young other."

THE OPEN BREACH.

Things went from bad to worse, the estrangement between the young couple growing wide enough even to satisfy the mother-in-law. But at last things came to a head in an open breach between them. The Emperor's flirtations, we are told, had become of so flagrant a nature that it was not in ordinary flesh and blood to overlook them, and after a violent scene the Empress suddenly bolted. She left the palace at Vienna for Trieste, and, embarking on board her yacht, started for the Ionian Islands, having vowed never to see her husband again. He followed her, first to the Ionian Islands and then to Minorca; but she fled beyond the Straits of Gibraltar, and he returned without her to Austria. Thus began the peregrinations in which she spent the great part of the rest of her life. She had

m

ut

es

er

t.

to

as

al

15

n,

SS

er

er

ie

n

ıl,

a

6

no doubt reason to resent the treatment which she had received from her husband.

RIDING AWAY FROM ONE'S SELF.

Whether in Norway, Greece, Algeria or Egypt, she spent her life much in the same way—ceaselessly endeavouring to conquer her tendency to melancholia by physical exhaustion. She was from childhood passionately fond of horses and dogs, and she never was so happy as when she was in the saddle. "In riding in the desert she lost a certain sense of nervousness and pain. She generally rode alone. League after league passed away like a dream, and it was only when she felt her horse quiver beneath her with fatigue that she would slacken her pace, and let the bridle drop upon its neck." When she was not riding, she devoted herself to study, and spent much time in acquiring many dead and living languages. She went out in all weathers, and would ride for days at a time in drenching rain or under blazing sun, turning a deaf ear to all the entreaties heaped upon her by her mother and her friends.

HER MOTHER'S REPROOF.

Her mother wrote to her: "The higher we stand on the social ladder, the less right have we to gratify our own private vengeance and to set ourselves free from painful obligations. You are an integral part of a great nation's honour. You are faithless to your trust and to the traditions of your ancestry when you thus act on the spur of personal injury and pain." Once or twice a year she was compelled by her official duties to put in an appearance in Austria; but the moment these functions were over she was off on her travels. For seven years she wandered about round the shores of the Mediterranean, and it was not until after the battle of Sadowa had been fought and lost, and Austria was compelled to seek reconciliation with Hungary, that the Empress made up her mind to return to the post which she had forsaken so long.

EMPRESS ONCE MORE.

When the King was crowned in Buda-Pesth, she returned to his side. In our authoress's phrase, she realised that "she could not for ever arrogate to herself the right of judgment against her lord, and great peace came over her." For a time it seemed as if she really contemplated the idea of regaining her hold over her husband and her place in the lives of her children. The execution of her brother-in-law, the Emperor Maximilian, in Mexico, afforded her opportunity for comforting her husband. "She resumed her place at Court with a dignity of attitude, a kindness of heart, and a loftiness of purpose which amazed and silenced her bitterest enemics." Another little girl—the conciliation baby—was born, and she devoted herself to the education of her children. The motherhood in her welled up with extraordinary force, and the presence of her children healed most of the wounds which she had suffered:—

One of the finest traits of the Empress was certainly her untiring charity, and her methods were always notable for the extreme delicacy of feeling which she showed in all things. It was she who caused the Viennese to realise the very decided difference which exists between men reduced to poverty through no fault of their own, and men whose destitution is the result of lazy or extravagant habits, and it was she who showed them how to treat the former as fellow citizens who stand in need of help, and the latter as criminals deserving severe reproof if not punishment. Through her influence numberless families are now redeemed from misery, many youths are saved from sin, many men aided to begin new and prosperous lives.

THE PEOPLE'S KITCHENS.

In the year 1872 an association of 400 ladies and noblemen belonging to the loftiest ranks of society, and presided over by Elizabeth herself, was formed for the purpose of supplying wholesome dinners to the poor at the lowest possible price. Each member gave a sum of 700 florins towards the initial outlay, and with this money the first volkskiichen (people's kitchen) was opened. To-day there are fifteen of these in Vienna, and in the course of the year food is sold in them to the value of more than 1,200,000 florins.

The volkskiichen are large rooms, with great windows letting in both sun and air, and provided with oak tables and benches.

The volksküchen are large rooms, with great windows letting in both sun and air, and provided with oak tables and benches, which are kept scrupulously clean. The floor is paved with marble, and at the lower end of the hall a wooden counter serves as a division from the actual kitchen, where many cooks are at work preparing food. All classes, from poor university students to ragg d-looking tramps, receive a kindly welcome.

Every day over ten thousand persons dine in the volkskichen, and the marvellously low price at which the food is sold can only be accounted for by the huge quantities in which it is bought and prepared. The complete dinner, excellently cooked, costs two groschen, and a breakfast of coffee, bread and butter, and some kind of stew can be obtained in the early morning for one groschen. From six to nine in the evening supper is served at the cost of one groschen, and is generally composed of scup, cold meat, and pudding. The ladies and gentlemen who manage this superb association have done w nders. Eight or ten ladies belonging to the Court circle make a point of being in each kitchen while the dinners are being served.

It is, one must confess, a rather touching sight to watch the lovely and aristocratic Court beauties of Vienna, wearing snowy aprons over their elegant walking-dresses, as they distribute the food to the poor, ill-fed wretches who crowd the room. A kind smile or word of sympathy always accompanies the action. It often happens that one of these charming ministering angels grows deeply interested in the case of one or another of her guests, and thus becomes the means of doing a great deal of practical good.

AN ADVENTURE IN THE SLUMS.

In those days the Empress frequently visited the slums on errands of mercy. On one occasion in an outskirt of Pesth, the authoress declares that she was her only companion, when their attention was attracted by loud cries of distress:—

The voice was that of a woman evidently in the greatest of distress. On the impulse of the moment we both leaped from our horses, and rushing to the door and pushing it open, we found ourselves in a villainously dirty room, where a huge ruffian of a man was dragging a woman about the floor by her luxuriant, unbound hair, kicking her vigorously as he did so. B:fore I realised what was happening, the Empress had laid her heavy hunting-crop about the fellow's face, and so surprised was he at our unexpected appearance and at this vigorous on-slaught that he dropped his victim, and stared at us in blank amazement. His astonishment was, however, as nothing to ours, when the ill-used dame sprang to her feet, and, putting her arms akimbo, demanded, in her shrillest Hungarian and with a torrent of invectives, what "we hussies" meant by interfering with her husband. The Empress, who possessed a considerable amount of humour, and in whom the sense of the ridiculous was singularly developed, burst into a peal of laughter, and taking from the side-pocket of her habit a couple of gold ten-gulden pieces, she handed them to this model benedict, exclaiming, "Beat her, my friend; beat her all she wants. She deserves it for being so loyal to you."

A STORY OF MAYNOOTH.

Her son was devoted to her, and when apart they corresponded daily, and frequently wrote to each other in English. The Empress still retained a love of travelling and of hunting; and in 1879 she made the first of her many visits to Ireland. She established herself in the County of Meath, where she took Lord Langford's fiftymad remains

acros

pacin

who with and the great Was grou unce runn dren garn pries whic degr the l G:301 ves!r

m em

II

very spol

it as it is myr wou those the was and from Wh four had of land was fors

mo

pict care place dea spewhe she Em

retuger pre sav residence as her hunting-box, and brought over with her fifty-two horses. In February, 1880, she is said to have made the acquaintance of Archbishop Walsh in somewhat remarkable circumstances:—

It was during that visit that a certain fox she was pursuing sprang over the wall of Maynooth College, and rushed across the exercise-ground, where the pious young students were pacing to and fro. What was the astonishment of these youths whin the wall was also cleared by a lovely woman sitting with amazing skill a magnificent hunter, all flecked with foam and mud. It was the Empress of Austria, who had followed the fox through thick and thin, and evidently also through a great deal of water, for she was dripping wet. Dr. Walsh, who was then principal of Maynooth College, hurried into the grounds to receive the Empress, who had so unwittingly and so unceremoniously entered his domain, and observing that she was running great danger of catching a severe cold in her present drenched condition, offered her a warm wrap. No feminine garment, however, was to be found in that school for young priests, and Elizabeth had to accept Dr. Walsh's own cloak, which she donned, laughingly remarking that with it a doctor's degree ought to be conferred upon her! On the following day the Empress sent Dr. Walsh a diamond ring of great value, and later on presented the college with a superb silver statue of St. George and the Dragon, as well as with a set of magnificent vestments, but the academic coat she insisted upon keeping in memory of her impromptu visit.

DEATH IN LIFE.

In 1881 she hunted in Cheshire, for she was always very fond of the British Islands. Some one having spoken before her of "foggy England," she replied: "You have a perfectly false idea of the place. Parts of it are simply incomparable, and as to the Isle of Wight, it is a little paradise on earth." Fuchsias, heliotropes, myrtles, pomegranates, and oleanders, she declared, would make one believe that one was in Greece, while those great green velvety lawns, sweeping right down to the sea, could be found nowhere but in England. Brittany was another place where she was very fond of staying, and once when riding home to Sassetot, she was thrown from a horse, and left lying senseless in the field. Whether in Brittany, or at Cromer, or wherever she found herself in her many visits to Western Europe, she had numberless opportunities of displaying her kindness of heart. She was fond of the sea, and whether on land or sea, never appeared to know what fear was. She was a fatalist, and faced death with composure. As she once said to her Greek tutor: "When the love of life has forsaken one, death has already put his cold hand on one's shoulder. There is in every earthly career a moment when one inwardly dies, and that need not be the time when actual death takes place."

AN APPARITION IN BRITTANY.

The book from which we are quoting is made up of pictures of incidents which occurred in the Empress's career, which are almost all represented as having taken place when the authoress was present. There is a good deal of "borderland" element in the book, of which a few specimens may be quoted. The authoress declares that, when staying at the château in Brittany, many years ago, she had a vision which prefigured the death of the Empress. Just as dusk was gathering, when she was returning home, she saw a white figure swaying with gentle undulating motion upon the very edge of the precipice, and that night, when she lay trying to sleep, she saw the same figure floating towards her on a sheaf of moonbeams:—

The figure reached my bedside and bent over me. I clenched my teeth convulsively to smother a cry of agony, for I could now distinguish every detail plainly, and I saw Elizab:th's features pale as death, her great blue eyes dilated and bent upon me with a heartrending expression of sadness and of woe, and one slim, emaciated hand pointing to a little wound on her bare breast, and from which two or three drops of blood had ooz:d upon the white folds of her robe. And then I swooned away, losing all consciousness of that awful picture.

RAVENS AND THE HAPSBURGS.

Another story describes how the ravens always appeared as heralds of misfortune to members of the House of Hapsburg:—

Everybody has heard of the flight of ravens which swept across the little town of Olmütz during the minutes when Emperor Franz-Joseph accepted the crown of Austria, and with it a weight of sorrows such as seldom has been carried by a monarch. When Maximilian was about to start on his ill-fat.d. journey to Mexico in order to assum: his duties as sovereign, a raven was seen by him and his wife Charlotte during a last walk which they took in the grounds of their castle of Miramar. The bird persistently followed them, and when they sat down upon a bench under a clump of sycamores it flew, or rather hopped, towards them and settled itself on one leg upon the sweeping folds of the future Empress's train. Again, when Archduchess Maria-Christina was about to enter the carriage which was to drive her to the railway station, whence she departed for her future kingdom of Spain-a land where she suffered all that a woman can suffer in her affections, her pride, and her health-an enormous raven kept hovering over the horses' heads, and actually kept up with them during the whole

On the afternoon which preceded the Empress's assassination at Geneva, she wandered for several hours in the mountains about Territet with her reader, Mr. Barker. The latter had brought with him a basket of fine fruit, the Empress being in the habit of partaking of some every day in lieu of five-o'clock tea. Seated upon some moss-grown rocks, the imperial lady, while listening to Mr. Barker, who was then reading to her Marion Crawford's celebrated novel "Corleone," drew the little basket towards her and began to peel a magnificent peach, of which she offered half to her reader. Just as she was in the act of handing him his share, a huge raven flew down from a tall pine-tree whose dusky branches were casting a deep shade upon the pair, and touching Elizabeth's forehead with the tip of its sombre wing, actually knocked the peach out of her hand.

The Empress herself had her own experiences, as, for instance, when her cousin, King Louis of Bavaria, appeared to her all dripping wet at the very moment when he was drowned in the Starnberg See; but since then she had "schooled herself never to let such wanderings of the mind, when asleep, create too great an impression when awake." "Life is not happy enough for us to spoil what few joys we have by worrying about such prognostications and ill-omened signs from the land of dreams."

HER PALACES.

At Corfu she built the famous palace known as the "Villa Achilleon," of which we have the usual ornate description, from which two facts may be noted—one, that behind the villa "is a huge field of roses, comprising twenty-five thousand bushes of all kinds and colours"; the other is the fact that everything in the stables was brought from England, down to the wainscoting in light oak with which they were lined. The building contains one hundred and twenty-eight rooms, and the stables have accommodation for fifty horses. In the garden, which slopes to the edge of the sea, she reared an exquisite little Greek temple:—

In this Greek temple the Empress used to sit with her dogs at her feet gazing on the deep blue sea, which appeared here and there between the forest of flowers, seeking comfort and consolation from the pain ever gnawing at her heart. Unfortunately, even the beauties of Achilleon failed to attain any such end, and the poor Niobe, hunted by the restlessness of a pain too great to be explained in words, decided not very long ago to abandon her lovely Greek villa.

"Who shall assuage thy grief, thou tempest tossed, And speak of comfort, comfortless to thee?"

But tiring of Achilleon, she went to Lainz, where she concealed herself from the public in the midst of thousands of woodland acres. If Achilleon was a marvel of Greek and Pompeian reconstruction, Lainz seemed to be torn out of the pages of some ancient records of legends and fairy-tales. Here she would wander about alone, secluded from the world, spending most of her time in correspondence and in writing a great deal of prose and poetry, which she said amused her, and kept her from thinking.

THE CROWN PRINCE AND HIS WIFE.

We have several chapters devoted to the tragic story of Rudolf's marriage and suicide. The authoress lays all the blame upon the Crown Princess Stéphanie. Empress, according to her, was strongly opposed to the marriage. Rudolf was apparently quite indifferent in the matter. He had no objection to marry the good little Belgian girl, who was neither homelier nor more un-interesting than the rest of her kind. His mother, however, knew too well that the marriage would be unhappy. "I am not blinded," she said, "by my love for my boy. She cannot keep him straight." Nor did she. For a time all went fairly well. But the Empress became more despondent than ever, and the death of her favourite hunter, Sir Lancelot, who broke his back when leaping a stream, cast a deeper gloom over her melancholy soul. Rudolf purchased the hunting lodge of Mayerling, and devoted himself to literary and scientific pursuits, in none of which his wife took any interest. She flung herself more and more into social distractions, till at last their disagreement culminated in such an explosion that his wife decided to leave him and return to Belgium. This, however, was forbidden by King Leopold, and she remained in Austria.

MARIE VETSERA.

It was in 1886 that Rudolf met Marie Vetsera at the Polish ball. She was only nineteen, tall, slender, and of extraordinary loveliness. They fell in love with each other, and matters progressed so fast that when in 1887 the Crown Prince and his wife had to go to London to attend the Queen's Jubilee, and Marie Vetsera by coincidence happened to be in London, the Crown Princess refused point blank to accompany her husband to England. Husband and wife had a great scene before Rudolf started alone, with the result that an irreparable breach took place between them. The Crown Prince Rudolf met Marie Vetsera several times in London, and decided apparently that life was not worth living without her. The following year he wrote to the Pope, entreating him to dissolve the marriage, and to use his influence with the Emperor to obtain his sanction for his giving up the succession to the throne in order that he might retire altogether from the public gaze. The Pope at once wrote to the Emperor, sending him the Crown Prince's letter; and thereupon father and son met. Rudolf declared his determination to give up everything in order to marry Marie Vetsera. His father opposed this resolution, and, after a long stormy scene, he succeeded in exacting from him a promise never to meet Marie Vetsera again. Next day, the Crown Prince left for Mayerling, where he said he intended to spend some days hunting with two companions.

THE TRAGEDY OF MAYERLING.

The night of January 29th, Marie Vetsera was driven to Mayerling in Prince Rudolf's private cab, and admitted secretly into the Crown Prince's apartments. His companions were out in the fields, nor did they know that she was in the castle until the following morning. Next day his man-servant knocked at his door, but received no answer. Taking alarm, he summoned his master's friends, and finding no response, they broke open the door:—

On the lounge near the window lay the body of Marie Vetsera, still dressed in her dark serge gown, but with all the violets of her two bouquets scattered about her. Her white face, outlined against the crimson silk of the cushion upon which her head was resting, seemed cut out of marble. Half leaning against her shoulder, half upon the floor, lay the Crown Prince, his hunting suit drenched with blood, and his lifeless hand still grasping a heavy cavalry revolver.

Count Hoyos hurried into Vienna and told the Empress. She broke the news to the Emperor, soothing and consoling him as if he were a child in pain.

Meanwhile, Crown Princess Stéphanie was sitting at her piano playing some new melodies which had been sent to her that morning. She wore a pink crépon peignoir, much adorned with lace, and on her light hair a coquettish little combination of ribbons and lace. So loud was her playing that she did not hear the door open, and was very much startled when, without any warning, her husband's father and mother stood before her.

Naturally alarmed, she asked if Rudolf was ill. The Emperor replied in a trembling voice, "Yes, we have bad news; very bad news." The Crown Princess recoiled a few steps, and with an awful scream, which rang throughout that entire wing of the palace, she fell headlong at the Empress's feet, her face touching the carpet, shrieking out in a wild, almost unearthly fashion, "He is dead, and it is I who have killed him!"

The rest of the book is devoted to the story of the assassination of the Empress at Geneva. Her end was peaceful and happy—happier than her life appears to have been. A sudden blow, followed by a few hours' unconsciousness, and then a quiet death—how few mortals are allowed to put on immortality so easily! Luccheni, her assassin, began life as a number in an Italian poorhouse. He was a bastard deserted by his mother. He is now a number once again, serving his life sentence in a Swiss prison.

The impression which the book makes upon the reader is melancholy. Here was a woman who had youth, beauty, power, wealth, and yet her life was so wretched—her whole existence is described as a martyrdom. It is the old, old story. Health, love, and a contented disposition—these things count for more than all the gilded glories which are the envy and despair of all mankind.

TH Spurg book, and preacl would the or its bu the pe in his the Pa Assoc detail scatte person which failed and sa you." the cardoor; On embass I re bowed humbu obliger

Ma

Soon

given.

to see

Altipunctiment.
to his
"To brothe
"So I citizen
man."
Tory,

I am a

Spurg retort "I d stances become about

the de

Mr. brough The commerce Mr. he said "Well first of a liar." Mr. Ruthat ou

Some Notable Books of the Month.

MR. SPURGEON'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

1856-1878.

THE third volume of the "Standard Life of Mr. Spurgeon" (Passmore and Alabaster) is a very readable book, the pages of which are enlivened by many quaint and humorous anecdotes and sayings of the great preacher. Like the volumes which have preceded it, it would have been greatly improved by careful editing and the omission of many pages which at present help to swell its bulk, but do not increase its value. Vol. III. covers the period between 1856 and 1878, when Mr. Spurgeon was in his prime. It records the founding and building up of the Pastors' College, the Orphanage and the Colportage Association. But of more general interest than the detailed account of Mr. Spurgeon's life-work are the scattered passages which throw a vivid light upon his personality.

MR. SPURGEON'S READY WIT.

Many instances of Mr. Spurgeon's facility in retort are given. For example, Mr. Spurgeon writes:—

Soon after I came to London, an eccentric individual called to see m:, with the view of setting m: right on various points in which he did not agree with the doctrine I preached. When he failed to convince me that my teaching was unscriptural, he rose and said: "Then I will shake off the dust of my feet against you." "Please don't do that," I answered, "you might make the carpet dirty; you will find a scraper and a mat at the front door; they will answer the purpose quite well!"

On another occasion his ready wit deprived an embarrassing situation of its sting: -

I remember that once, in London, a man took off his hat, bowed to me, and said, "The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon—a great humbug!" I took off my hat too, and said, "I am much obliged to you, sir, for the compliment; I am glad to hear that I am a great anything." We parted very amicably.

Although as a rule Mr. Spurgeon was one of the most punctual of men, he was once late in keeping an appointment. He explained to his host that the cause was due to his desire to vote :-

"To vote!" exclaimed the good man; "but, my dear brother, I thought you were a citizen of the New Jerusalem!" "So I am," replied Mr. Spurgeon, "but my 'old man' is a citizen of this world." "Ah! but you should mortify your 'old man." "That is exactly what I did; for my 'old man' is a Tory, and I made him vote for the Liberals!"

During a General Election Mr. Spurgeon's enemies set about the story that he had declared he would vote for the devil himself if he were a Liberal candidate. Mr. Spurgeon contented himself with the following decisive retort :-

is

ie

ys

to

d

at xt

10

s

e

ne

te

m lf

n

98

e

g

er

r

d ot

11

d

it

d

0

"I certainly should not vote for the devil under any circumstances, nor am I able to conceive of him as so restored as to become a Liberal."

MR. RUSKIN ON ST. PAUL.

Mr. Ruskin, in one of his talks with Mr. Spurgeon, brought a formidable indictment against the Apostle Paul. The conversation is given in Mr. Spurgeon's words:—

Mr. Ruskin came to see me one day, and amongst other things he said that the Apostle Paul was a liar and I was a fool! "Well," I replied, "let us keep the two things separate; so, first of all, tell me how you can prove that the Apostle Paul was a liar." "He was no gentleman, and he was a liar too," answered Mr. Ruskin. "Oh, indeed!" I rejoined. "How do you make that out?" "Well," he said, "th re was a Jewish gentleman came to him one day, and asked him a polite question: 'How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?' Paul began by saying to him, 'Thou fool,'—which proved that the Apostle was not a gentl-man; and then he continued, 'That which thou sowest is not quickened unless it die,'—which was a lie." "No," I answered, "it was not a lie; Paul was speaking the truth." "How do you prove that?" asked Mr. Ruskin. "Why," I replied, "very easily. What is death? Death is the resolution into its original elements of any compound substance which poss-sses life." Mr. Ruskin said, "That is the most extraordinary definition of death that I have ever heard, but it is true." "Yes," I replied, "it is true; and that is what happens to the seed when it dies, it is resolved into its original elements which is within; it becomes the source and centre of the new life that springs from it. "Then," asked Mr. Ruskin, "what do you mean when you talk of the death of the soul?" "I mean," I replied, "the separation of the soul from God; it was originally with God, and when it is separated from Him it dies to God, that is its death, but that death is not non-existence. The separation of the soul from the body is the separation from itself of that which quickened it, and it falls back into its original condition." "Well," said Mr. Ruskin, "you have not proved him to be a gentl-man." "At all events," I answered, "the Apostle was as much a gentleman as you were just now when you called me a fool." "So you are," said Mr. Ruskin, "for devoting your time and talents to that mob of people down at Newington when you might employ them so much more profitably upon the intellectual and caltured few."

UNDESIRABLE STUDENTS.

Many amusing stories are told about the students and teachers of the Pastors' College. Mr. Spurgeon had many curious applications for admission to the College:—

One brother I have encountered—one did I say ?—I have met ten, twenty, a hundred brethren who have pleaded that they were quite sure that they were called to the ministry because they had failed in everything else. This is a sort of model story:—"Sir, I was put into a lawyer's office, but I never could bear the confinement, and I could not feel at home in studying law. Providence clearly stopped up my road, for I lost my situation." "And what did you do then?" "Why, sir, I was induced to open a grocer's shop." "And did you prosper?" "Well, I do not think, sir, I was ever meant for trade; and the Lord seemed quite to shut up my way there, for I failed, and was in great difficulties. Since then I have done a little in a life assurance agency, and tried to get up a school, besides selling tea; but my path is hedged up, and something within me makes me feel that I ought to be a minister."

"A man with a big tongue which filled up his mouth and caused indistinctness," Mr. Spurgeon writes, "another without teeth, another who stammered, another who could not pronounce all the alphabet, I have had the pain of declining on the ground that God had not given them those physical appliances which are, as the Prayer Book would put it, 'generally necessary.'"

THE ANGEL GABRIEL AS PASTOR.

Hardly less amusing were some of the requests for pastors he received from country churches. For instance:—

The officers of a small church in the country applied to me for a minister, but the salary they were prepared to pay was so small that in reply to their request I wrote, "The only individual I know who could exist on such a stipend is the angel Gabriel. He would need neither cash nor clothes, and he could come down from Heaven every Sunday morning, and go back at night, so I advise you to invite him."

ANSWERS TO PRAYER.

Many pages are devoted to describing the work of the Orphanage. It was Mr. Spurgeon's habit when supplies ran short to resort to prayer, and with notable results:—

ran short to resort to prayer, and with notable results:

We met together, one Monday night, for prayer concerning the Orphanage; and it was not a little remarkable that on the Saturday of that week the Lord should have moved some friend who knew nothing of our prayers to give £500 to that object. It astonished some of you that, on the following Monday, God should have influenced another to give £600! When I told you of that at the next prayer meeting, perhaps, that the Lord had something else in store, and that the following Tuesday another friend would come with £500. . . In November, 1869, when the President was suddenly laid aside by an attack of small-pox, a fflend, who knew nothing of his illness, called and left £500 for the Orphanage; and a few days later, an anonymous donor, who was also unaware of Mr. Spurgeon's affliction, sent £1,000 for the same purpose. At one meeting of the Trustees the financial report was, "All bills paid, but only £3 left in hand." Prayer was offered and the stream of liberality soon began to flow again. On another occasion, the funds were completely exhausted, and the managers were driven to special supplication on behalf of the work. That very day nearly £400 was poured into the treasury.

THE STOLEN GLOVES.

In the middle of a sermon in Exeter Hall Mr. Spurgeon suddenly broke away from the subject of his discourse, and pointing across the hall, said :-

"Young man, those gloves you are wearing have not been paid for; you have stolen them from your employer." At the close of the service, a young man, looking very pale and greatly agitated, came to the room which was used as a vestry and begged for a private interview with Mr. Spurgeon. On being admitted, he placed a pair of gloves upon the table, and tearfully said, "It's the first time I have robbed my master, and I will never do it again. You won't expose me, sir, will you? It would kill my mother if she heard that I had become a thief."

A HOLIDAY CALENDAR.

Mrs. Spurgeon records the impatience with which her husband looked forward to the holidays, and the novel way in which he kept account of the passing of the days that separated him from his well earned vacation:—

The time for the proposed holiday was fixed far in advance, and he looked forward to it with feverish impatience. It was referred to at all meal times; and one day he said to me, "Wifey, I wish I had a piece of string marked, and put in some prominent place, so that I could cut off each day as it passes." I immediately prepared a length of tape, with all the dates plainly written on it, and attached it to the chandelier which overhung the dining-table. It certainly was not an ornament to the room, but it gave him exceeding pleasure to clip off a piece of it day by day; so nobody cared how it looked if he were gratified. It was very long when first put up, and he took as much delight as a little child would have done in watching it gradually grow shorter.

ALL botanical students will find themselves under a debt of gratitude to Mr. F. J. Hanbury and the Rev. E. S. Marshall for their recent book, "Flora of Kent," published privately by the former at 37, Lombard Street, E.C. (12s. 6d.). The work is truly a monumental one, having taken over twenty years of hard research to compile, but at the same time it is very compact and easy for reference, as the arrangement is alphabetical, and the authors have added a good index as well. For purposes of botanical exploration the "Garden of England" was divided into ten districts. The size and position of these districts are clearly shown in a large ordinance map. There is also a smaller map, which is coloured geologically. Any one interested in the botanical life of Kent can certainly find no better reference book than that which Messrs. Hanbury and Marshall have given us.

INDEX TO THE PERIODICALS OF 1898.*

PUBLICATION OF A NEW VOLUME.

I AM constantly applied to by journalistic and literary aspirants for advice as to the best way in which to begin and the quickest way to get on.

The counsel given varies, of course, according to circumstances. But one general rule always holds good. Before you write on any subject post yourself up upon that subject. Many people spend weeks reading up references in books to some question which they are handling, and at the end usually omit all mention of some salient fact, for the simple reason that they had failed to come across it. The simplest way to avoid such misfortunes is to look up the articles which have most recently appeared in the periodical literature of the day. There is no more direct road to acquiring at least the semblance of omniscience so much desired by some editors than to procure our newly published "Annual Index to Periodicals," and to look up under their respective headings all the articles bearing upon the subject with which they are dealing. Even if they are unable to gain access to all the articles, the mere list of names and subjects will give many a clue for which the overdriven journalist will often be grateful.

The Annual Index has now attained its ninth year of

The Annual Index has now attained its ninth year of publication, and the contents of nearly two hundred periodicals are most carefully indexed. It is probable that, for permanent value, nothing that I publish exceeds the Annual Index, for it supplies a ready key to the periodical literature of the English-speaking world.

I was delighted, when I visited the library of the Dominion Parliament at Ottawa, to find the Index in constant use on the librarian's desk, and also at Chicago I found that its value was appreciated by the librarian of the Public Library. How any journalist or writer on contemporary subjects can afford to do without it is a marvel. Certainly any one who has once used it will always have it at his elbow. The latest editions of the Encyclopædias rapidly get out of date, and the harvesting of the results of the study and research of mankind is carried on by the editors of our periodicals; but the magazines and reviews form a mighty maze without a plan. To this maze, so far as the periodicals printed in the English language are concerned, Miss Hetherington and her staff have succeeded in providing a most convenient clue.

To journalists who dwell in the neighbourhood of accessible public libraries the Annual Index is invaluable. Journalists cannot wait; speed with them is of the first importance, and the possibility of having reference ready to hand of every important article published in the English language on every subject under the sky, and not a few in the firmament of heaven, adds immensely to the confidence with which this hard-worked class may contemplate what the future has to bring. Nor is it only the journalists to whom the Index may prove as a key unlocking the storehouse of otherwise inaccessible information. There are very few of the immense number of persons interested in hobbies of their own, whether sports and pastimes, or any particular branch of study, who will not find references to articles which would tell them just what they want, but which, for lack of some such Index, they have hitherto known nothing about.

Previous volumes, I.—V., 1890-1894, are published at 5s. nett each (Volume III., 1892, is out of print); Volumes VI.—IX., 1895-1898, are published at 10s. nett. A prospectus and specimen page will be sent on application.

THE modern hand is natural differen life wit ambitio view, w in his r Nights gan but bring in and rol Hooliga thought Hooliga Emban and the neighbo Hooliga the Bo arithme untiring explain It has a

"Loc it wivou picion, a felony, P'r'aps and driv anyfink around, and arst after you mor it a cop. S The interest of crea

When

a tin b

fanligh

at and his eld

at "cl

Young

troop c

the pul

Londo

this die

the pol

owing newspa

gained ance to makin

he pro

inform offer y

Some

but the

and fe

notes

stairca

^{* &}quot;Index to the Periodicals of 1898." REVIEW OF REVIEWS Office. 108. post free. Now ready.

THE BIOGRAPHY OF A THIEF.

A HOOLIGAN LIFE.

THE Hooligan is not one of the admirable products of modern city life. He is a modern Ishmaelite, every man's hand is against him and his is against every man as a natural consequence. His way of regarding life is entirely different from that of the average citizen. He commences life with a grievance against society, and his aim and ambition is to "get his own back." That is his point of view, which Mr. Clarence Rook has made comprehensible in his realistic sketches of Hooligan life—"The Hooligan Nights" (Richards, 6s.). Life has little to offer the Hooligan but what he can help himself to. Honest work will bring in but a few shillings a week, whereas picking pockets and robbing houses presents glorious possibilities to the Hooligan mind. Mr. Rook describes the life and thoughts of Alf, a typical Hooligan. The home of the Hooligan is within the area bounded by the Albert Embankment, the Lambeth Road, the Kennington Road and the streets about the Oval. A lad growing up in this neighbourhood takes naturally to stealing. The average Hooligan is no ignorant ruffian. He is a product of the Board School, writes a fair hand and is quick at arithmetic. He is undersized as a rule, sinewy, swift and untiring, but nervous, and highly strung. Young Alf untiring, but nervous, and highly strung. Young Alf explained to Mr. Rook the Hooligan philosophy of life. It has at least the merit of extreme simplicity:

"Look 'ere, if you see a fing you want, you just go and take it wivout any 'anging abart. If you 'ang abart you draw suspicion, and you get lagged for loitering wiv intent to commit a felony, or some dam nonsense like that. Go for it strite. P'r'aps it's a 'orse and cart you see as 'll do you fine. Jump up and drive away as 'ard as you can, and ten to one nobody 'll say anyfink. They'll think it's your own property. But 'ang around, and you mit just as well walk into the next cop you see, and arst 'im to 'and you your stretch. See ? You got to look after yourself, and it ain't your graft to look after anyone else, nor it ain't likely that anybody else 'd look after you—only the

See ? "

erary

egin

cir-

ood. that nces and fact,

ross look

the rect

e so

wly

c up

ring

n if nere nich

r of

red

ble

eds the

the

in

ago of

on

s a

will

the

est-

ind

the ta

in

on

n-

of le.

rst.

dy

he

nd

ly

ay

ly

ey

le

se

of h

of

S.

cop. See?"
The account of young Alf's daily life is a profoundly interesting study of character and social conditions. When a few years old he was taught to cross a flocr of creaking wood without making a sound, and to open a tin box without noise. Later, he entered houses by the fanlights, dressed in an Eton suit, with "a black bowler 'at and a nice white collar," and he opened the doors for his elders. But unless a boy does something remarkable at "class" he does not get a chance of joining a gang. Young Alf first made his mark by rifling the pockets of a troop of amateur actors while they were engaged before the public. He was then deemed worthy of higher things. He began by distributing false coin all over the South of London, making as much as fifteen shillings a day. But this did not last long, for he and his patron were seized by the police, the eternal enemy of the Hooligan. Alf got off owing to his readiness and resource. After a month of newspaper selling he joined a house-breaking gang. Alf gained much experience in this line, and confided many interesting hints to Mr. Rook. He attached great importance to the planning of a job, and neglected no means of making himself acquainted with the interior of the house he proposed to visit. The commonest way to gain information was to set out with a few plumber's tools and offer your services in looking over the cistern and pipes. Some favoured the insurance book as disarming suspicion; but that will not gain you admission to the best houses. The best dodge is to send one of the gang with flowers and ferns for sale. As soon as the door is open the man notes all the bolts and fastenings, the position of the staircase, and gets an idea of the general plan of the house. No burglar-proof window has yet been invented, and a catch can easily be unfastened. Young Alf's account of the subsequent proceedings may not be without interest to householders :-

Once an entrance is effected, shut the window behind you. Nothing attracts the suspicion of a policeman like an open window. But note carefully its position in case you have to make a sudden retreat. A burglar prefers to leave a house unostentatiously by the door. There are, however, occasions on which decent time is not afforded for a quiet and respectable exit, and you are compelled to jump through a window. That requires some doing. Remember to go through sideways, adopting a sparring attitude. You will thus save your face, and also avoid identification. Electric bells under the doormats and on the stairs need not worry you, for you will not step on a mat but straddle it, and usually only the middle and top steps are wired. It is safer, however, to go up by the bannisters. Creaking boards are sometimes an annoyance even to the lightest-footed crib-cracker. Young Alf carries a set of wedges which shut together like a telescope. He carries too a small supply of oil for the lubrication of any noisy article of furniture on which he proposes to operate. Having thus gained entrance, it would be your own fault if you do not make the best use of your time. Let your visit be as short as possible, resist the temptation of refreshment (you will have taken a nip of brandy before getting to work on the windows), and on no account omit to look behind the pictures. Finally, do not wire the lawn. The wires are of no use unless you have to do a scoot. If you do, you are likely to fall into your own trap, being naturally flustered.

The Hooligan has many ways of gaining a livelihood. Nothing escapes his quick glance and nothing comes amiss to his deft fingers. If he finds an unattended bicycle he mounts, rides slowly with many wobbles to the first corner. Once round it he rides full tilt to a shop he knows and in ten minutes the bicycle is disintegrated. If the owner should happen to see him he explains he is only having a lark, an explanation which is borne out by his manifest incompetence to ride the machine. During Advent he will carefully follow the waits and call next morning to collect the rewards they have earned. Another fairly safe way of getting hold of money is to collect at Lifeboat processions or on Hospital Saturdays. Dog-sneaking comes in useful when times are dull. There is usually a reward attached to all dogs who stray either voluntarily or under compulsion. Churches again are an easy prey. All that is necessary is to conceal oneself after service, prise open the offertory boxes and leave about eleven, when the police have their eyes on the doors of the public-houses.

Then again the small shopkeepers simply invite depredation by keeping the till just under the counter. One of young Alf's stories of till-lifting is the best commentary upon the Hooligan philosophy of life :-It was at Peckham. The day was cold, wet and foggy. Young Alf was going round with a piano-organ, which was wheeled by one of the lads that worked with him. He had ground out a couple of tunes in front of a small shop which dealt in sweets and newspapers, when the woman came out and gave him twopence. Moreover, seeing that his clothes were thin and poor, she said it was a shame that a boy should face such weather without a decent coat to his back. Young Alf was invited into the shelter of the shop, while the kind-hearted woman went upstairs to fetch a coat which had belonged to her son. She had no longer a son to want it so she told young Alf. Young Alf stood alone in the little shop, amazed at the folly of the woman who had left him there. He leaned over the counter and slid the till out. About fifteen shillings! He had the choice. . . . He chose the fifteen shillings-with the odd coppers, and scooted.

Such is Hooligan gratitude. Soft-heartedness, as young Alf explains, has no place in his philosophy.

REGENERATING CUBA.

WHAT THE UNITED STATES IS DOING.

THE most detailed and authoritative account of the present condition of Cuba and of the work accomplished by the United States since the occupation of the island that has yet been published is "Industrial Cuba," by Robert 'P. Porter (Putnam, 15s.). Mr. Porter was the Special Commissioner of the United States Government to Cuba and Porto Rico. He gives an extremely interesting description of Cuba and the Cubans, and sets forth in detail the extent of the task which his countrymen assumed when they undertook to regenerate Cuba. He points out that the most pressing problem to be solved in the island is economic and not political. It is not so much a question of who shall administer the government, but how the devastation wrought by the long war may be obliterated. Mr. Porter visited Jamaica, and bestows very high praise upon the English administration of the island. He thinks the United States could not do better than take it as a model in many respects.

Although the United States has only had control of affairs for six months, a very great deal has been accomplished. Mr. Porter gives a useful summary of the work already taken in hand :-

A new tariff has been framed and put in operation by the War Department, aided by the experienced officers from the Treasury Department. The Post Office Department has inaugurated an improved mail service. The telegraph lines are rapidly being put in order. The United States sanitary authorities are laying their plans for a vigorous can paign against epidemic disease this summer. The governors of cities are as rapidly as possible cleaning up the streets and preparing plans for modern sewerage and drainage. Under the direction of General Brooke and the immediate supervision of General Chaffer, a complete system for policing the rural districts of the Island with Cuban police is in progress of organisation. For this purpose the Cuban army will be utilised as far as possible. The United States has abolished many onerous taxes, stopped the draining away to Spain of the resources and revenues of Cuba, and rigorously applied all available methods and instruments to build up the Island and improve the condition of the people. It has endeavoured to establish the principle that the Island should be governed in the interest of Cuba, by Cubans, for the Cuban people.

But much more remains to be done:-

The building of public roads, the establishment of public schools, and the inauguration of sanitary work are three branches of the civil government that must be pressed forward with all possible vigour immediately after the scheme for policing Cuba has been completed. The importance of teaching English in all Cuban public schools must not be overlooked, because the Cuban people will never understand the people of the United States until they appreciate our institutions. A complete reform of the judiciary must follow. The laws relating to ownership and transfer of property must be revised, safeguards added to the laws relating to mortgages, and some of the old customs repealed. Savings banks must also be established.

POLITICAL CARICATURE.

"THE POLITICAL STRUWWELPETER (Richards, 3s. 6d.) breaks fresh ground in political caricature. The story of Struwwelpeter is well known and deservedly popular, but it has been reserved to Mr. Gould and Mr. Begbie to adapt the idea to the politics of the day. Mr. Gould's imitations of the original illustrations are admirable, and must be included among the cleverest caricatures he has yet done. The verses which Mr. Begbie has contributed to accompany the sketches are somewhat rough, but they are amusing, as will be seen from the following extracts.

The cover is adorned with the familiar figure of Struwwelpeter, but with the British lion in place of the boy. In explanation of the neglected appearance of the lion Mr. Begbie writes:—

See the British Lion pose, Wildly groping for his foes! Men who tinker up the laws Never manicure his claws: And you will observe with pain No one ever crimps his mane; Seeing that he's so neglected, Do you wonder he's dejected.

Mr. Chamberlain figures as Cruel Joseph. "A stinging tongue has he," but old Boar Kruger proves more than a match for him:—

The trough was full, the greedy Boar Drank quartz and quartz yet dirtied more; And while he quaffed the grateful flow, He kept an eye on Cruel Joe! But Joseph when he cracked his whip, Began to speak of fellowship; He said he did but bring a letter To ask if Mistress Boar was better.

Lord Rosebery is caricatured as Young Primrose, who "found the childish game of ploughing sands was rather tame." Sir William Harcourt is pictured in the "Story of the Protestant Who Wouldn't":—

He really seemed to love the fight, But one day—one twin-letter day, He said—"I will not join the fray; I don't care what the papers say, No party will I lead to-day!"

One of the cleverest series of caricatures illustrates the direful tale of little "Johnny Head-in-Air," as Mr. John Morley is designated.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

It has become a habit with many people to regard the latter half of the nineteenth century as a materialistic age given up to sordid ambitions which leave no room for the admiration of the noble and beautiful. But it is this age which is giving back to us many of our national heroes. It is only the present generation which has adequately recognised the greatness of Cromwell, and it is on the millennial anniversary of Alfred's death that we are beginning to acknowledge the great part he played in the moulding of the English nation. The national commemoration will not take place till 1901, but the admirers of Alfred have done well to publish a most useful and timely volume on "Alfred the Great" (A. and C. Black, 6s.). Various authors have dealt with different aspects of Alfred's life and character. The general introduction is by Sir Walter Besant, Mr. Frederic Harrison contributes a chapter on Alfred as King, the Bishop of Bristol writes on Alfred as a Religious Man and Educationalist, Sir Clements Markham describes Alfred's achievements as a geographer, and other writers treat of his relations to war, law, literature and art.

"So much is Alfred the Founder of our Empire," Sir Walter Besant declares, "that every ship in our navy might have his name—every school his bust, every Guildhall his statue." He is everywhere. But he is invisible. The people do not know him. Mr. Frederic Harrison hails our English Alfred as the only perfect man of action recorded in history.

Caffy 260 Fran Jame cr. Lewi Life wit Life

Ashi Bodi Ha Dani Ha Irvir Meli

Dorr Flet Forr Free

Baig

Mari Mini Rod "Tr

Mor Vlac M Wili

Jenk ca Kirk 27

Cox

New or So Pate

BOOKS RECEIVED.

Books
BIOCDARUW PTC	NEW EDITIONS
BIOGRAPHY, ETC.	NEW EDITIONS. Creighton, Mandell (Bishop of London). Queen Elizabeth. 1, cr. 8vo.
Caffyn, Wm. Reminiscences of Seventy-One Not Out. cr. 8vo. 266 pp	308 pp Longmans 6/o
366 pp	324 pp Blackwood) 2/6
cr. 890. 392 pp	(Marshall Bros.) 2/6
Life and Letters of Sir Joseph Prestwich. Written and edited by his	Plutarch's Lives. Englished by Sir Thomas North. Vols. v. and vi wife, med. 8vo. 444 pp	cap. 8vo. 354 pp. and 358 pp(Dent) net each 1/6 Rossetti, Dante G. Ballads. (The Siddal Edition), c.p. 8vo. 158 pp.
l, cr. 8vo. 544 pp	Scott, Sir Walter. Anne of Geierstein. (10 Illustrations). I. cr. 8vo.
wife. med. 8vo. 444 pp	, 760 pp. Ninmo) 3/6 Scott, Sir Walter. Count Robert of Paris and the Surgeon's Daughter. (rolliustrations). Border Edition. I. cr. 8vo. 300 pp.
ESSAYS, BELLES LETTRES, ETC.	Scott, Sir Walter. The Fair Maid of Perth. (10 Illustrations)
Ashton, John. Florizel's Folly. (13 Illustrations.) l. cr. 8vo. 308 pp. (Chatto and Windus) 7/	I. cr. 8vo. 710 pp(Nimmo) 3/6
Redington Canon Charles Lichfield Cathedral, Illustrated by	Eversley Series cr. 8vo. 542 pp
Herbert Railton. cr. 8vo. 66 pp	(Macmillan) 5/0
Holland Tringham, cr. 8vo. 66 pp	Tompkins, B. The Theory of Water Finding. 1. cr. 8vo. 138 pp (Tompkins, Chippenham) 2/6
McIrose, C. J. Free Will and Determination in Relation to Progress. cr. 8vo. 54 pp(New Century Press)	POETRY.
cr. 640. 34 pp	King, Clifford. Poems. l. cr. 8vo. 282 pp (Digby Long) net 5/c Lucas, E. V. The Open Road. cap 8vo 312 pp (Richards) 5/o
FICTION.	Vialls, Mary Alice. Musical Fancies. I. cr. 8vo. 128 pp
Baignet, J. M. Stars and Stripes, 1, cr. 8vo. 306 pp	(Constable, Westminster) 5/0 RELIGIOUS.
(Digby Long) 6/	Fox, Rev. C. A. Victory Through the Name. dy. 18mo. 119 pp
Chatterton, G. G. The Sport of Circumstances. cr. 8vo. 213 pp. (John Long) 3/	MacNeil late Pey John Some One is Coming and Henry Cathered
Duckworth) 6/	SOCIAL.
Fletcher, J. S. From Broad Acres. cr. 8vo. 280 pp(Richards) 2/ Forrest, Thorpe. Builders of the Waste. l. cr. 8vo. 200 pp(Duckworth) 3/	(Bowen, Chicago)
Frederic, Harold. The Market Place. l. cr. 8vo. 360 pp	6 Ferris Alfred I Pumerising the Rich I er five
Fried, Alfred Hermann. The Diary of a Condemned Man. Trans- lated from the German by S. van Straaten. cr. 8vo. 178 pp	med. 8vo. 416 pp
Marsh, Richard. Frivolities. l. cr. 8vo. 336 pp(Bowden) 3/	A Prayer for the Nations.
Marshall Archibald, Peter Binney, Undergraduate, I. Cr. 8vo.	THE Sunday at Home for May contained an illuminated
Marshall, Emma. Rose Deane; or Christmas Roses. cr. 8vo. 352 pp.	frontispiece, "The Prayer of the Nations: a Hymn for Miniken, Bertha M. M. Where the Ways Part. 1. cr. 8vo. 560 pp	and the first and last of the first atomics to the first and the first atomics and the first atomics at the first atomics atomics at the first atomics atomics at the first atomics at the first atomics atomics at the first atomics atomics at the first atomics at the first atomics at Rodway, James. In Guiana Wilds. cr. 8vo. 272 pp(Unwin) 2/
Rodway, James. In Guiana Wilds. cr. 8vo. 272 pp(Unwin) 2/ "Two Friends." Punjabi Sketches. (8 Illustrations.) cr. 8vo. 110 pp(Marshall Bros.)	Behold us, Lord, Thy burden'd folk !
Walker, Wm. S. From the Land of the Wombat, (13 Illustrations.)	Our ploughshares rust, our fallows wait:
cr. 8vo. 220 pp	Our toil goes up in bitter smoke To fashion sword and armour-plate.
GEOGRAPHICAL AND HISTORICAL.	Our hosts increase, we know not why:
	Our terrors grow: we gaze and hark:
Morison, Theodore. Imperial Rule in India. cr. 8vo. 148 pp	The realms are tinder, quick, and dry; That waits the wind and spark.
Maps and Illustrations.) dli. cr. 8vo. 374 pp(Sampson Low) Wilmot, Hon. Alexander. The History of Our Own Times in South	Unwind, O Lord, the crimson thread
Africa. Vol. iii., 1889-1898. demy 8vo. 362 pp	Blind hate has woven through the years:
	Let earth forget the armies' tread, The seas no more be salt with tears.
MISCELLANEOUS.	This Council of the weary lands
Jenkins, E. Vaughan. The Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford. 74 pp. cap. 4to. Alden 2/Kirk, R. C. Twelve Months in Klondike. (100 Illustrations,) 1, cr. 8vo.	Enlighten: let Thy star increase,
Kirk, R. C. Twelve Months in Klondike. (200 Illustrations.) l. cr. 8vo. 274 pp(Heinemann) 6/	And lead us the our groping tailes
REFERENCE BOOKS.	Tun Balantina Mathetic Control Bridge Control
Coxhead, A. C. Cricket Records. cr. 8vo. 92 pp	THE Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review for April is marked by a wide variety of contents. Mr. J. D.
(Lawrence and Bullen) Hanbury, F. T., and E. S. Marshall, Flora of Kent, cr. 8vo. 444 pp.	Thompson concludes his study of the Elmira system of is marked by a wide variety of contents. Mr. J. D. Thompson concludes his study of the Elmira system of criminal reform. Mr. A. H. Vine discusses the enigma of animal suffering, and ends with the exclamation: "Better a great mystery than a miserable explanation!" Mr. Tolefree Parr cordially welcomes the Free Church Catechism. The literary papers treat of Charles Lamb, Edmund Spenser and Emerson's poetry.

1n

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

WE English-speaking folk have a traditional idea that when there is need of a quick seizing of any chance for getting on in the world, or when some energetic action is demanded, the Britisher is all there, and other nations nowhere. After the correspondence was started this idea was considerably shaken, for French teachers caught at the plan and acted upon it at once, whilst our schoolmasters hung back. It revived later on, when I found our clerks and business men so much more eager than our friends over the water, only to collapse more entirely than ever in the last few days, during which forty-seven letters have arrived from Danes—clerks, commercial men, medical students, etc., all, apparently, as a result of a short paragraph in a Danish newspaper. They came in by every post, and I contemplate them with dismay. Must I write to these enterprising young Danes that their language is rather "out of court," or will some forty-seven Englishmen or Englishwomen take the opportunity of doing a neighbourly turn by exchanging English letters, even if they themselves do not want to learn Danish, and the only advantage to be obtained is a little clearer knowledge of the fellow-countrymen of our gracious Princess. I trust some of our people who have a little leisure will seize this chance.

BILL OF FARE IN A FRENCH SCHOOL.

This appears chiefly remarkable from the absence of "pudding." Well I remember, years ago, trying to describe an English fruit pie; the eagerness of my entertainers and my disappointment were about equal when triumphantly at table the desired pie, made in a dinner plate with two thick crusts, was cut open, discovering a single layer of cherries, lying in rows 'ike marbles, and equally without juice. Of course, the lack of soup is the corresponding trouble of the French boy in England:—

7.30. Petit déjeuner (toast, butter, coffee or chocolate). Noon. Diner (soup, plate of meat, plate of vegetables).

4.0. Gcuter (bread).
6.30. Souper (plate of meat, plate of vegetables, dessert).

I suppose our technical schools would correspond most nearly to the École professionelle at Nontron from which this food table is taken. English boys have to take their birth certificate, in order to comply with French law, and are allowed freedom to leave the school bounds occasionally if their parents desire; a special liberty. The curriculum includes science, agriculture, commercial law, carpentering, metal and wood work in addition to the ordinary subjects, and swimming, cricket, football, tennis, gymnastics, French boxing, "la Canne," and tennis, gymnastics, French boxing, "la Canne," and shooting are the occupations of the Thursday and Saturday afternoons. It is a pity this country school is six hours from Paris, because the small fees suit so well the pockets of many amongst us. The attention paid to agriculture in French schools is very remarkable. is not a "book subject" as in our elementary schools, where it is quite possible for a teacher who has obtained a certificate to be in ignorance as to whether mustard or cress should be planted first, so that both should be ready for cutting at the same time. In France the methods are practical, and in consequence farming has been improved and production increased. The amount voted for agricultural teaching in the elementary schools in this present year was £152,000.

INTERESTING COMMUNICATIONS.

Dr. Hartmann, in writing about what is described as the situation-agency of the Saxon Society of Modern Philologists, remarks that a residence in foreign countries is necessary for the thorough mastery of a language which one intends to teach, and says that Dr. Max Gassmeyer, of Blumenstrasse 31, Leipzig-Gohlis, was impelled to start the agency by the numerous applications he received. I find, also, that some of the members of the society will gladly endeavour to befriend any young students staying in Leipzig for the holidays, by telling them of good pensions or advising them generally. I suppose that such students should write to Dr. Gassmeyer, sending a reply-postcard. Such kindly help seems also spoken of in Dresden; possibly Dr. Meier, Dreikönigschule, would answer inquiries.

Holiday courses are now the rule. That at Marburg begins on July 17th, and has three divisions—English, French, and German. Full particulars given by the Teachers' Guild, 74, Gower Street, from whence also may be obtained particulars of the French course at Lisieux.

The Alliance Française has established continuous courses at Nancy, examinations being held in April,

July, and November.

A schoolmaster writes (and I can bear witness that English as well as French are guilty, and men as well as boys) :-

Would it be possible to warn boys to write their own names so that it is possible to read them? I am often appealed to, and have to give it up almost invariably. With French boys especially it seems to be the fashion to sign with a flourish, more or less ornamental, but certainly most inconvenient when writing for the first time.

NOTICES.

Forty-seven Danish gentlemen of various ages and occupations seek English, and two amongst them German, correspondents. As there is no need to seek Danish, the usual fee of one shilling for adults is not necessary, but a stamped addressed envelope should be enclosed with application for a Danish correspondent.

An Italian lawyer would like to correspond with a business man.

A young Frenchman (17) would like to write to an Englishman who is an amateur photographer.

Will our adult readers remember to send a post-card directly they have received their first foreign letter? The shilling asked only defrays postage expenses, and it is therefore impossible to undertake the additional labour of writing to inquire whether applicants have duly received letters. It would cause too much delay to await a reply from each correspondent to whom a name may have been sent, and as many are communicated with vainly it is important for us to know at once when letters have been received.

Two German youths and several French normal school students are eager to exchange letters with girls, but such young ladies must have the permission of parents or guardians.

A schoolmaster at Flers, a town about twenty miles south of Caen, writes that the parents of one of his pupils, a boy of fifteen, would like to exchange their son with the son of an Englishman for a few months.

I am sorry that so many English girls have had to wait so long for French girls. These delays, and at other times the frequency of the lists, are inexplicable facts. I can only beg our girls to be patient, and assure them that no efforts have been spared on our part and the part of our co-workers to secure them correspondents.

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Architectural Review .- EFFINGHAM HOUSE, ARUNDEL ST., STRAND.

Supplement :- "Milford Lane" and "Booksellers' Row," by F. L. Emanuel.

Architecture and Crafts at the Royal Academy, 1899; Illustrations. Continued.

Clocks and Their Decoration. Illustrated. Continued.

E. Guy Dawber.

July. Supplement :- "Lincoln's Inn Fields," by F. L. Emanuel. Architecture and Crafts at the Academy; Illustrations. Con-

The Decoration of St. Paul's. E. S. Prior. Table-Glass. Illustrated. H. J. Powell.

The Well-Heads of Venice. Illustrated, F. Hamilton Jackson. Art Journal .- J. S. VIRTUE. 18, 6d. July.

Frontispiece: "" A Powerful Monk." After J. L. Gérome. Arthur Hopkins. Illustrated. J. A. Reid.

The Source of the Tay. Illustrated. Continued. A. Scott

The International Exhibition at Knightsbridge. Illustrated. R. A. M. Stevenson. The Decorations of the Carlton Club. Illustrated. A. L.

The Art of Homer Watson. Illustrated. James Mavor. Caswall Smith, Photographer. Illustrated. J. T. Nettleship.

Art Journal Jubilee Series.—J. S. Vietue. 13. 6d. No. 6. Engraving:—"The Odalisque," after Lord Leighton. Etching:—"An Old German Mill," by A. H. Haig. Studies by Sir Edwin Landseer. Illustrated. "Eleanor" Crosses in England.

Birket Foster. Illustrated.
"Misereres" in English Cathol rals. Illustrated. Doré's Pictures of London. Illustrated. Japanese Art. Illustrated. Sir R. Alcock.

William Frederick Yeames. Illustrated. J. Dafforne.

The "Peg" Tankard. Illustrated. Specimens from the International Exhibition of 1871. Illus-

Artist .- Constable. 18. June.

Frontispiece:—"Rescued," after Charles J. Allen. Studies by John Charlton. Illustrated. François Lutiger and His Silverwork. Illustrated. Dr. G. C. Williamson.

A Triptych of Three Cities painted by Edmond van Hove. Illustrated.

Pyrography in Bookbindings. Illustrated. W. G. Bowdoin. Dining-Hall by Jean Baffier. Illustrated. M. de Vouzay. The Work of W. J. Neatby. Illustrated.

Atlantic Monthly .- June. Notes on Glass Decoration. Annie Fields.

Catholic World .- June. Whistler and the Expatriated. F. W. O'Malley.

Century Magazine.-July. Gilbert Stuart's Portrait of Mrs. Josiah Bradlee. Illustrated. C. H. Hart.

Victor Hugo; Draughtsman and Decorator. Illustrated. Le Cocq de Lautreppe.

Critic.-June.

Thackeray's Contributions to Punch. Continued. Illustrated. Frederick S. Dickson.

Dome.-Uniconn Press. 18. June. Supplements:—"Alessandra Del Borro," after Velasquez; "Timoteo Viti," after a Pastel. Velasquez and His Modern Followers. Il'ustrated. C. J.

Holmes. Englishwoman,-July.

Lady Bookbinders. Illustrated. F. M. Steele.

Fortnightly Review .- July. The Academy, the New Gallery, and the Guildhall. Heathcote Stratham.

Girl's Realm .- July.

Lucy Kemp-Welch; Our Future Rosa Bonheur. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley.

Harper's Monthly Magazine.-July.

The Interior Decoration of the City Heuse. Illustrated. Continued. Russell Sturgis.

House, -Queen Office. 6d. July.

The Home Arts and Industries Exhibition. Continued. Illustrated.

Idler.-July.

Goya; the Artist and the Man. Illustrated. P. G. Konody. Edgar Wilson and His Work. Illustrated. Arthur Lawrence.

Lady's Realm.-July.

Mrs. Alma-Tadema and Her Art. Illustrated. Fred Miller.

Magazine of Art.—Cassell. 18. 4d. July.
Frontispiece:—"The Captive Cupid," after T. Blake Wirgman. The Royal Academy. Continu.d. Illustrated. M. H. Spiel-

The International Art Exhibition. Illustrated. A. L. Baldry. Limoges Enamels. Illustrated. Rev. S. Baring-Guld. Demenico Trentacoste; a Modern Italian Sculptor. Illustrated. Miss Helen Zimmern.

The Guildhall Exhibition of the Works of Turner. Illustrated. A. G. Temple.

The Old Salon, Paris, 1899. Illustrated. Henri Frantz. Paperhangings and Textile Fabrics designed by G. C. Haité. Illustrated. W. Shaw Sparrow.

The Guild of Women-Binders. Illustrated. D. M. Sutherland. The New Buildings at South Kensington. Illustrated.

New Century Review .- July.

Mr. Maitland's Exhibition at Clifford's Gallery, Haymarket. Charles Kains-Jackson.

Pall Mall Magazine.- July.

Punck Notes. Continued. Illustrated. F. C. Burnand.

Pearson's Magazine.-July.

The Art of the Age. Illustrated.

Review of Reviews.-(AMERICA). July. Rosa Bonheur and Her Work. Illustrated. Ernest Knauft.

Saint George.-July. The Artist and the Amateur. J. B. Stoughton Holborn.

Scribner's Magazine.-July.

John La Farge. Illustrated. Russell Sturgis.

Strand Magazine.-July.

A Peep into Punch, 1875-1879. Illustrated. John Holt Schooling.

Studio .- 5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. June. The Paris Salons, 1899. Illustrated. Continued. Gabriel Mourey.

Fritz Erler and His Decorations for a Music Room. Illustrated. Burnley Bibb.

E. M. Simas's Decorations for a Bath Room. Illustrated. American and French Applied Art at the Grafton Galleries. Illustrated. Horace Townsend.

Coloured Supplements: "Design for a Bath," by E. M. Simas; Painting by Byam Shaw; "The Violinist," by Kate Cameron.

Windsor Magazine. - July.

Stanley Berkeley and His Work. Illustrated. R. Mortimer.

Young Man.-July.

V. Verestchagin; Interview. Illustrated.

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

Anglo-American Magazine. -BREAM'S BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE. rs. June.

rs. June.
Trusts and Industrial Combinations. Dr. George H. Johnson.
1432-1838—The Spaniards' Return. Eleanor Bevan.
High Explosives in Warfare. Continued. Illustrated. Hudson Maxim.
A Wedding Trip around the World. Mrs. and Dr. George Donaldson.
The Problem of Three Bodies. Evan McLennan.
International Stock Arbitrage. Allen Sangree.
A Young American's Life in Spain. Continued. Franklin C. Bevan.
That "Printer's Devil." Edwin Ridley.
What I saw in Africa. Alden Bell.

Antiquary .- ELLIOT STOCK. 6d. July.

Windham's Tour through France and Italy, Continued, Working in Precious Metals, Illustrated, Mrs. Isabel Suart Robson.
Farther Contributions toward a History of Earlier Education in Great Britain, Continued, W. Carew Hazlitt, Haunts of the London Qurkers, Illustrated, Continued, Mrs. Basil
Holmes

Architectural Review .- Effingham House, Arundel Street, is. June. Guildford, Illustrated, A. H. Powell, Toledo, Illustrated Continued, J. L. Powell, Reminiscences of a Lincolnshire Stream, Illustrated, R. B. Lodge.

July.

Kensington Palace. Illustrated. Rev. W. J. Loftie.
Bourges and its Churches. Illustrated. S. N. Vansittart.

Arena. - GAY AND BIRD. 18. 6d. June.

A Queen Bee and Her Subjects. Illustrated. Helen H. Gardner, A Japanese View of Kipling. Adachi Kinnosuke. A Word for the Mormons. Theodore W. Curtis. The "National Duty" Delusion with regard to the Filipinos. Wm. H. Davis Davis.

Woman's Economic Status in the South. Laura S. McAdoo.

How Silver may be restored. Horace Boies.

Municipal Expansion. Samuel M. Jones.

The Mayoralty Contest in Toledo, Ohio: Draining a Political Swamp

Herbert N. Casson.

Mental Healing. Chas. Brodie Patterson.

The Genesis of Action. Horatio W. Dresser.

Argosy.-MACMILLAN. 18. July. Scenes in a Novelist's (George Eliot) Landscape. George Morley. Heidelberg. Continued. Illustrated. Chas. W. Wood.

Atlantic Monthly.-GAY AND BIRD. 18. June.

Japun and the Philippines. Arthur May Knapp.
Politics and the Judiciary. Frank Gaylord Cook.
The Greaser of New Mexico. William R. Lighton.
The Tenement House Blight. Jacob A. Riis.
Improvement in City Life. Continued. Charles Mulford Robinson.
Letters between Bayard Taylor and Sidney Lanier. Henry Wysham Lanier.
Robert and Elizabeth Browning. Harriet Waters Preston.
The Outlook in Cuba. Herbert Pelham Williams.
The Autobiography of a Revolutionist. Continued. P. Kropotkin.

Author. - HORACE Cox. 6d. June.

The Discount System.

Badminton Magazine.-Longmans. 18. July. Dry-Fly Fishing for Sea Trout. Illustrated. W. B. Boulton.
The Birds of the Southern Seas. Illustrated. Edward Roper.
The Cost of a Grosse Moor. Leo Parsey.
Irish Winners of English Championships. C. B. Irwin.
The Cunning of Birds. Illustrated. John Burroughs.
Big-Game Hunting in Northern Spain. Illustrated. Henry Goodale.
The Subaltern in India. Illustrated. Col. T. S. St. Clair.

Bankers' Magazine. - WATERLOW AND SONS. 18. 6d.

The Bank of England and the Money Market.
Co-operative Banking in Country Districts.
Auditors—Their Duties and Responsibilities to Themselves and the Public.
Charls: Woolley.
Life Insurance—Premiums and Surrender Values. Thomas Fatkin.

Blackwood's Magazine.-BLACKWOOD. 28. 6d. July. The Downfall of Finland; an (bject-Lesson in Russian Aggression. William Morris. Modern German Drama. Laurie Magnus. Pioneering in Klondike. Conclusion. Alexander Macdonald.

Some Gastronomical Recollections.

Mme. Bernhardt's Hamlet and the Celebration of the Tercentenary of Velasquez at Madrid; Two Spectacles.

The Looker-on.

Board of Trade Journal.—Eyre and Spottiswoode. 6d. June. Shipping Bounties in France, The Persian Customs. The Boma-Mayumb: Railway. New Bulgarian Coast and Harbour Law. Customs Law of the Argentine Republic.

Bookman.-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. June.

Literary London. Gertrude Atherton. The International Congress of Publishers. Illustrated.

Bookman .- (AMERICA). DODD, MEAD AND Co., NEW YORK. 25 cents. June.

Thomas Hardy's Country, Illustrated. Clive Holland. Henry Timrod. With Portrait. Henry Austin. Rider Haggard; the Evolution of an Artist. Katharine P. Woods.

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING CO., TORONTO.

A New National Policy. Senator Boulton.

Dante's "Inferno." Prof. Wm. Cla'k.
Pierre Radisson; Bushranger. Illustrated. Beckles Willson.
Birds of the Ga-den. Illustrated. C. W. Nash.
The Canadian People. Norman Patterson.
With Rifle and Rod in the Moose Lands of Northern Ontario. Illustrated.
W. R. Wadsworth.

Byton Edund Weilber. With Participe T. F. C. 25 cents. June. Byron Edmund Walker. With Portraits, T. E. C.

Cape Illustrated Magazine.—44, Shortmarket Street, Cape Town. 6d. June.

About Bushmen. Beta.

Captain.-George Newnes. 6d. July. How I cornered Ranji; Interview. Illustrated. Keble Howard. The South African Elephant at Home. Illustrated. Major-Gen. A. W. Drayson.

How to Bat and how not to Bat. Continued. With Diagrams. C. B. Fry.

The Fresher at Cambidge. Illustrated. H. A. Sams.

When You leave School; Something in the City. A. E. Manning Foster.

Cassell's Magazine.-Cassell. 6d. June. Sardou; the Man and the Dramatist. Illustrated. Tighe Hopkins.
Mont Blanc wi h Parasols. Illustrated. Edw. H. Cooper.
London by Night. Illustrated. B. Fletcher Robinson.
A Kodak in the Clouds. Illustrated. John M. Bacon.
On the Rivers of the East. Illustrated. Raymond Blathwayt.
W. T. Douglass on Lighthouses; Interview. Illustrated. Frank Banfield.

George and Mrs. Al. xander; Interview. Husstrated. Frank Danneld.
July.
George and Mrs. Al. xander; Interview. Illustrated. Leily Bingen.
The Next Day's Paper. Illustrated. B. Fletcher Robinson.
Gunpowder Mills at Faversham; Where Gunpowder is made. Illustrated.
W. B. Robertson.
The Art of "Manufacturing" Landscapes. Illustrated. Geo. A. Best.
To Klondike by Rail. Illustrated. H. J. Shepstone.
Cricketers before the Camera. Illustrated. M. Randal Roberts.

Cassier's Magazine .- 33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. June The Electric Railways of Budapest. Illustrated. Alfred O. Dubsky.
The Automatic Freight-Car Coupler in the United States. Illustrated.
H. G. Prout. Manufacturing Economies. Illustrated. Henry Binsse.
Fighting the Ice in River and Lake. Illustrated. George E. Walsh.
Electric Lighting of Railway Trains in Great Britain. Illustrated. H.

Scholey.

Scholey.

Electric Yachts in Holland. Illustrated. W. de Gelder.
Rolling Mill Fly-Wheels. Illustrated. John Fritz.

A Biographical Sketch of Lord Kelvin. Illustrated. J. D. Cormack.
Electricity as a Factor in Modern Development. Prof. R. B. Owens.

Catholic World .- 22, PATERNOSTER Row, E.C. 18. June. The Truth about the Church in the Philippines. Bryan J. Clinch. German Rumour. C. B. C. Englesfield. V. M. Crawford.

Béguines Past and Present. Illustrated. V. M. Crawford.

Northern Italy: Fresh Woods and Pastures New. Illustrated. E. M. Northern Italy; Fiesh 1. Margaret F. Sullivan, Lyoch, A Philosopher in Bohemia. Illustrated. Margaret F. Sullivan, Bishop Watterson. With Portrait. J. J. Rooney. Reminiscences of a Catholic Crisis in England Fifty Years Ago. Rev. C. A.

Bird R Unpub William Sk Rudya The M Alexar George Bret F Steven

Bacter Lord 1 Parasi Steven

Footp T The I

Micro The I

Chur A Ple

> Hann The (

(The V The S The T Denm The C The I The I

The I Sudar The A Pol Willia Confe Cost Progr In the How

Marin The V Moha Balza

Samo The V Tea-I The I Wom Gen. What

Sardo Jean Richa Conte

Century Magazine,—MacMillan. 18, 4d. July. Bird Rock. Illustrated. F. M. Chapman. Unpublished Portraits of Sir Walter Scott. Illustrated. John Thomson. Williamina Stuart; Sir Walter Scott's First Love. Illustrated. F. M. F.

Williamina Stuart; Sir Walter Scott's First Love, Illustrated. F. M. F. Skene.
Rudyard Kipling and Racial Instinct. With Portrait. H. R. Marshall.
The Making of "Robinson Crusoc." J. C. Hadden.
Alexander the Great. Continued. Illustrated. Benj. I. Wheeler.
Franklin's Relations with the Fair Sex. Illustrated. Paul Leicester Ford.
George Eliot. With Portrait. Annie Fields.
Bret Harte in California, With Portrait. Noah Brooks.
Stevenson in Samoa. Isobel O. Strong.

Chambers's Journal .- 47 PATERNOSTER Row. 7d. July.

Bacteria in Harness. J. B. C. Kershaw.
The Fall of Sebastopol, Sept. 8, 1855. Capt. I. S. A. Herford.
Lord Rosebery as Literary Critic. J. F. Hogan.
Parasites and their Peculiarities. Percy H. Grimshaw.
Stevenson's Relations with Children. Edmund Gosse. Harem Hospitality.

Chautauquan.-KEGAN PAUL. 108. 10d. per annum. June. Footprints of Famous Americans in London. Illustrated. John Chas.

Thornley.

The Drug Trade in the United States. Walter Scott Bigelow, Microbes in the Household. Gerald McCarthy.

The Development of Newspaper-Making. Edward Arden.

The City of Buenos Ayres. Illustrated. Wm. Eleroy Curtis. Walter Scott Bigelow.

Church Missionary Intelligencer,—Church Missionary Society, Salisbury Square. 6d. July.

Teachers at Home and Progress Abroad. F. B. A Plea for Proverbs. Rev. A. Manwaring.
The Uganda Mission: Letters and Journals.
The Centenary in the British Islands and the Colonies. G. F. S.

Classical Review .- DAVID NUTT. 6d. June.

Hannibal's Routs over the Alps. G. E. Marindin.
The Codex Turnebi of Plautus and the Bodleian Marginalia. W. M.
Lindsay and E. A. Sonnenschein,

Contemporary Review .- ISBISTER AND Co. 28. 6d. July.

The Conservatism of President Kruger, Herbert Paul. The Voice of the Uitlanders. Frank Safford. Puritanism and English Literature. Professor Dowden. Puritanism and English Literature. Professor Dowden,
The Situation in France. E. D.
The Present Phase of the Temperance Question. Canon Hicks, Eamb and Keats. Frederic Harrison.
The Troubles of a Catholic Democracy. William Barry.
The Possibility of a Catholic University. A Modern Catholic.
Demmark and Germany. George Brandes.
The Cancer Problem. Dr. Woods Hutchinson.
The Independence of Cuba. Dr. Antonio G. Pérez.
The Independence of Cuba. Dr. Antonio G. Pérez.

Cornhill Magazine.-SMITH, ELDER AND Co. 15. July.

The Rise of the "Short Story." Bret Plarte.

The Decay of Sensibility. Stephen Gwynn.
Sudan Recollections. Lieut. H. C. B. Hopkinson.
The Abodes of the Homeless. Rev. Canon Barnett.
At "the House" in the Fifties. John A. Bridges.
"Polyglot Russian Scandal" in the Sixties. George Somes Layard.
William Morrell; the Most Successful Bigamist on Record. F. Scarlett Potter.

Conferences on Books and Men. Urbanus Sylvan. Cosmopolitan .- 5, Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lang. 6d. June. Progress in Air Ships. Illustrated. H. B. Nason. In the Philippines. Illustrated. R. L. Packard. How to secure Expression in Photography. Illustrated. C. Francis Jenkins.

Marine Disasters on Pacific Shores. Illustrated. James G. McCurdy.
The Woman of To-Day and of To-Morrow. H. T. Peck.
The Ideal and Practical Organization of a Home. Symposium, Mohammed; Abu Beker; Omar; the Building of an Empire. Continued.
Illustrated. John B. Walker.

July. Some Americans Who have married Titles. Illustrated. Francis de Forest. Balzac and His Work. Illustrated. Harry T. Peck. Samoan Types of Beauty. Illustrated. Wm. Churchill. The Building of an Empire: Omar. Continued. Illustrated, John B.

Walker.
Tea-Drinking in Many Lands. Illustrated. Laura B. Starr.
The Ideal and Practical Organization of a Home. Charlotte W. Eastman.
Woman's Economic Place. Illustrated. Charlotte P. Stetson.
Gen. Frederick Funston: Romance and Reality in a Single Life. Illustrated.

Chas, S. Gleed. What One should know about Swimming. Illustrated. John Fletcher.

Critic .- G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS. 18. June. Sardou; the Man and the Dramatist. Tighe Hopkins, Jean Richepin. Bessie McGinnis Van Vorst. Richard Whiteing; the Author of "No. 5 John St." With Portrait. Contemporary French Novelists. Illustrated. A. Schade van Westrum. Lowell and His Friends.

Dial .- FINE ARTS BUILDING, CHICAGO. 10 cents. June 1. An American Academy. Two Orders of Critics. C. L. Moore.

Boys and Girls and Books.

Dome .- UNICORN PRESS. 18. June. Paderewski and Felix Mottl. Israfel.

Economic Journal.-MACMILLAN. 58. June.

American Trusts. Prof. W. J. Ashley.
The Commercial Supremacy of Great Britain. Prof. A. W. Flux.
Local Finance in Scotland. J. A. Row-Fogo.
The New Budget and the Principles of Financial Policy. Prof. C. F. Bastable.

Poor Law Statistics and Old Age Pensions.

Women Compositors and the Factory Acts.

L. Barbara Bradley and Anne

Black, Slate Clubs. Edith M. Deverell.
Conditions under which Shop Assistants Work. M. G. Bondfield.
Prof. S-ligman on the Mathema ical Method in Polivical Economy. Prof. F.
Y. Edgeworth.
Mortality in Extreme Old Ags.. Prof. H. Westergaard.
The Economic Aspect of Australian Federation. A. Duckworth.

Educational Review .- 203, STRAND. 4d. June. Moorish Schools and Colleges. Budgett Meikin. Psychology for Feachers. C. Lloyd Morgan. Soms New Eth cal Conceptions in Their Bearing on Education. Prof. James Sully.

Desirable Reprints of Old Educational Books. Prof. Foster Watson.

Educational Review .- (AMERICA.) J. M. DENT AND Co. 18. 8d.

Preliminary Report on School Hygi ne. Wm, T. Harris, Hygienic Desks for School Children, Illustrated. Eliza M. Mosher.
The Defective Vision of School Children. Walter B. Johnson.
A Successful Experiment in promoting Pupils. Julia Richman.
Reading by Sample. Henry S. Pancoast.
Educational Legislation for New York State. Symposium.

Educational Times.—89, FARRINGDON STREET. 6d. July. Historical Examination Papers. H. E. Malden.

Engineering Magazine. -222, STRAND. 18. June.

The Work of the Naval Repair Ship Vulcan. Illustrated. Gardiner C. Sims and W. S. Aldrich.

Machine-Shop Management in Europe and America. Continued. Illustrated. H. F. L. Orcuit.

Hydraulic Transmission and Distribution of Power. Illustrated. E. B.

Ellington.
The Influence of Electricity upon Railway Locomotion. B. H. Thwaite.
The Iron Industry of Sweden. Illustrated. David A. Louis.
Methods of Remunerating Labour. P. J. Darlington.
The Buildings of the Paris Exposition of 1700. Illustrated. Jacques Boyer,
The Industrial Situation in Japon. Lamar Lyndon.
Electric Power for Marine Propulsion. Chas. T. Child.

English Illustrated Magazine. -1,8, STRAND. 6d. July. English Hustrated Magazine.—1,5, Strand. od. July.
Polo in England and India. Illustrated. H. S. D.
A Remarkable Tiger Hunt. Illustrated. Capt. R. G. Burton.
The Story of the Volunteers, Illustrated. J. M. Bulloch.
The Growth of Cities. Illustrated.
St. Mary's, Woolnoth; a Church That has a Station beneath It. Illustrated.

Englishwoman .- 8, Paternoster Row. 6d. July. ome Representative Girls' Schools. Illustrated. Harriet Martineau; a Woman Writer of the Century. Illustrated. Halboro

Denham. The International Congress of Women. Illustrated.

A Voyage to Morocco, Teneriffe and Madeira. Illustrated. Rev. J. T. C.

Bucks, Lac 2-Making. Illustrated. M. E. B. Burrowes.

Etude.-T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. June. Prevalent Faults of American Teachers. H. Wickham.
The Need of a Wider Musical Culture. G. H. Gleuson.
The Relation between the Music Teacher and the Pupil. W. A. Dietrick.
Voice and Vanity. C. A. Fisher.
Cécile Chaminade. With Portrait. Ward Stephens.
Robert Franz. With Portrait. C. A. Nash.
Music for Piano:—"Alcazar," by L. Gautier; "Les Deux Alouettes," by T. Leschetizky; Slumber Song, by E. Roeckel.

Expositor.-Hodder and Stoughton. 18. July. The Vicarious Sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Dr. John Watson.
A Historical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians. Prof. W. M. Ramsay

Ramsay.
Something Better than Husks. Prof. T. K. Cheyne.
The Twenty-Third Psalm. Rev. Armstrong Black.
On the Relation of the Discourses of Our Lord recorded in St. John iii.
and vi. to the Institution of the Two Sacraments. Rev. H. J. C.

Knight.
The Appearances of the Risen Lord to Individuals. Rev. N. J. D. White Survey of Recent English Literature on the New Testament. Rev. Pro

Expository Times .- SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 6d. July. Prof. Dalman on "The Son of Man." Rev. David Eaton.
The Great Text Commentary. Continued.
The Hittite Inscriptions. Continued. Prof. Fritz Hommel.

Fireside,—7, Paternoster Square, 6d, July.
Arctic Attractions. Illustrated. M. A. Linklater.
Honeysuckle, Illustrated. George L. Apperson.

Folk-Lore.—David Nutt. 5s. June.
Ethnological Data in Folk-lore; a Criticism. G. L. Gomme. A Reply.
Alfred Nutt.
Folklore from the Southern Sporades. W. H. D. Rouse.
Christmas Mummers at Rugby. Illustrated. W. H. D. Rouse.
"Sqaktkgualt," or the Benign-Fazeed, the Oannes of the Ntlakapamuq, British Columbia. C. Hill-Tout.

Fortnightly Review .- Chapman and Hall. 28. 6d. July. Fortnightly Review.—Chapman and Hall. 2s. 6d. July.

Lord Rosebery; a Palmerston—with Nerves.
Rallying Points for the Liberal Party. "K." Souvenirs of Some Court Favourites. Countess of Cork and Orrery.
China: Spheres of Interest and the Open Door. R. S. Gundry.
The Mean Englishman. Joseph Jacobs.
In the Twilight. A Son of the Marshes.
Lamennais. W. S. Lilly.
The Legal Advantages of being a Drunkard. E. D. Daly.
Sarah Bernhardt. Yetta Blaze de Bury.
The Shop Seats Bill Movement. Margaret Hardinge Irwin.
Plays of the Season. William Archer.
A Regenerated France. An Angle-Parisian Journalist.
The International Council of Women. Gilbert Parker and Mrs. May Wright Sewall.

Wright Sewall.
The "New Situation" in South Africa. Diplomaticus.

Forum .- G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS. 18. 6d. June.

Common Schools in the Larger Cities. Andrew S. Draper.
The Crisis in the Church of England. F. A. Channing.
The Value of Porto Rico. Robert T. Hill.
Insurance of Property against War Risks. W. W. Kimball.
The Struggle for Commercial Empire. Charles A. Conant.
A Side-Issue of Expansion. Julian Hawthorne.
Physical-Growth Periods and Appropriate Physical Exercises. Wm. O.

Krohn.
Why Teachers have No Professional Standing, J. M. Rice, England's Decadence in the West Indies. Brooks Adams, Some Light on the Canadian Enigma. A. Maurice Low. A New Departure in Railroad Management. J. W. Midgley. Why Dumas's Novels Last. Prof. G. R. Carpenter.

Genealogical Magazine.-Elliot Stock. is. July. Henry Claude Blake; the New Athlone Pursuivant of Arms. Portrait. Fortrait.
Story of the Surname of Beatson.
An Old Scottish Manuscript. Continued. Charles S. Romanes.
Duchy of Lancaster Inquisitions Post-Mortem. Continued. Ethel Stokes.
Royal Descent of Lionel Cresswell.
The Arms, Crest and Supporters of Stourton. Illustrated.

Gentleman's Magazine.-Chatto and Windus. is. July. Epitaphs; Their History and Humour. John R. Fryer.
William Dunbar, Scottish Poet. A. S. Nelson.
On Foula Isle. Jaye Garry.
A Century of English China. Geraldine Leslie.
Insect Augury. F. G. Walters.
A Wiltshire Manor; Where Time Stands Still. M. Prower.
London seen through Foreign Spectacles. C. W. Heckethorn.

Geographical Journal.—Edward Stanford. 25. June. The Nyasa-Tanganyika Plateau. Illustrations and Map. Capt. F. F. R. Boileau. Onicau.
On Kumatology; Waves and Wave-Structures of the Earth. Illustrated. Vaughan Cornish.
The English Expedition to Sokotra. Dr. H. O. Forbas.
The German Deep-Sea Expedition in Antarctic Waters.

A New Carboniferous Trilobite. — DULAU AND Co. 18, 6d. June. A New Carboniferous Trilobite. Illustrated. F. R. Cowper Reed. On Archandon Jukesi. Illustrated. R. Bullen Newton. Note on Ammonites Euomphalus, Illustrated. G. C. Crick. Notes on Certain Granitoid Fragments from the Culm, etc., of South Devon. Arthur R. Hunt. Geological Magazine. - DULAU AND Co. 18. 6d. June. Courses of the Landwasser and the Landquart. With Maps. A. Vaughan.

Girl's Own Paper .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July. Dr. Thomas Arne. With Portrait. Miss Eleonore D'Esterre-Keeling.
Our Lily Garden. Continued. Charles Peters.
The Pleasures of Bee-Keeping. Continued. Illustrated. F. W. L. Sladen.

Girl's Realm.—Hutchinson and Co. 6d. July.
Princess Alice of Albany. Illustrated. Sybil.
Dolls of Many Nations. Illustrated. A. F. Morris.
The Pleasures of the River. Illustrated. A. Naiad.
A Girl's First Dinner-Party. Margaret Bateson, Bedford College. Illustrated. Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
Music on the River. Bessie Hatton.
On Being Engaged. Miss Alice Corkran.

Good Words .- ISBISTER. 6d. July. The Miracles of St. Louis. Florence MacCunn.
Inch Buis; the Burial-Place of the Macnabs. Illustrated. Rev. Hugh Macmillan. Macmian.
Greek Matrons and Maids. Illustrated. Miss Lucy M. J. Garnett.
London; a City of Strange Customs. Illustrated. Amyas Clifford.
George Meredith. With Portrait. Wm. Sharp.
The Mightiness of the Pen. With Diagrams. Harold Macfarlane.
A Chapter of Telegraph History. R. W. Johnston.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. July. James W. Riley: American Poet. With Portrait.
The Future of Dutch Women; Ladies-in-Waiting, Rowland Grey.
Henry Froude on the Oxford University Press; Interview. With Portrait.
Kaymond Blathwayt.
James A. Froude; a Great Prose-Writer. With Portrait. W. J. Dawson.
Rev. W. H. Fitchett on the Colonies; Interview. With Portrait. Raymond.

Harmsworth Magazine.-HARMSWORTH. 3td. June. Workers in the Air. Illustrated. Alfred Arkas.
Famous Cricket Families. Illustrated.
Where Battles raged. Illustrated. Chas. G. Harper, Feeding a Town at Sea. Illustrated. J. G. Horner.
The Marvels of Bird Photography. Illustrated. Sidney Gowing.
Trained Animals act a Play. Illustrated. Sidney Gowing.
Trained Animals act a Play. Illustrated.
Things Men Covet. Illustrated. C. L. McCluer Stevens and M. Bowne.

Harper's Monthly Magazine .- 45, ALBEMARLE STREET. 18. July. The Spanish-American War. Illustrated. H. C. Lodge. The Australian Horseman. Illustrated. H. C. McIlwaine. Trade Policy with the Colonies. Worthington C. Ford.

Harvari Graduates' Magazine.-6, Beacon Street, Boston. Harvari Graduatos Magazine,—6, Bracon 75 cents. June. Edward Austin. With Portrait. W. W. Vaughan. The Beginnings of Christian Literature. C. H. Toy. Comparisons; 1869-1899. W. R. Thayer. How President Eliot was elected. W. A. Richardson. Academic Hoods, Caps, and Gowns. W. James.

Homiletic Review .- 44, FLEET STREET. 28. 3d. June. Recent Reconstructions of Theology. Prof. Jesse B. Thomas. Immanence and Grace. Prof. Henry C. Minton. The Pastor and the Home. Dr. Samusl Dike. Present Theological Tendencies. Continued. Dr. J. H. W. Stuckenberg.

July. The Witness of the Egyptian Monuments to the Old Testament. Prof. A. H. Sayce. "Back to Christ" through Paul. Prof. Wm. C. Wilkinson.
The Inspiration Question. Dr. J. B. Remensayder.
The Problem of the New England Country Church. Prof. Alfred W.

Anthony. House.-QUEEN OFFICE. 6d. July. Kensington Palace. Illustrated.

Humanitarian .- DUCKWORTH AND Co. 6d. July. A Natural History Observation and Its Consequences. Prof. Meldola. The Colour Problem in the United States. Mark Drayton. Some Ideals and Practices. Hon. Stuart Erskine, Concerning Dr. Pitres of Bordeaux. A. R. Whiteway. Count Lützow's Bohemian Literature. Constance, Countess De la Warr. Foundlings and Foundling Hospitals in Italy. John J. Eyre. The Ethical Teachings of Mahomet. Beatrice Taylor.

Idler .- 8, PATERNOSTER Row. 15. July. Roamings in Brittany. Illustrated. Chas. Emanuel. Some Modern Psychology. A. Hamilton. Old Songs of the Chase. Miss Laura Alex. Smith.

International .- A. T. H. BROWER, CHICAGO. 10 cents. June. S' Gravenhage; the Seat of the Peace Conference. Illustrated. Harry Tuck Sherman. Splendour for Chicago. Austin Bierbower.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record .- 24, NASSAU STREET, DUBLIN. 15. June. Society for the Propagation of the Faith; a Neglected Association. Rev. T. P. Gilmartin.
The Birthplace of St. Patrick. Rev. Edward O'Brien.
The Congregation of Irish Priests in Bordeaux. Rev. Denis O'Donoghue. Was St. Augustine an Evolutionist? Rev. Philip Burton.
The New Legislation on the Index. Rev. T. Hurley.

Irish Naturalist .- SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 6d. June. Natural History Museum, Queen's College, Galway. Illustrated. Prof. R. J. Anderson.

Notes on the Razorbill. E. M'Carron.

Irish Rosary.-WILLIAMS AND BUTLAND. 3d. July. The Confederation of Kilkenny, Illustrated. Sacerdos. A Whitsuntide Walk. Illustrated. T. P. Fox.

J

SIBB

A

ATFGS

Jo T

T

MT

W L GTH

PWMAT

TTHTTR

Journal of the Board of Agriculture .- 1, Essex Street, Strand.

Spraying of Fruit Trees.
Eradication of Charlock.
Belgian Agricultural Coroperative Societies.
Russian Poultry Industry.
Seeding of Sainfoin and Lucerne.
Evantageness in Charming Street Beautiful Street. Experiments in Growing Sugar Beet. Injurious Insects and Fungi. Illustrated.

ugh

ilv.

on

I

and.

Journal of Education .-- 3, BROADWAY, LUDGATE HILL. 6d. July. How to treat English History from Gardiner's "Outline." W. E. Brown.
Class Master or Class Mistress preferable to Subject Teacher as a Principle.
A. Jamoon Smith.
Annual Meeting of the Teachers' Guild. James Bryce.

Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society.-John Murray.

Abortion, Barrenness, and Fat. 6d. June.

Abortion, Barrenness, and Fat. 6d. June.

Abortion, Barrenness, and Fat. 6d. June.

The Bacterial Treatment of Sewage. Illustrated. Dan. Pidgeon.

Flower and Fruit Farming in England. Continued. Wm. E. Bear.

Geese and Gese-Breeding. Edward Brown.

Stition Cheese. Illustrated. J. Marshall Dugdale.

Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute,-Northumberland AVENUE. 6d. June. The Colonies and the Century. Sir John Rob nson.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution.—
J. J. Kellher and Co. 2s. June.
General Reconnaissances; Their Objects and Value. Colonel Mark S. Bell.
The Cavalry Exercises before and the Cavalry during the Manceuvres of 1838. Major C. G. Morrison.
Main Features of the Spanish-American War. M. Plüddemann.
The British Marshalate, 1805–1855. Charles Dalton.

Ladies' Home Journal.—Curtis Publishing Co., Philadelphia.

When Washington was married. Wm. Perine. Ludwig II. of Bavaria; the Moonlight King. Illustrated. Professor J. H.

Girl Life in Germany. Illustrated. Charlotte Bird.
The College-Bred Woman in Her Home. Katharine Roich.
How to Make the most of Your Minister. Ian Maclaren.

Lady's Realm .- HUTCHINSON AND Co. 6d. July. Prince Edward of York. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley. Women's Work in Medicine. Illustrated. Æsculapia. Mme. Réjane. Illustrated. Robert H. Sherard. A Turkish Wedding. Illustrated. Lady Jephson. The Art of Hospitality. Symposium.

Land Magazine. -149, STRAND. 18. June. Turkey-Rearing in England and in France. Charles E. Brooks. The Revival of Home Industries. Duchess of Sutherland. Handicaps upon British Farmers. Wm. E. Bart. The Small Holdings' Act, 1892. A. W. Crampton. The Abolition of Vagabonds in France. Edward Corner. Results of the National Poultry Test. K. B. Bagot De la Bere.

Leisure Hour .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July. Our English Names. Lady Verney.
Apothecaries' Hall, Illustrated. W. J. Gordon.
Baku and the Fire-Worshippers. Illustrated. Dr. G. D. Mathews.
To Lapland by Railway. Illustrated. James Baker. To Lapland by Railway. Illustrated. James Baker.
Mrs. Oliphant, John Dennis.
Lorenzo Perosi and the New Oratorios. Miss Eleonore D'Esterre-Keeling.
The Kea; the Sheep-Eating Parrot of New Zealand. Illustrated. Dr. F. Truby King.

A Parcel of Anecdotes. Miss Elsa D'Esterre-Keeling.

Library Assistant. -B. L. Dyer, Old Brompton Road. June. Women Librarians; Symposium. .

Library Association Record .- HORACE MARSHALL, 18. June. Historical Sketch of Wigan, with a Note on Its Free Library. H. T. Insect Book-Pests; a Review of Recent Literature. E. Wyndham Hulme.

Library World .- 4, Ave Maria Lane, Paternoster Row. 6d. June. Library Charging Systems. James D. Brown. Alderman Southern of Manchester.

List of Books on Music. Continued. James D. Brown Longman's Magazine.-Longmans. 6d. July.

Music and Words. Frank Ritchie.
A Far.ner's Year. Continued. H. Rider Haggard.
Eadgers and Badger-Baiting. P. Anderson Graham.

Lute.-PATEY AND WILLIS. 2d. June. Miss Ethel Barns. With Portrait. Anthem: -- "Come unto Me," by H. M. Higgs.

McClure's Magazine. -- 10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 10 cents.

Marconi's Wieless Telegraph. Illustrated. Cleveland Moffett. With Troop M on the Frontier. Illustrated. W. J. Carney. John Paul Jones's Greatest Fight. Illustrated. Rev. C. T. Brady. Lincoln and the Soldiers. Illustrated. Ida M. Tarbell. Dewey's Capture of Manila. Illustrated. Joze King Davis. The Deep Mines of Cornwall. Illustrated. R. H. Sherard.

Macmillan's Magazine. - MACMILLAN. 18. July.

Pope and King in Italy. Sir John Robinson.
Danton. H. C. Macdowall.
Tennyson: the True Poet of Imperialism.
A Chelsea Manuscript; edited by Ronald McNeill.
Charles de Batz Castelmore; the Real D'Artagnan.
The Wedding of a Rajput Prince.
The Taking of Gibraltar. David Hannay.

Medical Magazine,-62, KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C. 18. June. The Future. Dr. Lovell Drage. How Surgery became a Profession in London. Continued. D'Arcy Power. Maternal Impressions. Prof. Bertram C. A. Windle.

Metaphysical Magazine. - GAV AND BIRD. IS. June. The Dual-Unity of Mind. Questor Vites.
The Doctrine of Election. Benj. F. Mills.
A Technical Analysis of Thought and Its Faculties. Paul Avenel.
Life Eternal. Concluded. Dr. A. Wilder.
Genius. Prof. H. N. Bullard.

Missionary Review of the World .- 44, FLEET St. 18. 3d. June. Samoa. With Map and Illustrations. Rev. James M. Alexander. The Present Centre of the Slave Trade. With Map. Rev. S. M. Zwemer. Reflections after a Winter Tour in India. Illustrated. Rev. F. B. Meyer. The C. M. S. Centenary. Rev. A. R. Buckland.

Month.-Longmans. 18. July. Dr. Ri ington on the Council of Chalcedon. S. F. S.
The Examination System; Its Use and Abuse. Rev. R. F. Clarke.
Shakespear and the Song of a Lark. C. Hope.
Prophecies of Future Popes. Illustrated. Rev. Herbert Thurston.
The American Language. C. Kegan Paul.
Catholic Progress in England. James Britten.

Monthly Musical Rec d -Augener. ad. June. The Lessons of the London Festiva: A. Eaughan.
J. L. Dussek. Prof. E. Prout.
Dr. Chrysander and Handel.
Music for Piano: "'Spring Son.
"Musestunden," by C. Gurlitt. Son and No. 6 of

On Sanity in Art. E. A. Baughan. From the Public's Point of View. F. Peterson. "Animation," for Violin, by Richard Hofmann.

Music .- 186, WARDOUR STREET. 2d. July. The Church Choirmaster's Training. J. E. Borland. The History of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Straeten.

Music.—1402, Auditorium Tower, Chicago. 25 cents. June. The American Indian Legend in Music. Wm. Armstrong. Sidney Lanier as a Musician. Egbert Swayne. Musical Instruments mentioned by Shakespeare. Ira Gale Widor's rh and 8th Organ Symphonies. T. C. Whitmer, European Teachers of Singing. P. D. Aldrich. The Chord of the Diminished Seventh. D. S. N. Penfield. Mendelssohn and His Violin Concerto. J. N. Huyette. The Theory of Violin-Playing. E. Gruenberg.

Musical Herald .- J. Curwen. 2d. July. Madame Lemmens Sherrington. With Portrait.
German Imperial Choir Contest. Editor.
Song in Both Notations:—"The South Wind," by Wm. McKendrick.

Musical Times .- Novello. 4d. July. Hans Richter. Illustrated.

Robrau: the Birthplace of Haydn. Illustrated. Frank Merrick.

Critics I have Known. Joseph Bennett.

The Influence of Fashion on the Art of Music. Sir J. Stainer.

Anthems: "The Woods and Every Sweet-Smelling Tree," by J. E. West;

"While the Earth Remaineth," by A. R. Gaul.

National Review. - EDWARD ARNOLD. 28. 6d. July. Is the Unionist Party committed to Old-Age Pensions? (a) C. A. Whitmore:

(a) Sir John Dorington: (3) Edward Bond.

The Civil War in France. Admiral Masse.

Studies of a Biographer: Southey's Letters. Leslie Stephen.

The British Sunday. Rev. H. H. Henson.

American Affairs. A. Maurice Low.

A Study in Jew-Baiting. F. C. Conybeare.

The Genesis of Germany. Henry Cust.

The Commonwealth of Australia. B. R. Wise.

Greater British. South Africa. Greater Britain; South Africa.

Natural Science.—Young J. Pentland, Edinburgh. 18. June. The Study of Natural History. Prof. J. A. Thomson. Fresh-Water Biological Stations: America's Example. D. J. Scourfield. Weismann's "Regeneration." Prof. Marcus Hartog.

Nature Notes .- ELLIOT STOCK. 2d. June. The Vanishing African Fauna. The Extermination of Monkeys. Robert Morley.

New Century Review.—434 STRAND. 6d. July.
The Sunday Prophecy of Alphonse Esquiros. T. H. S. Escott.
Some Experiences of an Indi in Barrister. Continued. Sir William Rattigan.
The Forgotten Churchill. F. G. Walters.
Paris and the Paris ans ; In and About Bohemia.
Gambling as It was and as It is. Lawrence Irwell.
The North-Western Provinces and Oudh Court of Wards Bill. Fendall Currie.
Early Associations of Flicketh.

Early Associations of Elizabeth B. Browning, Alice M. Timmins. Transatlantic Whimsicalities. R. S. Sillard. Pickwickian Studies. Continued. Percy Fitzgerald.

New England Magazine .- 5, PARK SQUARE, BOSTON. 25 cents. June Grand Manan. Illustrated. Wm. I. Cole.
Lorenzo Dow. With Portraits. Emily S. Gilman.
Insect-Eating Birds of America; Our Northern Fly-catchers. Illustrated.
Wm. Everett Cram.
Wm. Morris's Commonweal. Illustrated. Leonard D. Abbott.
Liberty though Levislation.

w.m. MOTIS'S COMMONWOOL, Illustrated, Leonard D. Abbott. Liberty through Legislation, Joseph Lee. Hamilton College: New England's First College out of New England. Illustrated. E. P. Powell. New Haven. Illustrated. Walter Allen.

New Orthodoxy .- 30, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July. So-Called Heresy: the Final Court of Appeal. Rev. Robert Tuck. The Gospel of the Holy Ghost. Continued. Rev. Robert Tuck.

New World .- GAY AND BIRD. 35. June.

Formal Reform. Ernest C. Moore.
History a Teacher of Liberal Religion. Samuel M. Crothers.
Zionism. Josephine Lazarus.
The National Movement amongst the Jews. Gotthard Deutsch.
Immortality and Physical Research. James H. Hyslop.
Mythical and Legendary Elements in the New Testament. Samuel J. ience of the Social Question on the Genesis of Christianity. Francis

A. Christie.

The Printing Press and Personality. Gerald Stanley Lee.
The Psychological Evidence for Theism. G. M. Stratton.
The New Evangelical Catechism. pW. G. Tarrant.

Nineteenth Centurand Sampson Low. 28. 6d. July.

Are we to lose South Africa? Sir Sydney Shippard, School Children as Wage-earners. Sir John Gorst, The International Council of Women in Congress. Countess of Aberdeen. The Open Spaces of the Future. Miss Octavia Hill. The International Council of Women in Congress. Countess: The Open Spaces of the Future. Miss Octavia Hill. The Mediæval Sunday. Father Thurston. The Native Australian Family. Miss Edith Simcox. Dante's Ghosts. D. R. Fearon. While Wniting in a Friend's Room. Sir Algernon West. The Teeth of the Schoolboy. Edwin Collins. The Outlook at Ottawa. J. G. Snead Cox. The English Masque. Prof. Edw. Dowden. Is there really a "Crisis" in the Church? Sir Charles Roe. Lord Ellenborough. Sir Spencer Walpole. Old Age Pensions in France. Arthur F. Wood. A Parlamentary Government in Japan. H. N. G. Bushby. "A Supreme Moment"; Play. Mrs. W. K. Clifford.

Nonconformist Musical Journal .- 29, PATERNOSTER Row. 2d. July. Music at Rushden Old Baptist Chapel. Anthem: —" Jesu, Thou Soul of All Our Joys," by A. Berridge.

North American Review.-WM. Heinemann. 2s. 6d. June. Conditions and Prospects of the Treasury. Lyman J. Gage. Israel among the Nations. Max Nordau. Jeffersonian Principles. Wm. J. Bryan. The Imbroglio in Samoa. Henry C. Ide. Commercial Education. James Bryce. The Industrial Commission. S. N. D. North. The Reverses of Britomart. Edmund Gosse. Taxtion of Public Expedient. The Reverses of Dittomart. Lomund coose.
Taxation of Public Franchises. John Ford,
The Outlook for Carlism. James Roche
The War with Spain. Continued. Maj.-Gen. N. A. Miles.
Present Aspects of the Dreyfus Case. Joseph Reinach.
The Peace Conference. A Diplomatist at the Hague.

Open Court.-KEGAN PAUL. 6d. June. Paganism in the Roman Church. Rev. Th. Trede. Condorcet. With Portrait. Professor L. Lévy-Bruhl. Peace on Earth. Dr. Paul Carus. Plato and the Cross. Illustrated. Dr. Paul Carus.

Organist and Choirmaster .-), Berners Street. 3d. June. Anthems: "Cantate Domino" and "Deus Misereatur." By Dr. C.

Outing.-International News Co. 25 cents. June. Through the "Green" with the Iron Clubs. Illustrated. Findley S. Douglas, and the Flow Illustrated. Ed. W. Sandys.
The New Yachts of the Year. Illustrated. A. J. Kenealy.
Five Weeks Awheel in France. Continued. Illustrated. "Sidney Cross."
Up to the Hills in India. Continued. Illustrated. P. E. Stevenson.

Overland Monthly .- SAN FRANCISCO. 10 cents. June. Amecameca, Mexico. Cunyngham Cunningham.

The Congress of American Aborigines at the Omaha Exposition. Illustrated.

Mary A. Harriman.

Rainfall and Wheat in California. With Diagrams. W. H. Fraser.

Photographing Fishes. Illustrated. R. W. Shufeldt.

Pall Mall Magazine.—18, Charing Cross Road. 18. July.
Modern Architecture in Chicago. Illustrated. Peter B. Wight.
Wireless Telegraphy. Illustrated. H. C. Marillier.
Polo. Illustrated. Capt. A. G. Bagot.
The Anglo-American "Entente." Lord Charles Beresford.
Silhouettes in Parliament. Continued. Illustrated. F. G. Higginbottom.
The Hundred Best Novels. W. E. Henley.

Parents' Review.—Kegan Paul... 6d. June.
Nervous Children and Their Training. Continued. Dr. G. H. Savage.
The Religious Teaching of Our Children. Mrs. P. H. Bagenal.
Educational Disappointments. T. N. Hart Smith.
Browning on the Incarnation. Continued. Rev. C. V. Gorton.

Pearson's Magazine.-C. A. Pearson. 18. July. The Russian Ice-Breaking Steamer Ermack; the Strongest Ship Afloat. Hustrated. Levin Carnac. How to Become Rich. Illustrated. Leading Self-Made Millionaires of America. America.
Algiers; a City of Ghosts and Shadows. Illustrated. Peter Keary.
The Secrets of St. Paul's. Illustrated. Gertrude Bacon.
How Soldiers Shoot. Illustrated. Marcus Tindal.
Pig-Sticking. Illustrated. Hesketh Prichard.
Signalling through Space. Illustrated. Herbert C. Fyfe.
How to Rescus the Drowning. Illustrated. M. L. Ewes.
Human Architecture. Illustrated. Turner Morton.

Physical Review.—Macmillan. 50 cents. June.

The Conducti ity and Dissociation of Some Electrolytes. With Diagrams. Wm. Foster, Junr.

The Derivation of the Equations of a Plane Electro-Magnetic Wave. With Diagrams. Edw. B. Rosa.

A Determination of the Modulus of Elasticity for Small Loads. With Diagrams. Charles P. Weston.

A Normal Curve of Magnetisation of Iron. With Diagrams. W. S. Frank'in and S. S. Clark.

Determination of Hysteresis Loss in Iron for Small Ranges of Induction. With Diagrams. H. S. Webb.

Poet-Lore. - GAY AND BIRD. 65 cents. June. The American as seen by a Melancholy Dane and a Mystical Hindoo. American as seen by a Meiancholy Dane and a Mystical Hindoo Magnus Mykilati. Clues to Emerson's Mystic Verse. William Sloame Kennedy. Bellmar; the Swedish Poet of Native Romanca. P. H. Pearson. Motherless Heroines in English Classics. Gertrude Withington. The Art Spirit in Browning's "Flight of the Duchess." Charlotte Moore. Shakespeare's Legerdemain with Time in "Julius Cæsar."

Positivist Review .- WM. REEVES. 3d. July. Comte's Psychology. J. H. Bridges. Honour—True and False. Frederic Harrison. Comte as Religious Leader. Charles G. H gginson.

Practical Teacher .- 33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July. Educational Holiday Courses with our Continental Neighbours. Superannuation in South Australia. Home and Foreign Travel. Illustrated.

Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review.—48, Aldersgate Street.
28. July.

Martin Luther. Joseph Ritson. Myth in Relation to Religion. John Forster. The Dantean Idea of Future Punishment. Wm. Barker. The Dantean Idea of Future Punishment. Wm. Barker. Marcus Aurelius. John Welford. St. Paul's Conception of Sanctification. R. G. Graham. Romanticism and Religion. Dr. James Lindsay. The Progress of Early Christianity. F. Jeffs. Recent Anthropology. Arthur S. Peake. The Good and the Evil of the Catholic Revival. John Day Thompson. Jonas Lie. Robert Hind. Trevor's Book "My Quest for God." Edward R. Davies. C. M. Sheldon's Works. H. Ycoll.

Public Health,—129, Shaptesbury Avenue. 18. June.
Bacteriology in Public Health Work. Dr. D. S. Davies.
Legislative Measures Necessary for the Abolition of Tuberculosis in Cattle. Dr. Meredith Young.
Pasteur Filtration at Darjeeling. J. Nield Cook.

Public School Magazine .- 131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. June. Bedford Grammar School. Illustrated. H. M. Dymock, Seafield Technical College. Illustrated. Philip Whitwell Wilson, Public School Chapel. Illustrated. Norman Bennet. Public School Athletics in 1899. Illustrated.

Liverpool College Upper School. Illustrated. K. B. D. Forbes.
Norwich. Illustrated. Scott Damant.
The Royal Naval School at Eltham. Illustrated. Philip W. Wilson.
Public School Chapel. Continued. Illustrated. Norman Bennet.
Dismissal of Assistant Masters at Grantham Grammar School.

Purite The Mill The Con A Christi Letter to The Fait A Free C Willi Rev. W. An East

Institutio Woo Church I Jane Aus Tempera Ra

Alfred P From Ro Great N Rou Invoices From L B, H The Corr Timber fo Reading

Revie

Trusts; Oliver Cr Steam The Mor The Stat Modern 1 A Pilgrin Unit Brick-Pa

> The Art How Do Rowton A Crop o

Fost

me Ph

Gold in t

The Rus

With the A Soap-E S The Eng Some Me The Wed Herb

The High Some Ra Loans. Annual N

School-P The Edir Plain Sor Songs in

The Tead

Butterflie C. L Instinct i A Histor British F Ticks and Cinchona Puritan.—James Bowden, Henrietta Street, W.C. 6d. July.
Th. Mills Hotels, New York. Illustrated. J. R. Macdonald.
The Congregational School, Caterham. Illustrated. Felix Hope.
A Christian Daily Newspaper. Symposium.
Letter to Archbishop Temple. Candid Critic.
The Faith of Yesterday. Thomas G. Selby.
A Free Church Camp for Public School Boys. Illustrated. J. E. Hodder
William

Williams, . Wm. Tidd Matson; a Free Church Hymn-Writer. Illustrated. Rev. Wm. Tidd Matson; a Fre D. Henry Rees. An East End Sportsman's Sunday.

Quiver.-Cassell. 6d. July. Institutions for the Blind; the Chasing of the Shadows. Illustrated. D. L. Woolmer.
Church Life in Canada. Illustrated. Special Commissioner.
Jane Austen's Private Life. Illustrated.
Temperance Enterprise in New York. Illustrated. A. P. Hollingdale.
Weather Wisdom of the Bible. Illustrated. Rev. H. B. Freeman.

Railway Magazine .- 73, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. June. Alfred Powell; Interview. Illustrated. From Roofless Pen to Corridor Coach. Illustrated. D. T. Timins. Great Northern Manchester Services; Old and New. Illustrated. Chas.

Rous Marten.

Ro

B. H. Inomas.
The Corris Railway. Illustrated. T. Booth.
Timber for Our Railways. Illustrated. V. L. Whitechurch.
Reading New Station. Illustrated. W. J. Scott.
Continental Tourists for the British Isles. Parisian.

Review of Reviews (America) .- 13. ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK.

2, cents. June.

Trusts; the Rush to Industrial Monopoly. Byron W. Holt.

Oliver Cromwell and the National Church of England. Illustrated. W. T. Stead.

Stead.
The Mormons in Mexico. Map and Illustrations. Chas. W. Kindrick.
The State as a Farmer. Illustrated. Leonora Beck Ellis.
July.
Modern History and Historians in France. Illustrated. Pierre de Coubertin.
A Pilgrimage to some Scenes of Spanish Occupancy in the South-west of the United States. Illustrated. George W. James.
Brick-Paving in the Middle West of the United States. Illustrated. H.
Foster Bain.
Some Phases of the Philippine Situation. John Barrett.
Gold in the Philippines. Ramon Reyes Lala.

Royal Magazine,—C. A. Pearson, 3d. July.

The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Roderick Grey.
The Crests of the Waves. Illustrated. J. H. Schooling.
How Dogs are Raced. Illustrated. Wellesley Pain.
A Prince of British India. Illustrated. A. L. Cotton.
Rowton House; a Home for the Shabby-Genteel. Illustrated. A. Goodrich.
A Crop of Curious Cyclists. Illustrated. Mulvy Ouseley.
An Elephantine Football Final. Illustrated. W. M. Duckworth, Junr.

Saint George.-ELLIOT STOCK. IS. July. The National Trust. Canon H. D. Rawnsley.
The Ruskin May Day Festival at Whitelands College. E. C. Ivatt.
"Western Rubaiyat;" Poem. John C. Kenworthy.

Saint Nicholas .- MACMILLAN. 18. July. With the Rough Riders. Illustrated. Dr. Henry La Motte, A Soap-Bubble Magician. Illustrated. Meredith Nugent.

Saint Peter's.—37, ESSEX STREET, STRAND. 6d. July.
The English College, Rome. Illustrated. Rev. John Pollen.
Some Memories of Father Mathew. Justin McCarthy.
The Wedding-Ring and the Catholic Marriage Service. Illustrated.
Herbert Thurston.
The High Crosses of Ireland. Illustrated. L. M. Cullen.
Some Rare Papal Coins. Illustrated. Ernest Robertson. Illustrated. Rev.

School Board Gazette. - Bemrose and Sons is. June. Loans, Annual Meeting of the Association of School Boards. Continued. School-Planning. Continued.

School Music Review .- Novello. 14d. July. The Edinburgh Church of Scotland Training College.
Plain Song; the Solesmes Method.
Songs in Both Notations:—"The Woods," by Mendelssohn; "The Dolly's Lullaby," by H. Elliot Button.

School World,-MACMILLAN. 6d. June. The Teaching of English Composition. J. C. Nesfield. The Teaching of Geometry. Concluded. Prof. G. M. Minchin.

Science Gossip.—Simpkin Marshall. 6d. July. Butterflies of the Palaearctic Region, Continued, With Diagram. Dr. H. Butterflies of the random C. Lang.

Instinct in Ants. R. Dickson-Bryson.

Instinct in Ants. R. Dickson-Bryson.

A History of Chalk. Continued. Illustrated. Edw. A. Martin.

British Freshwater Mites. Continued. Illustrated. Charles D. Soar.

Ticks and "Louping-ill." Continued. Illustrated. E. G. Wheler.

Cinchona Bark. Lewis Ough.

Scottish Geographical Magazine, -Edward Stanford. 1s. 6d. June.

The Hydrography of the Caucasus. With Map. Victor Dingelstedt. The Khedivic Possessions in the Basin of the Upper Upangi. Continued. S. H. F. Capenny.

Scribner's Magazine.—Sampson Low. 12. July. ters of R. L. Stevenson. Continued. Illustrated. Sidney The Letters of R. L. Stevenson. Colvin. Colvin.

The Foreign Mail Service at New York. Illustrated. E. G. Chat. Daniel Webster. With Portrait. George F. Hoar. Havana since the Occupation. Illustrated. James F. J. Archibald. Letter to a Young Man Wishing to be an American. Robert Grant.

Strad .- 186, FLEET STREET. 2d. July.

Antonius Stradivarius. Continued. H. Petherick.
The Literature of the Violincello. Continued. E. van Der Straeten.
Beethoven's Trios. Continued. J. Matthews.
The Last Sale of Valuable Violins in the Historical Room in Leicester Square, Illustrated.

Strand Magazine. - George Newnes, Ltd. 6d. July. Remarkable Cycles. Illustrated. Harold J. Shepstone. From Behind the Speaker's Chair. Illustrated. Continued. Henry W. Royal Mésalliances, Illustrated, A. de Burgh, Covent Garden Stars in Their Favourite Rôles, Illustrated, Kathleen Schlesinger, The Arks of Arktown, California. Illustrated. Laura B. Starr. Sand Art. Illustrated. Thomas E. Curtis.

Sunday at Home .- 56. PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. July. Trevelyan's "Wycliffs." With Portrait. Wm. Stevens.
A Sunday at Savaii, Samoa. Illustrated. Rev. R. W. Thompson.
Life in the Monasteries of Meteora. Illustrated. J. C. Cleghorn.
Gipping: Some Old History Retold. Illustrated. Rev. J. P. Hobson.
Cambridge House. Illustrated. F. W. Newland. Spanish Evangelisation Society; a Pioneer Mission. E. B. Moore.

Sunday Magazine.-ISBISTER AND Co. 6d. July. The Days of the We-k. Rev. S. Baring-Gould.
The Poor Law and the Children. Canon Barnett.
Rev. Dr. Alexander MacKennal. With Portraits. David Paton.
The Convict Ship Success. Margaretta Byrde.
Ripon Cathedral. Illustrated. Archdeacon Danks.
The Butter-Bur: Illustrated. Rev. Hugh Macmillan.

Temple Bar.-MACMILLAN. 18. July. John Wilson Croker; a Successor of Samuel Pepys. A Whirl through Batavia. A whirt introggi Batavia.

Sigismondo Castromadiano. E. Martinengo Cesaresco.

A Medley of Voices. Chas. Dray 20tt.

The Story of St. Helena. Malcolm Seton.

Temple Magazine.-Horace Marshall. 6d. July. Famous Men and Women I have met. Illustrated. Tracey L. Robinson, Hop-Picking in Mid-Kent. Illustrated. A Booker, A Night in the House of Commons. Howard Cameron. Silent London. Illustrated Gertrud: Bacon. Prospecting in British South Africa. F. R. Wi liams. Some Curious Collecting Boxes. Illustrated. George A. Wade, Theosophical Review .- 36, CHARING CROSS, S.W. 28. June. The Trismegistic Literature. Continued. G. R. S. Mead. On Some Difficulties of the Inner Life. Concluded. Annie Besant. The Irish Gods and Their Worshippers. Mrs. Hooper. An Idian Yogin. G. R. Traces of the East in Old Spunish Legends. Miss Hardcastle. The Heavenly Kingdom of the Holy Grail. Continued. Mrs. Cooper Obblew. Oakley.

The "Friend of God of the Oberland." Miss Carr.

Travel.-Horace Marshall. 3d. June. Our World's Cycling Commission. Illustrated. John Foster Fraser and Others. Others.
A Peep into Eastern Africa. Illustrated. Rev. J. Baxter.
A Coaching Tour through Savoy. Illustrated. Dr. H. S. Lunn.
Mrs. Moin on Mountaineering for Ladies; Interview. Illustrated.
Some Beauties of the Northumberland Coast. Illustrated. Chas. H.

United Service Magazine.-Wm. CLOWES AND SONS. 25. July. The Earl of St. Vincent. With Portrait. Viscount St. Vincent and L. G. The Earl of St. Vincent. With Portrait. Viscount St. Vincent and L. G. Carr Laughton.
Life in a Gunboat on the West Coast of Africa. A Naval Officer.
Some of My Shipmates. Robert Lendall.
The Ethics of War. Major-General H. M. Bengough.
Russia; the Great Northern Power. Rev. Philip Young.
The Last Campaign and the Death of Turenne. William O'Connor Morris.
Dost Muhammad Khan, Amiri-Kabir. Major Hugh Pearse.
Field Fortification in Trah. Captain A. K. Slessor.
A Tactical Question. Major A. W. A. Pollock.
The State of the Army. Beados.
An Eighteenth-Century Estimate of Cromwell. H. B. Goodwin.

Werner's Magazine.—43, East 19th Street, New York.
25 cents. June. "Cyrano de Bergerac." Edouard Rod. Elocution and Literature, F. X. Carmody. Louis Arthur Russell.
The Teaching of Music in the New York Normal College,

Westminster Review.-F. WARNE. 25. 6d. July. The Woman of the Future. Annabella Dennehy.
The Rights of Property.
Company and Crown. H. G. K.
What should be the Libral Policy? An Old Radical.
A Plea for a Liberal Education. James Oliphant.
A State Crutch for Old Ag: Pensions. A. Edmund Spender.
A Theory of Junius. N. W. Sibley.
The Domestic Problem and How to Solve It. Allan Ogilvie.
The Awakening of Woman. Ignota.
On Some French Appreciations of the Anglo-Saxon Genius. H. D. Oakeley.
Woman's Duty. Emma C. Hewitt.
A Slight Suggestion as to One Cause of Woman's Present State of Discontent.
A Philosophic Amatour.
Marriags or Free Love. Effic Johnson.
Hydropathy and Small-Pox. Observer. The Woman of the Future. Annabella Dennehy.

Wide World Magazine, -GEO. NEWNES. 6d. July. Twelve Years' Captivity in Chains in Omdurman. Continued. Illustrated. Chas. Neufeld. Chas. Neufeld.
Adventures on the Roof of the World. Illustrated. R. P. Cobbold.
The Columbus Festival in Barcelona. Illustrated. B. Waters.
Curiosities of the South Seas. Illustrated. Basil Thomson.
A Finnish Wedding: the Quaintest Wedding in the World. Illustrated.
Kathleen Schlesinger.
The Miracle Fair of Congonhas. Illustrated. H. K. Scott.
In the Wilds of Alaska. Illustrated. A. Beverly Smith.

Windsor Magazine. - WARD, LOCK AND Co. 6d. July. Signor Marconi and Wireless Telegraphy. Illustrated. Cleveland Moffett. St. John's River, Florida, choked with Hyacinths. Illustrated. Walter

Lord's Cricket Ground. Illustrated. M. Randal Roberts.
Minehead to Land's End; Two Hundred Miles by Coach. Illustrated.
Wilfrid Klickmann.

John Bright as an Angler. Illustrated. W. A. Somerville. Sea-Spiders. Illustrated. Edward Step. A Visit to the Strong Rooms of Chancery Lane. Illustrated. B. M. O'Reilly. Woman at Home. - Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. July.

Royal Amusements. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Tooley. French Fashion-Land. Illustrated. Marie A. Belloc. Womanhood .- 5, Agar Street, Strand. 6d. July. Student Life at Newnham. Illustrated. K. P. Marillier.

Yale Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD. 75 cents. May. A French Colonial Experiment in Indo-China. Henry E. Bourne. Taxation of Mortgages in California. Carl C. Plehn. The Political Drift of Germany. H. H. Powers.

Young Man .- HORACE MARSHALL 3d. July. Is Britain on the Down Grade? Symposium.
Water and Its Wonders. Frank Ballard.
Eugene Sandow at Work. Illustrated.
The Young Man and His Pleasures. W. J. Dawson.

Young Woman,-Horace Marshall. 3d. July. Gertrude Atherton on American Wives and English Husbands; Interview. Illustrated. The Adventures of a Lady Journalist in India. Miss Billington. What Wom:n have done in Literature. How Miss Twining reformed the Workhouse.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Aligemeine Konservative Monatsschrift.—E. Ungleich, Leipzig. 1 Mk. June.

Johann Kasper Bluntschli in Baden. Pfarrer Kern, Pictures of Swedish Churches. J. F. Oxford Sketches. J. Siedel. The Human Hand and Superstition. W. Engler.

Alte und Neue Welt .- Benziger, Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. June. X-Rays Illustrated Dr. M. Wildermann.
Abt Vogler. A. Hofmann.
Notes of Travel in Austria. Continued. Illustrated. Dr. G. Grupp.
Marriage Customs in Brittany. Illustrated.
Martin Greif as a Lyric Poet. With Portrait. Dr. C. Stemplinger.

Archiv für Gesetzgebung und Statistik.—Carl Heymann, Berlin.

2 Miss. 50 Pf. Nos. 5—6.

The New Old Age Insurance Law in Germany. Dr. E. Lange.
The Social Conditions of the Silk Industry of East Switzerland. Dr. F.

Schuler.

Progressive Taxation. Dr. C. Heiss. The New Law relating to Care of the Aged, &c., in Italy. Prof. C. F.

Dahelm.-Poststrasse 9, Leipzig. 2 Mks per qr. June 3. How the Sailor finds His Way Across the Ocean. F. Meister.

June 17. Medical Missions. S. Layer. Schloss Hohkönigsburg. Dr. H. Luthmer.

June 24.
Odilienberg and Its Monastery. Illustrated. Dr. H. Luthmer.
Birds and Their Young. Prof. W. Marshall.

Deutscher Hausschatz,-F. Pustet, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 12. Colombia and Its People, Illustrated, Archduchess Magdalena of Austria. Illustrated. Joseph Engel. Toledo. Illustrated. O. Hirt. Berthold of Regensburg. A. Hofmann. Salzburg. Illustrated. F. Koch-Breuberg. G. F. Handel. With Portrait. E. Kreusch.

Heft 13.

Education and Travel. Prof. P. Meyer. Vianna Himmelspforte. Illustrated. C. Wolfsgruber, Cordova and Cadiz. Illustrated. O. Hist.

Deutsche Revue.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.
6 Mks. per qr. June.

St. Petersburg at the Time of the Crimean War; Extracts from a Diary of St. Petersburg at the United States and in Europe. Pierre de Coub-rtin.

Telepathy. Prof. M. Benedikt.

Telepathy. Prof. M. Benedikt.

Insanity and Crime. Prof. Pelmun.

Colonial Expansion and Territorial Extension. Lord Farrer.

Deafness among Railway Servants. K. Bürkner.

Prince Hatzfeld in Paris, January-March, 1813. Continued. W. Oncken.

Experiences in Samoa. Capt. Freiher von Erhardt.

The People's Representatives and Art. Dr. Max Nordau.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Paetel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per

A Century of Bavaria-Wittelsbach History, 1797-1899. R. Fester. British India To-Day. M. von Brandt. Conrad Ferdinand Meyer. Continued. Adolf Frey. Prince Bismarck's "Thoughts and Reminiscences." Max Lenz. Alexander Pushkin. Eugen Zabel. Eduard von Simson. Erich Schmidt. Berlin Music. Karl Krebs. Karl Storm. F. Tönnies.

Deutsche Wowte.

Deutsche Worte.—Langegasse 15, Vienna VIII. 50 Kr. May. National Democracy and International Social Democracy. O. W. Payer. Gartenlaube .- ERNST KRIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 6.

Ludwig II. of Bavaria and Art. R. Artaria. Germans Abroad. Johannes Schmal. National Costume Museum at Berlin. Illustrated. Ewald Thiel.

Gesellschaft .- J. C. C. BRUNS, MINDEN. 57 Pf. June 1. The Genesis of Agrarian Ideas. H. Starkenburg. Christian Wagner. With Portrait. Julius Hart.

June 15. Eduard Bernstein and Social Democracy. G. Maier. Otto Julius Bierbaum. With Portrait. W. Holzamer.

Kunstgewerbeblatt .- E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. June. The Development of Form in Furniture. Illustrated. Julius Leisching.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau. -S. FISCHER, BERLIN. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. June.

The Origin of Large Towns. F. Oppenheimer. Friedrich Nietzsche. R. Freiherr von Seydlitz. Friedrich Hölderlin. Moritz Heimann.

Nord und Sud. - Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks.

Salomon Jadassohn, With Portrait, Martin Krause.
The German Order in Greece. Franz Rühl.
The East-Elbe City. H. Schmidkunz.
Victor Rydberg. Gustaw Karpeles.
The Tree of Life in Various Religions. A. Wünsche.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden, 10 Mks. 80 Pf. per annum. May.

The Church as the Messenger of Grace. R. von Nostitz Rieneck. The Suppression of Anarchy. St. von Dunin Borkowski. Bavaria and the Thirty Years' War. O. Pfülf. Ebb and Flow in Connection with the Copernican System. A. Müller. The Sacred Mountains of Tuscany. Concluded. M. Meschler.

Ueber Land und Meer.—DEUTSCHE VERLAGS-ANSTALT, STUTTGART.
1 Mark. Heft 11.

The Rhine-Elbz Canal. With Map. J. L. Algermissen.
Collecting Sza-Gulls' Eggs in Kunitz. Illustrated. G. Krause.
Max Schneckenburger. Illustrated.
Fictures of Naval Life. Continued. Illustrated. R. Schneider.
Hans Joachim von Zieten. Illustrated. Dr. A. Römer.

Ver S The Sp Vom

Boppar Picture Andern Posters D

After th Electric Alexan Johann

John (? Jens Pe

The De Blb

As

Réclan Gottfri The Sp Bonapa French Corre M. But Napole

Creuso The W The C Co The Re French Vendée Mediæ

War ar Some (

The Pi Journ The R Previsi

N Magde clu Music Mei

From I The Fr Mor Tokio. Hollan Curious

M. Tot Pigs. The Bo Daniel M. Loc

Ver Sacrum.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 15 Mks. per ann. Heft 4. The Spirit of Japanese Art. Illustrated.

Vom Fels zum Meer. — UNION-DEUTSCHE-VERLAGSGESELLSCHAFT,
STUTTGART. 75 Pf. Heft 21.

New Acquisitions of the Berlin Gallery. Illustrated.
Boppard. Illustrated. Rhenanus.

Pictures of Naples. Illustrated. W. Kaden.
Andernach. Illustrated, Rhenanus.

Posters. Illustrated, Rhenanus.

Andernach. Illustrate Posters. Illustrated.

Ioffett. Walter

trated

Reilly.

rview.

s. per

y. er.

6.

Mks.

Die Zeit.-GUNTHERGASSE 1, VIENNA IX./3. 50 Pf. June 3 After the Dreyfus Revision. Pollex. Electric Light Railways, W. Berdrow. Alexander Pushkin. N. Golant.

June 10. Johann Strauss. R. Wallaschek. June 17. John (?) Chamberlain. H. W. Macrosty. Jens Peter Jacobsen. J. Schlaf.

June 24.
The Struggle for Freedom in Italy. Dr. N. Colajanni.
Hungary and Croatia. A. Petrovics.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 26 Mks. per annum. June.

E S of 1466 in Portugal. Illustrated. S. R. Kochler. Sir J. E. Millais. Continued. Illustrated. W. Weisbach, Dürer's Aesthetics. Illustrated. Continued. K. Lange. Rome after the Renaissance. Illustrated. C. Eckert.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde,—VRLHAGEN UND KLASING, LEIPZIG.
6 Mks. May—June.

German Diaries and Almanacs at the Beginning of the Nineteenth Century.
Illustrated. Dr. A. Schlossar.
Luther's Handwriting, 1523-1544. Illustrated. P. E. Thiele.
Two Editions de Luxe for the Jubilee of Franz Joseph I. Illustrated. Dr. R. Beer.

Two Editions de Luise for the Joseph R. Beer. Jean Paul. Illustrated. Prof. L. Geiger. The Oldest Printed Sources of the History of German Student Life. Continued. Illustrated. Dr. W. Fabricius.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Association Catholique. -3, Rue de L'Abbave, Paris. 2 frs. June 15.

The Development of German Socialism. G. de Pascal.
Social Catholicism and Christian Democracy. Continued.
The Influence of the Consumer on Wages. E. Rivière.

Bibliothèque Universelle.—18, King William Street, Strand.
208. per annum. June.

Réclame. Paul Stapfer.
Gottfried Keller. Continued. F. Dumur.
The Spectre of the Brocken. J. Des Roches.
Bonaparte in Switzerland, 1814-15. E. de Budé.
French and English Detectives. Continued. Aug. Glardon.

Correspondant.—14, RUE DE L'ENERGY.
M. Buffet. Duc de Broglie.
Napoleon III. and Italy, 1860-4. Continued. Comte J. Grabinski.
Creusot. Henri Joly.
The-White Slaves of the French Antilles.
F. Mury.
The Catholic Renaissance in England in the Nineteenth Century Concluded. P. Thureau-Dangin.
June 25. Correspondant .- 14, RUE DE L'ABBAYE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c. June 10.

The Republican Party in France.
The Congo Free State. With Map. J. Darcy.
French Catholic Missions in India. L. de L. de Laborie.
Vendée, Eug. Bossard.
Murat in Spain. G. de Grandmaison.
Mediæval and Renaissance Art in Germany. Mme. E. Paris.

Humanité Nouvelle.—15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris. 1 fr. 25c. May Supplement.

War and Militarism.

Some Objections to Economic Materialism. G. Sorel.
Alcoholism and the Conditions of Labour in Belgium. Concluded.
The Developer

The Present Condition of Finland. N. R. af Ursin. Journal des Économistes,-14, Rue Richelieu, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. June 15.

The Reform of Prussian Trade Unions in the Eighteenth Century. E Castelot

Prevision in Political Economy. Ch. M. Limousin. Ménestrel .- 2 bis, Rue Vivienne, Paris. 30 c. June 4, 11. Magdeleine Marie Desgarcins; the Life and Death of a Tragedian. Con-cluded. A. Pougin.

Music in Switzerland. Albert Soubies.

Mercure de France.—15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris. 2 frs. June. From Kant to Nietzsche. J. de Gaultier. The French Salons. A. Fontainas.

Monde Moderne. -- 3, Rue St. Benoft, Paris. 1 fr. 60 c. June. monde moderne, —5, kue St. Benott, Paris.
Tokio. Illustrated, Jack Marshall,
Holland. Illustrated. A. Ganier.
Curious Almanacs. Illustrated. H. d'Almeras.
Tobacco Factories. Illustrated. Jean Roseyro.
M. Toulouse-Lautrec, Illustrated. Octave Uzanne.
Pigs. Illustrated. Dr. Hector George.

Pigs. Illustrated. Dr. Hector George.

Nouvelle Revue,—18, Kino William Street, Strand.
30s. per half-year. June 1.

The Bourbons in Poland. Count Wodzinski.
Daniel Lesusur; a Woman of Letters. H. Lapause.

M. Lockroy and the French Military Navy. Commandant Chasseriaud.
Letters on Foreign Politics. Mme. J. Adam.

June 15.

The Last French Indian Frigates. Dr. Desjardins.
An Unappreciated Poet. E. Rodocanachi.
The Vienna Novel. V. Rossel.
Puvis de Chavannes. C. Mauclair.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.—23, BOULEVARD POISSONIÈRE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c. June 1.

The Peace Congress. Emilio Castelar. Emilio Castelar. Maria L. de Rute.

The Hague Conference. General Turr.

The Marchand Mission and the Egyptian Question. E. Clavel.

The Franco-Italian Rapprochement. G. Rubstti.

Special Number, June.

Emilio Castelar. Illustrated.

Emilio Castelar. Illustrated

Réforme Sociale. -54. RUE DE SEINE, PARIS.

Democracy. René de Kerallain.

The Law of Civilisation and Decay. H. Mazel. Democracy. Concluded. R. de Kerallain. The Lyons Congress and Freedom of Education in France.

Revue Blanche .- 1, Rue Lappitte, Paris. 1 fr. June 1. Henry Becque. Gustave Kahn. Military Justice. Valentin Patrice.

June 15. The Britannic Empire. Paul Louis. Hamlet. Symposium.

Revue Bleue. - FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. June 3 A Prologue to the Chanson de Roland. Joseph Fabre. The Aesthetic Sense. Mile. D. Melegare.

Ethical Teaching in Colleges. A. Fouillée.
The Marchand Mission. L. Levin-Desplaces.
Louise Adélaide de Bourbon; the Last of the Condé Princesses. H

June 17.
The Solidarity of States; Memoir to the Hague Conference.
Waterloo. Col. Patry.
The Salons of 1899. Faul Flat.

College Education. A. Fouillée. Versailles under Louis XIII. P. de Nolhac.

Revue des Deux Mondes.-18, KING WILLIAM STREET, STRAND.

30s. per half-year. June 1. gos. per half-year. June 1.

Rebellious Richelieu (1610-1620). G. Hanateaux.
Napoleon III. as a Commander; the Preliminaries of Villa Franca. E. Ollivier.
The Consulate; an Unpublished Document. Count Remacie.
The Excavations at Carthage. P. Berger.
Trade Unionism and Democracy. C. Benoist.

Rebellious Richelieu. Continued. G. Hanateaux.
The Revision of Criminal Trials. A. Desjardins.
French Social Progress. A. Fouillée.
Chinese Merchants and Corporations. M. Courant.
The Curative and Health-giving Forces of Nature. Dr. L. Bithenson.

Revue d'Écourante Relifeus.

Revue d'Économie Politique.—22, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS 20 frs. per annum. May. Workmen's Associations in France. H. Blancheville.

Labour Bureaux. J. de Fenyvessy. Revue Encyclopédique.—18, King William Street, Strand.

7s, per qr. Nature's Musicians. Illustrated. Henri Coupin. Politics in Belgium. Illustrated. Marcel Paisant. Racine and Port Royal. Illustrated. Louis Coquelin.

The Pushkin Centenary. Illustrated.

June 10,

Pisanello, Animal-Painter. Illustrated.

June 17,

Politics in Germany. Alcide Ebray.

Francisque Sarcey. Illustrated. Henri Castets. The Dutch Colonies. Adrien Mellion.

XUM

Revue Française de l'Etranger et des Colonies.—32, Rue de La Victoire, Paris. 2 frs. June.

The Return of Marchand. G. Demanche.
Algeria; the Population Question. C. R.
The Philippine Insurrection of 1836-7. With Map. C. de Lasalle.

Revue Genérale,-16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per annum. June.

Florentine Painters. Illustrated. Continued. Arnold Goffin. The Woman Question. Concluded. Prosper Saey. The Religious Crisis in England. A. Richardson. Quarries and Quarries. E. F. de Ghellin.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie.—16, RUE SOUFFLOT, PARIS. 18 frs. per annum. May.

Spiritual Power. Edmond Galabert. Tolstoy's Ethical Teaching. M. Kovalewsky.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles. -5, Rue de Mézières, Paris.
1 fr. 25 c. June 5.

Francisque Sarcey. Adolphe Aderer.
Womn in Belgium. Frantz Mahutte.
The Salons of 1890. Concluded. Gaston Migeon.
Rapid Transmission of Thought. Goethe and Frankfort. Ernest Tissot. Postage-Stamp Collecting. Louis Forest. On the Si-Kiang. Paul Lindenberg.

Revue du Monde Catholique.—76, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.
2 frs. 50 c. June z.

The Natade and the Blockade of Dahomey, 1830-1. Continued. A. de Salinis Military Justice and Discipline in the Army. Continued. Jean d'Estoc. Franco-Russian Relations. Continued. A. Savète. African Monarchism. Dom Besse.
The King of Rome. Norbert Lallié.

Revue de Paris.—Asher, 13, Bedford Street, Covent Garden.

60 frs. per annum. June 1. The Marchand Mission. The Marchand Mission.
After the February Revolution, Baron d: Barente.
Two Deaths. E. Faguët.
Poison Dramas. Funck Brentano.
Five Days in the Russian Army. General Izzet Pacha.

A Colonising Method. E. Lavisse,
The Kingdom of Italy (1805). F. Masson.
Richard Strauss. R. Rolland.
Peaceful England. V. Bérard.
The Secret Diplomacy of the Sultan. P. Quillard.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire.—5, Rue de Mázières, Paris.
3 frs. June 20.

Letter to Marcel Fournier on Secondary Education. Hugues Le Roux.

The Regulation of Public Administration. G. Graux. Naval Bases in China. A. A. Fauvel. The English Budget. E. Besson.

Revue des Revues. -12, Avenue de L'Oréra, Paris. 1fr. June 1. Statistics of Marriages and Deaths in Paris. P. Gabillard, Catholics and Protestants in England. P. Berger. L. L. Dhurmer. Illustrated. Henri Frantz. Military Justice. Capt. Gaston Moch. Vsevolod Garchine. With Potrtait. Véra Starkoff, The Future of Wireless Telegraphy. Dr. L. Caze. June 15.

Panama and Nicaragua. Illustrated, R. G. Le Normand,
Social Morality. Emile Boutroux,
The Tendency of Contemporary Art and the French Salons. R. Bouye..
Rosa Bonheur. Illustrated. Mme. Virginie Demont-Breton.
Forf. Lombroso's Recent Books. Marquis R. Paulrecci di Calboli.
Journalism. Dick May.

Revue Scientifique.—Fisher Unwin, Paternoster Square. 6d. June 3.

Fishing in Norway. J. Pérard. The Hovas and the Madagascar Question. M. Zaborowski. June 10.
Carbon in the Atmosphere. Charles Richet.
The Condition of the Merchant Service. Gabriel Fermé.

June 17.

Marine Larva. Louis Roule.
The Condition of the Merchant Service. Continued. G. Fermé. The Incandescent Light. Louis Denayrouze, War and Peace. X.

Revue Socialiste .- 78, Passage Choiseul, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. June. The Third Congress of German Labour Syndicates, E. Milhaud. The Hague Conference. Paul Louis. Bernstein and Socialism. Arturo Labriola. The Origin of Abstract Ideas. Paul Lafarque.

Revue Universitaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 10 frs. per annum. June 15, The Teaching of Archæology in Girls' Schools. Jeanne Crouzst-Benab.n. University Education. Charles Cenil. Semaine Littéraire .- 4, Boulevard du Théâtre, Geneva.

is c. June 17.

Mme. d'Ebner-Eschenbach. With Portrait. Virgile Rossel.

Université Catholique, -Burns and Oates, 20 frs. per annum. June 15.

Leidrade and Christian Teaching. Mgr. Dadolle. The Triple Alliance. Comte J. Grabinski. Joan of Arc and French Feeling. Abbe Delfour. Christian Lupus. R. Parayre.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Bessarione. -3, S. Pantaleo, Rome. 12 frs. per annum. June. Catholic Activity among the Copts, The Eastern Policy of the Popes. Hellenism in Education.

Civiltà Cattolica. - VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. 25 frs. per annum.

Letter of Leo XIII. on Devotion to the Sacred Heart, Catholic France at Lourdes. Presentiments and Telepathy.

June 17.

Encyclical of Leo XIII. on the Consecration of Mankind to the Sacred Heart.

Americanism defended by Two Detractors of the Holy Sec.

Italian Dialects. The Dissolution of Evolution

Nuova Antologia. -- VIA S. VITALE 7, ROME. 46 frs. per annum.

The School Problem in Italy. Prof. E. Cocchia.
Tolstoi and Evangelical Literature. Zino Zini.
France and Italian Missionaries in China. Prof. L. Nocentini, Will England become Catholic? Richard Bagot.
Iune 16. Science and Faith. L. Luzzatti.

Balzac's Friends. F. de Roberto.
A Letter of Emilio Castelar. G.
The Political Abstention of Catholics in Italy. P. Molmenti.

Rassegna Nazionale.-VIA DELLA PACE 2, FLORENCE. 30 frs. per Annum. June 1.
China and the Chinese. Spagnolo-Turco.
From Assab to San-Mun. N. Malnate, Mgr. John Ireland. F. G. S.
A Reply to the Civilta Cattolica. Peregrinus.

Rivista Internazionale.-VIA TORRE ARGENTINA 76, ROMB. 30 frs.

Rural Banks in Germany. L. C. di Chiusano.

Proportional Representation. A. M. Campeggi.

The Commune and its Social Function. F. Inrea.

Rivisita Politica e Letteraria, -3, VIA MARCO MINGHETTI, ROME.

The Parliamentary Comedy concerning the Anglo-Chinese Question. XXX In Austria-Hungary during the Crisis. D. Veroni.

A New Ministerial Responsibility. B. Vita Internazionale. -21, Portici Settentrionale, Milan. June 20.

The Balance of the Dying Century. E. Vidari. Economic Reform in Italy. G. Sansone.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Cludad de Dios .- Real Monasterio Del Escorial, Madrid. 20 pesetas per annum. Berlioz and the Symphonic Poem. E. de Uriarte. Heredity and What Modern Anthropology says about It. Z. M. Nuñez.

June 20.
Le Play and Social Reform. Jose de las Cuevas.
Terrestrial Magnetism. Justo Fernandez.

España Moderna. - Cuesta de Santo Domingo 16, Madrid. 40 pesetas per annum. June.

Polytechnic Institutions in England. Various Writers. Crime in Castile and Social Customs in Madrid in the Time of Philip II. J P. de Guzman. American Poets. G. Valencia.

Garre Georg R Emili

Rev

The I

Eduar Popul The S

> Kri Alexa The S N What

> > The '

T inte of N is t Nin F tend

The

1888

1893 1894

189 x89 189

Tot

XUM

Revista Brazileira.—Travessa do Ouvifor, 31, Rio de Janeiro.
60s. per annum. No. 86.

Viscount de Taunay, X. Garrett and Brazilian Literature. José Verissimo. George Marcial; an Anglo-Brazilian. V. Varea.

2.

d.

pes n.

T

X 20

J

Revista Contemporanea.—Calle de Pizarro 17, Madrid.
2 pesetas. May 30.

The New Bases of the Metric System. De Lannoy The Exploration of the Atmosphere. V. Schaffers.

June 15. "Die Walkure." Eduardo L. Chavarri. A Hundred Leagues on the Frozen Volga, S. C. de Lutoslewski.

Revista Portugueza Colonial E Maritima.—Livraria Ferrin,
Lisbon. 13 frs. per annum. No. 20.
The City of Canton. A. Lobo d'Avila.

The Anglo-French Agreement of March, 1899.
The Trans-African Railway. A. J. d'Araujo,
The Portuguese Navy. Pedro Diniz.

THE DUTCH MAGAZINES.

Eisevier's Gelilustreerd Maandschrift,—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 18. 8d. June.
Eduard Karsen. Illustrated. C. Beeloo,
A Twelve Days' Tour from Deventer to Flims. Illustrated. Antoon Molkenboer.

Popular Sketches by a "Popular Artist." Illustrated. Lynceus.

De Gids.-Luzac and Co. 3s. June. The "Amsterdam" Co-operative Community and How it works. L. Simons. The Science of Seeds. Prof. Heymans.

Vragen des Tijds,-Luzac and Co. 18. 6d. June. Our Educational Duties towards the Children. Dr. J. Th. Mouton. The West Indian Islands. J. H. J. Hamelberg. The Poor Law and the Care of the Children in England. L. Peerbolte.

Woord en Beeld, -ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum. June. Falcons and Falcon-Hunting. Illustrated. E. van Off.l. J. W. Mangelbarg. With Portrait. H. L. Berckenhoff. Scenes in Amsterdam. Illustrated. Louis Raemaakers.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa .- OLAF NORLI, CHRISTIANIA. 2 kr. per quarter. June 15. The Personality of God. Dr. H. C. Hansen. Alexander Pushkin. With Portrait. Alfred Jensen. The Spanish Inquisition.

Nordisk Tidskrift .- P. A. NORSTEDT AND SONS, STOCKHOLM. to kr. per annum.

What has Gothic Art to do with the Goths? Continued. L. Dietrichson. The Youthful Works of Gyllenborg. Oscar Levertin. Minerals That Contain Rare Earthy Substances. A. E. Nordenskiold.

Ringeren.-The City Passage, Christiania. 2 kr. per qr. June 17 J. E. Christenson; a Danish Politician. With Portrait. Ove Rode. Our Fight with Tuberculosis. Professor Ax:1 Holst.

Tilskueren. - Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. June. Scandinavianism. Johan Ottesen. Herr Lasse Fi.nd. Viggo Stuckenberg. Religion and Morals. Eduurd Larsen. The Siege of Venice, 1849. Continued. H. Dahlerup.

TEN YEARS' TOPICS IN THE MAGAZINES.

THE Rev. Charles H. Eaton contributes a curiously interesting paper to the October Forum on "A Decade of Magazine Literature." The essence of his contribution is the classification of writings in the Forum and the Nineteenth Century during the decade 1888-1897.

From this analysis he infers the general world tendencies, which he declares are economic and political. There is but narrow interest in philosophy and poetry; he discerns also that the points of agreement between English and American thought are many, those of contrast few and superficial. "Nothing, perhaps, will show with more distinctness the essential unity of the English race than an examination of the matter and method of the literature of a decade." He finds nothing to show that Science is receding before Religion. The number and interest of the articles remain about the same for the

	Science.		Religion.		Political Economy.		History.		Fiction.		Education.		Politics.		Philosophy.		Poetry.		Miscella- neous.		Totals.
	F	N C	F	N C	F	N C	F	NC	F	NC	F	N C	F	N C	F	N C	F	N C	F	NC	F	N C
1888 .	6	7	6	9	33	21	5	5	4	1	25	10	26	27		2		4	2)	47	131	133
1889 .	7	9	8	18	30	x8	- 4	11	3		12	3	33	36			3	3	28	43	130	142
1890 .	15	14	10	9	32	26	2	12	3		3		35	31				1	25	48	125	141
1891 .	8	13	7	18	38	27	6	25	2		5	3	32	16		1		6	40	60	138	158
1892 .	2	16	6	4	60	31	2	8	x		. 5	3	33	42			3	13	45	82	155	198
1893 .	8	11	8	18	45	32	4	27	6	3	11	5	32	23			900	6	32	55	14)	160
1894 .	6	7	24	16	49	24	6	10	3	1	7	5	30	26	1	2			27	84	x43	175
1895 .	2	7	6	23	50	17.	10	15	7		14	5	13	35		5		1	41	68	143	176
1896 .	4	9	8	13	24	24	6	18	4	2	11	14	38	36		2		1	40	65	135	184
1897 .	3	9	5	II	40	21	13	21	1	2	10	6	31	42		2	6	2	25	57	134	173
Totals	61	102	78	139	401	231	58	132	34	9	103	54	303	313	1	14	12	37	332	60)	1,383	1,640

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS

will be posted to any part of the World for Twelve Months for 8s. 6d. (or 10.75 francs).

Intending Subscribers should fill up this blank form and send it, together with a Post Office Money Order for 8s. 6d. (or 10.75 francs) to the Manager, "Review of Reviews," Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C.

Date_____

To the Manager, "Review of Reviews." Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

Please send the "Review of Reviews" for Twelve Months, beginning with the Number, to

For which I enclose Eight Shillings and Sixpence (or 10.75 francs).

THE PARLIAMENT OF PEACE AND ITS MEMBERS.

Edited by W. T. STEAD.

With over 70 Portraits and Pictures, and Biographies of the Delegates.

Superbly printed on Art Paper.

Price SIXPENCE; by post, SEVENPENCE.

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, LONDON.

ANNUAL INDEX TO PERIODICALS.

The Annual Index to the Contents of the British and American Periodicals, issued in connection with the London Review of Reviews, supplies exhaustive classified lists of articles on every subject which has been dealt with in the periodicals of the year. It may thus be described as a series of bibliographies alphabetically arranged for convenience of reference.

VOL. I., 1890. VOL. II., 1891. (VOL. III., out of print). VOL. IV., 1893. VOL. V., 1894.

5s. 6d. per Volume, post free. VOL. VI., 1895. VOL. VII., 1896. VOL. VIII., 1897. VOL. IX., 1898. 10s. per Volume, post free. Rabi

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, LONDON.

A LIBRARY of 150 BOOKS FOR A POUND.

The very cheapest and best thing going in the way of books—especially for those who live out of the way of public libraries—is the Masterpiece Library of Penny Books.

The Library originally contained over sixty volumes of the poets, one hundred volumes of Novels, and over thirty volumes of Books for the Bairns. Twenty or thirty of these are now out of print. But one hundred and fifty volumes—each of which contains as much printed matter of poetry and fiction and children's picture-book as is to be found in many books published at 2s. 6d., or even 6s.—may be supplied in a Bookcase (the size of which is 15½ ins. by 16½ ins.) for 20s. No such collection has ever been offered before at the price.

N.B.—In order to avoid disappointment, intending purchasers should send in their orders as early as possible, as only a limited supply of cases is kept in stock.

Send Postal Order for 20s. to the Manager—"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, NORFOLK STREET, LONDON, W.C.

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

(JULY.)

I.—THE SOUTH AFRICAN CRISIS.

Westminster Gasette.]

[London.

THE POINT.

"W'at sorter seasonin' d'you sagashuate l'se gwineter cook you with, Brer Rabbit?" sez Brer Fox, sezze. Brar Rabbit up en say he don' wanter be cooked 't all. Brer Fox he grit his toof. "Youer gittin' 'way from de point, Brer Rabbit," sez Brer Fox, sezee.

Westminster Gazette.]

[London.

IN THAT BRIER-PATCH AGAIN. Brer Fox wonders what Brer Rabbit is up to now.

Johannesburg Star.]

BRITISH SUPREMACY. A ready helper. A powerful enemy.

Nebelspalter.]

Zurich.

J. Bull: "It would be'a good joke to knock down this Transvaaler, if . Westminster Ga:ette.]

[London.

THE PARROT THAT WOULDN'T.

Nebelspalter.]

IN TROUBLE.

JOHN BULL: "If I could only get rid of this beast."

II.—GERMANY AND FRANCE.

I .- THE SOUTH AFRICAN CRISIS.

LA FRANCE: "Au Revoir, Sire?"
WILHELM: "Till 1900."
LA FRANCE: "Won't you bring back Alsace-Lorraine then?"

Borss.em Janko.]

"COURTSHIP."

Nebelspalter.]

IN BERGEN.

(Zurich.

NEW TUNES TO BE QUICKLY UNLEARNT!

III.-MISCELLANEOUS.

Nebels | alter.]

[Zurich.

Judy.]

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

"They already begin to show in a striking manner how much they regard Peace."

SMOKING THE PIPE OF PEACE AT THE HAGUE.

Picture-Politics.]

"ALLONS, ENFANTS DE LA PATRIE."

Nebelspalter.]

[Zürich.

AN INTELLIGENT SALESMAN.

Spain (to whom Germany hands a 16,000,000 Mark pizce, whilst holding the Carolines and Marshalls in his helmet!: "Yes, I like this better because I am certain that even these southern fruits will soon taste sour."

Humoristiche Blätter.]

[Berlin

SCYLLA AND CHARYBDIS!

WALDECK-ROUSSEAU: "Forward, dear friends! Look neither to the right or to the left, and we will win through at last."

Sydney Bulletin.]

THE SAMOAN SITUATION AND SOLUTION.

JOHN BULL: "I think, Sam, we could manage him better if we cut him up amongst us."

IV .- A RUSSIAN VIEW OF THE DUM-DUM.

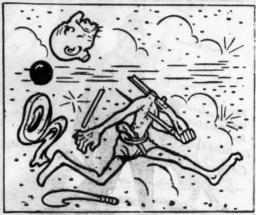

One must remember that the fakirs, by their blessings, render the bodies of the savage soldiers quite invulnerable.

Therefore the rain of shot does not harm them.

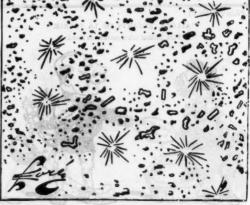

Cold steel does not hurt them.

Cannon-balls have very little effect.

Only the dum-dum bullets are not influenced by the supernatural power of the blessings.

[St. Petersburg.

· K

MR. A. PEEL.

MR. R. C. MAXWELL. MR. R. HAMILTON. LIEUT.-COL. A COURT.

Photograph by

GENZEAL SIR JOHN ARDAGH. ADMIRAL SIR JOHN FISHER.

SIR JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

SIR HENRY HOWARD.

THE BRITISH DELEGATES TO THE PEACE CONFERENCE AT THE HAGUE,

the achieve ac

thou

not than

confi seco part futur

114

PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

En Route to Christiania, August 1st, 1899.

A Great Day the World.

To-day is a red-letter day in the history of humanity, for on this day at the Palace in the Woods the representatives of the Powers signed the final Acte which sums up the story of the achievements and aspirations of the first Parliament of the World. It was a good work well done, and it is one of those things which in the midst of discouragements and disappointments enable us to thank God and take courage, to live more cheerfully in the present, and to contemplate the future with more trusting faith. Yesterday I had a talk with M. Basily, the second Russian Delegate, to whose persistent and repeated efforts the idea of the Conference first owed so much at its initial stages. I asked him what he thought of the work of the Conference. "Good," said he, "better than any one hoped for." "And what," I said, "is your watchword for the future?" "I have thought about that much," he replied. "What do you think?" "Hope," said I. "No," said he; "that is not my word. We must have something stronger than hope. The watchword of the future is confiance. We must have more confiance in everything: confiance first of all in the work of the Conference; secondly, confiance between the Powers that are parties to the Acte, and above all, confiance in the future."

The Father Conference.

I asked M. de Staal what he thought of it all. "It has ended better than it began," he said-" much better. It has been much better than any one expected. I have said little, but worked much. All my work has been to sit between every one, and take them by the arm and make them agree." He has been a veritable Father Confessor of the Conference. Delegates have gone to him with all their difficulties and their objections. He has minimised the one and answered the others, made concessions here and smoothed the rough places there. He has been a veritable father of a fraternal family; and although he has never attempted to emulate the hard driving method of management so dear to Bismarck, his name will live in history as a most successful president of the first International Assembly in which all the States of the world were represented. He was better in spirits and immensely better in health at the end of the Conference than when it began. "Five years hence, at the next Conference?" I said to M. de Staal. "Oh," said he, "do you know where I shall be at the date of the next Conference?" "Where?" said I. He said nothing, but raised his hand and pointed it above. Such a prediction would have seemed much more likely of fulfilment at the beginning of the Conference than at the end. M. de Staal seems almost to have recovered his youth in these two months, and there is no man of any nation, clime, language, or religion who does not carry with him from the Hague the pleasantest and kindest memories of M. de Staal.

Evolving

Opinions differ as to which is the great gain of the Conference. Perthe World-Unit. sonally, I am inclined to believe that the Conference itself is its own sufficient justification and its own exceeding great gain, for its assembly marks an era in the shrinkage of the world, and indicates the beginning of the organisation of the world-unit. Its indirect effects will probably be greater than its direct; and the mere fact of its existence, of the coming together of the picked men of all nationalities, and closeting them together in the beautiful Palace in the Woods to discuss what things make for the world's peace, cannot fail to have a great and abiding influence on the progress of events. One well-informed delegate said to me that he believed that the extent to which the conviction had penetrated all those present that the day for continually increasing armaments was over and past, was a more substantial gain and likely to have a more immediately valuable result than any resolution or convention that could have been framed.

A Great French Statesman at Last.

Another indirect gain of the Conference has been the creation of a new reputation in the country that needed it most. Before the delegates met at the Hague, M. Bourgeois was known to be one of half a dozen clever Frenchmen, parliamentarians and others, who have for a brief season held the post of Prime Minister in France. To-day he occupies a unique position in Europe. By universal consent there is no new reputation which has yet been made at this Conference so great as that of M. Bourgeois. So far as new reputations go, he has been the man of the Conference. His skilfulness, his extraordinary receptivity, his consuming energy, and his faculty of grasping the drifts of a dozen currents of opinion and forging in a moment a formula which will embody all the different shades of sentiment, has been a revelation to many men. France never stood more in need of great men than at the present moment. It is with hearty delight, a delight felt especially by her ally Russia, that a great statesman has at last been revealed to the whole world in the debates at the As Chairman of the Comité Huis ten Bosch. d'Examen, and as head of the French delegation, M. Bourgeois, brilliantly aided by his lieutenant, Baron d'Estournelles, has done a great deal to revindicate the reputation of France in the opinion both of her allies and her enemies.

When I asked Count'Nigra for his autograph, suggesting that he might give me a watchword for the future, he wrote some lines from an Italian

he wrote some lines from an Italian poem, which set forth that there live on earth three saintly things: there is Saint Peace, Saint Patience, and Saint Charity, but there is no hope of meeting the first of the three until you have made the acquaintance of the others. It was a good word, well spoken, one of those which are like apples of gold in pictures of silver. Patience and charity are indeed qualities greatly to be desired in the handling of international affairs. They go slow, of necessity. Hence the need for patience, for when dealing with men of such different heredity, whose habit of thought is moulded by different systems of education and religion, and who do not even perfectly understand the lingua franca in use at the general assembly, charity indeed is indispensable. The same thought was deeply impressed on the mind of Admiral Fisher, who, when I asked him what he thought was the most necessary thing to bear in mind, replied instantly: "Apply oil to the machinery whenever you can." The international machine, indeed, is only too apt to get hot bearings, and the international oil-can is one of the most indispensable of all institutions.

A New International Centre. Among the indirect and altogether unexpected results of the Conference has been the discovery that it has created a new international centre.

I do not refer to the Permanent Bureau and the Permanent Court of Arbitration, of which the Bureau will act as headquarters. I refer to the Council of Administration, composed of the representatives of the signatory Powers accredited to the Hague. This expedient was improvised by Sir Julian Pauncefote in order to turn the corner of an objection made by some delegates to his original proposal that the Dutch Government should itself nominate a Council of Administration, which would have to see that the officers of the Permanent Bureau were duly appointed, properly paid, and did their work. He suggested that the Ministers of the signatory Powers accredited to the Dutch Government should form a Council, and Mr. White, the American Ambassador at Berlin, added the suggestion that they should meet under the presidency of the Dutch Minister for Foreign They had hardly created the Council before they began instinctively to fear lest it should become a centre of international politics, so they introduced words declaring that its functions should be purely administrative; but before the Conference broke up, a political question arose which compelled several of the delegates to realise the possibility of utilising this administrative council for other purposes. The question was as to what Powers not represented at the Conference should be permitted to give in their adhesion to the Convention of Arbitration. It was found impossible to obtain unanimity as to the Powers who should or should not be received, and the suggestion was made that the matter should be left to the Administrative Council. It was rejected, but the necessity of things would compel the Powers, however reluctant, to use this council as a kind of standing a pro Affair

natio hono well strug
the co
and to worke

Grai

Hith no a Pow to th The this, have the v orga you worl ques the are cogr the is tr pacij miss pers be calle man sum judg righ of th of a rec SOVE pen who elec nati ence

inte

Eur

sign

a proud position for the Dutch Minister of Foreign Affairs to occupy, that of President of such an international body, but it is an honour which Holland has well won by centuries of struggle and service in the cause of human liberty and the civilisation of the world.

need

such

ded

and gua

leed

eply

hen

ary

oil

ter-

hot

the

her

nce

has tre.

the-

eau

l of

of

his

ote

ade

the

icil

the

ed.

ted

ted

cil,

in,

ler

gn

cil

ıld

ey

ıld

ce

ed

of

es.

re-

ve

n.

he

he

to ne

er

ng

It will Who shall be c o m e Grand Electors? about in this way.

Hitherto there has been no attempt to classify the Powers or to decide as to their status in the world. There was no need to do this, because the Powers have never acted together; the world has never been organised. The moment you begin to organise the world as a unit, the question forces itself to the front, what Powers are entitled to be recognised as members of the governing body? It is true that the reglement pacifique is only permissive, and the list of persons who are fit to be arbitrators which is called into existence may many of them never be summoned to sit on the judgment seat; but the right to nominate members of the International Court of Arbitration implies a recognition of the sovereignty and independence of the States who become the grand electors of the only international body in existence. Hitherto the only committee of all the Governments of the world. It is was called a closed treaty; no one else was allowed to adhere to it. Hence this question as to what is a sovereign Power never arose; but the Convention of Arbitration is not a closed treaty, but an open one. Outside Powers are allowed to give in their adhesion. Admission to the rank of Grand Electors will, therefore, be anxiously sought for, and the question as to the qualifications which every Power must possess before it can be recognised as a sovereign State raises many of the thorniest and most delicate questions in international politics. The Conference, after discussing this question at two stormy sittings in strict secrecy, came to the conclusion that it was absolutely incapable of arriving at a unanimous opinion, and therefore it decided that the question must whole be left over to be discussed by the signatory Powers at their leisure. Now the signatory Powers are scattered all over the world, they have representatives at the Hague who will be in constant touch with the Permanent Bureau, and who will be also of necessity in constant telegraphic communication their respective Governments. Here, therefore, we have over against the Court of Arbitration a diplomatic standing committee come to be regarded as the international body of any importance has been the intermediary between all the Governments. It will European Concert, consisting of the Powers which begin by dealing with small questions, but ultimately signed the Treaty of Paris in 1856. That was what it will have to deal with the greatest questions which interest mankind. The post of an ambassador at the Hague will before very long be the most coveted position in the diplomatic service.

[A. Radford. Photograph by] S.R JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE AND BARON D'ESTOURNELLES.

(Taken during the Peace Conference at the Hague.)

At the Hague the claims of only two The Case outside Powers were considered. It was admitted on all hands that the the Transvaal-South American Republics could come in as soon as ever they pleased; but what was to be done concerning the Transvaal and the Pope? The position of the Transvaal under the Convention by which its independence was restored is difficult, and the discussion raised many a delicate question. The Boers assert that they are a sovereign independent State. The English deny this, and maintain that while independent in the management of all their own internal affairs, they are under the suzerainty of the British Empire, the proof of which is that they are not allowed to conclude any treaty without submitting it to the British Government for This, it was urged by some of the Powers, was quite sufficient to relieve England of any anxiety lest the Transvaal should give in its adhesion to the Convention. But a closer examination of the clause in the Convention governing this point shows that it would be very difficult for England to veto treaties concluded with foreign States, for it specifies that such veto is only contemplated when such a treaty is counter to the safety or interests of the British Empire. Of course we could constructively argue that to allow the Transvaal to nominate four judges to the Court of Arbitration would be dangerous to the interests of the British Empire, inasmuch as it would tend to confer upon the Transvaal the status of an independent sovereignty; but this would be a rather strained interpretation, and it was thought better by the English Government to insist that no Power should be allowed to adhere without the consent of all the other signatory Powers, which, of course, in the

—and of the Papacy.

Powers.

If England had the Transvaal to think of, Italy had the Pope. The Pope, although no longer a territorial Sovereign, is nevertheless distinctly recognised as the "Sovereign Pope." Ambassadors are accredited to him, and he is diplomatically represented at many European Courts. In the election of Pope several European Powers take direct interest, and his position is such that he has been employed as arbitrator by no less a Power than case of the Transvaal, would be equivalent to compelling the Transvaal before its admission to obtain the written agreement of all the twenty-four signatory

Germany in the days of Prince Bismarck. He has at least a prima facie case in support of his claim to be allowed to adhere to the Arbitration Convention. But the Italians feel that were he permitted to do so it would distinctly raise his status in the world at large, and they are opposed to it. did not go so far as England in demanding that no Power should be admitted who could not secure the written assent of all the signatory Powers. They contented themselves with proposing that any application for adhesion should be admitted if no one of the signatory Powers recorded a veto. This no doubt would suffice, but it would place on any individual Power that pronounced the veto an invidious responsibility which Lord Salisbury did not wish to It is so much easier merely to neglect to give a written assent to a proposition than to stand out, it may be alone, and say veto. In clubs, no doubt, the principle of excluding every candidate for admission if there is one black ball found in the ballot-box, is all very well; but in clubs voting is by ballot, whereas in international politics the Powers must vote openly. It is easy to understand the difference between open and secret voting by supposing that the Pope applied for admission to the Court, and it lay with the English Government to decide whether or not he should be admitted. In such circumstances what would Mr. Gladstone have His own instinct would have been to blackball the Pope; but if the question of the administration had absolutely depended for its existence from day to day upon the support of the Irish Catholic members, it needs no argument to show that he would have thought twice and even thrice before giving expression to his own personal judgment if, instead of secretly dropping a black ball in the ballot-box, he had to stand up before the world and refuse the application of the Pope.

One Power One Vote. These questions, however, are but a detail. I mention them here not in the least in order to discourage but rather to encourage all those who believe in human progress; for what is more plain than that it is the very difficulties of the situation which will compel the Powers to confer together more and more, to act more and more as if the human race was a whole instead of being split up into rival and antagonistic sections? It may, no doubt, appear an anachronism that in such a council the little Duchy of Luxembourg and the small Principality of Montenegro should have to be consulted equally with the German, Russian, and British Empires;

but rectiv to im thems recog ing fo chaste bear gance by re posse existe limita and t mino the f adopt word, forwa fiance. a gre to be in an in the "The the have with not or that done feren have pound way i for th peace

> make the portu

> > the

Last pende betwee Amor neith strangare but that in itself is a very valuable corrective of the tendency of the Great Powers to imagine that nobody else exists in the world but It is, of course, dangerous ever to themselves. recognise rights behind which there is no corresponding force: but on the other hand, it is always well to chasten the overbearing arrogance of might by reminding its possessors of the existence of the limitations of law and the rights of minorities. For the future let us adopt M. Basily's word, and press forward with confiance. There is a great deal still to be done; and in another page, in the article on "The Topic of the Month," I have described with some detail not only the work that has been done by the Conference, but I have also expounded in what way it is possible for the friends of peace throughout the world to make the most of the present opportunity.

s at

be ion.

do

orld

hey

no

the

hey

any one

no

ıdi-

ous

to ect

to bs,

ate

in ıbs

nal

to ret

on

ent

In

ive

to

ad-

ice

lic

ıld

ing

of

he

he

a

in

ut

ho

in

on

re

ce

nd

an

hy

of

lly

S;

The Trouble the Transvaal.

Photograph by]

Last month has been one of ups and downs. The pendulum has swung backwards and forwards between hopes of peace and fears of war.

Among a minority in this country there should be neither fears of peace nor hopes of war. For strange, almost incredible, does it appear there are some men at large in England who actually

PROFESSOR MARTENS.

talk and write as if it were a thing much to be desired that the whole embattled might of the British Empire should be employed for the purpose of going forth to war against a handful of herdsmen to punish them for trying to govern the South African Republic on the familiar principles of English

Tories. Stranger still, the men who are most anxious to use the Imperial Nasmyth hammer to crack the Transvaal nut are in nearly every case Tories to a man, while the only articulate opposition is led by Radicals. The real trouble is that a Radical and a Unionist at the Cape appear to have laid their heads together for the purpose of "putting the thing through" peaceably if they can; but if not, then by means of the sword. It grieves me to think of my old colleagues gaged in such a task. But in all fairness both to them and to others, there seems to be no doubt that if Milner and Garrett were absent, we should have had little or none of these alarms and excursions and threatenings of war.

[M. Matuszewski.

Nemesia.

Behind these two men on the spot, one wielding the authority of the High Commissioner, the other holding the ear of King Demos, there is

Mr. Chamberlain at Downing Street, backed on this occasion by Lord Salisbury, who always grudges the Boers their independence, and can with difficulty resist the temptation to seize the first opportunity to take it away. If-which Heaven forbid!-we get into a war with the Transvaal, we shall not have far to seek for the cause. If, two years ago, Sir W. Harcourt and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman had not made themselves parties to the most scandalous fraud in the way of whitewashing ever perpetrated on the public, Mr. Chamberlain would not be at the Colonial Office to-day. It is difficult to do this sort of thing and not to have to pay for it Both Milner and Garrett condemned the effort to bring the truth to light. Both were for shielding Blastus, even when he used the South African Committee to make "Pharisees-Hypocrites" the proper description of the English people. now they have their reward. They are rousing British South Africa to demand what is to all intents and purposes the smashing of the Boer domination in the Transvaal, and he is preparing to let loose the dogs of war at Downing Street. And Lord Salisbury, with Lord Selborne as his acolyte, gives the trio his benediction and assures them that having put his hand to the plough he will not go back.

Weather Glass Points
to Storm.

It is unnecessary to describe in detail the phases of the negotiations in South Africa. In brief, it may be said that what has happened is little more than a continually increasing clamour on the part of the British in South Africa in favour of Milner, in the belief that he means business; while on the side of the Dutch there has been a gradual improvement in the offers made from Pretoria. It was indeed stated authoritatively in the Times that, thanks to the concession of the seven years' franchise, a basis so favourable to negotiations had been arrived at that the crisis might be practically considered at an end. But the announcement raised such consternation in the camp of Jingodom, that the pendulum soon swung back to the side of war. What is now demanded is almost avowed to be the destruction of the domination of the Boer oligarchy. Mr. Balfour tells us the reforms which must be conceded must be of such a nature as to contain in themselves a germ which will ultimately make the Transvaal part of the British South African Federation. Mr. Chamberlain and all his claque inveigh against the oligarchy. What that means is that whether they say franchise or whether they say intervention, they all mean one thing, viz., the destruction, if need be by the summary process of slaughtering out opposition, of the system of Government which President Kruger and his Boers went out into the Veldt to set up.

There is a tendency in some quarters to idealise the Boers, and to paint President Kruger as a kind of South African Washington. That is all nonsense; and to base opposition to Sir Alfred Milner's policy on that ground is to give the whole case into the hands of the enemy. From the point of view of the English Liberal, the oligarchy of the Boers is as indefensible as the existence and authority of that other oligarchy, the House of Lords. But he is not prepared "to go a-gunning agin either." Oligarchies are bad things, no doubt, and irreconcilable with principles of modern democracy; but that is no reason for a general throat-cutting of oligarchs if they don't consent at a moment's notice to sign their political death-warrant. The true line to take is to insist that time is on our side; that the Boer oligarchy is but a decaying remnant of a system certain to perish under modern conditions; and that it is to show little faith either in the British race or in democratic principles to argue that such a system can only be got rid of by push of bayonet.

That the Uitlanders have grievances Grievances no one can deny. But they are Inadequate for not unsupportable grievances. They Casus Belli. are taxed without being represented -a grievance they share with one half the human race. But even Mrs. Fawcett would not make the refusal of the franchise to women a casus belli. constitution of the Transvaal is such as to place the control of the whole State in the hands of President Kruger and his Boers. So if we may make bold to say it does, the Constitution of England placed the ultimate control of all legislation in the hands of Premier Salisbury and his supporters in the House of Lords. As for occasionally ugly incidents such as the killing of Edgar and the unredressed murder of Mrs. Applebee, they are the merest bagatelles compared with the wholesale homicide that has gone on for years unchecked in Cripple Creek and other far western mining districts. The constant iteration and reiteration of these names Edgar and Applebee is one of the weakest elements in the Jingoes' case. Why even in London after Bloody Sunday in Trafalgar Square not a single policeman was punished for a series of brutal, and in some cases cold-blooded, assaults upon helpless prisoners in the cells, nor was any one ever called to account for the slaying of poor Linnell-"killed by the police." If we imagine the Irish-Americans in control of the American Republic determined to find a p maj ann far Apj war

An

a C

sen to to as to "the alors sette atte

a mer

Ch

Bu

by war priing sha

Bri Uit goi of

rea

cyr gri wo of

ma

wi by wr

hie

flie

a pretext for interfering on behalf of the oppressed majority of the inhabitants of the Emerald Isle, the annals of that distressful Isle would afford them a far better case for intervention than the Edgar and Applebee cases afford Mr. Chamberlain for making war on the Transyaal.

The only gleam of light in the An International Debate on the Transvaal question Commission on July 28th was Mr. Chamberlain's Inquiry. statement that he had proposed that a Committee of expert South African lawyers, representing both parties, should examine into and report to the British Government and to President Kruger as to how far the reform proposals of the Boers give "that substantial and immediate representation which alone can be considered the basis of a satisfactory settlement." This is a very practical and sensible attempt to adopt the principle of the International Commissions d'Enquête, which form so conspicuous The règlea feature of the Hague Convention. ment pacifique had not been signed when Mr. Chamberlain made this announcement in Parliament. But the possibility of utilising such methods of elucidating the truth and of removing misunderstandings has been advertised throughout the world by the Peace Conference, and there is no need to wait for ratification before availing ourselves of the principle thus brought before our attention. The inquiry will gain time, and after it has reported we shall see where we are. At present the Boers say one thing and the British say another, and no one really knows what the truth really is. What the British public want is to get as much redress for the Uitlander as it can by squeezing Kruger, without going to war. Pressure, not butchery, is the true key of the situation.

The amount of attention that has "The been wasted on the handful of Fool's Eyes are on the Ends oppressed Uitlanders in the Transof the Earth." vaal, who are for the most part making money too easily and spending it too quickly to put their backs seriously into any revolutionary movement, is in ridiculous disproportion to the cynical indifference with which we treat the grievances of Londoners. Want of water is a worse thing than want of a vote, and the horrors of overcrowding in a great city entail much more hideous suffering and discomfort than the Boers inflict upon Johannesburg. It might even be contended with fair share of reason that the monopoly of land by a few great ground landlords inflicts much more wrong upon the million than the dynamite monopoly inflicts upon the few. But who cares? Yet the Transvaal problem is but a corn on one little toe, whereas these problems of our great city represent a cancer that is eating into our vitals. If the millions which the Jingoes are longing to spend in butchering Boers were used in rebuilding London, or in giving her thirsty millions water to drink without draining the Thames dry, what good might not be effected? But the corn hurts, and for the time the suffering of the cancer is not felt by the directing brain, only by the silent speechless member of the body politic. So it comes to pass that the papers are full of the grievances of 100,000 men who are making money on the Rand, while never a word is said concerning the grievances of the millions who thirst and suffer in these overcrowded dens even at our doors. But some day there may be an awakening, and the Conservative classes may see how readily the masses will apply to the oligarchy at home the measure of bloodshed and violence which they are now threatening to employ against the Boers. What is sauce for the oligarchical goose in the Transvaal is also sauce for the aristocratic gander in England. To make war in one case would justify making revolution in the other. We are against both. We are for pressure in Africa-agitation at home. But if our governing classes set an example of impatience under slight provocation in the Transvaal, they need not be surprised if under much provocation impatience should resort to force nearer home.

The Re-Trial of Dreyfus.

Before these pages meet the eye of the reader, the long-expected trial of Dreyfus will have begun at Rennes. It is calculated that 450,000 words will be telegraphed daily from Rennes to Paris-the most astonishing illustration afforded of the manifold re-duplication or waste of labour in reporting. One good verbatim report, with half a dozen different condensations, and say twenty different descriptions, would surely amply supply the public with all that can possibly be known concerning the proceeding; in court. No one appears to entertain any doubt but that the re-trial will result in the affirmation of the innocence of the hero of the greatest of all modern causes célèbres. For years l'affaire Dreyfus has eclipsed all other affairs, political, religious, and social, in France. But how lucky the French are in being able to re-try the victim before instead of after his death! In the case of Jeanne d'Arc and of Calas they were not so fortunate.

out

ers

int

uth

all

ed

ole

of

ers

at ot

es

th

no

if

gn

ke

er

m

at

or

m

re

y

d

n

e

e

ıt

It was not to be expected that the The Writhing party which for so many years has the Vanquished, used every existing agency in France, political, journalistic and military, for the purpose of exciting prejudice against Dreyfus, will tamely acquiesce in their discomfiture. We may therefore look out for squalls. We have had already attempts to provoke panic on the Bourse, and there have been the usual demonstrations of "popular sentiment" in the shape of hooting and yelling mobs, whose enthusiasm, as Dr. Dillon has recently explained, is strictly a matter of business arrangement. Paulez, a young genius in the art of organising these demonstrations of unrestrainable public sentiment, has been interviewed, and explained with much detail exactly how the work is done. A band of 300 or 500 roughs and corner men are organised in groups of from 15 to 20, each band being under the command of a commander. For four or five francs a day these excellent citizens will demonstrate in favour of anybody or anything. Without money they will do nothing. As there will be no lack of money to organise anti-Dreyfus demonstrations in the streets, it is well to know in advance exactly the way in which they are got up.

GENERAL NÉGRIER.

The only serious danger is in the The Fall army itself. No one knows what General Négrier, will happen. But the vigorous fashion in which Marshal de Gallifet dealt with General Négrier when that high-placed officer was detected in the act of attempting to organise a military demonstration against the Government has encouraged public opinion. Hitherto there has always been an uneasy suspicion that the Minister of War might not be strong enough to keep his generals in order. The conspiracy against Dreyfus has had its seat in the General Staff. To expect the General Staff to take it lying down when the inevitable exposure comes is not to be expected. Possibly the best way out of the miserable difficulty for them would be to compromise themselves as General Négrier has done, and so be enabled to get out of the army without having to undergo the ordeal of a trial and the inevitable punishment. Fortunately in President Loubet France has a strong sagacious ruler, and in General Gallifet she has a man whose vigour and energy are unmistakable. So we may hope that despite all dangers the Republic will pull through.

Servia is at present suffering from The Escape the consequences of an unsuccessful attempt at assassination. On July 6, King Milan.

when ex-King Milan, who is still commander-in-chief and all powerful in his son's kingdom, was riding through the streets of Belgrade, he was fired at four times by a man named Knezevitch, who appears to have been set on to make the attempt by the agents of an anti-dynastic conspiracy. One of the bullets struck Milan, wounding him slightly. The others missed their mark, but one of them hit the ex-King's aide-de-camp. Knezevitch was promptly arrested, and when in custody made a series of statements implicating the leaders of the Radical party in his crime. They were all locked up to the number of nearly two score, and are now awaiting their trial by court martial. Belgrade was declared to be in a state of siege, and the newspapers ever since have been full of stories of the ferocity of Milan's vengeance. So far there has been more squealing than killing. The usual stories are bir ne Ts

cui

the fail

ma

Ru

occ

reg

CTI

Th

att

rer

exi

on

go

reg

po

by asl

as

an

Tv

isla

the

tra

7

H of re

in rat

he pu

wh ha

Ge be current as to the bogus nature of the conspiracy, but these always make their appearance when the assassin fails to bring down his victim. Of one thing we may be quite certain, viz., that neither Austria nor Russia will allow reprisals to be carried too far. An occasional attempt at assassination appears to be regarded as within the rules of the game in Servia, and to punish it too severely would be regarded as "not cricket" at Belgrade.

The attempt on the life of the Presi-The Assassination dent of San Domingo was, unfortunately, more successful. President July 26, when President Heureaux San Domingo. was setting out for Santiago, he was attacked by Ramon Caceres, who slew him, and thereby reminded the outside world for the first time of his existence. Since the fall of Toussaint L'Ouverture no one in Europe has known so much as the name of any governing man in the great island which was once regarded as rivalling Cuba in its wealth and importance. Even now, when it has been advertised by a presidential assassination, the only question asked in England with a certain languid curiosity is as to how long it will be before it follows Porto Rico and Cuba in becoming a dependency of Uncle Sam's. Two American warships have been ordered to the island, but the Stars and Stripes will not go up over the Black Republic until more of the southern negroes have been made capable of undertaking the administration of their savage kinsmen.

The death of the Grand Duke

The Death George, the consumptive brother of The Tsarevitch. the Tsar, has made the Grand Duke Michael heir-presumptive to the Russian throne. The Empress, having now given birth to three daughters in succession, is expected next time to bear a son, who would then become Tsarevitch. The Grand Duke Michael therefore will not be styled Tsarevitch, but only the Grand Duc I' print elsewhere some reminiscences of the late Tsarevitch by an English lady recently resident in the neighbourhood of Abas-Tuman in the Caucasus. He was extremely delicate, but rather headstrong, and met his death when riding a motor cycle alone. It is seldom that the heir to a throne dies unattended public highway. His only aide-de-camp, smarting under the reflections cast upon him for permitting what he probably could not hinder, is said to have committed suicide. Although the Grand Duke George could never have become Tsar, his death has been much lamented. A curious story is published by the New York Journal to the effect that the dead Prince has made provision in his will for advertising throughout Russia a proclamation advising all threatened with consumption as to what they should do, and especially what they should not do—a mode of spending millions which may be commended to the attention of Mr. Carnegie.

The stroke of paralysis which last Lady Sallsbury's month numbed the left side of Lady Health. Salisbury, created everywhere profound regret by no means only personal. For although Lady Salisbury is no active political partisan, she is the other half of a Premier who is so much of a recluse, that anything affecting one of the few human beings with whom he is absolutely at his ease could hardly fail to affect the politics of the Empire. Fortunately, Lady Salisbury is now reported to be recovering. Women are peremptorily forbidden to sit on London town councils; but if two old ladies, the Queen and Lady Salisbury, were to be permanently laid on one side -which Heaven forbid -the effect of their retirement would be more felt throughout the world than a similar misfortune overtaking all the members of the House of Lords, Lord Salisbury alone excepted.

Ministers with their majority have The Dole clubbed the Clerical Dole Bill through Parliament. By this meathe Clergy. sure the Anglican clergy obtain relief from the National Exchequer to the extent of £,87,000 per annum. The Opposition fought hard, and were beaten; but this trifling subsidy to a sect will probably cost Ministers dear. No one grudges the clergy a little relief. But when the Methodists raise £1,000,000 merely because we are entering a new century, and the Pope received £,1,600,000 as a Jubilee present, it ought not to be impossible for the wealthiest sect in England to raise $f_{10,000,000}$ by an appeal to the laity. At present it is calculated that there are 5,000 livings which are worth only £130. A ten millions centenary fund would enable us to bring that up to £,200. But for that we shall probably have to wait till some layman arises who believes in Anglicanism as Mr. Rhodes believes in Empire.

The Imperial Institute, after a brief existence as an advertising museum for Greater Britain and the dependencies thereof, to which were added certain functions more social than Imperial, is henceforth to be the seat of London University. The University will occupy the eastern and

or

ill

g.

11

e-

in

ie

at

IS

et

d

0

0

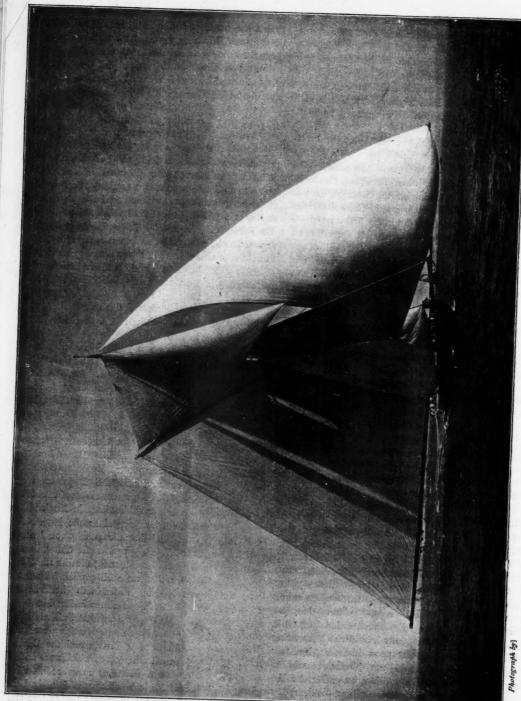

e

f.

8

e

0

THE SHAMROCK.

[West and Sons, Southson, tin o sin b

W

gi th an w no th tio

tin It with a or will are conin

co the ref

:24

centre portions of the main block, part of the upper floor of the inner block, and the temporary structure in the South-east Court. The original object of the Institute will continue to be pursued in the rest of the building—for a time. The camel has got his nose well into the tent, and it will not be long before the original inhabitant receives a final notice to quit. The need of a real Democratic social centre of the English-speaking race is still as great as ever. The premises now occupied by the Union Club and other tenants between Trafalgar Square and George III.'s statue would serve such a purpose admirably. But for that we shall probably have to wait for our millionaire.

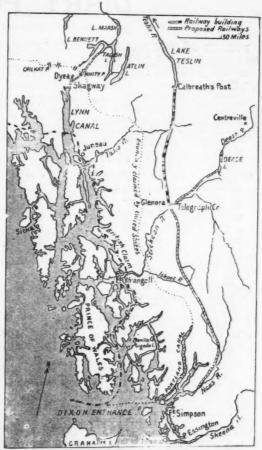

The Alaska Arbitration,

of Alaska has continued to disturb the good relations between the two great English-speaking states which divide between them the American Continent. The Canadians are very stiff bargainers, and Sir W. Laurier did well to remind the Dominion that as direct negotiations had failed they were shut up to the only remaining alternatives, War or Arbitra-As war is out of the question-we might as well talk of war between England and Scotland —the matter must go to arbitration. It is high time Sir Julian Pauncefote got back to Washington. It would be well if he could take Mr. Bryce with him as Imperial Commissioner, and the two of them, with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, were to be shut up in a room with three Americans, and not allowed fire, or light, or victuals till they had settled the terms on which this outstanding question shall be referred to arbitration. It would be well if the Hague Court could be got ready in time to try this question. But nine Powers must ratify before the Bureau can be constituted, and while the nine Powers are making up their minds, we ought to be settling the terms of the reference to the Arbitral Court.

The dispute between Canada and the United States over the boundary

MAP SHOWING THE D'SPUTED BOUNDARY OF ALASKA.

Photograph by]

PRIVATE PRIAULX, WINNER OF THE QUEEN'S PRIZE AT BISLEY.

[Knight, Aldershot.

DIARY FOR JULY.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

July 1. Captain Dreyfus lands in France and is taken to the Military Prison at Rennes. Mr. Hofmeyer leaves Cape Town for Bloemfontein.

3. Captain Dreyfus has interviews with his counsel, MM. Demange and Labori.
An international deputation waits on the Tsar on behalf of the Finnish people; the Tsar declines to see them procession comprising fifteen thousand Socialists and Liberals march in an orderly way through the streets of Liege to show their indignation at the Electoral Bill.

way inrough the streets of Lieg's to show their indignation at the Electoral Bill. Dr. Schurman, President of the American Civil Commission, concludes his tour of inquiry in the Philippine Islands.

Hofmeyer goes from Bloemfontein to Pretoria The Ausglei k between Austria and Hungary is completed.

The Tsar publishes a Rescript defending the

The Tsar publishes a Rescript detending the Russian action taken in regard to Finland. The concluding meetings of the International Congress of Women in London take place. The French Parliament is prorogued. Mr. White, American Ambassador to Germany, presides at an American tribute to the memory of Grotius at the Hague.

The Belgian Government capitulates on the question of their objectionable Electoral Law Bill, which is to be referred to a mixed Committee.

5. Mr. Hofmeyer meets President Kruger and the whole of the Transvaal Executive at Pretoria; they discuss the Franchise question.

question.

6. Great loss of life from floods in Texas; three hundred negroes drowned.

7. The German Emperor and the French President exchange polite telegrams on the former's visit of the French training ship Iphigenie at Bergen.

General Zurlinden is superseded as Military Governor of Paris, and General Brugère appointed in his stead.

Mr. Deakin's motion on teaching religion in Australian State schools is defeated by a large majority; the question of a referendam on the question is carried, with the proviso that the religious denominations first settle among themselves what form the instruction is to take.

is to take. A deputation waits on Mr. Balfour at the Foreign Office to commend to the Govern-ment the construction of a tunnel between Scotland and Ireland.

The Prince of Wales reviews the Metropolitan Volunteers on the Horse Guards Parade; twenty-six thousand men march past, lew Franchise proposals are submitted to the Raad at Pretoria.

no. Release of General Giletta di San Giuseppe from prison at Nice.

Captain Watkins, captain of the liner Paris, loses his certificate for two years, as the result of the inquiry into the loss of his

The International Electrical and Silk Exhibi

in the international Electrical and Sik Exhibition of Italy is destroyed by fire; the Volta relics all destroyed.

11. The House of Magnates at Budepest passes the Ausgleich Bills without amendment. The steamer Paris is floated off the rocks.

12. The Cape Town Branch of the Africander Bond approve the new Transvaal Franchise scheme

scheme.

The Assgleick Bills are carried through both Chambers of the Legislature, and the Hungarian Reichstag is then prorogued till September 28th.

Lord Kelvin resigns the Chair of Natural Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, which he has held for fifty-three years.

The liner Paris is towed safely into Falmouth Harbour.

The new Franchise scheme for the Transvall as revised by the Velksraad is published. The Royal Assent is given to the London Government Bill.

The Attorney-General brings to a conclusion his address before the Venezuela Arbitration Tribunal, in Paris, on the history of the Dutch and Spanish governments of Guiana.
 The Cape Parliament is opened by Sir A. Milner.

15. A Green Book is published at Pretoria concerning the annexation of Zambaansland by the British Government; against this the Transvaal has always protested.

n orderly meeting of Uitlanders is held at Lyndenburg, which passes a resolution of thanks to the President for the new Franchise law now before the Volksraad.

law now before the Volksraad.

17. Japan takes her place as an equal amongst the civilised Powers of the world by her Courts assuming full civil and criminal ju isdiction over all foreigners in Japan.

The newspiper corespondents at Manila complain by teli-gram of the censorship of the press kept up by General Otis.

18. Lead-poisoning in the pottery trade is discussed at a conference between the Home Office officials and a number of manufacturers.

Photograph by]

Russell and Sons.

THE REV. F. W. MACDONALD. New President of the Wesleyan Conference.

18. The Volksraad resumes the debate upon the Franchise Bill; the President makes an important speech.

The New South Wales Parliament opens; the Governor refers to the passing of the Federation Bill.

The reciprocity teaty between the United States and British Guiana is signed at Washington.

19. The election for the Bavarian Chamber is concluded, resulting in a Clerical triumph.

The city and environs of Rome are visited by a severe shock of earthquake, the volcano of Etna being in a state of eruption. Mr. Alger, American Secretary of War, resigns,

The Canadian Senate rejects the Government
Redistribution Bill.
In Italy the Public Safety Bill, promulgated by Royal Decree on June aand, comes into force.

Mr. Henniker Heaton, M.P., receives the freedom of the City in recognition of his services in promoting Imperial Penny Post-

20. Sir Henry Irving and Colonel Hector MacDonald receive the honorary degree of LL.D. from the University of Glasgow. The London School Board decides to create a

Works Department of its own.
21. A disastrous accident occurs on board the

A disastious accident occurs on board the torpedo boat destroyer Bullfinch in the Solent; ten men are killed. Mr. Severo Mallet Prevost, on behalf of Venezuela, begins his reply to Sir Richard Venezuela, begins his reply to Sir Richard Webster's speech.

The Queen's Prize at Bisley is won by a Guernseyman, Private Priaulx.
Mr. Root is appointed American Secretary of War in place of Mr. Alger.
The Government of Candia is handed over by the British to local authorities.

The reciprocity treaty between France and the United States is signed. The treaties relating to Jamaica, Bermuda and Trinidad are also signed between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Asquith attend the annual meeting of the Colonial Nursing Association.

Lord Welby delivers the chairman's annual address on the work of the London County Council.

The new first-class battleship Vengeance is launched at Barrow-in-Furness.

26

27

26. General de Nég ier is removed from his in-spectorship of the French Army and his seat on the Supreme Council of War. Great fire at Marienburg.

The funeral of the Tsarevitch takes place at St. Petersburg.
The Old Age Pensions Committee report in

The Old Age Pensions Committee report in favour of pensions of 5s. per week to deserving and needy persons over 6s.

27. The referendum in Victoria on the Commonwealth Bill results in an enormous majority in favour of Federation.

31. The Archbishops give judgment against the legality of the use of incense and processional liches.

Sir Julian Pauncefote is raised to the Peerage

Peace Conference.

July 3. The drafting Committee of the Brussels y3. The drafting Committee of the Brussels Conference Section have a long sitting. Sir Julian Pauncefote's project is read a second time at the Arbitration Committee. M. Bourgeois and Baron d'Estournelles make this addition; "that the signatory Powers will consider it a "duty" to remind conflicting parties that the permanent Court of Arbitration is open to them." The Comfeed d'Examen on Arbitration meets and finishes its work.

The Conference meets and decides to leave to a future conference the question of private property at s

6. The Queen of Holland receives the members of the Peace Conference at a banquet at the Dam Palace at Amsterdam.

The project of Arbitration is presented to Commission No. 3 by M. Descamps, reporter of the Committee, the text being at the same time published. The document embodies the Russian, British, and American projects,

"The Exposé de Motifs" reported to the Comité d'Examen by Chevalier Descamps is published.

16. The Comité d'Examen on Arbitration meets and discusses amendments and modifications to discusses amendments and modifications to the general project.

ommission No. 1 sits and discusses the report by M. Karnebeek on the first four articles of the Muravieff Circular. No. 3 on Arbitration also sits and the reading of the arbitration project from Article a to the end 17. Comm arbitration project from Article 9 to the end is gone through, the first eight articles having is gone through, the first eight articles naving been read before.

18. Commission No. 3 sits. Professor Martens delivers an eloquent speech for the acceptance of arbitration as irrevocable. Mr. Holls delivers a masterly address which carried all before it, and secures iunanimity for Mr. Asser's amendment, which practically embodied the American proposal.

rg. Commission No. 3 again meets, and considers Article 9 of the Arbitration Project relating to International Commissions of Inquiry, Roumania, Greece, and Servia object to the article, beliaving it adverse to the interests of small countries. Among the great Powers all serious causes for difference of opinion have been removed. have been removed.

ector ee of ate a f of hard

y a

y of r by

and aties

idad ates

the

sing

nual

nty

is

his

at

to

on-

ity

the

ge

Sir nd

ke

ers

ra-

nd

to te

of

m

to

at nt

an he

nd

g

ao. Commission No. 1 votes on the use of asphyxiating shalls and expanding bullets; all the nations represented vote against their use except Great Brit.in and the United states (Portug I abstaining). Commission
No. 3 meets and gets through the second reading of the first twenty-nins articles of the general project of arbitration. M.
Bourgoois makes an impressive speech.
22. Commission No. 3 meets. The remaining articles are read a second time. The Roumanian and Greek Governments withdraw their objections on a slight alteration being made in Article 9.

24. Article 27 on arbitration is discussed by the Conference.

25. Article 27 in the Arbitration Convention is adopted without modification. The United States delegates however make a declaration that nothing in it shall be construed to require the United States of America to depart from their traditional attitude of not interfering in European affairs.

It was decided that the Conventions to be concluded by the States represented at the Conference are to remain open for signature until December 3181, 1839.

26. The question of admitting as signatories other than the States represented at the Comité de Rédaction is considered.

27. The Comité de Rédaction discusses the Acte Final. The question of subsequent signa-tories is still undecided. The Plenary Con-ference meets under the Presidency of M. de Staal: the preambles dealing with the laws and customs of war and the application of the Geneva Convention to naval warfare are read and definit ly adopted.

28. The Plenary Conference sits and unan adopts the decisions arrived at by the Comité de Rédac ion.

29. The Conference is brought to a close. the Conference is brought to a close. This signature of the various documents takes place. The Convention on arbitration is signed at once by sixteen Powers, that for the adoption of the Geneva Convention to Naval Warfare by fifteen, the Acte Final of the Conference by all the twenty-six States represented. Speaches are delivered by Baron de Staal, Count Münster, M. de Beaufort and Baron d'Estournelles. A letter from the Oueen of Holland to the Pous Beaufort and Baron d'Estournelles. A letter from the Queen of Holland to the Pope and his reply on the subject of the Peace Conference are read.

By-Elections.

July 5. Owing to the resignation of Sir John Austin on the question of Local Veto, a vacancy occurred in the Osgoldcross Division of Yorkshire. A re-election took place with the following results:

Sir J. Austin (L.) 5,818

Mr. C. H. Roberts (L. and Local Veto) 2,893

Against Local Veto ... 2,925

6. In consequence of the death of Mr. Robe
Ascroft and the resignation of Mr. J. I Oswald, two vacancies in the representation of Oldham took place. An election to fill the two vacancies had the following result:— Mr. A. Emmott (R.) ... 12,93,6
Mr. W. Runciman (R.) ... 12,770
Mr. W. S. Churchill (U.) ... 11,477
Mr. J. Mawdsley (U. and L.) ... 11,449

Mean Radical majority ... 1,410
This poll represents a Radical gain of two seats 12. Owing to the resignation of Mr. R. C. Webster (C.), a vacancy occurred in the representation of East St. Pancras. An election took place with the following result:—

Mr. Thomas Wrightson (C.) ... 2,670
Mr. B. F. C. Costelloe (L.) ... 2,423

Conservative majority 187

PARLIAMENTARY.

House of Lords.

The report of the amendments to the ondon Government Bill is considered; the Bill passes the report stage. The Educa-tion of Children Bill passes through Com-

Third reading London Government Bill.

Third reading the Education of Children Bill.
Other Bills advanced a stage.
The Ballot for the Milkith Bill read a first time;
speech and statement regarding it by Lord

Lansdowne.

Bills are advanced a stage.

Second reading Seats for Shop Assistants (England and Ireland) Bill. Division—for, 73; against, 28.

The Seats for Shop Assistants Bill and various other Bills pass through Committee.

other bills pass through commission.

Bills are advanced a stage.

Lord Selborne makes a statement regarding the Ceylon Waste Land Ordinance. Third reading Commons and Open Spaces Bill. Second reading Gordon Memorial College at Khartoum Bills.

Swamel Bills are read a third time. Lord

 Several Bills are read a third time. Lord Inchiquin calls the attention of the Government to the claims of Irish landlords to compensation on account of the Land Act compensation on account of the Land Act administration. Lord Lansdowne cannot promise any relief except in the passing of the Tithe Rent-charge Bill next Sess on. On a division Lord Inchiquin's resolution was carried by thirty-nine votes against thirty-four, which is a defeat to the Government. Government.

The Companies Bill is considered in Committee. Third reading Gordon Memorial College at Khartoum Bill. Report of amendments to Seats for Shop Assistants considered and igneed to. agreeu to.

21. First reading of the Tithe Rent-charge Bill, which is brought up from the Commons.

Second reading of the Small Houses (Acquisition of Ownership) Bill: Other Bills

tion of Ownership) Bill: Other Bills advanced a stags.

Scond reading of the Tithe Rent-charge Rates Bill; speeches by Lord Schorne, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Kimberley, and Lord Salisbury.

Lord Kitch-ner takes his seat. The Small Houses (Acquisition of Ownerslip) Bill and other Bills are advanced a stage.

The Tithe Rent-charge (Rates) Bill passes through Committee without amendment. Second reading of Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill and Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Bill.

Debate on the affairs in the South African Republic: speeches by Lord Camperdown, Lord Selborne, Lord Kimberley, and Lord Salisbury.

Salisbury

31. Second reading of the Ag iculture and Techni-cal Educat on (Ireland) Bill. Second reading Sale of Food and D. ugs Bill. Other Bills advanced a stage.

House of Commons.

July 3. The Chancellor of the Exchaquer, in Com-mittee of Ways and Means, moves a financial resolution on which to found a Bill for the transfer to the British. Government of the administration of the Royal Niger Company's territo ies. The resolution is agreed to after a division—223 votes to IoI.

Third reading of the Small Houses (Acquisition of Ownership) Bill, and other Bills advanced a stage.

5. Mr. Gerald Balfour's Agricultural and Technical Instruction (Ireland) Bill is discussed and read a second time,

6. Mr. Chamberlain explains his position in regard to the Niger Compary. The Lords' amendments to the Londoa Government Bill are considered.

7. The consideration of the Civil Service Estimates is resumed.

10. Tithe Rent-charge (Rates) Bill is considered.
11. Committee resumed on Tithe Rent-charge (Rates) Bill.

12. The consideration of the Tithe Rent-charge (Rates) Bill is resumed in Committee. Progress reported.

13. The consideration of the Tithe Rent-charge (Rates) Bill is resumed in Committee; there is an all night sitting.

14. Committee of Supply—Scotch Estimates considered; vote agreed to.

17. Mr. Balfour moves the suspension for the remainder of the Session of the Standing Orders under which contentious business anot be proceeded with; he mentions the cannot be proceeded with; he mentions the Bills which the Government will try to pass, and those which cannot be passed before the prorogation. The Sale of Food and Drugs Bill is considered.

18. Consideration of the Sale of Food and Drugs Bill as amended by Grand Committee is resumed; amendments considered. The financial resolution on which to found the Naval Works Fills agreed to in Committee of Ways and Mans.

19. Discussion on the Koyal Niger Company Bill;

 Discussion on the Royal Niger Company Bill; the Bill is read a second time. The Sale of Food and Drugs Bill is considered on report. Food and Drigs Bill is considered on report.
Read a third time; the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Bill. Naval Wo ks Bill is read a first time after a brief discussion.
20. Third reading of the Tithe Rent-charge [Rates] Bill by a majority of 63. The Sale of Food and Drugs Bill is considered on report.
21. Supply—Navy Estimates considered. Votes agreed to. Progress reported.
24. Several Ministerial measures are advanced a

25. Third re ding Sale of Food and Drugs Bill.
Second reading Naval Works Bill; vote agreed to. Discussion on Telephones Bill.

agreed to. Discuss on on Telephones Bill.

26. Second reading Inchriates Act (1808) Amendment Bill. The Royal Niger Bill is considered in Committee.

27. The Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a

27. The Chancellor of the Exchequer makes a statement regarding the Colonial Loans Fund Bill. Third reading Royal Niger Company Bill. The Naval Works Bill is considered in Committee. Third reading of Land Bill.

28. Supply—Debate on the state of affairs in the Transvaal. Speeches by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Chamberlain.

31. Second reading of the Coloni I Loans Bill; other Bills advanced a strge. Mr. Balfour announces the appointment of an extra announces the appointment of an extra Charcery Judge.

SPEECHES.

July 3. The United States Ambassador, in London, on the Progress of the Negro Race in

5. The Archbishop of Canterbury, at the Mansion House, on the c. isis in the Church.

6. M. Méline, at Paris, on the domestic crisis in France.

11. The Archbishop of Canterbury, at Canterbury, on the crisis in the Church.

12. Mr. Asquith, in London, on the policy of the Government.

Government.

14. Sir A. Milner, in the Cape Parliament, on the affairs of the Colony.

15. M. Déroulède, at Paris, on a plebiscitary Republic for France.

19. Mr. Labouchere, at Northampton, on Mr. Chamberlain.

Cham! erlain. Mr. Cecil Rhodes, at Cape Town, on his ideas as to Africa.

21. Mr. Cecil Rhodes, at Claremont, Cape Colony, on African Unity.

Sir Charles Tupper and Sir W. Laurier, in the Canadian Parliament, on the Alaska boundary and the United States.

27. Mr. Balfour, in London, on the Transvaal franchise.
2). Lord Rosebery, at Epsom College, on the Virtue of Manhood.

OBITUARY.

July 1. Sir William Henry Flower, 67.
M. Victor Cherbulicz (French novelist), 70.
5. Professor Fletcher (King's College), 66.
6. Sir Al. xander Armstrong, 61.
7. Mr. Richard Congreve Honorary Fellow Wadham College, 0xford), 80.
10. The Grand Duke George of Russia, 28.
11. The Duchess of Rutland.
Cardinal Teodolfo Martel, at Rome, 93.
15. Right Rev. Dr. Graves, Bishop of Limerick, 87.
20. Mr. Robert Green Ingersoll (New York), 66.

EX-KING MILAN.

128

objant dref for man migaph so of age up over hall equipos of att. won ten the as ber this alto seld skee pot who ban the ban alto such that the skee door that the see see sitt judiver, into his pow of $5.

CHARACTER SKETCH.

EX-KING MILAN OF SERVIA.

FUROPE was startled last month by the news of an attempt to assassinate ex-King Milan of Servia. The would-be assassin failed in his immediate object, but succeeded in achieving what he never anticipated. The last thing in the world which he dreamed of when he loaded his revolver before sailying forth on his murderous expedition was to rehabilitate the man whom he wished to slay. Yet a little reflection might have told him what would-be assassins are always apt to forget—that there is no reclams so useful for ruling personages as an attempted assassination. This is so widely recognised novadays that when the life of the King of Greece was attempted a couple of years ago, his enemies stoutly declared that it was a putup job, and that the attempt was a bogus one, resolved upon solely for the purpose of drawing a veil of oblivion over the previous mistakes of the reign. And even now half Europe believes that the attempt on Milan was equally unreal. The recognition of this fact might possibly tend to discourage an attempt upon the persons of kings. Careful calculation upon the number of these attempts which have failed and those which have succeeded, would show that there are usually about half a dozen attempts at least which fail for one which succeeds. Kings, therefore, stand to gain to the extent of six to one; and as the last thing in the world which assassins desire is to benefit those whom they try to slay, a vivid realisation of this fact might tend to diminish such enterprises in future.

INITIAL ANTIPATHIES.

Certainly the attempt in this case has had one altogether unlooked-for result, in that it has led me to select the ex-King Milan as a subject for a character sketch in the REVIEW OF REVIEWS; for of all the potentates of Europe ex-King Milan was the one with whom I felt least in sympathy. This antipathy dates back for many years, and even the glamour attending the victim who so narrowly escaped from the assassin's bullet can hardly reconcile me to the task of a sympathetic a preciation of a man who for the last twenty years has been the most prominent figure in the politics of Eastern Europe. It takes all sorts to make up a world, and although it might be better, according to our ideas, if such a man as the ex-King had never ascended the throne, he has been a king, and he has still more power than the actual King in the kingdom of Servia. In this sketch, therefore, I will not depart from the rule laid down at the foundation of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS of treating the subject of the character sketch not as he seems to his enemies at his worst moments, but as he seems to himself at his best. In writing of him I am not sitting as his judge, nor do I attempt to sum up in judicial spirit the weaknesses and the strong points of a very mixed character. I would rather endeavour to interpret how it is that this Obrenovitch, notwithstanding his many faults and failings, should still be sufficiently powerful to exercise a controlling influence on the politics of Servia.

There is considerable difficulty in writing a character sketch of a man who, in the opinion of the world, has no character at all, or perhaps it is more correct to say a character so unutterably bad that no one can speak about it; but even the worst man is not altogether bad, and least of all is he bad in his own estimation. If we could put ourselves inside the skin of King Milan, and see life as he sees it, and look over the chequered career which so nearly came to an end last month, we should find many things in it that might be explained if not excused, and possibly enough some things upon which even the most austere might dwell with complacency and gratitude. Qui tout sait, tout pardonne; and although it is easy to carry this kind of thing too far, so that you come to a general whitewashing of blackguards, it is by no means the besetting sin of the human race to be too charitable to the faults of others.

THE PROTEST OF HIS ENEMIES.

When I suggested to some friends that I contemplated writing this sketch, I was assailed by vehement protests. They said it was impossible to write a true sketch of King Milan, to describe the man as he was and is, without rendering it absolutely impossible for the review containing such a sketch to enter any decent household. The satires of Juvenal and the pages of Suctonius would have to be ransacked in order to find classical phrases to suggest all the infamies of the ex-King of Servia. According to them, he was a compendium of all vices, a sink of every abomination, a monster in human form, a gambler, a roué, a liar, a poltroon, a wretch for whom hanging was too good, and who was now crowning an infamous career by vamping up a story of an imaginary conspiracy for the purpose of enabling him to wreak bloody vengeance upon his political opponents-all this and more was said and written to me, until I really began to feel as if all that would need to be said about King Milan was this, that he was a putrefying mass of carrion, which nothing but a continuous diabolical possession enabled to keep moving among men. From that point of view ex-King Milan presents a figure of abnormal interest. For an utterly bad man to exist-so utterly bad as not even to have a redeeming vice, to say nothing of virtue, would constitute him the most unique human being now existing on this planet. Such excessive abuse, however, excites natural reaction. It is impossible really to believe that the man who with all his faults has nevertheless been the central point in the history of the Servian kingdom for the last thirty years, can be without qualities which, however they may be obscured by excesses and selashness, yet exist. To seek them out, it may be something like fishing for pearls in a cesspool, but we may depend upon it that the pearls are there, and after all who knows when they may repay our search?

I.-THE BOY KING.

When Milan was a little boy of twelve, his uncle, Michael Obrenovitch, one of the wisest rulers who ever reigned in Servia, fell a victim to the assassinated as Belgrade, a simple peasant rushed from the fields at Uschitza exclaiming, "They have killed my Prince—they have killed my Prince!" The authorities first of all regarded him as a man mad, but when two hours later the news of the assassination arrived by telegram, they immediately jumped to the conclusion that this peasan.

QUEEN NATALIE.

must
the up a there natio
that anyt
as it assa:
with left h
seen.
to sh
those at lih

Be man mucl whet like. of se aske could plain Mila over of m in wh marr side. that disso He w crow and t would a sir peasa then the "by th publi critic In th as to their propl atten in ex will h

to oc and forlor ride t of the know moun moth teens in th

event

must have been a conspirator, and be secretly aware of the plans of the assassin. He was accordingly locked up and remained for several days in prison. there he was subjected to interrogatories, and the explanation which he gave was very remarkable. He said that he did not know how it was, nor did he understand anything about it. All that he knew was that he saw, as it were, passing before his eyes, the scene of the assassination. He saw Prince Obrenovitch fall covered with wounds, and the sight so overcame him that he left his work, and rushed into town to tell what he had seen. No amount of cross-examination could get any other story from him but this, and as the man was only a simple peasant, and nothing could be brought forward to show that he had ever had any communication with those implicated in the conspiracy, he was ultimately set at liberty.

A CLAIRVOYANT'S PROPHECY.

Before his release, however, he was visited by many people, among others by a doctor who was much interested in his account of his peculiar gift, whether it may be called clairvoyance or what you like. The man said that he had always had this kind of second-sight, and being encouraged to talk, and asked whether he had seen anything else that he could mention, he said that he had seen quite plainly what was to come. He described the boy Milan, who, he said, was going to be Prince and reign over Servia. He said further that it would be a reign of many misfortunes, that he would be engaged in a war in which he would be defeated. He said that he would marry, and described the wife whom he saw by his Then he said a son would be born to him, and after that he would be divorced. He said also that he would dissolve the local Sobranyé, or Parliament, and reign alone. He would also become a king, and then would lose his crown. Twice his life would be attempted by assassins, and twice he would escape. The third time the assassins would be successful. All this and many more details of a similar kind were written down at the time, and the peasant from being regarded first as a man mad, and then as the accomplice of assassins, became notable as the "wise man of Uschitza." The narrative written down by the doctor is still in manuscript, but will some day be published, when the matter will probably come under the critical investigation of the Psychical Research Society. In the meanwhile there is no doubt as to the facts, nor as to the firm belief which is entertained in Servia as to their truth. King Milan himself is well aware of the prophecy of the "wise man of Uschitza," and possibly his belief that he has now only to look forward to a successful attempted assassination may make him somewhat ruthless in exacting vengeance on the last occasion on which he will have the opportunity. This, however, is to anticipate

A PRINCE WITHOUT A FRIEND.

When the boy was brought from Paris to Belgrade, to occupy a throne which was one of the most difficult and disagreeable in Europe, he was a timid and forlorn little boy. When they put him on his horse to ride through the streets of his capital to the ceremony of the consecration, he was indeed a pitiful figure, hardly knowing how to bestride the great steed which he mounted for the first time. He had neither father nor mother, and had found himself before he entered his teens a prince of Servia, the control of the country being in the hands of regents. His tutor, a free-thinking professor, was almost the only person to whom he was sincerely attached. As he grew up, he found himself in the midst of a very rude society in the centre of a Court full of all manner of intrigues. There is something mournful and pathetic in the figure of the boy prince in the palace at Belgrade, feeling that in all the principality he was utterly unknown, and that excepting his professor he had not a friend on earth He sometimes would say, pointing to his favourite dog, "He alone loves me; he alone can I trust. Every one else is always trying to use me for his own pur_c oses."

"PLEASURE AT THE HELM."

Milan was not an idealist by birth, and the surroundings in which he passed his early youth were by no means calculated to encourage any but the baser part of his nature. At the age when English schoolboys are beginning their undergraduate career at a university he was already Prince not only in name, and therefore a prey to every temptation which unscrupulous women and still more unscrupulous men could throw in his way. Society at Belgrade was not very polished. Cards were much more in vogue than books, and wine and women formed the staple amusements in the Court. Without the restraint of religious principle, without the sustaining stimulus of a strong sense of duty, it is not difficult to foresee the result. The Prince amused himself as might have been expected, and long before he attained manhood he had drained the cup of riot and excess to the dregs.

Not for him were the "lilies and languors" of virtue; he chose unhesitatingly the "roses and raptures" of vice. Nor did he reck of warning, even if such warning were given him, that the rose had many a thorn, and that the much-vaunted raptures sapped the resources of pleasure which, with due restraint, might have ministered to the happiness of a long and well-spent life. Hence, he long before he was emancipated from the Regency, he had practised the immorality of Paris of the Third Empire in the comparatively primitive society of a little

SCHOOLED IN SUSPICION.

One who knew Milan well in those days, and who watched the sad tragedy of the blighting of his youth, says:—

The young boy, Milan, proclaimed Prince of Servia, found himself surrounded by entirely strange people, by ministers and officers who represented to him that in Servia the anti-dynastic conspiracy never sleeps. They told him that, just because he was on the throne, his life was never safe. If his policy were favourable to Russia, Austria would aid the friends of the exiled Karageorgevitch dynasty to upset if not kill him, and if his policy were favourable to Austria, then Russia would side with his opponents, and do everything to send him away or even to get him assassinated. He was systematically trained to suspect everybody, and to be always on his guard against assassination. He was taught that true policy and diplomacy consisted in using astuteness to achieve your object by whatever means. Many years later King Milan recognised how evil had been the ideas and teaching which he had imbibed during his youth. He has frequently told Servian politicians: "You must not forget that I am your own creation; you have made my political education; whatever I may be, I am such because you are what you are!" And that is perfectly true.

There is no doubt much truth in this. If the politicians of Servia could have been banished to some island in the distant seas, where they were free from being made the tool and plaything of Austrian and Russian diplomacy, they would have had much more chance of developing normally, and their prince in particular would have had a much more easy time. It must be admitted that to familiarise a boy from his youth up with the seamies

KING ALEXANDER.

whet suffice of an

132 boy he pote boy exce lead press From Stef Rus

the to sai

wh is ext

of a la not Bal fam Mil ard No Free type his the print a g second of I who uncerthe program any finis

was Kur foun spee

was Rus Serv was the have fami

the p

side of international politics was not calculated to rectify the results of a purely secular education. It was enough to have made a cynic of a saint, and Milan was not a saint, but a precocious Parisian boy, very intelligent and very spoiled.

FRENCH IN BLOOD AND MORALS.

The correspondent from whom I have already quoted, whom I will call X., has reminded me that King Milan is not merely of Parisian education, but of French extraction. He writes:—

Milan is the son of Milosch Obrenovitch, who was the nephew of the founder of the Obrenovitch dynasty, and Marie Catargi, a lady of great beauty, and belonging to one of the oldest of noble families of Moldavia. Marie Catargi's mother was nee Balsch, a family which claims to have descended from the famous French family Seigneurs Le Baux, of Provence. King Milan has inherited from his mother the impulsiveness, the ardent nature, the æsthetic sense inherent in the Latin race. Not so much by his education as by his blood, he is more a Frenchman than anything else. In many of his ways he is a type of an old French Grand Seigneur, who thinks it beneath his dignity to count his money—indeed, hating money, but loving the splendour of high life, faithful to his friends, generous to his enemies, daring and bold, almost as proud of his weak points as of his good ones.

To understand King Milan rightly, you must bear in mind two principal influences on his character: first, his Servian blood has a good deal of French and Roumanian blood mixed with it; secondly, his education was received in Paris under the tutorship of Professor Kurt, a well-known adherent of Comte's philosophy, who, when asked by Michael, the reigning Prince of Servia, the uncle of Milan, what was his programme for the education of the heir presumptive to the throne of Servia, answered: "My programme is this: I shall educate Milan as if he were my own son!" "Thank you," said Prince Michael—"I do not want any other programme." Professor Kurt had not much time to finish his programme. When only in his fourteenth year, Milan was suddenly called to succeed to his cruelly assassinated uncle. Kurt had already laid down democratic principles in the foundation of his pupil's education, but these principles came speedily into conflict with the realities of things.

IN FAVOUR WITH RUSSIA.

During the regency between 1868 and August 22nd, 1871, when he came of age, and undertook to reign, the boy prince was very popular. It was in those days that he made a journey which had for nearly ten years a potent influence on the history of Servia. While yet a boy, the Regent took him to Russia, where he made an excellent impression on the Tsar Alexander II. and the leading Russian statesmen. He himself was deeply impressed by the reception given him at the Imperial Court. From his accession to the throne to the time of the San Stefano Treaty, King Milan was steadfastly devoted to Russia, and ready to do anything Russia wished. This was because he, together with his ministers, believed Russia to be sincere in her professions of goodwill towards Servia. During that period (1868–1878) Prince Milan was persona gratissima at the Russian Court, and with the Russians in general, and although sometimes attempts have been made by the friends of the Karageorgevitch family to represent Prince Milan as unpopular in the country, there were in those days no attacks on him in the press which were either organised or sustained.

A SUMMONS UNRESPONDED TO.

There are some natures which appear to have inherited, whether from a previous existence or from their parents, sufficient morale to enable them to preserve in the midst of an atmosphere dark with the gloom of atheism, and turbid with the fumes of vice, an intrinsic nobility of soul which enables them to rise to the dignity of a high position. Such a man in our history was Henry V., to whom the summons to the throne came as the trumpet of an archangel summoning to resurrection his better life. His advent to power brought to Milan no such summons to the higher soul. The moral equipment with which he found himself at the beginning of his reign was inadequate enough for a man who had to govern a State even in the piping times of peace; but in the troublous period upon which the Balkans were then entering a worse preparation could hardly have been conceived.

II.-HIS MARRIAGE.

Many and various are the means of grace by which the divine voice makes itself heard by the children of men. The first of these had been tried in vain. The summons to lofty station, the solemn consecration with which, in the name of the Almighty and as the representative of a nation, Milan had been called to the princely office, had fallen upon deaf ears. Power and responsibility, with its immense opportunities for usefulness, had awakened no responsive echo in his soul. The first means, therefore, had failed; the second remained. Of all the agencies by which the higher soul of man may be touched and roused from its trance-like torpor there is none to be compared to the love of woman. It is ever the woman's soul which leads us, and one of the worst consequences of the life of dissipation by which Milan had prostituted the days of his youth is the hardening of the heart and the deadening of the soul which renders it irresponsive to this diviner element in the world. Even the worst men, whose associations of womanhood have been bemired by years of self-indulgence, which is in reality the very destruction of the higher self, have discovered in the radiating love of a noble woman the miracle-working element which transforms life. Power and its responsibilities having failed to make a man of Milan, it remained to be seen what might be effected by his marriage.

A WIFE THAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN.

There seemed some hope in the influence which was exerted over him by a Servian lady, a widow somewhat his senior, to whom he was deeply and tenderly attached. If only he could have married her, the miracle might have been effected, for she seemed the only person who was able to inspire him with lofty aspirations. But she, alas, was not considered eligible for the hand of the Prince, and he had to seek for a wife elsewhere. He missed his way. He never ceased to cherish a deep and abiding affection for the Egeria who for a brief season led him upwards. She died some years after his marriage, and to this day he ever celebrates the anniversary of her death by the side of her flower-decked grave. Princes, however light of love, are not incapable sometimes of deep affection, and when this is crossed by the exigencies of dynastic expediency they are the least to be envied of mortals.

NATALIE AND THE FORTUNE-TELLER.

The Prince's aunt chose for him a bride in the person of the beautiful girl afterwards famous as the unfortunate Natalie of Servia. She was a daughter of a Moldavian who, having entered the Russian service, had risen to the rank of a Colonel. His daughter spent her girlhood in the neighbourhood of Odessa, and grew up to womanhood a Russian in heart and soul, despite her Moldavian extraction. The story goes that one time at their country place a gipsy woman was telling the fortunes of the guests. She had told many wonderful things, when Natalie appeared on the scene, and her girlish companions insisted that she should allow the witch-wife to read her fortune by her palm. The gipsy scanned the girl's hand, and exclaimed: "I see in your future that you will be a queen." A loud outburst of merriment checked the prophetess, for nothing in the world seemed less likely than that the Russian Colonel's daughter would ever ascend a throne. "No," said the gipsy woman, when the laughter had subsided; "you laugh, but you will see that it will happen as I have said. The lady will some day wear a crown. But," she added, "when you come to be twenty-nine or thirty there is no more a crown upon your head. It may be by death or it may be from some other cause." "But can you see nothing more?" asked Natalie. "No," said the gipsy, "but in some way or another the crown will go through wood." In vain they plied her with questions as to what kind of wood it was, or in what way the wood would have this evil influence upon her destiny, but the lips of the seeress were sealed.

THE HONEYMOON.

The gipsy left, and life resumed the even tenour of its way for Natalie. She had, indeed, almost forgotten the prophecy, when, one fine day, fortune, destiny, or call it what you will, threw her into the path of Prince Milan. She was a singularly beautiful girl, and Milan was fascinated by her loveliness. No restric-tions of princely etiquetta forbade the ruler of Servia to choose his bride outside the royal caste. He woold her, and she on her part readily surrendered to her princely suitor. They married, and for a time all went well. No two lovers could have been more ideally wrapped up in each other than were Milan and Natalie in the first days of their honeymoon. It seemed to those who saw them closely that it was possible that the second call had been effectual, and that Milan was to find in the intimate blending of his life with that of his beautiful young bride the principle of divine restraint which he had heretofore sorely lacked. After a time their joy was completed by the birth of their firstborn and only child, the present King of Servia. The young Prince Alexander was born in the war with the Turks, and one who was present described with much humour how the Servian Army, having been defeated, was wakened the next night by salvos of artillery, and on inquiring anxiously what was the matter, was told that the Queen had given birth to an heir to the throne.

III.-WAR.

The first time when Milan appeared conspicuously before the world was in the year 1876, that eventful year in the history of Eastern Europe. 1876 was for the democracy of Western Europe the birth of the Slavonic peoples of the Balkans. Before 1876 the fundamental facts of the situation in the Balkans were known only to a few statesmen and diplomatiste, travellers and students. The fact that the Balkan Peninsula was inhabited by various races was known, as it is known to-day that Albania is peopled by different tribes; but everything was hazy. It was known that there were Turks there, and that there was a Servian Principality on the atlas, but beyond that there was no vivid realisation of the identity of the Servian people, or of the fact that they differed in language and in national aspirations from the Bulgarians. It was not until 1876, when the Turks took their terrible revenge upon the Balkans for the incipient attempt at revolution, that the affairs of the Balkan Peninsula begin to live with vivid human interest in the imagination of the English people.

Eng

and was sens

thou our

tion iust

high gall of o

wha

that Eur

Bas

the

phil

and

of 1

For

littl

nev

reg

was

of t

Ru

to foe

har

Sla

As

ma

Ru

fre

res

hu

pu

bro

por

spe

pri

ass

arı

un

wa

Ru

wil

WO

va

vo

an

Dj

the

of

the

to

It

of

th

of

ve

There is no advertiser so potent as the man who takes life or who spends life. It is the bright red plash of blood that most arrests the attention of the living, and there is no doubt as to the redness of the plash of gore which fell upon the news-sheets of Europe when the Turks massacred the Bulgarians into subjection. These massacres did not affect the Servians directly. Within the frontiers of the Principality of Servia no Ottoman soldier ever dared put his foot, ever since the days when, thirty years ago and more, the last of the Turkish garrison had been banished from the citadel of Belgrade. Nevertheless, it was the Bulgarian atrocities which were the means of bringing Servia to the front. It was some time before the real nature of the horrors which desolated Bulgaria were made known to the English public. They were, however, only too well known to the Servians, who, although separated by a geographical line from Bulgaria, were only too well aware of the orgy of hell which had taken place among their co-religionists and fellow Slavs.

When Mr. Gladstone raised his puissant voice, and the English people rose in angry response to his summons, a new charter began in the history of the relations between England and the Balkans. Then it was that in the heart and conscience of the English people the Ottoman caste was condemned, and condemned once and for ever. A sense of horror and of loathing filled our people at the thought that we had been using our strength and spending our blood and treasure in maintaining such an abomination of desolation in the midst of Christian races; and just at that moment, when the passion of pity was at its highest point, we were assailed by the news that Serviagallant little Servia-had taken up arms in vindication of outraged humanity. At first we dimly understood what had happened, but after a time we began to realise that Servia, and Servia alone among all the States of Europe, was endeavouring to bring the Pashas and their Bashi-Bashouks to justice. I remember with gratitude the fact that Mr. Cowen, of Newcastle, a man Turcophile to his finger-tips, was nevertheless one of the first and most eloquent exponents in England of the heroism of this Servian war. The Servians were outnumbered. For them to attack the Ottoman Empire was as if a little terrier was flying at the throat of a bloodhound; nevertheless, they did it. It was a mad enterprise regarded from the point of view of commonsense, but it was one of those actions which changed the whole course of the history of Europe.

THE RUSSIAN VOLUNTEERS.

If the Servians had not attacked the Turks, the Russian volunteers would never have had occasion to hasten to the support of Servia against her gigantic In particular, Alexander Kirieff would never have fallen fighting on the fatal field of Zaitschar, or have kindled by his heroic death the flame of Slavonic enthusiasm throughout the whole of Russia. As Mr. Kinglake tells us, in every church in Russia masses were said for the repose of the soul of the gallant Russian officer who had fallen in defence of Slavonic freedom; and the great heart of Russia throbbed responsive to the mingled appeal of patriotism and humanity. Nearly a million pounds were raised in public subscription for the assistance of their Servian brothers; and four thousand Russians of all classes poured down the Danube to Belgrade for the purpose of spending their lives in the defence of the gallant little principality. It was the presence of those men-the assistance which they were able to give to the Servian armies, which riveted the attention of Europe upon the unequal struggle; and what was still more important, it was the popular interest which their sacrifices excited in Russia itself which led Alexander II., sorely against his will, to pledge his Imperial word that if no other Power would intervene, the Slav should not look to Russia in

TITULAR COMFORT FOR DEFEAT.

The Servians, even despite the aid of the Russian volunteers, were overwhelmed by the superior numbers and military skill of their Turkish adversaries; and after Djunis fell nothing stood in the way of the march of the victorious Turks to Belgrade but the interdict of Russia, which on this occasion was supported by the other Powers, anxious above everything else to avoid a direct rupture between Russia and Turkey. It must be admitted that during that war the character of Prince Milan did not impress itself favourably upon the Western world. He was not of the stuff of which heroes are made. If he had been a prince of the type of Alexander of Battenberg, events might have taken a very different course. General Tchernaieff, the Russian general, was in command. He did not wish to be incommoded with the presence of a prince in his camp. So Milan remained at Belgrade, denounced as a poltroon by the newspapers of Europe, but probably serving his country better by his absence than by his presence. The campaign afforded him no opportunity of displaying any great qualities of a general or of even distinguished personal bravery.

Another of the bizarre incidents in which comedy trod upon the heels of tragedy was the proclamation of King Milan as King of Servia after another reverse in the field. It was a way they had of comforting themselves in those days when they fought and suffered and bled in the cause of humanity.

IV.-AFTER THE WAR.

The Servians, althou h they had shown great gallantry in going to war, under the pressure of the Slavonic Committees of Moscow, were untrained to battle, and being pitted against some of the best fighting troops in the world, they had very few successes to put to their account. Gratitude had little place in politics, and the Russians, when the day of reckoning came, treated their Servian ally with an astonishing forgetfulness of past favours. Servia had fought for them in 1876 and in 1877, and had participated in the closing scenes of the war for the liberation of Bulgaria. Prince Milan had shown himself so subservient to Russian policy that in Europe he was roundly denounced as neither more nor less than a Russian satrap. When the war was over, and the Turks were compelled to accept the terms of their conqueror, the Servians waited with feverish anxiety to know what share they were to have in the distribution of Turkish territory. The Servian race inhabits a large tract of territory, at least three times as large as the principality of Servia. The whole of Bosnia and Herzegovina is purely Servian. Montenegro is also of the Servian stock. Large districts lying between the southern frontier of Servia and Salonica are also to a great extent peopled with Servian folk. To the north and west of Belgrade there are several Austrian provinces which, if political frontiers were made conterminous with those of race, would make the kingdom of Servia extend to the Adriatic, and make considerable inroads upon the Austro-Hungarian empire. The Servian provinces of Austria were not in question, but the Servian provinces of Turkey were. What was to be done with them? Would Russia repay her ally for all the carnage of the campaign of 1876 by extending her frontiers so as to include the Servian population of Bosnia, Herzegovina and Macedonia?

A CRUEL DISILLUSION.

The Servian people waited, and so did King Milan. After a period of suspense the provisions of the treaty of San Stefano were published, and Servia experienced a profound and cruel disillusion. Bosnia and Herzegovina were handed over to Austria to occupy and administer, while the Servian districts lying between Servia and Salonica were made part and parcel of the great principality of Bulgaria, which stretched from the Danube to the Ægean. Never was there disappointment more acute. The treaty of San Stefano seemed to the Servians to represent the very acme of ingratitude. That Russia would give them less than they hoped for did not surprise them-they were prepared for considerable disappointment-but that their great patron, the victorious White Tsar, would so far forget all their services as to remodel the map of Europe in such a fashion as to be absolutely fatal to their most cherished aspirations, seemed to them like a hideous nightmare. There was no doubt

usly

tful

was 876

the plo-

the

was

by wn

ian

las,

vas

the

ian

hat

ige

ns

It

en

ble

ns

pt

he

n-

id

nsh

S.

60

10 ls

d

st

e

0

of 11

e

of

about it. Russia had thrown them over, and having to choose between Bulgarians and Servians, had cast in her lot definitely with Bulgaria. Nations in such predicaments have not much time for reflection. States in the position of Servia, that lie between two great empires, have always an alternative ally.

SERVIA'S AUSTRIAN POLICY.

King Milan and his people, realising their desertion by Russia, turned instinctively to Vienna. It is not necessary here to discuss the rights and wrongs of the action of Russia in this matter. The Russians had quarrelled with King Milan. They were not pleased with the part played by the Servians in the war, and estrangement had grown up between the two countries. But it is plain enough after the event that Russia-I do not say backed the wrong horse, by any means, but put all her money on one horse, whereas she might have made better business if she had put a little more on Servia. The progressive party in Servia made a campaign against the Russian Alliance, Milan not only joined these politicians, but he became an active and energetic leader of the Anti-Russian party in Servia. From this policy he has never varied, and in his own opinion and in that of his friends it was this change of policy which explains the ferocity of the attacks to which he has been subject ever since. Again to quote from my friend, from whose paper I have already made considerable extracts :-

Contrary to the desire of the Russian Pauslevich, King Milan's Government made railways connecting Roumelian and Macedonian systems with the Austrian set of railways. Contrary to their advice, a number of conventions (commercial, veterinary, etc.) were made with Austria. The Russians believe that at the same time (between 1879 and 1882) a secret treaty was concluded between King Milan and the Emperor Francis Joseph, by which Austria promised to support the Obrenovitch Dynasty and the Servian claims to Macedonia, whilst King Milan engaged to respect the Treaty of Berlin, not to agitate against Austrians in Bosnia, and not to join Russia in a war against Austria. It is said that the transformation of the Principality into the kingdom of Servia was the first fruit of the good understanding between King Milan on one side, and Austria, Germany, and Italy on the other.

RUSSIA'S COUNTER-MOVE.

Russia became in her turn indignant against King Milan. He was at once designed in the Russian press as "the traitor of the Slavonic cause," and a "Campaign" against him was immediately organised in all the papers which outside Russia enjoyed Russian subsidies. The official Russian press did more. It induced the Prince of Montenegro to sign a secret offict treaty with Pursic of which the control of the press of the pressure of the pre state treaty with Russia, of which the conditions are very well known in Belgrade as well as in Berlin, Vienna, and London. By the intervention of Russia, the pretender to the throne of Servia, Prince Peter Karageorgevitch, became the son-in-law of the Prince of Montenegro, and these two, supported by Russia, began to agitate in Servia, and through the press in all Europe, against King Milan. To his own people Milan has been described as a man who has sold the country to Austria and to the Pope of Rome, having engaged to force every Servian to go to fight for the Catholic, Francis Joseph, against the orthodox, Tsar Alexander. Abroad he has been, and is constantly described, as a gambler, coward, a man destitute of every moral principle, whose only object in the world is to extort money from the poor people of Servia, to waste it on the gambling tables or on the demi-monde! No lie was too bad to be told of King Milan. His intelligence and his resourcefulness could not be denied, because no impartial and intelligent man could converse with King Milan for a quarter of an hour without being struck with the superior mental gift of the man. Therefore all the united and organised efforts of his enemies were directed to represent him, in the eyes of the world, as a moral monster.

In Servia itself this European press campaign exercised no influence because there even his political opponents recognise gladly that he has many high qualities of character. King Milan has always only given and never taken, and the story about his insatiable greediness is nothing but a calumny, just as the story that he - who never takes more than half a glass of wine-is a confirmed drunkard.

He is with special persistence represented as a great gambler. But while in Servia he could not gamble for the simple reason that there was no one there with whom he could gamble. The only two men in Belgrade with whom he from time to time could play a party of cards were the Russian Minister, Persiani, and the German Minister, Count Bray. Both of them were poor men, and very often when willing to play borrowed money from King Milan for the pur-When in Vienna or Paris or temporarily on a visit, he, being a member of the Jockey Club and the Cercle Royal, would play in those clubs on high stakes, but so did many another Grand Seigneur of France and Magnate of Hungary. But gambling was never a true passion with him, as it is constantly, although absolutely wrongly, represented. One of his first orders as Commander-in-Chief of the Servian Army was to prohibit playing cards among the Servian officers.

All this, of course, will be read with much shrugging of shoulders by those who have taken Milan at the estimate of his accusers. I express no opinion as to the subject. My correspondent's statements accurately represent the opinions which are expressed by the Servians of the King's Party. When I was in Belgrade last year the acting Prime Minister spoke in the same high terms concerning the character of the ex-King. Certainly if

MILAN AT THE ACCESSION OF KING ALEXANDER, 1882.

my o has Pres more

W not : ordi man nate kind kind the:

and wou of i of in hap com jea' nan is s con -th

fath

she

the else

E

fatu

tise OWI told of bril of ' ove my ma of I was the eye but ma thr the suc inv tho COL me as wil wii

ha for

of

tra Co my correspondent is correct, King Milan is a man who has certainly no reason to be grateful to the European Press, which, so far as he is concerned, has been little more than a permanent pillory.

V.-DIVORCE AND ABDICATION.

When you ask the Servians whether, after all, there is not some foundation for the possession of such an extraordinarily bad reputation by such an extremely capable man, they tell you that it was all the result of his unfortunate marriage. If Queen Natalie had been a different kind of woman, her husband would have been a different kind of man, which, no doubt, goes without saying. But the same is true concerning all wives and all husbands, and so far as the general estimate goes, Queen Natalie would seem to have had a great deal more to complain of in King Milan than ever Milan had to complain of in Natalie. After the first years of their married happiness, things did not go well; but no one could complain of Queen Natalie on the ground of excessive jealousy. If her husband had respected les convenances, things might have gone on fairly well. It is said that Queen Natalie would have been quite contented with seventy-five per cent. of her husband -that is to say, if he had lived at Belgrade as King, father, and husband for nine months out of the twelve, she would not have questioned what he did with himself the remaining three. Que le roi s'amuse in Paris and elsewhere.

THE SIREN ARTEMISIA.

But it was too much when the King became so infatuated with Artemisia Christics that he publicly advertised his devotion by day and night in the streets of his own capital. The story of Artemisia may some day be told by those who have an interest for human documents of that sort. She was a woman neither beautiful nor brilliant, nor faithful. She seemed to have been a kind of weird woman of the enchantress type, whose mastery over her victims was as complete as that of any siren in mythological lore. She was the daughter of a timber merchant, to whom nature had denied almost every gift of beauty, save the soul which glowed in her eyes. There was no fire in the eyes, but "oil" which seemed to feed the flame of other men. When Artemisia of the "oily" eyes had borne Milan a son, nothing would satisfy him but that he would divorce Natalie, in order to be able to marry his enchantress, and make her child the heir to the throne. There is no need to go into the long story of how the divorce came about without changing the order of the succession; but it would form an interesting subject for investigation by the Psychical Research Society or by those who are curious in the investigation of hypnotic control. During the time the King was as a man mesmerised he imagined his Artemisia to be as divine as her namesake, and just as the victim of the hypnotist will swear that salt is sugar and vinegar the sweetest wine, so Milan was firmly convinced that in Artemisia he had the pearl of all women, the ideal of her sex. Whether for beauty, for wit, for wisdom, for political sagacity, he swore by her; he was, to use a good Scotch term, "clean daft."

A RADICAL CONSTITUTION.

Finally, after all Europe had rung with the scandal of his divorce and his treatment of his wife, he resolved to abdicate. When he announced his intention, one of his councillors, perceiving that he was as one distraught, suggested that he would do well to give a new Constitution to his people, wait a little while to see how it worked, and then retire if he pleased in the lustre of his achievement. The words for a moment seemed to break the witch woman's spell; the King responded to the appeal, summoned a constitutional assembly, and assisted in drawing up a very radical constitution, which still exists in Servia. In council he displayed an astonishing grasp of political subjects, being able to discuss every point when it came up, as if he had made it a study all his life. One who was present on that occasion told me that it was a perpetually increasing amazement to see how perfect a master he was of all the subjects dealt with and hownothing could turn up which took him unawares. He was quick, eloquent, capable, a man possessing a phenomenal memory and a full share of the royal gift of remembering persons and faces after the lapse of many years.

ABDICATION.

The Constitution having been proclaimed, his advisers hoped that no more would be heard of the abdication, but to the amazement and dismay of his household and his Cabinet he suddenly appeared before them and announced that his resolve was taken and that he would quit the throne. It was in vain to argue with him, to point out that never before had the country been so devoted to the person of the King or his dynasty, that the Radical opposition was willing to support the Ministers of his choice-all this counted as nothing. He was demeanour was as that of a person possessed. The act demeanour was as that of a person possessed. The act of abdication was executed, and he descended into private life. And then a strange thing happened. From the moment that the crown left his head the influence of the witch woman ceased. Artemisia and Milan parted, never to meet again. The story was current at the Hague that she had been heard of, years later, proposing to part with the King's letters for a consideration to the Russian Government; but this may only be a canard hatched in some foreign chancellery. What is indubitable is that for some years the King was as wax in her hands, and that after his abdication the whole of her influence disappeared. When he was still under the domination of her spell, it was urged by a wise woman that he should be sent abroad across the water, far away; only then would he be able to regain control of his reasoning faculties. The magic of Artemisia was too strong to be annulled by running water of the Danube, which is sufficient to destroy most spells. Probably the Atlantic would have been broad enough to have broken its baleful influence. But enough of the Circe of Belgrade.

WAS IT WORRY?

Those who have a less psychical view maintain that the King was worried to death. What with the scandal about his wife and the worry about his mistress, and the irritation and friction produced by the attempt to force Servia to follow an Austrian policy—it all told upon his nerves to such an extent that he abandoned everything in disgust. An attempt had been made upon his life, and open rebellion had broken out in the country, instigated by the partisans of the Karageorgevitch dynasty; and then he had on the top of it all the frightful misfortune of the war between Servia and Bulgaria, in which Servia was badly beaten on the field of Slivnitza. No doubt "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown"; and King Milan did not by any means find the Servian throne a bed of roses.

PILGRIM TO JERUSALEM.

After his abdication, King Milan made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. It is an odd thing to do for such a man.

on,

of

of

ia,

all nas ria

ery

h,

n,

ti-

is

on

00 iis

be

al

nut

or e-

e

n

a

Although he was a Freethinker, he had never been entirely indifferent to religion. Again to quote from my friend's letter:—

The old philosopher Kurt inspired his young pupil with agnostic tendencies in the question of faith. It was one of the deficiencies of King Milan's personality. At one time he invited the most distinguished men amongst the believers and unbelievers to a series of debates in his presence on questions of faith. He wanted to have faith by conviction, and desired to have an opportunity to be convinced. The result of those conferences in the palace, held generally after dinner between 9 and 12 o'clock, was not favourable to the increase of his very slight faith. But since King Milan went in 1889 to Jerusalem, and visited the Holy Places of Palestine, a remarkable change has come over him. He told a friend that, standing in the great temple at Jerusalem on Good Friday, he felt for the first time that there is a reality about faith, God, Saviour, and the Eternal life which he never felt before. Since that day he has given great attention to the question of faith, and many of his ordresdu-jour to the Servian army, especially those on the eve of Christmas and Easter, read more like a short sermon than addresses from a general to his soldiers.

"A CHANGED MAN" EVER SINCE.

The conversion of Paul on the way to Damascus was certainly much less sudden and extraordinary than the conversion of King Milan at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Since that time, according to his friend, he has been a changed man, and has devoted himself sedulously to the very necessary duty of improving the discipline and organisation of the Servian Army. As commander-in chief of the Servian Army and as ex-King he is the virtual ruler of Servia. As such he has been assailed, and as such his life has been attempted twice. According to the prophecy of "the wise man of Uschitza" a third attempt will be made, and on this occasion it will be successful.

THE ATTEMPT ON HIS LIFE REAL.

But, asks the reader, what about the vindictive persecution of all political opponents as a consequence of the attempt on the King's life? Was it a real attempt or merely a bogus one? It seems to have been genuine enough. People do not expose themselves to have the revolver bullet fired into them at close quarters merely for theatrical or political purposes. There seems to be no doubt that one bullet at least did enter the ex-King's body, while others passed close to him. That he could have promptly availed himself of the incident in order to get hold of his most dangerous opponents is only natural. Even a man who was less hasty and hot-tempered than King Milan might be pardoned if he had made the most of the move which the failure of the attempt had placed in his hands. That there was a conspiracy there is little doubt. Servia seethes with conspiracy. It is its normal condition. The little kingdom lying between Austria and Russia, with rival dynasties and unsatisfied ambitions, is one of the most politically feverish centres in Europe. In Servia assassination has long been regarded as one of the natural and almost necessary political methods. There is nothing more extraordinary in the fact that the Karageorgevitch partisans or Radical leaders should compromise themselves in a conspiracy to get rid of the King than that Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman and Lord Kimberley should lay their heads together for the purpose of organising a vigorous political propaganda against the Government of the day. But if so, it will be objected, why the wholesale persecution and reign of terror which has been established as a consequence of the attempt? The answer to this is that the number of arrests has been grossly exaggerated, and the imagination and malignity of partisans have multiplied the number of prisoners by hundreds and by thousands. Next year they will be tried, and if their guilt is clear enough, some of them may be shot.

MILAN "NOT VINDICTIVE."

Again to quote from my correspondent, to whom I referred about this matter:—

I

the

the peo

kno

Eig

with stro

doc

gat

retu

trer

irrit

his eas

and

was

Lie

atte

mos

Milan is not vindictive and is simply incapable of a mean action. All statements to the contrary are inventions and slanders. His inveterate political enemies have of late filled the European press with statements that the attempt on his life was arranged by himself with the object to get the Radical leaders into his clutches, and to send them to execution. But he actually was wounded and very narrowly escaped being killed. It was not necessary to arrange a public attempt on his life, and to risk assassination; the leaders of the Radical party could have been arrested on some other charges. And then these very Radicals who have been now arrested, had not many years ago been already before a Court Martial and had been condemned to death. It was this very King Milan, who had their lives in his hand, who gave them pardon. Whether they will be now executed, if condemned again, it is difficult to say, but those who know King Milan incline to think that he is likely to use his influence with his son in order to get them their pardon again.

IMPULSIVE, BUT MAGNANIMOUS.

Hasty by temperament, and outspoken and daring, he has sometimes acted precipitately, and in that way done injustice to one or other man; but hardly ever has a week or two passed that he has not recognised his mistake, and then tried in most generous manner to make an apology and reparation. It would be quite in keeping with his temperament if it were true that, when he heard that Lieutenant-Colonel Nicolitch made a political demonstration by accompanying publicly the Radical leader Pashich to the prison door (when condemned for lese-majesté) that he tore his epaulettes off with his own hands, throwing them on the floor; but if that officer or his friends had undertaken to prove to King Milan that Nicolitch did not mean to demonstrate, but did the act from other motives, Nicolitch would have been within a month or two reinstated into his former position: It is quite in keeping with his character that when a few days ago he received a deputation which came to congratulate him on his escape, he addressed one of the Radical leaders, M. Voritch, who repeatedly was Minister of Finance in the Radical Cabinet, and only three months ago had been appointed a Senator, telling him that he is a coward, because he comes with loyal people to congratulate him, yet behind his back he does not hesitate to attack him with all sorts of slander. Yet there will not pass many months before you will hear that M. Voritch has been invited to dine with King Milan. M. Pashich and M. Tauschanovich, with many other prominent Radicals, have been condemned to death for having organised an armed rebellion in the eastern districts of Servia. But King Milan commuted that sentence, and in a few years after this condemnation made them Ministers of State.

A MIXED CHARACTER.

So far my friend. Let us hope that he may be correct, and that King Milan may justify the confidence of his friends. It is at least evident that he is a much more mixed character than is ordinarily believed, and that in that bundle of inconsistencies there are elements of good to explain the hold which he seems to have upon his own subjects. Belgrade itself gives little token to the visitor that it is the vortex of a turbid and sometimes bloody whirlpool of dynastic and political intrigue. To be born in the centre of it, to have to rule over a race which feels that it is but half-born into political existence, and is perpetually struggling dissatisfied towards the realisation of its greater destinies, is not so much a lot to be envied as a doom to be deplored. Let us hope that the young King Alexander, of whose character much is hoped and little known, may not have so much reason as his father to lament the destiny which called him to the throne.

THE LATE TSAREVITCH.

AN APPRECIATION BY A FRIEND.

Dear Mr. Stead,—I feel quite stunned at the news of the death of the Grand Duke George of Russia. I know the world expected it; that it was no surprise to most people; but to those of us who had the privilege of knowing him, it was a great shock and a deep sorrow. Eight weeks ago I was in the Caucasus, and spoke with Dr. K——, who told me, in answer to my inquiries, that Prince George was looking better and feeling stronger than he had done for years, that he would, the doctor thought, eventually recover. But from what I can gather, he seems to have presumed too much upon his returning strength, and hence the sudden end.

be

1

ean

nd

vas

ers

he

ed.

nd

ıld

ry

go ed

in

n.

ed

ld

gd d

From the beginning of his illness he disliked extremely to be doctored and fussed over. Nothing irritated him more than a remark that he was in a draught, or that it was advisable to close a window on his behalf. He liked, too, to wander about at his ease unaccompanied, and it seems he was alone and unattended when his death took place, although he was on the most friendly terms with his adjutant Lieutenant B—, a man of great tact and sense, most attentive to his duties, and one of the cleverest and most refined of men.

Many people will write of the late Tsarevitch—write the exact and proper things in the exact and proper way; but I should like to pen a few lines as of one most deeply beloved and sincerely lamented by all those who knew him.

As a boy he was the most gentle and docile of the family, not particularly brilliant perhaps, but winning the love of every one around him. It was not until his return from his voyage around the world that symptoms of consumption appeared, which dread malady has carried him away, in spite of every effort to arrest it, after seven years of suffering most patiently borne. Many doctors tried their skill in various ways, and at last Abastouman (Abas-Tuman) was strongly advised on account of its splendid mountain air. The house of the Princess T-. was taken for him, a lovely little place covered by wild vine. But later a small palace was built by Colonel B---. This palace is a very simple construction. A London tradesman would probably reject it with scorn, but to my mind it just suited the surrounding scenery and quiet tastes of its owner. It was originally one-storied, but three years ago another etage was added, being considered better for the Grand

THE DEVIL'S BR'DGE, ABASTOUMAN.

Du sini chi The the cro the fatt one wh and of the a bal gree one mo wh arr clo lea of use

he sea

THE LATE TSAREVITCH.

140

THE GRAND DUKE ALEXANDER.

Duke's health. The interior is very simply furnished, and is interesting chiefly for its library and pictures. The Prince's cabinet was as simple as the rest of the palace. It was almost crowded with photographs, amongst them being a pencilled sketch of his father, the late Emperor, and a lovely one of the Princess of Wales, of whom he was very fond.

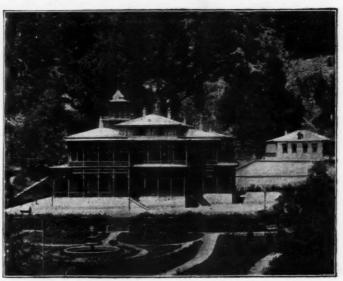

On his writing-table he kept a great number of cigarette-cases of all kinds and sizes. He liked to make presents of them to those of whom he approved. The outside of the palace resembles a Swiss châlet. There is a noisy, babbling brook running through its grounds. The site is a very beautiful one, being entirely surrounded by mountains covered by pine forests, where paths have been cut and seats arranged. Only one of these paths is closed to the public, and that is one leading to his pavilion on the summit of one of the loveliest hills, where he used to dine and take tea sometimes. Once, upon his return from Denmark, he was much annoyed to find that the seats had been removed, and he immediately had them restored for the comfort of the public. At a little distance stands the palace of the Grand Duke Alexander, more imposing-looking than the palace of Prince George. A private path connects the wo palaces.

Abas-Tuman is exceedingly beautiful. Its mountains are covered with pine forests where delicious raspberries and strawberries grow, where bears and wolves find a home, and sometimes brigands a hiding-place. I cannot attempt to describe the freshness of the mornings there; one seems almost intoxicated with new life; while the evening air has a stinging bracing effect, making one's blood bound and sending one home with the appetite of a dozen people. The mineral baths are well arranged and splendidly kept under the direction of Dr. K-They stand in the centre of a park where a band plays each morning. The military hospitals built by Colonel B--- are the best I have seen in Russia. The two groves have innumerable seats, where the band plays once a day, and where dainty luncheons and dinners can be served at every hour. But the beauty of Abas-Tuman consists in its rocky heights, towering one above another, looking down on the foaming waters dashing in angry impatience at their base; and as one mounts higher and higher, leaving the tops of the pines far below, one comes upon plains covered with flowers of extraordinary size and beauty, while a little higher than these Elburz bursts upon us in all his wondrous majesty.

But with an aching sorrow comes the thought that he who so loved Abas-Tuman and so gloried in its beauties has been ruthlessly cut down in the morning of his life. Let me recall his form as I first saw it—tall, slender, slightly stooping, but manly and dignified. His faze was beautiful, ethereal, spiritual, and from it eyes as deeply blue as the sky looked out at you with a pathos that brought tears to your own. His smile was like fleeting sunshine, and his manner was quiet, gentle, and exceedingly gracious. I never could look at him without a feeling of pitying reverence. He had a most beautiful character—gentle, modest, and unsel ish. He was idolised by his family and adored by the people around him. We heard his valet say: "His Highness—God bless him!—would put himself to any inconvenience rather than give trouble; I would give my life for him." The extreme gentleness and winsomeness of manner which characterised the late Tsarevitch is possessed by all the members of the Imperial family. I saw a Cossick kiss the dress of the Grand Duchess Xenia when she came out of church; she responded by bending and saluting his forehead.

PALACE OF THE GRAND DUKE ALEXANDER, ABASTOUMAN.

The Grand Duke George so generously responded to every appeal to his pity that the Empress-mother had to arrange that requests were passed on to him only after being sent me his own books to read; but then his sympathy was unfailing towards all. He lived a simple, retired country life. One day he came to bid us good-bye before leaving for Denmark, and when he rose to go he said, "Oh, dear! Stiff collars, stiffer manners, and stiffest of dress suits will be the order of the day. How I do dislike them! I am so happy here, where I can dress as I please." As he spoke he glanced at his shoe, in which appeared a slit, and we all laughed.

He was very fond of photography, but disliked being photographed. I have before me the most delightful photos taken in all kinds of laughable ways, but of course they are strictly private. They were taken at picnics in considered by his adjutant. A short time ago he was compelled to dismiss from his service his architect; but his pity obliged him to charge himself with the education of the culprit's children; and there are many cases of this kind. As a guest he was charming. I remember one day his adjutant having arrived, Madame went into the salon and entered into conversation with him. Madame noticed something wrong with the table-cloth, and went to put it straight, when there was a peal of laughter from Prince George, who crept from under the table. He would often romp with the children and enter into their mischief, and he kept on his writing-table the photographs of two little ones to whom he had taken a fancy. His thoughtfulness extended even to me, for fancying that I was lonely, he the mountains. At these picnics he was the life of the party, even helping in the cooking with all his might. I remember at one of them he accidentally hit a lady with a morsel of bread intended for a gentleman, and how very distressed he was. At another, when his Cossack servant was bitten by a serpent, how promptly he had the wound cauterised. He was passionately attached to his mother and sisters, who came every summer to visit him. The parting was agony to him, and for days after their departure, he would shut himself in his rooms. He disliked foreign languages, and never spoke them when he could avoid it, indeed, he weighed his words at all times, speaking very little.

QUEEN TAMARA'S CASTLE, CAUCASUS.

B

rude

idea

nev

unp us,

sper

com

muc bee

was

Son repl his take occ —tl room he

imp tak who ma

But with all his gentleness and courtesy he was no chiffon, and he knew how to put down impertinence and rudeness. He had the strength of character and the ideas of honour of his father. The late Tsarevitch was never known to break his word. To him that was an unpardonable offence. One day, he had sent word to us, with his usual thoughtfulness, that he wished to spend the evening at our house, and that he would come at eight o'clock. He came bespattered with mud, but excused himself by saying that as he had been hunting, and had not remarked the hour, he was obliged to come as he was or else break his word. Some one asked why he was so particular, and he replied that years ago when he was a boy he, with his brother, the present Emperor, had promised to take their sister for a ride, but that an unforeseen occurrence had prevented their doing so. Their father -the late Emperor-had entered the Princess Xenia's room and had found her in tears. Upon their return he had sent for them and had said: "All men may break their word, but the sons of a Russian emperor,

As before said, Prince George knew how to put down impertinence. One day, he, with four of his uncles, was taking lunch at our house on the balcony. A woman, who was passing, being greatly astonished at set... g so many great personages together, stopped and stared for at least ten minutes. At length she was asked: "Pray, Madame, is this your house?" "Oh! no, your Highness." "Then, Madame, may I request of you to pass on, if you please?"

Prince George generally dined on his balcony, during which time his Cossacks played delightful airs from the Russian operas. Crowds of people came to stare most rudely, so one evening, there was a very disagreeable smoke which swept over them and drove them away. I had the curiosity to find out the meaning. A stove had been filled with bark and leaves, and placed in such a position that the smoke was driven right into the faces of the people; and I could imagine the quiet laugh that went round the imperial dinner-table as the people dispersed as sheep having no shepherd.

The late Tsarevitch mixed little with the political world—or indeed, with any world. He disliked anything that brought him into public notice. He was warmly attached to those about him, and never forgot them when an opportunity presented itself of furthering their interests. It is by those who knew and loved him that his loss will be most keenly felt. I think his death was most touching. It bore out the character he had lived all his life. For, when feeling very ill, he dismounted from his machine, and a woman ran up asking what was the matter, he replied: "Nothing," and soon after passed away as gently as he had lived. Years may roll on their onward way, but they never will dim the memory of that pure and patient spirit whose gentleness hath made him great.

patient spirit whose gentleness hath made him great.

I am, dear Mr. Stead, only one of those who most deeply lament him.

ERICA GLENTON.

SANATORIUM AT THE MINERAL SPRINGS, A ASTOUMAN.

athy

ired

bve

he fest

do

ress

, in

ing

tful

rse

in

Photograph by Matuszew:ki.]

H.M. QUEEN WILHELMINA.

Specially taken during the Peace Conference.)

[St. Petersburg and Paris.

eloqu Peac by M An

Anunite
The g who l
of my new r clearl
M.

THE

IT diplo

of the affirmation of the affirm

Bu objec Confe ment gentle like t and t

All of the sme a "We it is

harv

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

WHAT MUST FOLLOW THE CONFERENCE?

Alendons la moisson

Falsio du Bois

14 Justes 1899.

THE HAGUE, July 29th, 1899.
THE CLOSE OF THE PEACE CONFERENCE—AND AFTER.

IT is no longer the prophets who sit upon the misty mountain-tops who see the dawn of a new day. M. de Staal, as an old man who has spent all his life in diplomacy, has had a career not calculated to qualify men for the rôle of seers, but his closing words in the eloquent address which he read at the last sitting of the Peace Conference at the Hague might have been spoken by Mazzini:—

And now, gentlemen, the first step has been made. Let us unite our desires and learn how to profit from the experience. The good seed is sown; may the harvest soon come! As for me, who have arrived at the end of my career and at the closing years of my life, I consider it a supreme consolation to see open up new perspectives for the good of humanity, and to be able to see clearly into the brightness of the future.

M. de Staal expressed the almost universal sentiment of the Conference, but what the old man eloquently affirmed in his closing sentences was taken up and re-affirmed with much violent enthusiasm by M. Baron d'Estournelles, who is well known in London, where he was for many years the acting representative of France at the Court of St. James. The French have contributed little for many years to the elevation of the ideals of the Continent. But in M. Bourgeois and Baron d'Estournelles there is a welcome promise that things are changing even in materialised France. Certainly no nation in the world sent to the Hague a representative more enthusiastic, more ambitious and more eloquent than Baron d'Estournelles. In the last words spoken in the Conference he

But this germ, in order to be able to develop, must be the object of constant care, and therefore we must hope that our Conference will not separate for ever. It has been a commencement; it should not be the end. Let us express our desire, gentlemen, that our countries, by calling together other conferences like this, will continue to advance both the cause of civilisation and that of peace.

Always and everywhere when you talk to the members of the Conference, which has now been dispersed, we find the same idea—an idea which the Emperor expressed to me at our last meeting at Tsarkoe Selo, when he said: "We will not succeed in achieving all that we want; but it is seed sown in the ground, of which we shall reap the harvest in the future."

THE NATIONS PUT TO THE TEST.

In the future, yes, but in how distant a future? That will depend upon the peoples. It will depend in the first place upon the leaders of the people, upon those who have hearts to feel and imaginations to realise the immensity of the opportunity which is afforded them. This Hague Conference, which has been so unexpectedly and completely successful in a region where six months ago no one ventured to believe it could achieve anything but a disastrous failure, has thrown a vast responsibility upon all men and women in every country in Europe; for what the Conference has done has been to organise a simple, practical and speedy method of adjusting the disputes between nations. It is beyond the power of a Conference to do more, but everything depends upon whether or not the nations will avail themselves of the apparatus which is being constructed with so much care and elaborated with so much anxiety by the leading representatives of the Governments of the world. If at the Conference the Governments were on their trial, to-day it is the nations that are put to the test. And first of all, those whose position and opportunities render it possible for them to enlighten, to educate, and to lead the people in the midst of whom they dwell.

WHAT OF THE LIBERAL LEADERS?

It would be interesting to know what our Liberal leaders are going to do in this matter. For the next month or two, of course, there will be a lull in politics. Exhausted legislators will be recuperating their energies on the moors and by the seaside. They will have time to think, but it would be a relief to some of us if we knew that any of them intended to bestow any serious thought excepting on trivialities and banalities of party strife. Here is a great opportunity of showing whether we have any statesmen of international mind in our midst. Our Empire has grown very big, but many of our statesmen seem to have grown very small. The familiar saying that there are some merchants with the minds of statesmen and many statesmen with the minds of pedlars, is as true to-day as it ever was before. In three months' time we shall see how many statesmen we have in the ranks of the Opposition whose survey is wider than that of the pedlar. Let us hope that all of them will not fail us in this moment. For surely the statesman who has remained indifferent in the presence of the spectacle of the Governments of the world meeting together to constitute an International Temple of Justice, to create for the first time an international centre for the planet, must be one whose soul, in Carlyle's phrase, is merely useful as a kind of salt to keep his carcase from putrefying.

LORD ROSEBERY'S OPPORTUNITY.

It would be specially interesting to see whether Lord Rosebery will have anything to say on the subject. He has been Foreign Minister of Great Britain. He is a man of imagination and of feeling; he was one of the first of modern Ministers who thrilled responsive to the ideal of the federation of all English-speaking commonwealths. It will be disappointment indeed if he should remain cold and torpid, and dismiss with a cynical phrase the first conscious struggle of the human race towards the federation of the world. In the banalities of our parochial politics the interest of our youth is in danger of perishing for the lack of inspiring ideals. Here, surely, is one which only needs to be adequately stated by a statesman who has the ear of the public and a capacity for eloquent, articulate speech, the like of which occurs seldom in a lifetime. the ablest diplomatists of all the Governments of the world have spent two months in elaborating the ma-chinery of arbitration, it is surely time that the subject were taken into other hands than those of the professionals of peace. It is true that little party capital, in the sordid sense of the word, can be made out of the Peace Conference. Whatever Liberals may have to say on such a momentous subject as the burden of a twopenny-halfpenny tax-levying for the relief of a distressed clergy, they cannot say anything about arbitration which will not redound to the credit of Lord Salisbury.

LORD SALISBURY'S GLORY.

For it is Lord Salisbury's glory that he has from first to last done his utmost to bring the deliberations of the Hague Conference to a successful conclusion. chose the strongest statesman in the diplomatic service to help him. He gave excellent lead, but left him a very free hand, and he supported him throughout with loyalty and zeal. But the bat-eyed politicians of the meaner sort, who can seldom see beyond the tips of their noses, and never beyond the date of the next general election, are of all people least qualified to form an estimate as to the bearing of a generous and chivalrous support to a political opponent and one who has endeavoured to realise one of the sublimest of ideals. For the moment it may seem as if their speeches were tending to bring grist to the mill of Lord Salisbury, but in the long run they will be serving their own party far more usefully than if they were spending their time in carping criticism or in scathing invective. The Liberal party is always and must always be, so long as it is a Liberal party, the party of the ideal, the party of progress, the party of enthusiasm. To kindle generous enthu-

Photograph by]

NICHOLAS II. OF RUSSIA.

[M. Matuszewski.

(T.e latest photograph; taken at Tsarkoe Selo.)

siast summent inevities st not of to out of the much won'

TI a w expe A ce the com oblig whic cont claus prop oblig She the l the Arbi to a price claus the natio oblig

> arbit TI the preli to th to er spec inqu segu befor Geri did to lo in E in c the willi such parti neve befor

of t

The follogood amo

sam

work

siasm, to fire the imaginations of our ingenuous youth, summoning them to struggle towards the earlier attainment of a beneficent and humanitarian end, must inevitably and always strengthen the party of progress in its struggle with the party of satisfied content. But it is not on party grounds that we should dream of appealing to our leaders to prove this autumn that they are worthy of their name and of their position. We have had too much in the past of illiberal Liberals and leaders who won't lead.

OBLIGATORY ARBITRATION,-

The Government has done well. The Governments as a whole have done well, so well that they have raised expectations which they will disappoint at their peril. A certain number of Governments—notably the English, the American and the Russian—have at the Hague committed themselves strongly in favour of a policy of obligatory arbitration for a large number of small disputes which, although they may not endanger the peace, continually trouble the repose of nations. These clauses were abandoned as a sacrifice to the amour propre of Germany. Germany had no objection to obligatory arbitration if there was no Permanent Court. She would have accepted the obligatory clause in the Russian scheme if it had not been supplemented by the Anglo-American proposal for a Permanent Court of When under great pressure she consented to accept the Permanent Court, she demanded as the price of her adhesion the abandonment of the obligatory clauses; but when they were abandoned as part of the general act for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, these two Powers which wished for both obligatory arbitration and a Permanent Court, placed on record their desire in the article in which it states that they reserve the right even before the ratification of the present treaty to conclude treaties among themselves establishing the principle of obligatory arbitration. This is Lord Salisbury's opportunity.

CAN IT NOT BE ARRANGED?

There is no necessity for waiting for the constitution of the Permanent Court of Arbitration before making preliminary inquiries from the Governments favourable to this system, as to whether or not they will be prepared to enter into treaties binding themselves to refer certain specified categories of subjects to arbitration. Such inquiries can do no harm. They are the natural sequel of the approval given to the original scheme before it was mutilated out of deference to Germany. Germany could raise no objection to a treaty which did not concern her. It would be a thousand pities to lose the present opportunity, when every Government in Europe has been for the last two months engaged in considering the question of arbitration, for raising the question at once whether or not we would be willing to enter into negotiations for the concluding of such treaties. This was obviously in the mind of the parties to the règlement pacifique. Otherwise they would never have reserved the right to enter into such treaties before the ratification of the convention at the Hague. There is nothing like striking when the iron is hot, and following up a good resolution. Already the preliminary good understandings in this direction have taken place among some of the minor Powers, and there is reason to hope that Russia may act on her own account in the same direction. But as an Englishman I covet that my own country should take the initiative in this noble work.

WHAT WILL EDITORS DO?

As in old time it was said, "Put not your trust in princes nor in any child of man," so to-day, notwithstanding the encouragement that may be legitimately derived from the action of the Governments at the H gue, it is well not to put our confidence in party leaders, either in or out of office. This is a matter which concerns the people. We cannot always depend upon such a succession of miracles as the Imperial Rescript. We must work out our own salvation, and not wait for leaders who may not lead, whether they be Liberals or Conservatives. appeal comes home to each of us in proportion as we have opportunity for influencing our fellow-men. What, for instance, are the editors of the world going to do in this matter? They are the keepers of the ears of King Demos, the daily counsellors of the sovereign people. Will they rise to the height of their great vocatior, and use their unequalled position of persuasion and influence in order to make the most of the present opportunity, or will they, like many an evil counsellor or ancient despot, seek to make their own fortune and to strengthen their own position by ministering to the foibles of the hour and continually diverting the attention of their sovereign from thought of his responsibilities and of his duties by flattering his vices and ministering to his passions? It is much easier to tell off good descriptive writers to describe cricket matches than it is to rouse the consciences and direct the intelligence of a nation. But at the Day of Judgment things may appear in a somewhat different

THE CO-OPERATION OF THE POPE.

And what of that other great teaching profession, which one day in seven at least has a monopoly of the guidance and the instruction of the people? In the last day of the Conference, a letter was read from the Pope expressing his desire to give effective co-operation in the great peacemaking work in which the Conference was engaged. The time is now at hand when humanity will look to him to redeem his promise. It is a comparatively trivial matter as to whether or not the Sovereign Pope is allowed to exercise such an attribute of sovereignty as the nomination of four arbitrators to the Permanent Court. He can co-operate far more effectively with the Conference than by nominating arbitrators,—a right which is enjoyed by the petty Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, which has a population of considerably less than the town of Newcastle. Twenty-six secular governments can nominate arbitrators to the Permanent Court of Arbitration, but the Pope, with the moral and spiritual influence which he exerts over the souls and consciences of a hundred million human beings, can do much more than they all in putting the whole machinery in motion.

ANGLICAN AND FREE CHURCHES.

And what is true of the Pope is true to a less extent of every ecclesiastical or religious teacher of every denomination. Why should not every Protestant pulpit, for instance, co-operate in this work? If there were to be preached a sermon from each such pulpit proclaiming the glad tidings of great joy—that at last in this warweary world the Governments, which had hitherto too often b en little better than organisations for mutual slaughter, will establish a great temple of reconciliation and peace, where all disputes which have hitherto stained the battlefield with gore shall be peacefully settled in accordance with the principles of justice in the Court of Arbitration. It is a theme which would have fascinated the glowing imagination of Isaiah, and aroused the enthusiasm of that apostle who wrote, "The Lord of ch a nny

hey

not

t to

the

He

atic

left

out

ans

ond

e of

fied

ous

one

t of

hes

iry,

irty

e in eral

is a ess.

hu-

peace be with you always even unto the end of the world." This is a matter surely which the Church Congress might take in hand with much better results than by discussing such tremendous questions as the number of candles which may be burned in daylight or any other similar matters of eternal import. But if the Established Church is wedded to its idols, and we have to leave it alone, why should not the preachers in every Free Church Council which has been organised with such infinity of labour in the last year or two, show that they are worthy of their trust and capable of rising to the level of a great occasion? I just throw out the suggestion in passing and leave it to others to carry it into effect. But supposing that the political leaders fail us in future, as they have so this world's goods, the members of the invisible Church, the elect souls, the temples of the Holy Spirit, upon whom rests the responsibility and the power to carry out the work which is now required at their hands. It is these units of the human race, whether male or female, that constitute the main great reserve force which makes for righteousness in the world. It is to them that we appeal with great hope of awakening a sense of responsibility. But their hearts are not ready; they desire peace greatly, but hitherto they have not seen any means by which they could co-operate and obtain it. Now is the opportunity, now is the accepted time, and now may be the day of salvation to the nations, if they but realise the position, and throwing on one side all dread of appearing to be forward or pushing, all mock-modesty as Count Welsersheimb.

M. O. von Oklicsani. M. MÉREY DE KAPOS-MÉRE.

THE AUSTRO-HUNGARIAN DELEGATES.

(Photograph by M. Matuszewski.)

often done in the past, supposing that the editors prefer to tickle the ear of King Demos with the gossip of the fleeting hour, and the Free Church ministers are alike but dumb dogs, or worse still, dogs which bay at the moon, instead of attending to their proper business of guarding the household from attack, we do not despair. THE GREAT RESERVE FORCE.

In the midst of the common people there are many men and women who are in earnest about this matter, simple folk they may be, who have never spoken in public or written for a newspaper, whose zeal for the cause of peace is known only to their Maker, to whom their prayers have arisen in silence these many years. Nevertheless they are, however lowly, however poor in well as the real humility which so often stands in the way of effective service, are willing to spend and be spent in the service to which they are summoned by the action of the Conference at the Hague.

Do they ask what can be done? Then let them read with care the following report of an undelivered address prepared in the last days of the Conference, to explain what can be done, what may be done, what ought to be done-nay, what will be done in the coming months.

I.—WHAT HAS BEEN DONE.

The first point that we should consider is that there are 1,200 millions of human beings on this planet, of whom not more than 10 per cent, have heard of the Conference of Peace

excep the I of the what even withe have IWO I and i sental from two being blame useles the w policy bushe not to a seri ference a Par it co nation wish thing ference exclus In c after t the fa at the efficie to car line a the fa Amer. the av and to faces bread

> we sh Eve beginn to bea know which and of it is r what t of wh actual stand necessa a true only to many averag so igno achieve prohib insister the se perfect themse of the not or instruc

was ad

nine o Confe somet except by chance or by a paragraph in the newspaper. Of the 120 millions who may be assumed to know of the existence of the Conference, one million at most could give some idea of what the Conference has done, if questioned on the subject. And even of this million it is very doubtful if a dozen could be found, without reckoning the members of the Conference, who would have a correct idea of the significance of the work which for two months occupied the Parliament of Peace. It is a curious and indeed almost incredible phenomenon that such a representative assembly should have been able to come together from all parts of the world, and to hold meetings during two months, without the true significance of its work being appreciated. The Conference has only itself to blame, or rather those people, both Dutch and foreigners, who during the first weeks worked their hardest to render useless the efforts of the journalists to popularise and to explain the work of the Conference to the public. By this mistaken policy the Conference deliberately hid its light under a bushel, and was afterwards astonished that the public did not take more interest in its work. This is, without doubt, a serious misfortune, no less so because self-created. This Conference, differing from all those held previously, was essentially a Parliament of the peoples. Its atmosphere, without which it could not have existed one day, was the hope of the nations for some lightening of an intolerable situation; to wish deliberately to enforce secrecy was exactly the one thing likely to endanger its success. At the close of the Conference, those themselves who were most ardent for the exclusion of the press recognise and acknowledge their mistake. In consequence we have to undertake as our first du'y after the Conference, to undo to the best of our ability some of the far-reaching mischief which was done when the authorities at the Hague decided to treat journalists not as their most efficient allies, but rather as if they were thieves prowling round to carry off the family spoons. In this work we must in the first line appeal to the press, and our task is not made any lighter by the fact that we can only appeal to the journalists of Europe and America on principles which are too lofty for general acceptance by the average man. We have to ask them to return good for evil, and to reward the Conference which has closed its doors in their faces by advertising its good works throughout the length and breadth of the world. Our first starting-point is therefore that nine out of ten men know nothing at all about the work of the Conference, and as they know nothing, they have got to learn something, and in order that they may learn it is necessary that we should teach them.

ch.

000

out

is ile,

ses

we-

ire

ins

is

ay

ise

of

as

the

ent

tion

ead

ress

ain

be

are

not

WHAT NEEDS TO BE TOI.D.

Everything needs to be told. We need to begin at the beginning, as a teacher who starts with the ABC. We have to bear in mind that the immense majority of the people only know in a very vague fashion that something has been attempted which most of the newspapers declare has resulted in failure, and of which none of the politicians say anything. Therefore it is necessary to explain things from the beginning, to explain what the Conference at the Hague was, why it was summoned, of whom it was composed, what it tried to do, and what it actually accomplished. And in order to make the essential facts stand clearly out before the eyes of the great public, it is necessary to strip away all the confusing details which obscure a true appreciation of the central fact. For instance, we have only to turn to the Neue Freie Presse to see how imbecile are many of the comments of journalists usually supposed to be of average intelligence. This one-time official organ of Vienna is so ignorant as to tell its readers that the Conference might have achieved something but for the opposition of England to the prohibition of the dum-dum bullet, and also owing to the insistence of England on the right to seize private property on the sea in war time. Every one in the Conference knows perfectly well how idiotic is such a criticism. The Americans themselves, who brought forward their proposal for a discussion of the inviolability of private property in time of war, were not opposed by the English representatives, who had no instructions, and who abstained from voting. The subject was admittedly not ripe for settlement, and never formed a part of the programme of the Conference. As for the dum-dum bullet, its use has been prohibited by all the Powers but two, and the two dissentients, while voting against the reso'ution adopted by the majority, declared their adhesion to a much more drastic formu'a, forbidding all bullets which cause unnecessary cruelty. But I only mention this to illustrate the absurdities by which blind leaders of the blind contrive to tumble their followers into the ditch. All these resolutions, which occupied more space in the final act than the simple recital of its actual achievements, must not be allowed to obscure what has actually been accomplished. But considering the stupidity of the average man, it is somewhat to be regretted that in the final act there should be half a dozen subjects mentioned, the consideration of which is postponed to some future Conference, while only three or four lines are devoted to a statement of what has actually been done, the general public is very apt to lose its way in the midst of a bewildering thicket of conventions, prohibitions, declarations, etc. The chief thing, therefore, to be done is to give the work of the Conference its proper political and historical perspective.

THE CENTRAL FACT.

The central fact round which everything else is to be grouped in the picture which we have to display before the peoples of the world, is the Conference itself. The Conference, as an assembly of twenty-four Governments, whose dominions and dependencies comprise nine-tenths of the planet, is a portent of these latter days, the true significance of which only needs to be referred to to be understood. This Parliament of Peace, representing all the civilised Governments of the world, with few exceptions, has been the outward and visible sign of the shrink ige of this plastic planet under the powerful pressure of electricity and steam. From the Huis ten Bosch telegrams were despatched and received from the uttermost ends of the earth. It did not take twenty-four hours for the Japanese delegates to receive an answer from the Government of the Mikado, while the despatches by post were sent and answered between the Hague and Washington in less than three weeks. It is not three hundred years since the Pilgrim Fathers started from Delft Harbour on their memorable voyage across the Atlantic. It was months before they set foot on the stern New England shore. The postal distance between Delft and Washington is to-day about eight days-less than one-tenth of the postal distance in the time of the Pilgrim Fathers. Thus all the nations have become next-door neighbours to one another. Hence the possibility of a veritable world's Parliament foreshadowing the federation of mankind. This aspect of the Conference we shall find the most potent to fire the imagination of the ordinary man. He may not understand much about anything which the Conference did, but the poets would have sung and seers would have prophesied in vain if the average human heart did not respond with glad surprise when it realised that we have actually witnessed the meeting of the Parliament of Man which has laid the foundations for the federation of the world.

THE NECESSITY FOR THE CONFERENCE.

From explaining what the Conference is we must proceed to explain how it was not only necessary, but inevitable, that such a gathering should be held. The immediate occasion for this meeting of the Conference was undoubtedly the Emperor's Rescript; but they greatly err who would attribute the Conference solely to the benevolent disposition of a humanitarian Sovereign. Its foundations lie much deeper. They are based on the necessity of things. The shrinkage of the world, the close inter-communication and inter-dependence of all nations, the practical freeing of all frontiers to all persons, excepting soldiers arrayed for battle, the liberty of transit for all goods, limited only by the tolls and customs, have brought about a state of things in which the evolution of an organising centre for the whole planet was as indispensable as the creation of a similar centre in the various nations and states of which modern Europe is constituted. It is not so many centuries ago that every province, nay, every district, had its own fighting centre. Every feudal chief maintained his own retainers, and exercised the right of private war. The growth of trade, the making of roads, rendered such anarchy insupportable within the national area. The further extension of commerce, the increased rapidity of movement, has rendered it equally insupportable over the whole area of the planet; and that is why the Conference had to be.

THE BREAKDOWN OF THE COURT OF WAR.

But there was another reason. As in the Middle Ages the men-at-arms increased the thickness of their mail until at last it became so cumbrous that they discarded it altogether, so at present the only Court of Appeal which has hitherto existed for adjudicating disputes among nations has become so cumbrous as to be practically unusable. The sovereign independent States recognised no authority but the God of Battles, and the only shrine in which He pronounces sentence is the battle-field. At the present moment that is the supreme tribunal of all the Governments. They may use diplomacy, they may argue, they may even arbitrate, but the ultimate Court of Appeal is now as it has always been-War. But the resort to this tribunal has become practically impossible owing to the immense costs of the process. It is like a law court in which the judges and the barristers and the witnesses and the jurors have all gone on doubling their fees every few years, until at last the cost of the litigation enormously exceeds the value of any conceivable claim that may be in dispute. The costs of the Court of War have become so insupportable that, as M. Bloch has pointed out, the resort to war on the part of the great nations is practically impossible. It is possible only at the price of bankruptcy. That price no Power likes to pay. Therefore humanity has at the present moment lost the only Court by which it heretofore, in rough and ready fashion, settled its disputes. It can settle them in the same fashion still, if it pleases, but only at the price of financial ruin. It was therefore necessary, the Court of War having become too expensive to serve as a Court of Appeal for the nations, to put something else in its place.

THE MINOR WORK OF THE CONFERENCE.

It is necessary to mention, although only as a preliminary, in order to bring into clearer relief the important work of the Conference, what may be regarded as the important because the permanent results of its labours, what is unimportant because only temporary. The unimportant work of the Conference is that which relates solely to the endeavour to make a little more tolerable the altogether intolerable exactions made by the Court of War upon the litigants who resort to that tribunal for settlement of their disputes. The Geneva Convention, which applies the beneficent principles of the Red Cross to those engaged in naval warfare, and the elaboration of a code of the Laws and Customs of War based upon the recommendations

MR. WALTER.

MR. HUYPERS. (Daily Chronicle.)

MR. LAVINO.

MR. MERCADIER. (Reuter and Havas.)

MR. W. T. STEAD.

MR. CRAWFORD. (Daily News.)

LEADING JOURNALISTS AT THE HAGUE.

(Photograph by M. Mctuszewski.)

of th inten natio anach Conv labou tation need prese certai may l will o which of the the in or e That huma blueas an profo ship a existin annih than t overti

> all t found iudica have i more believ frateri means radian descer Comi eyes o majes maste glory as pu enforc it is se pillars though equip for en scienc the Co the pe ling p

The

As ence in unders many. asseml wisdo compl the pe might the ex and in such s Confe peacen not or of the Brussels Conference-these are only palliatives, only intended to guard against the worst evils of a system of settling national disputes which every year renders war more of an anachronism, nay, of an impossibility. Hence two of the Conventions over which the Conference has spent much time and labour need not be dwelt upon at length in a pepular presentation of what has been done by the Conference. They only need to be mentioned incidentally, as indicating that while the present bad system remains, the Conference has laid down certain rules restraining still further the limits within which Hell may be let loose and the Ten Commandments suspended by the will of the men of war. But it is not that aspect of the question which will commend the work of the Conference to the masses of the people. Their imagination no doubt will be touched by the interdict upon the use of balloons for dropping projectiles or explosives from the sky upon combatants on earth. That embodies an idea; it is the interdict which collective humanity has placed upon aerial navies grappling in the central blue-an attempt to save at least one element from being used as an arena for war. And here we may note in passing a profound remark of Baron d'Estournelles, that while the steamship and the electric telegraph have done much to remove all existing frontiers, the discovery of a navigable air-ship will annihilate them altogether. It is probably the inventor rather than the statesman or the religious teacher who will ultimately overturn the war system of the world.

he ly.

ıly

n,

II.

ras

ut

in

he

he

ise

re

irt

le-

ch

se

he

ns

THE GREAT WORK OF THE CONFERENCE.

The great work which the Conference has done, that to which all the rest is but as background or shading, is to lay the foundations broad and deep for an international system of judicature. The Permanent Court of Arbitration, which will have its sitting at the Hague, is a tribunal which will more and more impress the imagination of mankind. What we, who believe in peace and who desire to promote the sentiment of fraternity among the peoples, have to do is to use every available means for making that Permanent Court stand out clearly in radiant relief before the eyes of the war-weary world. It is no use descending upon particulars that have been in controversy in the Comité d'Examen. What we have to do is to make the dim eyes of the myriad millions of mankind catch some glimpse of the majestic proportions of this New Temple of Justice which the master-builders of the Conference have reared as the crowning glory of the closing century. Let those cavil who will, and let the cynics sneer, if they please, at the project as purely facultative, without any armed force behind it, for enforcing its decrees. But ours is the nobler task to show that it is set upon eternal foundations of justice and of right; that its pillars are irradiated with the light of the coming day, and that though behind it there stands no embattled army, no men equipped for mutual slaughter, it yet wields a mightier weapon for enforcing submission to its mandates in the awakened conscience of the federated nations. It was beyond the mandate of the Conference to do more than establish the tribunal, to create the peace-making machine. It is for us on our part to supply the element of obligation, and by rousing public enthusiasm and kindling public interest to create that force which will set the machinery in motion. That is the task which lies before us to-day.

THE NECESSARY DETAILS.

As to the question of how to present the work of the Conference in the best way, so that the simplest minds will appreciate and understand its nature, some details are necessary, but not very many. For instance, we may say that the Parliament of Peace assembled in the Palace in the Wood has brought the united wisdom of the ablest statesmen and diplomatists to devise a complete system of peace-making machinery for the benefits of the peoples. This machine consists of various parts, each devised with the special object of meeting some special need. It might be somewhat difficult to explain to a meeting of peasants the exact difference between "bons offices" and "mediation," and indeed the lecturer will probably do well to avoid any such subtle distinction. But we can point out that at the Conference the various Governments have agreed to act as peacemakers between the Powers on the verge of war, not only when they are appealed to by either or both of the Powers in question, but also on their own initiative when they see that two of their neighbours are likely to carry the controversy beyond the pale of argument. It will also be a very pleasant and simple task to explain the nature of the special mediation introduced by the Article Holls in the règlement pacifique. The analogy of the seconds in a duel is so obvious and so universally recognised that there will be no difficulty in explaining the true meaning and practical working of the Article Holls. But the two chief features of the règlement pacifique upon which public attention will be fixed will be the International Commissions d'Enquète and the Permanent Court of Arbitration.

THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSIONS D'ENQUÊTE.

It was the fashion at the Conference to belittle the significance of the International Commissions d'Enquête. It was expressly set forth that these Commissions shall have nothing of an arbitral character, but one chief object which will be sedulously set before the people is to exalt the importance of the International Commissions d'Enquête and to give them as much as possible of an arbitral character. What we shall say, and say with reason, is that the International Commissions d'Enquête give the Governments of the world an opportunity of having an investigation of the facts in dispute without the prior compulsion of undertaking to accept the result arrived at by the Commission of Enquiry. For practical purposes I expect that we shall use the International Commissions d'Enquête nine times for once that we shall use the Permanent Court of Arbitration in all questions of serious importance. The difficulty in the way of securing an international investigation of a dispute is that when it is most needed the disputants are in the worst possible mood to assent to it. They are distrustful, angry, and inclined to believe the worst of everybody and everything. To ask disputants in such a temper to agree to refer their dispute to an International Court of Investigation is to secure an almost certain refusal if you ask them at the same time to bind themselves to accept whatever the Court or Commission may decide. "Always arbitrate before you fight" was a formula which did good service in the Peace Crusade in England; but in order to avoid confusion of terms, it is better to say, "Always investigate before you fight"; and the great advantage of the International Commissions d'Enquête is that they open the door to a full, impartial, conscientious investigation of the facts in dispute without exacting as a preliminary compromise to abide by the judgment embodied in the report of the investigators. We shall do well, therefore, in our propaganda throughout the world to magnify to the uttermost the functions of the International Commissions d'Enquête, to declare on every occasion that they are virtually International Courts of Arbitration, whose verdicts are not binding upon either litigant. Under the admirable clause introduced by the delegate from Luxembourg, it is perfectly possible to give the organisation of a Commission d'Enquête an arbitral character, and we are much mistaken if the International Commissions d'Enquête are not recognised as the best and most practical piece of all the machinery that has been devised by the Conference.

NEITHER HONOUR NOR ESSENTIAL INTERESTS.

It is this fact which has led me to protest so vehemently against the calamitous mutilation of Art. 9 by M. B:ldiman of Roumania. All nations have done well at this Conference; all nations have deserved well of mankind for the services which their delegates have rendered in the deliberations of the Parliament of Peace; all nations—that is, except Roumania. As there was Judas among the Apostles, so there is Roumania among the nations. But, as even the treachery of Judas was overruled, so as to bear good fruit, for the salvation of the world, so we must see to it that the blot placed by Roumania upon the fair handiwork of the Conference is used for good. What Roumania did was to insist that the International Commissions d'Enquête should never be used when questions of honour or of essential interests were involved. It is possible so to educate public opinion and so to present the truth that it will be regarded as the most dishonourable thing in the world to use this subterfuge of honour, and to bring about such a state of feeling that any nation with any regard for its essential interests would shrink from quoting the Roumanian blot—for it is absurd to call it amendment—in order to avoid enquiry. In order to bring about this excellent way of looking at things, we shall do well to point out that as the Commission of Enquiry is only to investigate questions of fact, it is impossible to plead that honour is involved in the questions without practically asserting that the Power making such a plea has been guilty of such dishonourable practices as to be afraid to have the searchlight of enquiry turned upon the facts. The plea of honour will be regarded as the last refuge of the dishonourable. There is no one who brags so loudly of honour as the man who plays with marked cards; and the sharper who is challenged to produce his pack before a Commission d'Enquête is certain to plead that his honour is too much at stake to permit him to do so. But all his companions would know perfectly well how to interpret such a plea. It would be merely a euphemious formula for admitting that he was a rogue. So any nation which uses the plea of honour to avoid conscientious and impartial examination into facts by an International Commissions d'Enquête, will come to be regarded as a nation whose honour cannot bear the light of day, and whose practices are such that they must be shrouded in obscurity impenetrable to the searchlight of the Commissions d'Enquête. In like manner the phrase as to "essential interests" can similarly be turned against the advocates of darkness, for how can it be alleged that essential interests can be endangered by inquiry without admitting that it is essential to the essential interest which you defend that the truth should not come to light. Every one knows what a jury thinks in a court of law when a witness is compelled to admit that he has suppressed the essential evidence; and if he were further to admit that he had suppressed essential evidence because it was contrary to his essential interests, the verdict of that jury would be a foregone conclusion. So I think it is possible that, if this point of view is well handled, there is not a Government in the world that will dare, for its own interests, to take advantage of the pretext furnished by Roumania so as to avoid the issue of the International Commissions d'Enquête, by which it will secure all the advantages of an arbitral investigation without the disadvantage of being compelled in advance to pledge itself to accept the result of the investigation, whatever it might be.

THE PERMANENT COURT OF ARBITRATION.

This requires very little explanation. The idea of a Court of Arbitration is well understood by every one. All that is necessary to say, is to explain that there will be brought into existence as the result of the reglement pacifique, a new roll of honour in the world, to belong to which will year by year tend to become more and more coveted as indicating the highest position which can be attained by mortal man. What the Lord Chief Justice in England, or the President of the Cour de Cassation in France, or the President of the Supreme Court in America, is as compared with the County Court Judge in England, the magistrates of France, and the ordinary judges in the States in America, so will be the Arbitrators of the Permanent Court, as compared with all the other judges of the world. State will nominate four, and those four must be certified to be "d'une competence reconnue dans les questions de droit international, jouissants de la plus haute consideration morale et dis-posées à accepter les fonctions d'arbitres." They will be the élite of the world, men who, after searching the whole planet through, are declared to be the best men to make peace and execute justice among the nations of the earth, by the suffrages of their own governments. Each government is authorised to nominate four, so that if each of the states represented at the Hague exercise this privilege to the full, there would be ninety-six members of this Supreme Court, who would be conspicuous among all their fellow men as those who are set apart to administer justice among the nations. What the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour or what the Blue Ribbon of the Garter is to those who esteem such honorific distinctions, so will the right to a seat on the Permanent Court come to be regarded by all the world. It is a new-found honour, which has been created at the Hague, and the hundred judges of the Permanent Court are destined to make a great name in the history of the twentieth

ITS POLITICAL SIGNIFICANCE.

Before describing the strictly judicial functions of the Permanent Court, it will be well to call attention to some features of its political significance. It is, to begin with, a great democratic ideal—the elevation of the principle of impersonal law and abstract right above all national or dynastic considerations whatever. Next, it is a great recognition of the sovereignty of individual States. The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, which would be almost covered with a handkerchief, has a right to nominate four arbitrators to the Court as much as the British or Russian Empires. Everything which tends to minister to the self-respect of the smaller States is good; and this could not be done in a safer or more effective manner than the way in which it has been accomplished at the Hague. Objection might be taken to this uncompromising recognition of the principle of the equality of States, if the Court sat as a whole; but this is not the Each arbitrator will choose his own judges, and it is quite possible that some of the persons nominated by the signatory Powers may never be called upon to exercise judicial functions. On the other hand, it is quite possible that there may be such a run upon the Court as to necessitate the services of all the judges. But in every case the choice will be made not so much because of their nationality as because of their intrinsic merit as honest upright men, with judicial minds and profound knowledge of international law. Further, the existence of this body of trained international judges opens up a new resource for civilisation. Questions which disturbed the nations, but which do not constitute a dispute between any nation, may in time to come be considered by the arbitrators sitting in plenum. But long before that time comes we shall see the first step towards the creation of a Permanent International Committee in the administrative council which is to be constituted by the representatives of the signatory Powers at the Hague. Every effort was made at the Conference, especially by Austria, to diminish the importance of this administrative Council, and to confine it solely to administrative duties; but, notwithstanding all that has been done, the Ministers resident at the Hague will be the only International Diplomatic Congress that will be in permanent session, and as the presidency of that body has been conferred upon the Dutch Foreign Minister for the time being, Hollard becomes at once much more important in the International Councils than she has ever been before, for the Dutch have the right to nominate the permanent chairman on a standing committee of all the Powers, which has to look after the administration of international justice, and which will inevitably as time goes on grow in dignity and importance. One last consideration may be mentioned under this head, viz., that the experience of the international bureaux at Berne shows that the working of any international system demands the convocation from time to time of conferences of the representatives of all the signatory Powers. The Conference at the Hague, instead of being an isolated phenomenon, is but the first of a series of international parliaments, which will be summoned from time to time to revise and extend the arbitral judicial system, the first broad outlines of which have been sketched by the present Conference, so that we have seen the beginning not merely of an international system of arbitration, but the sowing of the seed for a series of international parliaments, whose jurisdiction will be co-extensive with this planet.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE COURT.

There will be no difficulty in explaining the method in which the court is to be constituted. When any two Powers fail to adjust their difficulties by diplomatic means, instead of putting armies in motion and spending millions in mere preparation for an appeal to the sword, they will refer the question to the decision of arbitrators chosen from the list of the dite, which will be kept constantly revised by the secretary-general and his staff at the central bureau. Each disputant will select two arbitrators, and these four will select an umpire from the list. Should they be unable to agree, they will leave the nomination of an umpire to a third Power, or, if they are unable to agree to a third Power, the arbitrators on each side will each name a neutral Power, and those two will appoint an umpire. When the um secretar and the duly m course, human, cannot the hun what is that wh parties underta to the a new fac ment, w before i that it v new tria the same made cl awake h

The F monetar tation of by the v there is right, w themselv consider Permane terms in where th and the the obli are justi Powers In other ought to addresse at once e into trea almost a excepting to the C the small say; but will be n exercise Conferen vation of surplusag which I a

The cr the Artic time all humanity defined, break ou now on t declared to call of the pe world into points for perform i and not to neutrals h M. Descar long perirecognitio thing which the umpire is appointed, the disputants will notify to the secretary-general that the Court is constituted to their satisfaction, and the arbitration will begin according to the forms and rules duly made and provided beforehand by the Conference. It is, of course, impossible to prevent a miscarriage of justice, for to err is human, and the most perfect Court which the wit of man can devise cannot always be relied upon to discern the truth; but so far as the human mind is capable of devising a method for ascertaining what is just and true, nothing better could be suggested than that which has been established by the Conference. Before any parties refer their dispute to the Arbitration Court, they must undertake in the preliminary agreement to submit in good faith to the arbitral award. Only in case of the discovery of some new fact, within a period which must be specified in the agreement, which was not known to the Court when the case was before it, but which affords a prima facie reason for believing that it would have changed the character of the judgment, is a new trial permitted. The trial, however, must take place before the same judges. All this is quite simple and plain, and can be made clear to the mind of the dullest man, if once you can awake his attention sufficiently to listen to the exposition.

ic

nd

of

ch

to

or

he

be

ch

be he

he

by

se

at

he

be eir

nd

he

he

ny

ors

we

ent

he

de

he

it

nas

ent

red

rd

nal

the

ing

the ta-

ne

z.,

rne

nds

the

at

be ral

een

the

on,

nts,

ich

to

for the vill

taff

wo

ist. ion e to e a hen

OBLIGATORY ARBITRATION. The Russian proposal for making arbitration obligatory in all monetary disputes and in all questions arising out of the interpretation of certain specified international conventions, was defeated by the vote of Germany. But in place of the Russian proposal there is a clause stating that the Powers reserve to themselves the right, which nobody ever questions, to conclude treaties among themselves undertaking to refer all disputes to which they consider arbitration suitable, to the adjudication of the Permanent Court. The phrase "se reservent" does not in terms imply any moral obligation, but we shall argue everywhere that when we take into account the history of the clause and the fact that this was put forward as a substitute for the obligatory article in the original Russian project, we are justified in maintaining that in reserving the liberty the Powers recognise the desirability of exercising their rights. In other words, the one point of the popular movement which ought to follow the dissolution of the Conference is a demand addressed to the Government of each country that they should at once exercise this right which they have reserved, and enter into treaties among themselves, which provide for the reference almost automatically of all questions upon which everybody, excepting Germany, believes arbitration ought to be obligatory, to the Court of Arbitration. Whether Russia, or England, or the small Powers take the initiative in this matter, no one can say; but this clause declaring that the Powers reserve the right will be made the basis for an energetic demand that they should exercise that right. No plainer hint could be given by the Conference to the nations than is contained in this explicit reservation of a right which, as it was not contested, would be mere surplusage if it had not been intended to serve the purpose which I am describing.

THE NOTE OF DUTY.

The crown of the whole règlement pacifique is to be found in the Article d'Estournelles, Vol. 27. In this Article for the first time all civilised States have recognised that they owe a duty to humanity at large and to the cause of peace—a duty clearly defined, easily capable of application. Whenever disputes break out between Governments, which threaten war, it is now on the authority of this Ccumenical council of humanity declared to be a duty on the part of all signatory Powers to call the attention of the disputants to the existence of the peace-making machinery established at the Hague, and to urge them to take advantage of it instead of plunging the world into war. That word "duty" will be one of the rallying points for our future propaganda. To recognise and yet not to perform it will be regarded more and more as a thing shameful and not to be thought of. With every generation the rights of neutrals have become more and more prominent. At first, as M. Descamps has pointed out, neutrals had no rights. After a long period of slow evo ution, the rights of neutrals claimed recognition, not as superior to those of belligerents, but as something which had to be taken into account; and reckoned with. In the future, the rights of neutrals will become more and more paramount and predominant, and this word "duty" will be one of the mainsprings which will continually impel neutrals to give more and more effective exercise to their growing authority.

II.-OUR DUTY.

From this rapid outline of a popular exposition of what the Conference has done and what is likely to spring out of the Conference, we will now pass to consider our duty. The Conference has begun a good work, and it will depend entirely upon the people how far it is to bear good fruit for the welfare of the world. This brings us to the practical question as to what should be done in order to bring home to the minds and consciences of the people, in the most effective way, in the shortest possible time, a knowledge of the work done at the Hague. The field is a wide one, the duty is incumbent upon all of us, and especially is it incumbent upon those who stand so far in advance of their fellow-men as to realise the immensity of the opportunity which the règlement pacifique gives to the friends of peace everywhere.

THE RULING CONFERENCE.

The Interparliamentary Conference, which meets at Christiania next week, is a body composed of the friends of peace and arbitration who are members of the parliaments of the world. It is a fortunate coincidence that they should meet immediately after the signing of the Final Act, for it is primarily upon members of the Interparliamentary Conference that will depend the effective action in their own legislatures and their own constituencies. These deputies, who have for several years past held an annual meeting for the purpose of considering how best they can promote the furtherance of the cause of arbitration, have never met before at such an auspicious moment. It will rest with them, in the first place, to decide what should be done, what action should be taken to press their respective governments to exercise the rights which are explicitly reserved, and, secondly, to consider and discuss what measures should be most effectively adopted to educate the people and to disseminate far and wide a knowledge of the new opportunity that is afforded to the friends of peace. What their decisions may be we know not. If M. Descamps is able to carry out his intention of proceeding to Christiania from the Hague, the Interparliamentary Conference will have in its midst the most gifted exponent that could be desired as to the work that has been accomplished here. We can, however, leave that matter safely in the hands of the members of the Interparliamentary Conference. They have laboured for years past in the cold shadow of obloquy and misrepresentation. They have now, thanks to the initiative of the Emperor and the labours of the delegates at the Hague, entered into the light of a brighter day. It will be for them first among the unofficial assemblies to seize the opportunity and teach their governments and their con-stituents in every country how to take occasion by the hand, and make the bounds of arbitral justice wider yet.

THE PEACE ASSOCIATIONS.

I was glad to read in the Dagblad of last night the eloquent and stirring appeal addressed by Madame Wasklewicz, in which she reminds the friends of peace that their work is by no means finished, and that the proper moment has come to poser la question à nouveau. What Madame Wasklewicz proposes should be done in Holland, a country which of all others should take the lead, owing to the fact that its capital has been selected as the seat of the Permanent Tribunal, should be followed in all other countries. If no step is taken elsewhere, it is to be hoped that the Committee-General of Holland will deem it its first duty to appeal to similar organisations in all other countries to utilise this winter for a combined energetic propaganda of education in the cause of arbitration.

WHAT IS MY DUTY ?

So much for the general, now for the particular. If the duty lies upon all of us, it lies upon each of us. And therefore it lies upon myself as much as upon any one else, and as I alone am responsible for myself, it is my duty to ask, what can I do? The first thing I think it is my duty to do, is to say that

If, in the opinion of the workers for peace, it is better that I should do nothing, I am wilfing to do nothing. There is always so much danger when any one person takes a leading part in any movement that personal feeling and jealousy or antagonism are aroused, which gradually accumulate until at last the best service which a man can do to a cause is to leave its guidance in other hands. It would, I admit, be a sore trial to me to have to take a small passive rôle in this matter, but I hope I am a sufficiently good soldier in the cause of peace not to resent an order to do sentry duty as a common private rather than continue in the position which I have hitherto held. They also serve who only stand and wait, and one would more warmly applaud and more loyally support whoever is called upon to lead this new crusade—a crusade not so much of peace as of arbitration, which is the road to peace. But supposing that there should be still thrown upon me the responsibility of advising and directing those who have responded to the initiative of the rescript of the Tsar, I ask myself what can I do? It is but little that any individual can do, but how much that little is, no one knows until he has tried.

"THE UNITED STATES OF EUROPE."

I have got an idea which I would submit with all deference to our friends in the hope that it may commend itself to their judgment. At the beginning of this year, on the eve of the Conference, I published a book under the title of "The United States of Europe," a copy of which I had the honour to present the other day to each plenipotentiary at the Hague. "The United States of Europe" is the title of an illustrated account of my journey round Europe in the elosing months of last year. It is written with the express purpose of fostering what may be described as the European idea. The idea is that Europe is an entity like the United States of America, and that the various hostile governments with their standing armies and navies are a survival from the past and an anachronism in the present. The book itself, composed as it is largely of the reports of conversations and investigations conducted in every capital in Europe for the purpose of ascertaining how far this conception of the United States of Europe has ripened in the minds of men, expresses more fully and completely than any other book that I know the fundamental idea which underlies the Conference and its work. As an instrument of propaganda I think this book would be very useful. I therefore propose to distribute copies of this work throughout the continent of Europe, allotting so many to each country, and endeavouring to find in each land persons who can read English who are likely to sympathise with the idea, and to co-operate in its advance. Inside the book I propose to print a brief statement, appealing for the help and co-operation of those who are what I should call "good Europeans."

A SOCIETY OF EUROPEANS.

My idea is that in every country, and probably in every city in Europe and in Great Britain, there is a certain number of men and women who have reached a stage of mental evolution which will enable them to appreciate the need for readjusting our political arrangements to the new social and diplomatic conditions already existing in the world. But at present these persons are isolated, and have no means of communication one with the other. It would be a great thing if in every town in Europe there was but one man or woman whose imagination was fired with a conception of federated Europe sufficiently to feel it a joy and a privilege to co-operate with all of like mind in other countries as well as their own. I should appeal to all persons who have read this book, and who find themselves of the same way of thinking, to send me their names and addresses and to advise me as to what means they think would be most effective to carry out the propaganda in their own towns and districts. In this way we might form a society of say a thousand Europeans, without any president or executive officers-merely a number of men and women who see that the present order cannot last, and who are anxious to be in touch with all those who are willing to work towards a better state of things. Out of this thousand it is possible that one hundred might be willing to take an active part in such propaganda. If these hundred persons are well distributed over the continent, we might be able to effect much greater things than are at present thought of. That is one suggestion. It may be a good one or it may not. It has at least this advantage, that it costs nobody anything but myself, and it entails no obligation and involves no obligation.

A LANTERN MISSION OF PEACE.

When Senator La Fontaine was in the Hague from Belgium, bearing the memorial to the Conference, he made a very pregnant suggestion. He said he thought it was extremely important to popularise the work of the Conference and to familiarise the masses of the people with the idea that a new epoch has dawned in which a Court of Arbitration is to replace step by step the arbitrament of war. In order to do so, it is necessary to organise a systematic and universal propaganda. The agitation of the Peace Crusade had to a certain extent opened the door to such a propaganda, and he thought it very important that it should be taken advantage of. His suggestion was that in this winter the friends of peace in every country should organise a system of illustrated lectures with the idea of securing the delivery of popular expositions of the work of the Conference in every town and village in Europe. He said he thought it could be done in Belgium on one condition; that was that there should be produced and rendered available for use a series of slides for the magic lantern or stereopticon. Without pictures it would be impossible to attract a popular audience. With pictures it would be possible to secure a meeting in every commune in Belgium. The idea is one that is well worthy of the consideration of all the friends of peace. Belgium is not peculiar in need of illustrations to attract the multitude. What are wanted are interesting pictures; the first thing, without which nothing can be done, is to arouse the interest and attract the attention of ordinary people, to whom the whole subject is more or less new, and unattractive.

THE KIND OF SLIDES WANTED.

But if there are pictures and good pictures, a very indifferent speaker can often attract a very good audience. For this reason—the pictures tell their own story. All that is needed is first a lantern; secondly, a sheet of white calico; thirdly, a set of projections from twenty to fifty; and fourthly, a printed lecture which any one can read. Of course in towns or in places where you have a good priest or a public-spirited schoolmaster, he would never dream of reading the printed lecture. He would merely work up material from it on which to construct his own discourse, but in many places it will be impossible to find persons competent to make their own lecture, whereas there is probably no place where some one could not be found capable of reading intelligently a printed discourse. When I was talking about this to one of the delegates at the Conference, he asked with a somewhat puzzled air what pictures could be suggested. The best way to answer this objection is to give the following brief outline of the slides that would convey the salient ideas of our propaganda to the minds of the simplest rustic.

A SUGGESTED SERIES OF SLIDES.

The lecture might open, for instance, with a picture illustrating the shrinkage of the world, showing the great fact that underlies everything, viz., that the uttermost ends of the world have come together, and that it now is much easier to organise the planet as a unit than it was previously to organise a single country. A good picture of a great Atlantic liner would be an excellent opening to a series followed immediately by a diagram showing the comparative size of the world measured by time fifty years ago and the size of the world to-day. Another picture would show on the map of Europe the number of independent principalities which had the right of levying war in the Middle Ages, and Europe as it is to-day, grouped under the great system of Dual and Triple Alliances. Then we might proceed at once to the Conference at the Hague. A view of the Huis ten Bosch would be an effective opening, followed by a portrait of Queen Wilhelmina and of the Emperor of Russia, the rulers respectively of one of the smallest and the largest European States. Nothing is more interesting than personalities in any lecture intended to bring things home to the somewhat torpid imagination of the average person.

Th carica portra count also prese Cross battle provi portra sack a ban of W Al show Perm Ange Paun preceder Arbit the control of midecla as a nation. The such varies and i

If groun

is pro

Cong

meth

A vi

(UM

effect The series might also be enlivened by some well-chosen caricatures, showing the curse of militarism. Then some portraits: that of M. de Staal and of the delegates of the is one has at nyself, country where the lecture is being delivered. There might also be some pictures showing the war of the past and of the present. Verestchagin's pictures would serve to show the Red Cross in action. These would lead up to a view of a naval battle, showing the need of hospital ships, such as have been provided for by the Conference at the Hague. Similarly, after gium, gnant ant to portraits of M. Martens and M. Beernaert, we might have the se the

wned ep the ganise

on of door

hat it

n this

anise

uring

the id he

t was use a thout

ence.

every hy of

not

What

hout

tract

ct is erent

ason

rst a et of

ture

here , he bluc own find re is le of king ked ted. ring s of ting lies me et as A lent ring ears uld ncires, to sch een ely ing led sack of Magdeburg, followed by a portrait of M. Rolin displaying a banner bearing the inscription, "Pillage is prohibited": Rules of War, the Hague.

All this would, however, only be preliminary to the pictures showing the great work of the Conference-the establishing of a Permanent Court of Arbitration. A symbolic figure of the Angel of Peace might be followed by portraits of Sir Julian Pauncefote, M. d'Estournelles, Mr. Holls, and M. Descamps. A view of a duel, followed by a scene in a law court, could precede a picture of war followed by a scene in the Court of Arbitration. Then might follow a portrait of Baron Bildt, with the declaration: "This is not yet enough!" M Bourgeois with his resolution, unanimously adopted by the Conference, on the expense of armaments, and a picture showing the burden of militarism, accompanied by a portrait of Colonel Schwarzhoff, declaring that the German nation did not feel the load. Then, as a final effective picture, a slide of the Angel calling the nations at the Hague to the Temple of Arbitral Justice.

The artists of all countries could share in the production of such a series of lantern slides, and the series might be indefinitely varied. But enough has been said as to the way the Conference and its work could be brought home to the masses.

NEXT YEAR: THE CONGRESS IN PARIS,

If this plan could be worked out as it has been conceived, the ground would be prepared for the great work of next year. It is proposed to gather together at Paris, during the Exhibition, a Congress of the Peoples—as distinguished from the Conference of the Governments—in order to discuss the most effective methods of realising the idea of fraternity amongst the peoples.

A preliminary journey of a party of men and women of all nationalities through Europe, visiting all the capitals in order to explain the idea and to stimulate the friends of peace and fraternity in their local action, would attract universal attention.

Possibly in this there would be found the realisation of the idea of the pilgrimage by which it was hoped to prepare public opinion for the work of the Conference. It will be undertaken with a view to awake public interest and to so educate public opinion that the best results may follow on the work of the Conference. I have had the honour to discuss the project with the Russian Emperor and with the French President; both were highly favourable to the idea.

One last word. There is no lack of plain direction in the foregoing pages, but if any of my readers still desire to know how they can help and what they can do in their own immediate vicinity, let me tell them this. In the first case, let them ask themselves whether there is anybody in their immediate circle, whether it is their minister, their relatives, or only members of their family, to whom they could speak on such a subject, or whom, if they could not speak to, they could ask to read the foregoing pages, and consider what ought to be done in their own neighbourhood. I appeal first of all to my helpers in every constituency where they are found, and ask them, if so be that they share the desire to assist in this work, to undertake to distribute to the most influential persons in their own district copies of this article, which will be gladly supplied them from the office of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS; and to those who are not helpers, who are willing to help, I would say the same thing. If they feel moved to do this thing, let them act, but not delay to give effect to their aspirations. Quench not the spirit. Procrastination is not only the thief of time but the extinguisher of many a generous resolution which, if carried into effect, would by this time have transformed the face of the world.

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE FRANCO-GERMAN FLIRTATION.

THE exchange of friendly greetings by the Kaiser and President Loubet supplies the occasion for "Ignotus" in the National Review to discuss "the rapprochement between Germany and France." He quotes a saying of Cavoui's, uttered fifty years ago, "that a united Germany would arise to disturb the European equilibrium, and that the new State would aim at becoming a naval power to combat and rival England upon the seas. He next quotes Count Yorck von Wartenburg, who says there are only four Great Powers in the world—the United States, England, Russia, and "Central Europe under the hegemony of Germany."

THE KAISER'S ANTI-ENGLISH POLICY.

He finds the reason of the Kaiser's hostile policy towards the United States in his desire to assume the position of the champion of Europe against the Transmarine Powers. The writer pursues his proof of the Kaiser's anti-English policy :

It is notorious that at the time of the Jameson Raid he sounded France and Russia as to a joint note directed against this country. He received such a rebuff from the former that beyond question this fact weighed with Lord Salislury at the recent Fashoda negotiations, making the British Premier far more tender of French susceptibilities and far more generou; than he might otherwise have been.

After Fashoda the German press has been vitriolic towards England. Attempts have been made to break up the close friendship between the British and the Russian Royal Families, and to embroil the United States and England.

FRENCH AND GERMAN CO-OPERATION.

Since Fashoda France and Germany have worked together. They have combined for a joint railway advance through Asia Minor to Baghdad, thus vetoing the old British Euphrates Valley project. They have helped to sterilise the disarmament proposals of the Tsar at the Hague and to throw odium on England for the "Dum-Dum" bullet. And a German has been appointed to the directorate of the Suez Canal Company. The writer suggests a personal reason for the Kaiser's courtship of France: "He wants passionately to prance along the boulevards of Paris, acclaimed by the Paris mob. He wants to figure at the Exhibition."

WHAT GERMANY IS AFTER.

The writer enters as ascertained facts :-

The traditional policy of Germany is to conciliate France and detach her alike from England and Russia.
 The personal predilections of the Kaiser tend towards such

3. By common action with France, Germany is striving to show that the two States have generally identical interests.

4. Ultimately a great coalition, to be used first against England or the United States, and in the remote future against Russia, is aimed at. But Russia will, at first, at any rate, be taken into the German firm.

WHAT FRANCE THINKS AFOUT IT.

France is finding that she cannot afford two hatreds. and that she would rather give up hatred of Germany than hatred of England. M. Ernest Daudet says: "It is no longer Germany who is the enemy, but England." Major Marchand's position is that henceforward France would forget Alsace-Lorraine and remember Egypt. In

This, then, is the situation of France. She despairs of regaining Alsace-Lorraine; she is eager to extend and aggrandise her expensive colonial empire; she is not too trustful of her Russian ally, whose peace proposals were a terrible shock to her susceptibilities, the more especially as they singled out her pet submarines for condemnation; and, having in the Fashoda affair deliberately thrown down the glove in the full expectation that England would, as so often before, yield to bullying at the last minute, she is furiou; with herself and with us that the challenge was accepted. If the German army were only a little weaker she might hesitate.

BETROTHAL GIFTS.

The paper closes with a revival of an old scare :-

It is perfectly clear, however, that if Germany is to secure the goodwill of France, she must compensate her in Europe for Alsace-Lorraine . . . On the French frontier is Belgium—with its annexe the Congo Free State; and on the German frontier Holland-with the very desirable annexes of Curação and the Dutch East Indies. Belgium has always shown strong French and Republican leanings; Holland is close akin to Germany. Considerations of race and geography can thus fitly be invoked. Germany in the nature of things ought to possess Rotterdam; France ought to own Antwerp. No Power could intervene, for England is far from possessing the military strength required to enforce her will against such a combination, and indemnities might be discovered to satisfy Russia.

What English Imperialism Means.

In the July Atlantic Monthly Mr. William Cunningham explains to American readers what English imperialism means. He says :-

This is the meaning of English imperialism. We see that colice control is necessary, if the contact of civilisation and barbarism is not to be a continued curse to mankind; there must be strong civil authority established to keep the peace and punish the wrongdoer, whether black or white; and Englishmen are ready to undertake this police control wherever they are called on to exercise it.

We do not grasp at it; we know the strain it involves and the jealousy it breeds; but we will not shirk the responsibility when it comes to our hands. The thing must be done; there must be the maintenance of law and order somehow, and we are prepared to do our best. If others will join us in it, good and well. We invited France to share the work in Egypt, and she left us to do it alone; we have combined with Germany and America to attempt it in Samoa, and we wish we had left it to them, or they had left it to us. Conventions do not work quite easily; under the imperialist system there is far less danger that a squabble about the succession to a barbarian chieftainship should endanger the peace of two friendly European Powers. The position of the English imperialists is this: it is necessary that some civilised Power should exercise effective police control in every part of the globe: if other people like to do it, good and well; if they leave it to us, so much the better. It is preferable, from our point of view, on two grounds: first, because, with our experience of governing conflicting races, we are as likely to set about the task satisfactorily as anybody else; secondly, because any country that is under our political control, and that is not ripe for self-government as our colonies are, will pursue a cosmopolitan economic policy, and so give a fair chance—no preferential advantage, but only a fair chance—to our trade. The spread of English imperialism, with its free play for the commerce of all nations, is the chief factor in diminishing the risks of commercial quarrels between civilised powers. It is the one practical step that is being taken at the present day to secure the peace of the world, and at the same time to afford the greatest possible scope for national self-development.

TH

"th inte it n obse has, all

vent

Ger

out

in (

B

Por was the this has T tion "ac the | Sir with qual

how

grie

T calc Boe give writ T Kru mini large to t num be r vote M

imp this occu imp thus of S

N

THE PROBLEM OF THE TRANSVAAL.

(1) A SUCCESS FOR MR. CHAMBERLAIN.

"DIPLOMATICUS" contributes to the Fortnightly his views on the struggle for South African supremacy. He argues that the Transvaal, not being allowed to make treaties without Great Britain's approval, is not a sovereign but a dependent state, and that the stipulation forbidding it to do anything in conflict with the interests of Great Britain covers its domestic and intercolonial arrangements. "It follows from this," he proceeds, "that, to the extent of these obligations, a right of intervention is vested in the paramount Power, and that it may be exercised should these obligations not be observed." He goes on to prove that the Transvaal has, by secret intrigue and public enactment, been doing all it could "in conflict with British interests." Intervention was justified.

HOW HE GOT KRUGER ON THE HIP.

But before Great Britain could resolutely intervene, Germany must be conciliated and German intrigue got out of the way. This end was secured by co-operation in China and agreement over the apportionment of Portuguese possessions in South Africa Once Germany was squared, Mr. Chamberlain "had the Transvaal on the hip." President Kruger took some time in finding this out; but the sequel of the Bloemfontein conference has been the virtual surrender of the Boers' position:—

The upshot of these concessions is that, providing the registration condition is amended so as not to apply retrospectively, and "acts against the Government" are not interpreted as excluding the bulk of the participants in the rising of 1896, the Bill meets Sir Alfred Milner's Bloemfontein scheme in every particular, with the exception that it substitutes a seven years' residential qualification for five. The most significant feature about it, however, is that it abandons all attempt to play off the Uitlander grievances against the so-called suz-rainty.

WHY NOT SPLIT THE DIFFERENCE?

The seven years' limit would only enfranchise, the writer calculates, some 8,500 Uitlanders, over against the 12,000 Boer burghers. Redistribution might be of a kind to give the minority no effective voice in the Raad. The writer suggests:—

The safest plan, perhaps, would be to suggest to President Kruger to split the difference between his own irreducible minimum and that of Sir Alfred Milner; in other words, make the residential qualification six years. This would admit the large increase of population which took place in 1893, owing to the completion of the railway to Johannesburg. The total number of immediately enfranchisable Uitlanders would then be raised to 13,500, which would probably command twelve votes in the Volksraad out of a total of thirty-six.

"Diplomaticus" sums up :-

Mr. Chamberlain has achieved an undoubted and very important success. He has established the paramountey of this country in South Africa on a firmer basis than it has ever occupied before. Burring a few details of only transitory importance, he has solved the Uitlanders' question, and has thus cleared away the most serious obstacle to the racial peace of South Africa, and to that ultimate confederation of States and Colonies which is the ideal of every patriotic Africander.

(2) THE RISK OF ESTRANGING THE DUTCH.

Mr. H. A. Bryden, writing in the Fortnightly "as an Imperialist and Conservative," declares a war for further concessions than have been offered to be unjustifiable and ruinous. He thus estimates the available South African forces, British and Dutch:—

TRANSVAAL DRISIS		r'r M	British.	Dutch.
Cape Colony .			17,000	50,000
Orange Free State .			1,000	18,000
Transvaal			3,000	22,000
Natal			6,000	1,500
British Bechuanaland			500	500
Rhodesia			2,000	300
Imperial troops in Sout	h A	frica		16
at the present time, sa	у.		10,000	- 5
Totals .			39.500	92,300

Even granting that we should "beat the Dutch," the war would be most costly, and would result in endless hatred between the two races.

THE FUTURE WITH THE DUTCH.

Besides, it is the Dutch who remain on the land. The average British settler finds pastoral or agricultural life too humdrum, and is very migratory. When the gold has been exhausted the abiding population will be Dutch, not British. Under these circumstances to antagonise the Dutch is not the part of wisdom. The writer says:—

Present indications point to the probability that in fifty years' time the British will be settled in a few coast towns and inland cities, while the Dutch, probably in preponderating numbers, will be spread over the whole vast territory south of the Zambesi, and perhaps far beyond. These two races, again, unless some black upheaval has taken place meanwhile, will be living in the midst of native populations vastly superior in numbers to both of them combined, and offering problems infinitely graver and more dangerous than does the tension between British and Dutch at the present moment.

(3) A RÉSUMÉ OF THE SITUATION.

Mr. Sydney Brooks writes in the North American Review upon "England and the Transvaal." Here is his description of the status quo in the Transvaal to-day:—

A half-nomad people, of sullen and unsocial temperament, severed from Europe and its influences for over two hundred years, living rudely and contentedly on the vast arid holdings where their sheep and cattle are pastured—each man as far as may be from his neighbour—disdaining trade, disdaining agriculture, ignorant to an almost inconceivable degree of ignorance, without music, literature, or art, superstitious, grimly religiousthey are in all things, except courage and stubbornness of character, the very antithesis of the strangers settled among them. The patriarch Abraham in Wall Street would hardly make an odder contrast. The Uitlanders have an even greater share of the intelligence of the country than of its wealth. Nevertheless, they are kept in complete subjection to their bucolic taskmasters. They are not allowed to vote, except for a legislative chamber that cannot legislate; they have no voice in the spending of the money taken from their pockets; they see millions of dollars lavished on the secret service and fortifications at Pretoria, while Johannes-burg remains a pest-hole; their language is proscribed in the schools and law-courts of a city where not one man in a thou-sand speaks anything but English; a clipped and barren-dialect, as much beneath pure Dutch as Czechish is beneath Russian, is enthroned in its place; and their children are forced to learn geography and history from Dutch text-books after passing the elementary standards-the President, with a directness that would have come home to the late Mr. Dingley, seeking to popularise his native taal by a tax of one hundred per cent. upon foreign books.

Mr. Brooks declares that so long as the reasonable grievances of the Uitlanders are met with an absolute non possumus, the Transvaal runs the risk of perishing suddenly and in violence. "The newly enfranchised citizens, when they are no more the victims of mediæval oligarchy, will be as little tempted to hoist the British flag over Pretoria, as the French in Canada to return to their old allegiance."

In

gainher

ssian

epti-

rines

telv

land

she

ted.

tate.

the

for

with tier

the

ench

iny.

red.

am;

for to

ities

am sm

hat

and

ere

and

nen

are

the

be

red

We

to ica

to ess ef-

an

is ice

it,

is

se,

ely

is

a

no

le.

he

he

he

he

DR. FITCHETT ON THE TRANSVAAL CRISIS.

COLONIAL opinion evidently means to be reckoned with in the settlement of the South African trouble. The enthusiastic demonstrations in the Canadian Parliament are a very significant reminder from the West, and a not less decided pronouncement from the Antipodes is contributed to the National Review by our Australasian editor, Dr. Fitchett. He gives what he calls the Australian view of the South African crisis. He declares:—

It touches many interests, and, with reason or without, the Australian Colonies feel that they have a partnership in it, and entertain quite decided views upon it. The latest and most expressive sign of this is the offer Queensland has made to send a contingent of 250 mounted rifles and a machine-gun to assist in any fighting that has to be done in the Transvaal. Measured by arithmetic, the Queensland contingent is of very insignificant, not to say inglorious, proportions. For how much would 250 men count in the shock of battle betwixt Great Britain and the stubborn Boers of the Transvaal? But Queensland, it must be remembered, is a colony with a population of not quite half a million.

AUSTRALIANS KEENLY INTERESTED.

But the Queensland offer does not stand alone :-

It makes visible and audible at one point a mood of feeling which extends throughout Australia. All the Australian capitals have effervesced in public meetings, big or little, on this subject. Every Australian colony in turn, if war came, would make a like offer to that of Queensland. And the shrewd and able men who administer public affairs in Australia are too hard-headed, too sensitive to public opinion around them, and too loyal to local interests, to make an offer which is not endorsed by universal public opinion.

It must be accepted as a fact that Australians are keenly interested in the South African trouble, and have convictions about it which may be true or false; but which, at all events, are perfectly definite, and on behalf of which the Australian Colonies are prepared to give the last proof of conviction a State can offer.

WHY?

Dr. Fitchett next asks why Australians are so keenly interested:—

The answer, first, is that they will not consent to reckon themselves the mere Uitlanders of the Empire. They take its citizenship seriously. Every changing vibration in its public policy affects their interests. That which stains its honour stings their self-respect. The defeat of the Empire at any point, in any realm, and from any cause, is felt with the sharpness of a personal humiliation. He is proud of his flag, of his ancestry, of the space his nation fills in the affairs of the world. And when in the great debates of foreign politics, with the whole world looking on as spectators, England is threatened in material interests, or assailed in honour, or thwarted in some vital question of policy, and seems likely to endure the shock of England is theirs? Is it either unintelligible or ignoble that they should show a willingness to share the sacrifices and perils of the strife?

MR. JOHN MORLEY'S FRIGID IMAGINATION.

Dr. Fitchett then joins issue with Mr. John Morley, who, writing on the expansion of England, argues that on the first sign of peril to the Empire, the Australians would scuttle out of it:—

"Is it possible to suppose," Mr. Morley enquires, "that Canadian lumbermen or Australian sheep-farmers would contribute anything towards keeping Basutos and Zulus quiet; or that South Africa would invest sixpence for the sake of keeping French convicts out of the Pacific?" A selfishness as thick-headed as it is cold-blooded, according to Mr. John Morley, is the virtue which best becomes all colonists. Australians, we are assured, would look twice, and even thrice, at a sixpence before risking it "to put down an Indian Mutiny"; and Mr. Morley holds they would be quite right in that performance. Mr. John Morley, in a word, has no more imagination than an icicle himself, and he thinks that the colonists have just as little!

It must be confessed that the Queensland vote offers a pretty effective rejoinder to Mr. Morley's challenge. Dr. Fitchett does not spare his opponent. He says:—

Mr. Morley and politicians of his chilly school do not understand that at the spectacle, say, of a new Indian mutiny, the rifles in 'Australia would go off on their own account! The colonists, as a matter of fact, feel that whatever, at any point of the horizon no matter how remote, concerns the honour, the welfare, the good faith of the Empire, is a matter in which they have a right to feel the keenest interest.

THE MEMORY OF MAJUBA.

Dr. Fitchett is careful to add that if England were engaged in some unjust or selfish quarrel, Australia would make no offer—

But the Colonies do not separate themselves from the motherland in the Transvaal dispute. They claim that they are parties to this great cause. It is the cause of justice. The way in which it is settled must profoundly affect them. England is their spokesman in it. And they are convinced that the claim she makes has reason and equity on its side.

The situation in the Transvaal affronts every political ideal they cherish, and contains conditions which in any of the other Colonies would provoke insurrection within twenty-four hours, and the memory of Majuba Hill goes sorely against the grain. Dr. Fitchett has scant mercy for Mr. Gladstone over that unfortunate episode in South African politics. He says:—

Mr. Gladstone linked Majuba Hill to what most Australians, at least, like most Englishmen, believe to be a policy of dishonour. He did not, when he came into office, declare the annexation of the Transvaal to be immoral, and cancel it. Facts, he said, must be accepted. England stood pledged, and her engagement must not be broken. "OUR JUDGMENT IS," he wrote, "THAT THE QUEEN CANN®T BE ADVISED TO RELINQUISH HER SOVEREIGNTY OVER THE TRANSVAAL." Yet he allowed these pledges, made on the part of England, to be broken, and the Queen's sovereignty to be surrendered, merely because a skirmish had been lost!

EVERY COLONIST EVERYWHERE INVOLVED.

Dr. Fitchett sums up the case thus :-

The whole case, it is clear, raises a question which has for the colonist everywhere the closest personal interest. Does England owe any obligation to her children scattered over so many seas and lands? Here are 150,000 people of the British stock in a land over which the Queen holds suzerainty. They are denied the civil and political rights which the promise of England guaranteed, and which the men of their race enjoy everywhere else. Is England powerless to remedy this wrong? Or is she too careless to be troubled in the matter? The question at issue is one which profoundly concerns all the Colonies, for it is the question of what is the measure of England's loyalty to her children under other skies? What is the case of the Uitlanders to-day may be the case of some other section of the English household to-morrow. If 150,000 people of British speech and blood could suffer—in a state for which England was responsible, and at the hands of a tiny and corrupt Boer oligarchy—the denial of all civil and political rights, and England stood careless, or powerless, to help, this would be a sort of signal of dissolution to the whole Empire! This, at least, is the Australian view of the situation.

Wh Bos the one who fort inha up inquither used smo and for the men ever inter air build it pa dray

and

stair

more they of be shore to S owner Afte quar had more Pom length device If by peop thougall to speal libra of bootstatic build municity withing the E

The sixty-population is and is extended in the extended every broad the a

"THE FINEST LIBRARY IN THE WORLD."

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

In the Temple Magazine for August Mr. Philip Whitwell Wilson has an interesting account of the Boston Public Library, which the Bostonians maintain is the finest in the world.

NO SMUTS.

The building alone cost half a million. The writer says:-

The Bostonians boast that for their dollars they have obtained one of the most beautiful buildings, ancient or modern, in the whole world. In one respect the architect has been favoured by fortune. In the centre of this city of five hundred thousand inhabitants there are no smu's. It was natural for one educated up to the atmospheric ideals of Liverpool or Manchester to inquire into the secret of this uncanny cleanliness. Apparently there is no secret, save the regulations that no small coal be used in the city, and that manufacturers consume their own smoke. Thus it is that the pink-grey granite of the library walls and the chameleon hues of its tiled roofs are likely to remain for many generations in all their purity. As an instance of the care with which valuable books are treasured, I may mention that there is no need for the windows of the library ever to be opened. An eighteen-foot fan draws air from the interior court at the rate of 40,000 cubic feet a minute. This air is strained through dust-bags, and, so purified, enters the building in such a manner as to cause no draughts. In winter it passes through a hot chamber. An exhaust fan in the roof draws out the foul air.

THE STAIRCASE.

Within the building there is a marble staircase for splendour and there is an elevator for use. The marble of the Boston staircase is yellow, and as you ascend streaks of black become more frequent. So carefully have the slabs been chosen that they match left and right. When, owing to the large number of blocks rejected as unsuitable, the supply threatened to run short, the authorities immediately despatched a special emissary to Sienna, where was a quarry of a suitable character. It was owned by a monastery, and had been closed for some time. After no little persuasion the monks consented to reopen the quarry, and the emissary returned happy. Another expedition had to be sent to Cape Cod to discover sand which would make mortar of such a shade as would exactly harmonise with the red Pompeian bricks of the courtyard. The bricks were of unusual length, and had to be made specially. Of the decorations in the interior it is impossible to give any detailed description.

A SYSTEM OF LIBRARIES.

We in England are sometimes tempted to smile at the ingenious devices by which the American contrives to save himself trouble. If by a piece of mechanism you can save many hundreds of people some minutes of their time, has not your expense, even though great, its reward? This is the principle which guides all the arrangements of the Boston Public Library. Strictly speaking, it is not one library, but the centre of a system of libraries. In various districts there are ten auxiliary collections of books, and, in addition to these, there are seventeen delivery stations, eleven of which contain books. Between the central building and these twenty-seven stations there is constant communication, so that persons need not travel to the centre of the city when they wish to change their books. What a splendid thing it would be for London if some such system existed, with the British Museum library for centre.

The number of card-holders with the right to draw books, is styr-five thousand—that is, one to about every eight of the population catered for. When we remember that this population includes infants, and that each card-holder may have out two, and in some cases more, books at a time, we begin to realise the extent to which the library is used. Even more striking is the number taken out for home reading every year. On the average every card-holder reads twenty books a year, or, to put it more broadly, every Bostonian—whether card-holder or not—reads on the average two-and-a-half library books a year.

THE LIBRARY AND THE SCHOOL.

The secret of the popularity of the library is twofold. In the first place, the children in Boston are taught to acquire the habit of reading; in the second place, reading is made convenient. In England we have no conception of the extent to which the public library in America aids the schoolmaster. It is a regular part of school routine for child and teacher to apply for books bearing on their work. Nor is this all. At Boston the children have a special reading-room, lined with about thirteen hundred books, in which an attendant is always present to render every possible assistance. At the age of twelve the child is allowed to take out books for home-reading, and thus the greatest of all intellectual appetities is awakened.

THE BOOK RAILWAY.

In the Boston Library the reader is served as if he were a member of a West-end club. Most of the books are kept in an enormous bookstack, the height of three storeys of the building. To every part of this there run pneumatic tubes, through which the applications for books are sent. Attendants pick out the required volumes and fill small trucks placed at certain miniature railway stations. When one of the trucks is full it is pushed on to an eight-inch gauge electric railway, where a cable grips it and hurries it at a pace of five hundred feet a minute, or nearly six miles an hour, to a lift fitted into a well near the delivery counter. As it approaches this latter it automatically slips its cable and slackens speed. If the elevator is occupied, the car is gripped and waits its turn. If not, the shock releases a pin and the car is taken up or down, as the case may be, to the level of the delivery counter, where it tips out its load. By this arrangement books are delivered to the reader seven minutes after application. In the British Museum it takes at least three-quarters of an hour.

The income of the library is £50,000 a year from the city, and £2,000 from endowment. Part of these sums go to the bindery, where about fourteen thousand volumes of transactions and periodicals are annually bound. Large numbers of books require to be renovated, and book-lovers may be interested to hear that leather has been eschewed in favour of cotton duck and Irish linen, which wear better.

"BEAUTY'S AWAKENING."

THE Studio has issued a special number consisting of the Masque of Winter and Spring, entitled "Beauty's Awakening," and written and illustrated by members of the Art Workers' Guild. The text has been contributed by Mr. Walter Crane, Mr. Selwyn Image, Mr. C. R. Ashbee, Mr. C. Harrison Townsend, and others; the illustrations are the work of Mr. Walter Crane, Mr. Joseph Pennell, and a number of other artists; and Mr. Malcolm Lawson and Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch are responsible for the music. The Masque, it will be remembered, was performed recently at the Guildhall. It is best to let "the presenters and contrivers" describe their object in their own words:—

What meaning there is in the Allegory that underlies our Action is not far to seek, nor is our Dream an empty baseless show. We have striven to set forth as well by Poetry and Music as by the various Arts that appeal to and address the eye, that love (on the one hand) of London, our City and (on the other) of the Art we follow, which makes us hope that a day and time will come when, as our City is the greatest in the world, so she shall be the most beautiful, and that, pre-eminent now in commerce, so then shall she also be the leader of cities in the symbolizing of her Greatness by the Beauty of her outward Show.

In six scenes the Masque represents the old story of the Sleeping Beauty—the Sleep of Fayremonde, the Quest of Trueheart, the Rally of the Demons, the Vision, the Awakening, and the Triumph.

orley Mr. n an st as offers

enge.

ey, is re are

nderthe The int of the they were ralia other-

arties which their she tical

any ithin goes ercy outh

ians,
y of e the el it.
and
IS,"
TO AL." d, to erely

the land seas in a nied land here

the her ders ders dish and ble, the

she

ood gnal the

WHAT THE PEACE CONFERENCE HAS DONE.

A UNIQUE EVENT.

THERE is an excellent article in the Edinburgh Review on the Conference and Arbitration. The work done at the Hague falls short, the writer admits, of the Tsar's design, but, he maintains—the Conference will stand out as one of the memorable events of the century. It is folly to belittle the gathering at the Hague. Its shortcomings are obvious. But it is a unique event, about the ultimate effects of which one may not dogmatise, and as to which the most hopeful may prove the wisest.

ARBITRATION IN EVOLUTION-

The writer, after remarking on the dramatic character of everything connected with the Tsar's Rescript, passes to consider its principal, if unexpected, outcome in the adoption of a permanent international court of arbitration. He says:—

Arbitration is not a panacea for the evils which the Tsar deplored; it is a remedy, limited and uncertain in its operations. . .

-OFTEN RESORTED TO.

The writer thinks these limitations are too much emphasised at present. Arbitration is no novelty: it has been frequently resorted to, and though optional and without sanction has been usually respected. He says:

In six interesting volumes, enriched with maps, plans, and copies of all important documents, Professor Bussett Moore has compiled an elaborate history of the arbitrations in which the United States have been concerned. Every reader must be struck by the number and variety of the controversies settled without resorting to arms, the growing habit in modern times to refer to arbitration as a matter of course disputes which diplomacy used to allow to drag on interminably, and, not least, the readiness of nations to carry out awards adverse to them.

ITS AWARDS COMPLIED WITH.

No sanction secures the enforcement of awards between nations; no court says, "Obey them or be punished." Nations which have been worsted in an arbitration may refuse to submit to the award. But the instances in which this has been done are singularly few.... In the lists prepared by M. Bellaire, M. Donnot, and Dr. Durley the only clear case of refusal to abide by an award is to be found in the dispute between this country and the United States in regard to the North-East boundary. The Americans declined to accept the award of the King of Holland, and the dispute remained open until it was settled under the Ashburton Treaty.

THE IDEA STIFFENING INTO STOUTER REALITY.

Justice is not done to the labours of the Conference, the writer contends, until they are seen to form only another step in advance in a long process of development. In the beginning of the century disputes between States were referred to a hastily-improvised tribunal, with few rules of procedure or none. The umpire was at first chosen by lot; then for many years the practice was to refer to a sovereign. Of late preference is given to jurists or judges of supreme courts. "The day of the amateur is over"; the specialist is in demand.

Rules of procedure were introduced beforehand in the Treaty of Washington in 1871. Within the last ten years permanent treaties of arbitration between two or more Powers have been drawn up. The next step of a permanent court has been taken at the Hague:—

Sir Julian Paunceforte and the American representatives at the Conference were the first practical statesmen to put forward such a scheme. England and the United States have had far more experience of arbitration than any other countries, and the measure of success achieved by the Conference in this field is due largely to them.

The reluctance of Germany is attributed to dread of anything that would rob her of her chief advantage in war—rapidity of mobilisation and a swift first blow.

And yet it looks as if an international court of some sort—which Lord Salisbury in 1887 declared there was no hope of seeing formed—will be established at no distant date; it is probable that, if not a permanent tribunal, a permanent bureau will be constituted with a roster of names from which a tribunal may be formed. But it can only be a court with very small powers.

A HINT TO YOUNG LAWYERS.

The suggestion that the members of this court should be drawn from the judges of the various national supreme courts is questioned by the writer. Supreme Courts cannot readily part with their most distinguished members without detriment to the national business. Then again, English judges are rarely trained or inclined for international judicature; they seem empirical in their methods to the more philosophically minded French or German judge. Professors of international law, like M. de Maartens, would have more weight than, say, members of the Russian judicature.

THE LAW OF NATIONS EVOLVING.

International law is in a very nebulous and rudimentary stage; but signs are discernible of the growth of a working system of jurisprudence between nations, and nothing will do more to develop and perfect it than an international court, however limited its functions at first may be. The Civitas gentium which is to embrace all nations of the earth is a long way off, but some chapters of its laws dealing with minor matters are already written. In regard to copyright, postal matters, telegraphs, the usages of war, have been formed "administrative unions" of various States which contain the promise of still more important international organisations.

A RELIGIOUS GLOW AT THE CONFERENCE.

The Spirit of the Conference thus impresses the

In many respects, notwithstanding the contrast between the magnitude of the programme and the meagreness of the performance, it has been a memorable meeting. There has been a gathering of the nomads of philanthropy—men who move rapidly across Europe and collect wherever good works are being done; some of them vain, futile, obtrusive; some with their hearts full of ineffectual fire of enthusiasm; others as wise as they are good. In the air of the Hague was a little of the glow of earnestness which accompanies a religious congress rather than a meeting of sober, sceptical diplomatists. And some of the heat communicated itself to the representatives, who were eager to do business, and to do it quickly.

THE PROGRESS OF PEACE.

Despite all obstacles, slowly but surely the forces working for peace are strengthening and throwing out new shoots. Where conscription exists the impatience at the burden which it imposes is more marked than it was. We note in those countries the growth of a popular literature of which war against war is the motto. The success of Baroness von Su:tner's "Die Waffen Nieder"; the vast literature relative to arbitration; the fascination exercised by Verestchagin's pictures of war as it is, stripped of pomp and circumstance, tinsel and dazzling accessories, are signs of the times. Preparations for war are redoubled; and yet there is a reluctance to make use of them such as there never was before. In any case the Conference has helped to educate the nations as to the uses of arbitration. England and America have been in this respect the teachers of the world. The object of the Tsar's Rescript has not been obtained; but it has been advanced, and measures hitherto discussed only by theorists have become part and parcel of practical politics.

fre

re

C

of

st

ci

pi ce T

th

C

th

m

po

h

ca

tre

th

bu th

of

gr

eff

ha

ar

fo

th

of

fig

ar

of

BARONESS SUTTNER'S VIEW.

In the North American Review Baroness Suttner writes on "Universal Peace from a Woman's Standpoint," and her article is dated "The Hague, June, 1899." She insists rightly on the effect of overlooking the significance of the fact of the Conference itself. She

One forgets to contemplate the overwhelming fact that such a Conference has been called together by an autocrat in our ultramilitary times, and in which every State takes part. Apart from all that will be achieved by speeches, propositions and resolutions, the significance and the effect of the event itself must be of the greatest influence, and the first official Peace Conference appears like a miracle in the history of the world.

People do not only forget to observe the magnitude of such an event as the meeting of an inter-governmental Conference; they also forget, in speaking of the subjects under discussion, to open their eyes to the importance of them. They know what the point in question is, but they do not realise it. Like a person ignorant of music before a symphony of Beethoven, like a three-year-old child before a picture by Raphael, so do people stand before the chronicle of the Conference. They hear and They hear and see, but the awe of comprehension does not thrill through them. "Universal Peace!" How few can comprehend the harmony and the glory that lie in these words. How few reflect, while discussing the problems lying before the Conference, what is really at stake: the happiness or ruin of themselves and their

Baroness Suttner was somewhat too sanguine in anticipating that the decision of the Conference on the question of disarmament would offer a startling revolution. There is none, but there is a declaration of principle which may be binding in future, and will certainly afford a good text for agitation in the future. The first part of the article is devoted to discussion of the influence of women on war. She thinks that gentleness and moderation must no longer be discouraged by men. She prophesies that :-

With the removal of other privileges those of crime must also cease, and man shall no longer pride himself on his excesses. Courage, that model virtue, first of the lion, then of the savage, then of the hero, lastly of the soldier always ready for battle, must lose its halo, and must not be practised only by men to the point of contempt of life, but will be required in hours of danger, in life's difficult situations, in a like measure from the perfectly The human race will not be left alone to the care of woman, but every perfect human being must disdain to be a slave to the pleasure of the senses without love or in treacherous disloyalty. Thus it will happen by the falling of the fetters which one sex has borne so long, that not it alone, but also the other will rise to a higher human dignity. Exactly the contrary will take place of what is dreaded by the opponents of the emancipation of women: the woman will not assume gross masculine defects, the man will not sink into womanish effeminacy, but both united, among them the best, the strongest, and the most intelligent, will form models of a nobler race.

MADAME RATAZZI'S ACCOUNT.

Madame de Rute, better known as Madame Ratazzi, has spent some time at the Hague during the Congress, and she contributes to the Nouvelle Revue Internationale for July, of which she is editress, a long article concerning the Conference. The article is very brightly written, full of the personal gossip and reminiscences which always figure so largely in Madame Ratazzi's writings. Speaking of the members of the Conference, she exclaims: "What an amalgamation, what a kaleidoscope, what a mine for the historian and physiologist, this unique agglomeration of intellectual cosmopolitanism! There we see above the rank and file some grand patriotic figures, men respected and worthy of respect from their talent, and their patriotism, and their diplomacy." She speaks of Sir Julian Pauncefote as one of the most sympathetic and one of the most considerable figures of the Congress, and describes Baron Stengel as "the learned professor, confidant and friend of the Emperor William." Of M. Bourgeois: "His qualities of seductiveness, and above all of tact and decision, his clear and precise outlook, his activity almost without equal among our French statesmen, his vibrating eloquence, and his legal knowledge, his astounding power of throwing himself heart and soul into whatever he does, bringing always new ardour to everything that he undertakes, no matter how different or opposite it may be-these were things which it was most astonishing to find united in one who had also a capacity for work of which few people know the incredible extent. He has such a determination to carry his point, such coquetterie, such a resolution to succeed and triumph, such energy united to such suppleness, that if the Conference had been deprived of his help, questions could not have been so broadly treated as they were by this persuasive and vibrant statesman."

It is rather curious to note, however, that what the Emperor said to Mr. Stead when he was at Livadia is textually quoted as having been spoken in Paris by the Emperor to a distinguished visitor, "who has repeated it to me in those terms." Considering that Madame de Rute must have translated this directly from Mr. Stead's published report of his conversation with the Emperor, Madame de Rute's statements as to the sources of her information must be accepted with a grain of salt.

Soldiers as Colonists.

In the Revue de Paris it is refreshing to read M. Lavisse's article, entitled "A Colonising Method," by which he means, apparently, the bringing together of a colonial army of which the first duty will be not so much fighting as that of preparing the country for the occupation of the bona fide French colonist. This is the system which has been pursued by General Galieni, who has spent the last three years in Madagascar; and M. Lavisse believes that it has been exceedingly successful. The General even turned his soldiers into village schoolmasters, and the article is embellished with two amusing illustrations showing the Hova boys and girls at play; for this exceptionally clever "piou-piou," to quote the French equivalent of "Tommy Atkins," managed a mixed school of three hundred and sixty pupils divided into four The soldier schoolmaster took so kindly to the work that he sent for his young brother from France and started him in a farm, and in a short time he hopes to have out his wife and children. The General also opened a number of factories, placing soldiers at the head of each, and putting under their orders the natives, to whose intelligence and quickness the French colonists pay the greatest tribute. A farming school was given over to a non-commissioned officer, who sent for his wife from France; they have worked the estate very successfully, some of their native pupils, of whom they have three hundred, having already started for themselves.

This idea of the army as a colonising agent is not so strange when France is in question as it might appear to Englishmen. On the Continent every man, whatever be his trade, has to serve for three years in the army accordingly he rarely becomes a professional soldier, and nothing pleases him better than to be allowed to work at his own trade. General Galieni found that in many cases those who had begun by being colonising soldiers ended by becoming ordinary colonists; they sent home for their wives, and even for their parents.

XUM

ad of n war sort-

ureau bunal small

ould ional reme shed ness. ined

l in nded onal han,

tary uriselop

d its s to ome eady the" of tant

the the

peren a ove are vith vise the ress ·

And

vho

for ere ses the the fen na-

are ind ver ate ica ect

ped

en ve

WHAT MAKES UNIONISM DWINDLE?

MR. J. LOUIS GARVIN propounds in the Fortnightly the question, Why is Unionism unpopular? He has no doubt about the decline of public enthusiasm for Unionism. Over fifty by-elections, he says, have yielded a gain of three seats to the Government and fifteen to the Opposition. He offers these totals:—

remaining than				Before By-elections.	After By-elections.
Liberal votes		11	WHA!	202,363	231,649
Unionist votes			4	219,400	218,016
Unionist majori	ty, I	895	15 41	17,037	- mains
Liberal majority	, 18	99 .		4	13,633

He points out that "there are no fewer than 105 Unionist seats with majorities of less than 500. Two-thirds of these seats were Liberal even in 1892. In these seats alone any such Radical recovery of votes as has been shown at the by-elections would wipe out the majority of the Government." He groups the acts of the Government under the three heads of Irish, social, and foreign policy. He says:—

If the adverse verdict of the constituencies were given upon Mr. Balfour's Irish policy nothing could be more unjust. If it were given upon Mr. Chamberlain's social legislation nothing could be more intelligible. If it were given against Lord Salisbury's policy it would be both unjust and intelligible.

TOO COMPLETE A SUCCESS IN IRELAND.

Mr. Garvin sees in the Irish County Councils Act the last stage of the legal revolution which has redistributed privilege, property, and power.

Catholic emancipation was the complete extinction of religious privilege in Ireland; the Land Acts of economic privilege; the Local Government Act of political privilege. The deep wounds of Ireland have begun at last to close. The constituencies almost seem to need reminding that a few years ago the Irish difficulty was the despair of English statesmanship. The Unionists have done their work too well, and the electorate has at last got Ireland completely off its mind. In any case it has quite ceased to do its political thinking in terms of the Irish question.

POCKET POLITICS NOT POPULAR.

Mr. Garvin scarcely conceals his feeling with regard to the "Birmingham programme":—

The social legislation of the Government has been deliberately based upon the appeal to enlightened selfishness... The surprising fact remains that while sentimental and imaginative politics arouse the enthusiastic emotions of democracies, pocket politics are not popular. For the Unionist Party, at least, to argue the matter on the brutal ground, they are not profitable.... Democracy takes a higher view of politics in some respects than these who talk down to it. It does not live by bread alone, and it is not actuated by an excitable cupidity.

The Tory democrat is not opposed upon principle to Tory Socialism, but he is more moved when the flag is waved in a music-hall than when Mr. Chamberlain invites him to participate in the advantages of pocket politics. The Radical democrat is not in the least induced, even by the prospect of Workmen's Compensation Bills, and Small Houses Bills, and Old Age Pensions, to desert his own party. But between the Radical and Unionist democracy, whose votes are not affected, comes the decisive intervention of the odd man, the cross-bench elector, who is usually not a democrat at all, and has an indignant abhorerence of pocket politics.

abhorrence of pocket politics.

The domestic legislation of the Government is, in one word, unpopular. It has not moved the multitude. It has alienated the sympathies of the middle classes, who were the driving element of Unionism. The middle classes perceive that the Unionists, for all legislative purposes, are most useful in opposition. The desire to keep the Unionists in power is proportionately diminished.

LORD SALISBURY'S SPLENDID RECORD.

Passing to foreign policy, Mr. Garvin points out that "the influence of Lord Rosebery, since the Fashoda speeches, has begun to work deeply upon the country. The Unionists have lost the monopoly of Imperialism and the peculiar prerogative of a firm foreign policy." It is a noble tribute which the writer pays to our Foreign Minister:—

It does not appear that Lord Salisbury receives the confidence of democracy for his preservation of peace in circumstances of unique difficulty, Lord Salisbury's burthen has been the heaviest that has rested upon the shoulders of any Premier since Pitt. He has had to avert the danger of war with the four other greatest Powers of the world—with America, with Germany, with France, with Russia. He has not only preserved the peace; his Ministry has presided over a memorable restoration of Imperial prestige. The Venezuela quarrel has not only been composed; it has been followed by the most intimate rapprochement of Anglo-American sympathy known since the War of Independence. The breach of good relations with Germany after the Jameson Raid has been followed by an agreement upon the South African question, which, perhaps, accounts to some extent for the patience of the Government upon the Transvaal difficulty. The military victory of Omdurman and the diplomatic victory over Fashoda were not only the most conspicuous successes achieved by English foreign policy for twenty years; they probably added the Nile to the Empire, in closing the two centuries' struggle with France for dominion in three continents: Egypt has followed India and Canada. Lord Salisbury's Ministry is likely to see the rise of United Australia. In China alone Lord Salisbury's policy has left the impression that he is a tired Minister.

WHY NOT DISSOLVE NEXT YEAR?

This brilliant piece of analysis, which will possibly not be relished in Birmingham, opens with the following advice to the Government:—

After the turn of the year the approach of the General Election will be felt. When things begin to go wrong or to seem wrong by some crass perversity, Governments rarely gain by waiting. To postpone the dissolution into 1901 would be to run a great risk of going to the country at a moment of declining trade and shrinking revenue. Ministers are not likely to find any better way to re-inspire their followers than to accept the crowing challenge of the Opposition without lingering out their term of office to the last.

A writer in Blackwood on the position of the Government takes "the fact to be undeniable that they have lost ground in the country by their attitude towards the crisis in the Church." "As matters now stand, a serious defection from the Ministerial party may possibly be at hand."

THE most sensational feature in the Royal Magazine for August is its stories of adventures about Niagara Falls, by F. A. Acland. William Will gives pictures of the graves of "good and faithful servants of the Queen" in the kirkyard at Crathie, and contributes glimpses of their lives.

MR. JOHN S. ROWNTREE, in the August Puritan, gives an interesting view of George Fox as a social reformer. He specially instances Fox's attitude towards the living wage and the rights of the labourer, towards slavery and the rights of aboriginal races, to his plea for justice from magistrates, the amelioration of prisons and the more humane treatment of prisoners, to honesty in trade, to conscientious dealing by publicans, in the interests of sobriety, to his enlightened words on parental and scholastic education, and to his self-sacrificing struggle to secure the just position of women: and marvels at his social prescience.

Ei pu de Mi

mu

pr

att up wo Or ma Ha Ra Ch

the

the

and stru he for flas cro Oth are effe

opii in held eme Loi twe field but acco

Lor the decl the to h Wei

Her Mr. of the of en betw

beli

if th

LORD ROSEBERY AND THE PREMIERSHIP.

In the Forum for July Mr. Henry W. Lucy raises the question of the succession to the Premiership when the present Government shall have been driven from power.

THE FIRST QUALIFICATION.

Successful leadership, says Mr. Lucy, is not merely a question of political ability. To be pre-eminent in English politics it is necessary, first of all, to interest the public. Disraeli and Gladstone had this gift in a supreme degree.

The secret does not dwell with the Duke of Devonshire, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Goschen, or Lord Salisbury. Lord Salisbury has the power latent, but industriously stifles it. He must needs, by reason of his position, be in pretty regular attendance at the House of Lords, and once a year must stand up in a big hall and hide his scorn of the class of mankind and womenfolk who wear the decoration of the Primrose League. On the whole, to put it in most genial form, he hates his fellowman, and would rather be a doorkeeper in the seclusion of Hatfield than dwell in the tents of London Society. Lord Randolph Churchill wielded the magic spell. So does Mr. Chamberlain, and so does the Earl of Rosebery.

LORD ROSEBERY'S MAGNETISM.

Mr. Lucy attributes Lord Rosebery's magnetism for the general public to two things—his gift of speech and the element of mystery which surrounds him:—

To these qualities Lord Rosebery superadds the charm of graceful speech, in turn witty, humorous, pathetic, eloquent... If, as a matter of precaution and in token of respect for his audience, Lord Rosebery does frame in advance the main structure of his speech, he quickly seizes occasions to show that he is not dependent upon the equivalent to the midnight lamp for inspiration. Many of the best things in his speeches are flashed forth either in retort to interruption from a voice in the crowd or in passing reply to a speaker who has preceded him. Other natural gifts which he has, conducive to success in oratory, are a pleasing presence, a far-reaching, melodious voice, and an effective delivery.

HIS INFLUENCE.

Lord Rosebery is hardly less influential in the Unionist camp than among his own people:—

In the spring of last year, when, according to the expressed opinion of his followers, Lord Salisbury was muddling matters in the Far East, it is scarcely exaggeration to say that he held the fate of the Ministry in the palm of his hand. Had he emerged from his retirement, taken his place in the House of Lords, and pegged away at Lord Salisbury's foreign policy, as twenty years earlier Mr. Gladstone hammered at Lord Beaconsfield's, he might not perhaps have turned the Government out, but they would have been saved only by altering their policy in accordance with his views. It is no secret that, at the time, Lord Rosebery was approached by variou: influential sections of the Liberal Party, and besought to emerge from his tent and declare himself on Lord Salisbury's policy, of late crowned by the acquisition by Russia of Talien-wan. He clung tenaciously to his policy of silence; and Lord Salisbury lived to acquire Wei-hai-Wei.

SOCIAL POPULARITY.

Lord Rosebery's position in Society is another factor in his favour :-

Lord Rosebery, as we have seen, is specially acceptable to Her Majesty; London Society, which could never "abear" Mr. Gladstone, pays him court. As for the masses, the occasion of the wedding of his daughter in May last led to an ebullition of enthusiasm the like of which has never been seen on the way between Westminster Abbey and Berkeley Square.

As to Lord Rosebery's return to authority Mr. Lucy makes no prophecy. But there is no doubt as to his belief in it. The real difficulty, he says, still consists in the irreconcilable section of the Radical army which, if the fortress is not governed in accordance with its views, is ready to blow it up or admit the enemy. This section will let no personal merits overcome its objections to a Premier who is without a seat in the House of Commons.

STORIES OF OUR FUTURE QUEEN.

THE girlhood of the Duchess of York is sketched by "Sybil" in the Girl's Realm for August. Photographs are given of the Princess at different ages, and several interesting incidents are told. Of her personal tastes, we are informed that "blue is par excellence her favourite colour, and next in favour come bright shades of mauve and heliotrope. Turquoises are her favourite stones, and she has inherited her grandmother the Duchess of Cambridge's love for wearing beautiful jewels." More serious pursuits, however, are mentioned. "Each year she set apart a portion of money" out of her "none too plentiful dress allowance" for charity, and, "what was better still, she gave her own time and thought to help the poor and afflicted." She "invariably purchased goods of British and Irish manufacture," and she "only dealt with those firms who, she had ascertained, treated their employés fairly."

THE RHYME OF THE DUCHESS MAY.

Possibly many will be surprised to learn that the aspirations of this Royal heart have broken into verse; but such is the case, and the sentiment is certainly unimpeachable. The writer avers:—

She followed, with the greatest interest, the investigations made by the Government into the Sweating system, and the plans being formulated for the Better Housing of the Poor, and would discuss these questions with her mother's visitors with great earnestness. Princess May was a girl who was not content with merely doing kind and pretty things, but she liked to get at the why and wherefore of the poverty and misery with which this favoured England of ours abounds. I am sure you will be interested to read some lines which she wrote as a girl, and which express her sentiments of patriotism:—

"If each man in his measure
Would do a brother's part,
To cast a ray of sunlight
Into a brother's heart,
How changed would be our country,
How changed would be our poor!
And then might Merrie England Deserve her name once more."

Such is "the Rhyme of the Duchess May," not the "Rhyme" by Mrs. Browning of that title, but the work of the real Duchess.

MAKING TEA FOR THE SERVANTS

"Sybil" goes on to tell how the Duchess and her mother used to supply every year the old women from the Royal Cambridge Asylum for Soldiers' Widows with vegetables from the gardens of White Lodge. The vegetables were given by the Royal hands with much Royal banter. Here is an incident which King Demos may remember hereafter of the wife of his titular

Not far from White Lodge the Duchess of Teck had a Training Home for Servants, and there she and Princess May often went to make little jollifications for the girls. On one occasion they went unexpectedly, and the Duchess of Teck, going down the staircase to the kitchen, said, "Follow me, May, and we will go and give the girls their tea." You may imagine the astonishment of the girls when the Duchess appeared, and, seating herself on an ordinary kitchen-chair, began to pour out the tea, while Princess May handed it round. There were some clothes' lines across the kitchen, and Princess May being tall, her hat caught in the ropes as she was hurrying about, but the incident only served to give occasion for more fun by the manner in which the Duchess bantered her daughter over being ought in the clothes' line.

n

st t.

, e n of

y

al

ic

15 0

:

ia

t

g

m

y

to pt.

1t

3-

e

is

of

of 1

ls

Is

or

d

n

ie

al

le

THE QUEEN AS HOUSEKEEPER.

THE Pall Mall Magazine for August has a beautifully, illustrated paper by E. M. Jessop on the Queen's private apartments at Windsor Castle. Much interesting light is cast on the habits and tastes of Her Majesty as housekeeper. The Queen is distinctly conservative in the ordering of her household. She does not relish some of our new-fangled ways. The writer says :-

The grate itself is invariably filled with beech logs, which are brought from Great Marlow, and used throughout the Castle for both private and State room fires, Her Majesty having an invincible objection to the use of either coal or gas in any of her apartments, Of late years electricity has been sparingly intro-duced into Windsor Castle, but the majority of the artificial light required is still procured from wax candles. Although exceedingly conservative in matters of detail, the Queen has gradually allowed her private sitting-room to conform to the modern taste in furnishing-that is to say, all old-fashioned formality is dispensed with, and the room presents a scene of picturesque but comfortable confusion.

DISLIKE OF NEWNESS AND SMARTNESS.

One may mention with regard to repairs and renovation of the Castle rooms that all innovations are strictly forbidden. For instance, should new curtains or carpets be required for a room, there is a fixed set of patterns, and each article must be a duplicate of that which it replaces. On no account may the entire renovation of a room be undertaken all at once. It must be done piece by piece in Her Majesty's absence, so that it never loses its look of homeliness. There is a well-worn but perfectly true anecdote current at Windsor with regard to the Queen's objection to smartness. On one occasion during the absence of Her Majesty some railings in view of her private apartments required repainting, and it occurred to the responsible official that a somewhat brighter tone and gilded tops might improve their appearance. The work was duly done; the Queen returned; an hour or so afterwards an order was issued to return the railings to their original colour before the Queen came down in the morning. Dozens of painters had to start work at five o'clock A.M. to obliterate the objectionable decorations.

TWO PET ANTIPATHIES

There is a billiard room, with one table, for the use of equerries and guests. It is of the plainest :-

But be it understood that neither there nor anywhere else in the Castle may any one smoke. This rule is as sternly carried out as the one prohibiting the keeping of cats.

It is pleasant to know that "everything past use in the Castle goes to the poor," and "the Queen, although always partial to the clergy, has never been in the least bigoted with regard to Sunday observances. Sunday at Windsor is what it should be everywhere-a day of rest. Nothing is done in the way of work that can be avoided."

THRIFTY HOUSEWIFERY.

It is interesting to learn that the Queen, who is one of the busiest statesmen in Europe, finds time to direct her own domestic arrangements :-

Notwithstanding the enormous amount of business with which she has to deal, the Queen is to a large extent her own housekeeper. The first thing every morning a paper of suggestions from the clerk of the kitchen is placed before her, from which in her own hand she orders the menus of the day, both for herself and such of her grandchildren as may be with her. These mouns are at once sent to the kitchens, gardens, and other departments concerned, to obtain the viands required; and their contents duly entered, together with the quantities of materials used, in the books which are kept in the Royal kitchen. The Queen's chef receives a salary of $500 per annum, and has as satellites four master cooks, two yeomen of the kitchen, two assistant cooks, two roasting cooks, six apprentices, and six kitchen-maids, besides pantrymen and other lesser lights. . . All stores at Windsor are under proper supervision, materials being served out without a proper requisition signed by the head of the department concerned. Not a bag of dogbiscuits can even be ordered for the actions are printed form. The whole vast establishment is practically as printed form. The whole vast establishment is practically as biscuits can even be ordered for the kennels unless on the proper methodically conducted as any great London business. This method, which was evolved by Her Majesty and the late Prince Consort out of the chaos which descended from the days of George IV., entirely does away with the waste, extravagance, and the abominable perquisite system, and moreover enables Her Majesty to exercise that wise control over her finances which enables her to keep the grandest establishment on relatively the smallest Royal income in Europe.

TWO SPECIAL TREASURES.

Speaking of the Corridor, the writer describes among other treasures two of special interest. One is "a charming little white marble bust of the Queen, then Princess Victoria, at the age of ten years":-

There is one article in the Corridor that never loses its interest for Her Majesty—indeed, she herself rarely fails to point it out to an unfrequent visitor: this is the Bible of the late General Gordon. It is of the plainest, being bound in a much-worn limp-leather cover, and lies on a satin cushion, open at the Gospel According to St. John. The Bible is enclosed in a superdid cocket of expenses the context to like years to be supported to see the supervision of th splendid casket of seventeenth-century Italian work, with frame of silver gilt and enamel, and sides of engraved rock crystal. This is surmounted by a figure of St. George and the Dragon. The casket stands on an ebony pedestal containing a clock with ormolu mounts, and bears a small plate with engraved inscrip-tion recording the fact that the Bible was presented to Her Majesty by his sister after the death of General Gordon.

A BELIEVER IN SPIRIT COMMUNION

The Queen at Windsor is the subject of the first paper in the Lady's Realm for August, from which we learn that "The Queen has a hobby for collecting the portraits of famous people of the day, and the fact that Louise Michel is in the collection shows the catholicity of her taste." We are also informed :-

The Queen is a devout believer in spirit communion, and has derived the greatest comfort throughout her widowhood from it. She has been conscious of the supporting presence of her beloved husband in many critical periods of her life, and immediately after her bereavement she found "her only comfort in the belief that her husband's spirit was close beside her—for he had promised that it should be so."

Round-About.

Round-About for August contains articles "On the Inaccuracies of the Old Testament," by B 156, "A Platonic Experiment," "A Holiday in Paris," by B 47, "Character Sketching," by A 169, etc., as well as ælist of the members of the Wedding Ring Circle. The Guinea annual subscription entitles members to receive Round-About post free by letter rate, insertion of their personality for twelve months, and the forwarding of all private correspondence from and to each other, provided stamps are enclosed for postage. All particulars will be sent by the conductor, Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C., on receipt of a stamped, addressed, foolscap envelope.

THERE is some good reading in Longman's for August. A study from Paul Bourget on "The Critical Essay in France" demands attention. The writer claims for M. Taine "a constructive power as great as Hegel's or Spinoza's." Mr. Rider Haggard's "Farmer's Year" reveals how he felt the Fashoda fever last November. He predicts: "One day the rest of the world, or most of it, will, I suppose, fling itself at the throats of America and ourselves. That will be the day of Armageddon, after which will come the long peace. But the British Empire and the United States will dictate the terms of that peace."

y e: m E B is

THE TROPICS AS A HOME FOR WHITE MEN.

HEAT NO HINDRANCE.

THE Quarterly Review, in a paper on Climate and Colonisation, upsets several popular notions about the tropics as a human habitat. The writer points out, to begin with, that the unity of the origin of man is generally conceded, and that it is a mistake to suppose temperature a principal factor in the distribution of species. Remains of tigers and elephants are found in the arctic circle, of the reindeer as far south as the Garonne in France. "Man is undoubtedly the most cosmopolitan of mammals." "The American Indian ranges from 50° S. to 60° N." The different types of man are distinguished not by isothermal but by continental lines. The white race in its expansion has occupied all the fertile regions of the temperate zone, and now claims the wilderness. It is "rising to the conquest of the great tropical belt."

"WHITE MEN'S GRAVES" NOW HEALTH RESORTS.

Yet there is a curious pessimism as to the acclimatisation of Europeans in tropical lands. So late as 1850, Dr. Knox declared that Englishmen transplanted to America or Australia would die out in a few generations: this doubt of the temperate zone has now been transferred to the hotter regions. The fearful mortality among the first white visitors to tropical shores is easily explained by their insanitary ships, their insanitary habits, and their ignorance of tropical conditions of health. But, says the writer, we have changed all that. The reduction of mortality through improved sanitation is almost incredible. In India the annual mortality of European troops, prior to 1859, stood at 69 per 1000; now it has fallen so low as 12 per 1000. In some colonies, such as Trinidad and Barbadoes, the sickness and mortality among European soldiers are actually less than among those on home service. Colonies which were once called "the European's grave," such as the West Indies, Hong Kong and Algeria, are now recommended as health resorts.

WHITE CHILDREN CAN THRIVE THERE

The common impression is that where death does not reign deterioration is certain. But, says the reviewer, "there is no such thing as a special tropical deterioration in the sense of heat-deterioration":—

Improved sanitation, and above all a better knowledge of the natural history of pathogenic parasites, is already greatly reducing the prevalence and severity of the diseases which cause deterioration both in Europe and in tropical countries. Some thirty years ago, Sir Joseph Fayrer conclusively proved, from the experience of the Lawrence Orphanage, that, under proper management, children could thrive in India as well as in England, not only in the hill stations, but in the very plains of Bengal. The notion that children cannot thrive in the tropics is based on the fact that soldiers' children brought up in India are frequently unhealthy. . . . The healthiness of children has improved pari passu with that of adults in all colonies. The death-rate of European children is now considerably below that of native children, and, in some colonies, it is decidedly lower than in many European districts.

NO DETERIORATION IN TWO CENTURIES.

That white people cannot exist longer than three or four generations in the tropics is apparently another fallacy:—

Sir Clements Markham, in a valuable paper which he read at the Seventh International Congress of Hygiene and Demography, put together all the available information, much of which he had carefully collected himself, and proved that families of pure European blood had been settled for upwards of two centuries in places within the tropics, and that in each case the living representatives were quite equal to their progenitors in moral and physical development. That a sudden change of habitat may produce a temporary reduction of fertility is undoubtedly a fact, but it is likewise true that this function soon becomes re-established, and may even increase considerably, as is proved by the Spaniards in Cuba and the French in Algeria. The same thing occurs in animals and plants. European fowls became almost sterile when first introduced into Bolivia; now they are once more exceedingly fertile.

The real obstacles, the writer goes on to show, are "not temperature and moisture, but living organisms": savages, wild beasts, poisonous reptiles, bacilli of disease. Immunity from the last is surely not beyond the range of preventive medicine. Much might be learned from precautions adopted by the natives themselves. Care should be taken to select healthy localities for residence. Towns have been too fatally erected on the deadly alluvial soils at the mouths of rivers. Immigrants should time their arrival some months before the rainy season, which is especially dangerous to new-comers. Diet should be adjusted, but total abstinence from flesh and alcohol is not necessary.

WHITES CAN WORK IN THE TROPICS.

Yet another prejudice is assailed :-

It has been frequently repeated that if Europeans wish to live in tropical countries they must be free from outdoor physical labour. The belief that the white man cannot work in the tropics arose greatly from the assertions of the advocates of coloured labour. It is certainly disproved by facts. Farm labour is carried on by white men in Central and South America, in tropical Australia, in South Africa, in the West Indies, and in India, with no worse consequences than in temperate regions... With the exception of low, swampy districts, experience in all tropical regions has proved that white men are far more healthy when engaged in outdoor labour. The truth about the labour problem is that white men are unwilling to work; they go to the tropics with a fixed resolve to gain wealth by coloured labour, which only too often is another word for slave-labour.

MORE ROOM FOR THE WHITE MAN!

So the writer confidently concludes :-

The sanitation of the unhealthy tracts in tropical lands may seem at first a hopeless task, but intelligence, energy, and science will surely triumph. The genius of man, which has united transcontinental seas, tunnelled mountains, changed the course of rivers; which has stubbed up the forest and drained the fen; which has turned the desert into a garden, and substituted useful plants for the noxious produce of the jungle—such a power can surely in time render habitable the vast and rich territories which lie within the tropical belt.

The Hon. Truxton Beale, formerly United States Minister to Persia, has a short article in the Forum for July on the same topic. Mr. Beale declares that the solution of this problem is merely a matter of time, and pins his faith to science to settle the question. It is mainly a question of necessity. India has been made habitable only for an official class merely because there has never been any necessity to make it so for any other class. But the Chinese, driven forth by the pressure of their dense population, have prospered in all climes from Siberia to the torrid swamps of Java and Sumatra. With science at our command we may solve the problem even more successfully:—

The science of reducing the temperature of rooms and buildings is still in its infancy; yet a Government arsenal already exists in Marseilles—that hottest of European cities—where the temperature is so reduced, by artificial means, that artisans can work there with comfort during the hottest months. Chemistry has so reduced the cost of artificial ice that it is now frequently used in preference to the natural product. The utilisation of liquid air for cooling purposes will be more effective than anything else hitherto discovered, as it will make the air in rooms not only cool, but as pure as the most bracing mountain air.

is

e

e,

h

y

it

THE YELLOW PERIL IN QUEENSLAND.

MR. T. M. DONOVAN writes in the Westminster Review on Oueensland politics and federation. He gives a very unpleasant view of the ethics of Queensland politicians.

The goal of a successful Queensland politician is a life Government billet at a salary ranging from £1,000 to £3,500 per annum. When a big gun in Queensland politics shows any sign of exploding in his own camp, gets incisively critical, or, more dangerous still, acts the part of the candid friend, his mouth is immediately closed with a travelling commission carrying a big salary and expenses. . . . If he is a little fish, he is put on a Royal Commission at £300 a year and expenses an addition to his £300 a year as a member of the Legislative Assembly. . . . In extreme cases, he—the candid friend—has to be taken into the Cabinet, which sometimes ends in the Cabinet being taken in by him. The rail-sitting critic of a few years ago becomes the Premier of to-day.

It is a sad story Mr. Donovan tells, of corrupt politicians, corrupt constituencies, and capitalistic He looks to Federation as a cure for all ascendency.

their political ills :-

Federation will bring us statesmen, an honest democratic franchise, and will, no doubt, in a short time rid us of the Asiatic and coloured-labour curse. Under the federal flag a piebald race will be an impossibility. The desire for union with the sister colonies is very strong in Queensland, and in none of the other colonies is the sentiment in favour of Australian nationality so universal and deep-rooted. The instinct of the negocial talls there that unless their best hards in the Court of the people tells them that, unless their brothers in the South stand shoulder to shoulder with them in keeping out the Asiatic and other coloured aliens, the greater part of their magnificent patrimony will fall into the hands of the yellow races. Already in North Queensland one out of every four is a coloured alien. At this rate it will be only a question of time until the white man is driven out. The northern coastal climate being in favour of the Chinaman, Japanese, Cingalese, Javanese, Malayan, and Kanaka, total exclusion alone can save Queensland from the coloured problem of the United States, or, in the no-distant future, from a clear rout of the white man south of Capricorn. For we a clear rout of the white man south of Capricon. For we must remember that we are not dealing with the simple negro and gentle (?) Kanaka. We have to fight industrially the hardworking Chinaman, and the hardy, intelligent, almost Yankee, Jap. The Jap has already captured the industries of Thursday Island, a frontier town near Cape York. He is coming in wholesale during the last two years. In that time Japanese have increased in Queensland from five hundred to over three thousand. Japanese brothels are now established in every port town along the coast, and in a good many inland towns as well. This glaring yellow curse will, no doubt, gradually filter down the coast to the Southern colonies. Queensland is the only colony of the group which signed the Japanese treaty with the mother country; the others are keeping a free hand to deal with a possible Japanese invasion. The Tory Continuous Ministry of Queensland boasts of a secret protocol between the Queensland Government and Japan regulating the admission of Japanese to Queensland sugar plantations. The truth is, the present dominant party are under the influence a secret but provedly influence. party are under the influence-a secret but powerful influenceof the financial institutions, and whatever promotes dividendpaying schemes the law and the Administration favour. . . .

An unlooked-for evil has arisen, Kanakas are now among the homes of the people, bringing leprosy and immorality in their train. A Liberal renegade has said: "It is sad to think that our white population is now providing prostitutes for our Kanaka population."

THERE is an excellent paper by Mr. Wm. Archer in the Pall Mall Magazine for August, in which he discusses the present relations of North and South in the United States. He admits the unifying influence of the Spanish War so far as the younger portion of the population is concerned. The aged Southerner is still unreconciled.

WANTED-AN ENGLISH BAYREUTH.

An unsigned article in the Westminster Review on "Music in the Provinces" raises the question, Are the provincial towns more musical than London? The writer answers that they appear to be so. London has an immense public, but of a varied and volatile character; she has force, wealth, skill, education, but music languishes, and clamours for municipal or Imperial subsidies. The writer asks, Can she offer a suitable environment? The sordid commercialism of London surroundings and the endless dissipation of rival attractions form no fit home for the cult of music. Why not seek a better environment?-

In many provincial cities, and especially watering-places, though limited in resources, there are certain advantages to be found from the point of view of the musical director. Among these may be enumerated the more pleasing environment of rural scenery, the sense of space, unsuffocated by the pressure of many and rival enterprises and the plethora of talent, the comparative leisure of the inhabitants, in the latter case often sent there for the purpose of rest, or to be cured from the ills which lie in the wake of the busy world left behind. In a word, the visitors are compelled to listen to the music because they have nothing else to do, and under these circumstances the music absorbs them gradually heart and soul with an unspeakable intellectual power, not necessarily unpractical because it is unmaterial, which soon pervades the whole neighbourhood from the centre where it is constantly exercised.

The British public are awakening to the sense of purely intellectual delights after visiting the musical centres of the Continent. Why not have the same at home? The British Isles abound with places of exquisite beauty, of wild and rugged and rocky hillside, of lake and river and woodlike stretch, and rich with the picturesque remains of historic antiquity and the monumental piles of a bygone day. All that are wanting, or rather have been wanting, are the mesmeric influences of the arts of the stage—concert, theatre and opera-house.

-IN DERBYSHIRE.

The writer suggests Buxton as one of the small cities destined to thrive in part by musical and dramatic

Satisfied with the artistic potentialities of the place, Dr. Churchill Sibley has determined to make the musical produc-tions of the Buxton Pavilion of the first order. The familiar band has given way to the grand orchestra, capable of interpreting under his skilful hand the greater works of the classical and romantic composers in a most cultivated style. The idea, if bold, is a good one, and lovers of the stage arts, delighted to have a Homburg or a Wiesbaden so close at hand, will wish him every success in an enterprise which, in our humble opinion, given the trend of British progress, cannot be a failure. . . . Who can prophesy whether we shall not have one day an English Baireuth?

Yet the writer will not altogether despair of London, which is progressing by such giant strides. "We know," he says, "it is in an age of transition, somewhat like that when Cæsar found his Rome of brick and left it built of marble."

Good Words for August has an excellent topical article by Mr. I. D. Hilton on "Thirsty London." Rome, says Mr. Hilton, was far better off than London in the matter of water supply, having a supply of 300,000,000 gallons a day, or 50 per cent. more than London with her greater population. Yet with London's supply we could fill a lake a mile long, a quarter of a mile broad, and five feet deep. This water is supplied by eight companies, of which six draw supplies from the Thames.

has En way wou the whi Rus high in t

poli quer

on a truth

find such grea

an

pre

Uk

M.

agg

and

and

wit

her

M.

A sens elen assi into Eng Eng influ Imp the ance Sam Cent in w aspin Unit

In equa expo inde typif Rev. In funda hand, ment reach power tion v bring miser Certa out of

TWO RUSSIANS AND AMERICA.

A PLEA FOR A RUSSO-AMERICAN UNDERSTANDING. THE North American Review for July contains a long and remarkable article by M. Vladimir Holmstrem, prefaced by some introductory words by Prince Ukhtomsky, under the title of "Ex Oriente Lux." M. Holmstrem's object is to prove that England is aggressive and Russia peaceful; that England is aggressive and Russia peaceful; that England is inimical to China and determined on her disruption, and Russia friendly and desirous to preserve her; and that Russian autocracy has nothing in common with Cæsarism, but is a national idea of unity which fits, her for alliance with America against English Imperialism. M. Holmstrem's article is the more remarkable since he has his facts at his fingers' ends, and has read all our English speeches and publications on Asiatic affairs in a way which it is devoutly to be wished English publicists would reciprocate.

RUSSIA'S JUSTIFICATION.

M. Holmstrem begins by giving his interpretation of the spirit of Russian autocracy, the failure to understand which is, he declares, the cause of the attacks made on Russia by Western politicians:—

"All possible freedom, on condition of acknowledging the highest Russian ideal of common interest and creed as developed in the service of the idea of unity"—such is Russia's internal policy as understood by her best representatives, who not infrequently wage war with the "tchinovniks" (officials of the State) on account of the false interpretation placed by the latter on this truth. The unity of Russia is personified in the Tsar and can find no other expression, such as parliament or congress, because such institutions would mean political slavery not only for the great mass of races of an inferior degree of civilisation, but for the bulk of the Russian peasantry as well.

ENGLAND AN OUTSIDER.

America, says M. Holmstrem, is also a universe, in the sense that it brings into close contact and harmony elements of various origin, creed and disposition, assimilating them to one another and welding them into an indissoluble whole. But in this assimilation England blocks the way. In America, as in Asia, the English are outsiders, and in both continents their influence is artificial, enforced and temporary. The Imperialism of Canada, the fisheries of Newfoundland, the internationalisation (which means English predominance) of the Nicaragua Canal, the tripartite rule in Samoa, the West Indies, and English influence in Central and Southern America—all these are questions in which America must reckon with English designs and aspirations. What, therefore, are the advantages to the United States of throwing in their lot with England?

SOLIDARITY IN CHINA.

In China the interests of America and England are equally antagonistic. But between the Russian policy, expounded by Prince Ukhtomsky, of preserving the independence of China, and America's true interests, typified in the International Institute scheme of the Rev. Gilbert Reid, there is real solidarity:

I repeat that the independence and integrity of China is a fundamental principle of Russian policy in Asia. On the other hand, Mr. Gilbert Reid thinks of upholding the Chinese Government by improving the ruling classes and the literati; he would reach the masses by the best channel, through the established power, the classes. Instead of sweeping them away by a revolution which would rob the people of their natural leaders and bring on the disruption of the land, attended by unspeakable misery for all, he intends to utilise the forces now existing. Certainly he has α practical mind; he realises that the carrying out of his scheme by the co-operation of all the Powers, the bringing them into close and friendly contact in the task of promoting China's welfare and enlightenment, would save the empire from being torn to pieces, and that consequently the "open door," as implying the integrity and independence of China, would be preserved, American trade promoted and American influence maintained.

ENGLAND'S POLICY.

M. Holmstrem proceeds to quote English writers who have urged the British Government to take "the lion's share of China," and to "occupy the Yang-tse region and Southern China," and wonders what effect such declarations would have if made in the Russian press. He quotes from Mr. Colquhoun, who, basing his opinion on the fact that "China's wealth is undoubted; she is of greater value than the Indias; her people are peaceful," declared that she ought to be seized! M. Holmstrem declares that Mr. Colquhoun's policy has been adopted in all its details, the advance from Burma, Shanghai and Hong Kong being begun at all points simultaneously. Such facts ought to make America distrustful:—

England tried to rouse in the United States an enthusiasm for the open door, and in the meantime was working on the lines of a "sphere of influence" policy; she took over Wei-hai-Wei from the Chinese on the avowed pretext of upholding the integrity of China, which, as the English maintained, was menaced by us, and never thought of upholding China's integrity against Germany, invited Italy to take a share in the spoiling of the empire, and yet still keeps Wei-hai-Wei.

AMERICA'S TRUE INTERESTS.

America's true policy is to assist in the preservation of the real integrity of China:—

If the Americans view their progress toward Asia and their participation in the Asiatic question in the way I have indicated, this movement will mean to them increase of power and spiritual renovation, and will be heartily welcomed by the Russians. On the other hand, if they follow the lead of Great Britain, and view their advance in the Asiatic East in the Western Anglo-German sense, as that of conquerors coming with the "mailed fist" to subdue the Oriental nations, dealing death and destruction to their spiritual individuality, then will they simply be committing suicide; they will destroy the foundations of their State and endanger their democracy, which will die out as Western imperialism gains ground.

HUMAN MONSTERS IN CHINA.

An article in the Mercure de France by M. J. Drexelius gives particulars of a hideous form of human traffic carried on in China, by which human beings are transformed into the semblance of animals for purposes of exhibition. The skin is taken from the whole surface of the body, and replaced with the skins of animals, generally bears or dogs, an operation lasting a long time and causing intolerable agony. The victim is then made dumb to complete the illusion and to take away all possibility of complaint. A Chinese journal thus describes the appearance of such a human animal exhibited in the Kiangsi: -His whole body was covered with the skin of a dog, he could stand and sit, make inarticulate sounds, and generally act as a rational being. A mandarin who heard of this extraordinary monster ordered him to be brought to his palace. "Art thou a man?" he asked, and received an affirmative shake of the head, and the human dog traced in the dust five characters representing his name and native place. Enquiry showed that he had been stolen and subjected to long tortures. His master declared that hardly one victim out of five resisted the process. A still more horrible means of obtaining human monsters is by grafting infants on to grown men, the blood vessels being joined.

WILL RUSSIA SHUT OUT ALL FOREIGN SHIPPING?

A SENSATIONAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

A WRITER in the Formightly signing himself "S." gives his second instalment on "Russia's great naval enterprise," the connection by canal of Baltic and Black Sea. He declares the ideal of Russian policy "involves the exclusion of foreign competition." He observes in an aside, "Did the United Powers adopt a policy similar to that of Russia, we should soon hear suggestions from St. Petersburg for a Free Trade Conference at the Hague." Among Russia's "preliminary measures" the writer mentions the new law restricting the right to trade between Russian ports to Russian vessels, so as to secure the local carrying trade; the guarantee of the Russian Government to refund all dues levied on Russian vessels passing the Suez Canal to or from the Far East, and the abnormal duties placed on imported goods. Russia is beginning to close her ports to foreign shipping, we are told. Sevastopol will be closed to shipping on the 1st of next September. "The remarkable progress made in the last few years has been arrested, and trade annihilated by a single edict against which there is no appeal. Russia prefers to have her naval and commercial ports on the mainland, where she has the country behind her; such is the suggestion. The writer advances this categorical statement:—

Now a decree has been issued, but not yet officially published, by which the principal ports in the Black Sea, the Baltic, and the Far East, are to be permanently closed to foreign vessels in 1001.

For some time past there have been rumours to this effect, but I am able to state, on reliable authority, that this measure has been decided on.

With the exception of Nicolaiev on the Black Sea, of Dünamünde and Cronstadt in the Baltic, and Vladivostock in the Far East, I am not able to name these ports, though the decree includes others which are wholly commercial. It is for this reason that large sums of money have been voted to make harbours, which are practically to be dug out to accommodate foreign shipping on the Baltic and on the coast of the Crimea. By closing her ports Russia has two definite objects in view: if trade follows the course taken by foreign shipping, foreign enterprise will soon create flourishing centres of commerce, and Russia has great need of them; if the old-established centres continue to receive foreign trade, which is not unlikely with tariffs militating in their favour, she will secure the carrying trade. If this law be permitted to come into operation, it will be nothing less than a calamity for Europe; but on this head I do not propose to enlarge further than is absolutely necessary to show what a powerful instrument the waterway will be in enabling Russia to carry on her campaign against foreign shipping. Scattered along the coast, foreign shipping will shipping. Scattered along the coast, foreign shipping will gradually decrease in proportion as Russia is able to do without it, and the produce of other countries will be excluded in due proportion as Russia augments her own.

FACTS about Porto Rico of a practical interest are told by Mr. H. M. Wilson in the July Engineering Magazine. The island, consisting as it does of a mountain range, and watered continually by rain from the Atlantic, offers splendid opportunities for the development of waterpower, direct and transmitted by electricity. Though the average rainfall is heavy, it is found chiefly on the north coast. There is "an authentic record of nearly three years without an inch of rainfall" near the extreme south-western end; but even on the north side at Guayama "there is one record in 1893 of thirteen months without a drop of rain." American umbrella vendors will have to exercise care in selecting their location in the new province.

THE AMERICAN AND THE IRISH SPIRIT.

MR. CHARLES JOHNSTON contributes to the Atlantic Monthly for July a very interesting study of "the true American spirit in literature." He kindly sums up his conclusions:—

T

in

no

an

at

up

sh

H

we ree

po

in

th

he ple

as

Ca

wa

re

M

M

les

pe

tru

H

for

the

wh

do

tur

lite

on tyr

cus

of.

nis

tax

We have reached this result, then, in our analysis of the American spirit in literature: floods of light, meagre colouring, no atmosphere at all. The writers of the future must give up everything which depends on the atmosphere of the Church, with its mystery and tradition, and the atmosphere of the palace, the castle, and the court. All these things will be stripped off, as the mist vanishes before the noonday sun; and we shall have plain humanity, standing in the daylight, talking prose. American writers will have to pull their books through without weather, in a larger sense than that meant by Mark Twain. Some of them have already tried to do so, with very notable results.

He takes as most characteristic of the American spirit these four writers—Bret Harte, G. W. Cable, Mark Twain, and Miss Mary E. Wilkins. He makes one side-remark apropos of the absence of the religious atmosphere from American literature, which is worth putting in prominence :-

To get a visible expression of the spirit of the Gospels we should have to go to Ireland—to Ireland, with her pensive and poignant sweetness, her unworldliness and sense of failure; where veils of soft mists shimmer with pale rainbow colours, where the hills are covered with the silvery greyness of doves' wings. There is a subdued colouring about the roses; their leaves have a moist freshness, a gentle greenery, like the colours of old stained glass. There is a faint opalescent lustre about the mists; the damp bark of the trees passes through endless shades and soft half tones. There is a wistfulness in the face of the natural world, speaking of the springs of hidden tears. There are a hundred faint gradations in the greyness of a single valley, a softness and tenderness in the growing buds when the dawning days are silvered with dew.

The Lady's Realm.

THE Lady's Realm for August is full of the matter which ladies delight to read. Noticed elsewhere are the sketches of the Queen at Windsor and of the Archbishop at York. A symposium is held on the ancient question of long engagements or short. Lady Arabella Romilly emphatically declares for short, Evelyn M. Lang leans to long. Ella Hepworth Dixon pronounces the long engagement a modern institution, and the Hon. Mrs. Armytage answers in effect, "Circumstances vary." A sensible suggestion is made of valley cycling tours in Germanytours which by keeping to the valleys avoid steep roads and secure delightful scenery. The valleys suggested are those of the Main, the Moselle, the Aar, the Lahn, the Rhine, and the Nahe. Polo and its haunts are described by Mrs. Stepney Rawson in her sketch of Hurlingham and Ranelagh.

"GROG" is a word with a winding history. Writing in Gentleman's on some causes of changes in dress, C. Fortescue Yonge observes:—

The old-fashioned grogram no doubt survived in Cranford long after it was forgotten elsewhere, save in the name of "Grog"! Grogram (gros-grain) was a mixture of silk and mohair; the famous old Admiral Vernon (1684-1757) used to wear a grogram coat, which made the sailors term him "Old Grog," and that name was afterwards transferred to the mixture of rum and water he introduced into the navy.

At the close of the paper the writer reports that the 25-inch waist of the Venus of Medici is becoming the recognised size in place of the regulation half-yard.

THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION ASPERSED:

tic

his

the

ng,

up

ch,

be

and

ing

igh

ark

irit

ırk

ne

us

th

ind

e;

rs, es'

eir

urs

out

ess

ice

rs.

gle

he

er

he

GO

on

lly

to

re-

ge

le

ds

re

he

ed

m

in

ss,

rd of

nd

to lđ

re

ne

rue .

VIGOROUS REJOINDER TO SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN.

THE Quarterly Review is provoked by Sir George Trevelyan's "American Revolution" into the severest criticism, both of him and his heroes. The writer finds in the work a "disagreeable surprise":—

Animated by a spirit not that of history, and we should hope not that of politics, he has gathered up all the Whig traditions, animosities, and jealousies of the eighteenth century, and has flung them by way of defiance on the threshold of the twentieth, at a time when the dying nineteenth century had come to look upon them with somewhat of disdain. He has endeavoured to outdo all the panegyrical portraits, painted by popular artists in America, of the Fathers of Revolution. He has tried to outshriek the annual declaimers against the "Boston Massacre." He has contributed, as far as he can contribute, to revive in the minds of Americans the hatred of Britain which in past times has retarded the progress of civilisation, and which has lately, we had reason to hope, been somewhat dulled by the national recognition of British friendliness at a critical time. He has exhibited a singular and, to us, quite unjustifiable hatred of King Gorge III., of the Parliament, of English laws, English policy, and English society during the memorable period covered by his volume.

The reviewer sets himself to show that the British side in the struggle is much less black, and the American side much less white, than the baronet has painted them.

A CONSPIRACY OF CONVICTS AND PURITANS.

He point-blank assails the common notion that "Independence was a public necessity forced on the Colonies by a tyrannical mother country." He argues that it was "the triumph of a deliberate and long-pursued policy." He questions the veracity of Franklin, when he declared, in 1775, that he had never heard a hint of a wish for separation. Yet Tom Paine's open plea for Independence in 1776 is defended by Americans as expressing the general feeling of the people. Mr. Cabot Lodge says that a powerful minority in the colonies was bent on separation. The origin of that party the reviewer finds "in the vessels which carried Puritans to Massachusetts and convicts to Virginia." He quotes Mr. John Fiske to prove that between 1717- and 1775 not less than 10,000 convicts were shipped to Virginia from the Old Bailey alone. The notion that Virginia was peopled by the aristocratic, loyal cavalier is only partly true. The spokesman of this convict tribe was "Patrick Henry, the shiftless adventurer": just as the Puritan set found voice in Otis and Paine and Adams.

GEORGE III. NO TYRANT.

The reviewer takes up cudgels on behalf of the King:—
* Few of our Kings have had such hard measure dealt out to them as King George III. Yet he had the private virtues which all men respect, and many of the public qualities which men of principle admire. He gave a splendid example of domestic purity and of official industry. He encouraged agriculture, and was not indifferent to the interests of art, science, and literature. . . . We are told he was a tyrant, and represented a tyrannical policy. But King George's tyrannical hand never fell on the shoulder of a single Colonist. If he was a tyrant, he tyrannised in good company, and with the sanction of law and custom, and of the political ideas of his day.

TAXATION NO TYRANNY.

The alleged tyranny of Parliament is similarly disposed of. The very champions of the Colonies at first recognised that they ought to submit to taxation:—

But Chatham came down to Parliament to denounce the taxation he had proposed to put on, and Franklin exhausted his great ingenuity in stirring up hatred against the necessary measure he had acquiesced in. These inconsistencies leave us in an uncomfortable frame of mind regarding human veracity . . . The wisdom of the government of the day has been attacked and condemned for the schemes of colonial taxation which were adopted. But when all precedent was with them, when necessity pressed, when Parliamentary history and law were on their side, whence was their wisdom to be drawn? History was barren of warnings; political philosophy was silent; the statute-book was full of encouragement, and the colonies had always acquiesced in such legislation as was imposed on them. To press the right under new conditions was, as the event showed, impolitic, but it is difficult to see in what sense it was tyrannical.

The opposition to taxation went in due course through three phases. At first it was, No internal taxation; next it was, No taxation without Colonial legislation; finally, No taxation without represented in England. Never was there perhaps an 'unrepresented' country so well represented as America was in the British Parliament. The services of Chatham, of Burke, of Barré, of Conway, of Fox were at the disposal of all the Colonies; and the Colonial agents were extra members of the Cabinet, constantly consulted by Ministers. The benefits of legislative interference were greater than the impositions.

The writer warmly repels the charges of greed, immorality, and tyranny made against the British Governors, and cites testimonies to the contrary. He then assails Sir George Trevelyan's panegyric on the Fathers of the Revolution, and quotes contemporary testimony to show they were far from the saints and heroes pictured by Fourth of July rhetoric. Arthur Lee, an envoy of Congress at Paris, insinuated that Silas Deane, a fellow envoy, had connived at a financial fraud on Congress. Deane in turn declares Lee to be "a suspicious, quarrelsome, false-hearted knave, whose word was totally unworthy of consideration."

FRANKLIN A SORDID DEBAUCHEE!

Benjamin Franklin is set by the reviewer in a very unpleasant light. Of him Lee wrote officially in 1779: "Neither my reading, experience, nor imagination can furnish me with the idea of a mind more corrupt nor that labours with more cunning and systematic constancy to carry that depravity into execution."

Sir George has contrasted the profligacy of the Earl of Sandwich with the high morals of Franklin. But, rejoins the reviewer, the Earl, if a rake, was no hypocrite; and, he adds, Franklin's private character is beyond all defence. His life at Paris was notoriously bad:—

John Adams describes Franklin during the same period as "depraved in his morals," and accuses him of "extreme indolence and dissipation." Every one knows that all of Franklin's children were illegitimate, and that for one of them he had obtained from the tyrant King George III. a comfortable governorship. And if any reader cares to know how sordid and mean the self-revelations of a debauchee can be, let him turn to the "Works" of Franklin (ed. 2, vol. i., p. 106) and read Franklin's own account of his immoral practices and his reasons for marrying. We do not care to taint our pages with the story.

Hamilton is quoted as testifying to John Adams possessing a "vanity without bounds and a jealousy capable of discolouring every object."

THE VICES OF THE COLONISTS.

Sir George's eulogy of the virtues of the Colonists stings the reviewer into this retort :—

Do we find that among a people who prided themselves on a superior sanctity, there was any evidence of that superiority? Let the intellectual dominance of Voltaire, of Jefferson, and of Tom Paine afford some reply. Do we find that among a people who talked much of freedom and the inalienable rights of man, there was any real appreciation of freedom? Let the persistent maintenance of slavery, the bitter hostility to the liberties we conferred on the Catholic French in Canada, and the Puritan legislation of New England, afford a sufficient reply.

Their education was poor. Their merchants are charged with avarice, inhospitality, and smuggling:—

Horse-racing, gambling, duelling, and dissipation were the main occupation of the young planters of the South. The condition of the working-class was deplorable. In regard to wages, food, clothing, and shelter, the details of life in that class are unpleasant reading. The prisons were foul and full.

A horrible tale is told of a Black Hole in Connecticut, a prison in an old mine, where every barbarity and indecency was practised. The convict population of Virginia and the number of illegitimate children born to them were of a character that the very negroes looked down on them as inferiors.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE BOSTON TEA-PARTY.

"The Boston Massacre" is pooh-poohed as a simple act of self-defence by soldiers whose patience had really been exemplary. American writers are quoted to the effect that Mackintosh, a prominent actor in the "Boston tea-party," was "as thorough a ruffian as ever met justice at the hands of a vigilance committee." The reviewer remarks that "many among the mercantile class were in a desperate condition. They had smuggled enormous quantities of tea; they were liable, if the Indian tea was landed, to be undersold in the market, and, if discovered, to be heavily fined in addition."

THE SECOND CONGRESS A "SET OF SCOUNDRELS."

The moral condition of the first two Congresses is then examined. On American showing they were marked by selfish intrigue and corruption. Some thirty years afterwards, Governor Morris observed to John Jay, "Jay, what a set of d——d scoundrels we had in that second Congress!" "Yes," said Jay; "that we had." The reviewer quotes a letter of date, 25th September, 1779, in which M. de Vergennes writes to M. de la-Luzerne, a French agent temporarily at Boston:—

His Majesty authorises you to continue the donatives which M. Gerard has given or promised to different American authors.

The reviewer adds :-

We may perhaps understand from the above one cause of the literary activity of the time. May we not extend our suspicions, and rest satisfied as to the ease with which so many American agents were able to live rather expensive lives in Paris and abroad during the war and the negotiations for peace?

The Cash Value of the British Navy.

IN Cassier's for July, Mr. A. S. Hurd sets himself to compute what the British Navy represents as a national asset. After a description, accompanied by admirable pictures, of battleships, cruisers, and other ships of war, the writer concludes:—

All we know is that the best inventive genius has produced these ships on definite scientific principles, and that they represent £108,000,000, made up as follows:—

64 battleships		200	000		52,000,000
15 coast defence vessels					3,100,000
22 cruisers, armoured	610	493			11,327,000
119 ,, protected		040		114	29,037,000
36 ,, unprotected	140	249			2,236,000
35 torpedo vessels	480		600		2,300,000
320 torpedo boat destroyer	'S			. 	6,000,000
98 torpedo boats	999 "-				2,000,000
the little little south and it is not still				C0

In this statement no account has been taken of many important ships now building or projected. . . . If the cost of these twenty-seven ships be added to the aggregate cost of the navy, the total would be increased to just under £125,000,000.

RELATIVE TAXATION OF IRELAND AND ENGLAND.

"BRITISH Finance in the Nineteenth Century" is the theme of the first article in the Edinburgh Review. In the course of his survey the writer comes on the facts which "The Report on Financial Relations" has set in so strong a light. He points out that by the Act of Union Ireland was to pay in the relation of 2 to 15, but actually paid 2 to 24, raising the balance by debt, which in 1817 became part of the common burden of the United Kingdom:—

In 1817 the Exchequers were amalgamated, and as the revenue of Ireland was at that date only about half what it ought to have been under the terms of the Act of Union, the liabilities of that country were about halves at a single blow. This was, surely, no ungenerous treatment.

In 1850 the revenue contributed by Great Britain was practically the same as in 1817, but Ireland's contribution had declined, thanks to remission of taxation consequent on blight and famine.

MR. GLADSTONE THE EXTORTIONER!

But the reviewer does admit that Ireland has suffered harsh financial injustice—but only at the hands of Mr. Gladstone:—

If we proceed from 1850 to 1860 the case for Ireland comes into view. For during that decade Mr. Gladstone, abandoning the policy of Sir Robert Peel, extended the income-tax to Ireland, which the latter statesman had refrained from doing when he imposed it in 1842 upon Great Britain. But Mr. Gladstone went further in prejudice of Ireland. He raised the Irish spirit duties from 25. 8d. to 45. per gallon, and this example was so readily followed by succeeding chancellors that those duties had risen to no less than Ior. in 1860. All this proved a serious burden to the Ireland of those days, then terribly depopulated and shaken by famine, and her contribution rose by nearly 60 per cent. in that one decade. Stated relatively to Great Britain, her contribution, instead of being in the ratio of 2 to 24, was now in the ratio of 2 to 16, and this, too, in the days when the wealth of Great Britain was advancing by leaps and bounds! Surely this was a singularly ill-advised action upon the part of Britain.

"NO ANSWER TO THIS ARGUMENT."

The reviewer makes short work of the present day plea:—

Finally, our examination must take us from 1860 to the period in which we live, and at the present time it may be said that the relative contribution of Ireland and Great Britain is as 2 to 24, or the old proportion of the first quarter of the century. It might be thought that all this did not constitute much of a basis for a reconstruction of financial relations, but the whole aspect of the argument becomes altered when the advocates of Ireland assert that her "taxable capacity," whatever that mysterious phrase means, is as 2 to 40 in relation to Great Britain, and that, Ireland being overtaxed on this hypothesis, a large annual sum should be refunded to her. But, unfortunately, the advocates of Ireland omis a most vital circumstance. If, as they suggest, the contribution of Ireland is to be reduced as suggested to about four and a half millions, then, as the Imperial Exchequer has annually contributed a sum of about $6,000,000 to purely Irish purposes, Ireland, on this view of the case, instead of "contributing" anything, will actually be in receipt of an annual subsidy of a million and a half. There is really no answer to this argument.

LOBSTER DOLLS, or dolls made out of the claws and antennæ of lobsters, are a peculiarity of Brittany and the Channel Islands, which Louise J. Miln describes with local flavour in the Girl's Realm for August.

MI Magglocon Amerinds which trade great powe their turnet and perio order

A

The The design expression, the letime, a sing upon the w course

An

engir

Ne

Engl

the A obsolute in Grubeing

co and t new who "T its put and n and . long:

In with some done presc major princ

Ov

Engl

AMERICAN LOCOMOTIVES

AND WHY THEY ARE ORDERED FOR ENGLAND.

he

In

ets

n

ly

17

ed

ht

es

ıs,

as

n

nt

r.

ig to

ıg

le

is

at

is

en

n

ie

e 2

e

le*

er

0 t, ie

ıt

e

n

S

MR. CHARLES ROUS-MARTEN, in the Engineering Magazine for July, writes on English and American locomotive building. He sets out to explain why American engines are built for English railways. He finds the cause in the engineers' dispute two years ago, which led to the piling up of arrears in the engineering trade. The boom in trade which followed gave rise to a great demand on English railways for additional hauling power. The railway companies which generally make their own engines could not meet the demand, and turned to private makers; only to learn to their horror that the private makers were overdriven with business and could not promise the needed engines for a long period ahead. There was nothing for it but to send the orders to the United States.

MORE "MARGIN OF POWER."

Nevertheless, the comparison once instituted between English and American output, the writer goes on to point out serious disadvantages in English methods. The first point touches "the margin of power":—

The American locomotive engineer deems it advisable to design his engine with a very large margin of power. If an express engine is designed to take a 200-ton load at 50 miles an hour, and if that load should happen to be increased to 300 tons, the locomotive is still expected to be able to take it and keep time, and usually does so. . . . But if an English engine is given a single coach above its prescribed load, the driver at once insists upon having a "pilot," and commonly he gets one. Or should the weather be bad, with strong side-wind or slippery rail, he demands an assisting engine and is accorded one, as a matter of course.

LESS DURABILITY.

Another point is relative durability: the British engineer builds his engine to last thirty or forty years; the American thinks ten or fifteen years too long a life for his locomotive, as it will be old-fashioned, if not obsolete in type, before it is past use:—

It has been remarked by a brilliant American writer that even the small bridges over ditches or tiny brooklets are built in England to last for centuries. The same idea pervades British locomotive designing. Curiously enough, the American principle of "doing things too well" in respect to power-provision prevails in Great Britain with regard to durability, the American practice being reversed.

JUST GOOD ENOUGH TO SERVE.

Consequently the English engine has to be repaired and transformed up to date, whereas in America a totally new engine is built. The writer quotes a British engineer,

"The work in the American engines is good enough to serve its purpose and that is all. . . . There is none of that extra finish and minute delicacy of work that we put into an English engine, and upon my soul I don't know why there should be, so long as the engines serve their purpose."

This demand for excessive fineness of finish in detail is another respect in which the British makers are handicapped.

BUILT WITH A FREER HAND.

Over-precise specification also works against the English maker :-

In the English case the builders must build in strict accordance with elaborate specification down to the minutest detail, and sometimes are required to use materials or particular parts by some special maker whose name is specified. All this must be done; but still the engine as then built must fulfil all the prescribed requirements. And I am bound to add, in the great majority of cases it does so. In the United States the great principle of responsibility on the part of the contractor is carried to much greater lengths. "Build the engine as you please," he is virtually told, "so long as you supply us with an engine that will do the work stipulated," And here again the result is usually entire efficiency.

Consequently, American builders, having patterns of their own in stock, can turn out engines at much shorter potice

THE CASE OF A BRITISH COLONY.

The writer mentions a flagrant instance of overspecification and its baneful results :--

A British colony ordered of an eminent English engineering firm twenty engines—ten express and ten goods—which were urgently needed, and for which elaborate and minute specifications were forwarded. There happened then, as now, to be a press of work on, and, if my memory be accurate, the builders required eighteen months for the execution of the order. At last the first two were sent out, accompanied by the intimation that, through compliance with the other specifications, the engines were obliged to be made each ten tons heavier than the weight limit permissible.

Naturally this caused some consternation in the colony, as it involved such extensive strengthening of every bridge over which those engines had to pass as to amount to virtual rebuilding. In the correspondence which ensued it was made clear that the builders were not in fault for the error which had occurred. But meanwhile the shortage of locomotive-power had become a serious inconvenience, and so, losing patience, the colony telegraphed urgently to an American firm to send out a dozen engines, express and freight, of the power and principal dimen-sions specified—i.e., of wheels, cylinders and weights. Those engines were landed within five months of the date on which the order was despatched, and cost £400 apiece less than the price of the British-built engines. They did all that was required of them, and turned out satisfactorily in every respect. . . . I need hardly say that this experience resulted in an absolute cessation of orders from that colony to British builders. Strangely enough, while the influence of Imperialism and Diamond-Jubileeism was at its zenith, the same colony did endeavour to place a locomotive contract in Great Britain, but on learning that, owing to the pressure of orders, this one could not be executed for about a couple of years, the Colonial Government promptly transferred its custom to the United States.

From the general purport of the article it seems that British engines are all too good for this changeable worka-day world. They are made too durable, with too fine a finish, and according to too precise conditions.

A Missionary's List of Reforms for China.

REV. G. OWEN, who has lived thirty-three years in China, informs an interviewer in the Puritan of the changes he would recommend in China. He says:—

If I were asked to summarise China's most needed reforms, I should begin by the proper payment of officials. Then the fiscal system demands reform—I mean the way in which the money is raised. The army requires reorganisation and putting on a different basis. Then China is almost entirely unpoliced. Peaceable citizens must be protected, and rowdyism be put down. At present, people have to catch and punish thieves themselves. Things have got to such a pass, and theft is so common, that neither horse, cow, nor donkey, not even a plough, is left in the fields at night. Everything is put under lock and key. And then education must be reformed, beginning from the very bottom and right up to the University.

PERSONAL sketches in the Puritan for August include papers on Sir Samuel Way, Chief Justice of Australia, Rev. F. W. Macdonald, M. A., President of the Methodist Conference, and Dr. Norman Walker, editor of the Free Church of Scotland Monthly. Mr. J. M. Fergusson recalls "a memory of Matthew Arnold delivering a lecture from the pulpit of a Presbyterian church in Princeton, U.S.A."

THE TRANSFORMATION OF SIBERIA

BY THE GREAT RUSSIAN RAIL.

It is a most attractive account which Mr. W. Durban gives in the Contemporary Review of the Trans-Siberian Railway, its route, its actual and probable results. Its five foot gauge is uniform with all Russian railways: "the great height of the carriages, proportionate with the width, adds to the imposing aspect of the trains." It is solidly and durably built: "all the permanent bridges are of iron:" the bridge over the Irtish is four miles long, and its piers are stupendous.

GREAT INTERNATIONAL AWAKENING.

The effect of this wonderful undertaking will be the opening up of Siberia, making it easy of access in any spot, and the development of its incalculable but splendid resources and capabilities. . . . Russia is about to become, in a pre-dominant sense, an Asiatic Power. In a few years she will be able to supply all her essential needs from her territories beyond the Ural. . . . Siberia is the greatest country in the world so far as mere magnitude is concerned; and this huge territory is one vast repository of undeveloped resources, both mineral and . . A great disturbance of things is at hand, as the nations of Europe are about to realise. Great awakenings await our statesmen and our merchants. Splendid possibilities are at hand for those who may know how to use them.

LUXURIOUS TRAVELLING.

Most pleasing is the picture of the amenities of travel

The traveller who expects that on the great Siberian route he will speedily find himself plunged into semi-savagery, or that he will on leaving Europe begin to realise the solitude of a vast forlorn wilderness, will be agreeably disappointed. This great line is intended to carry forward in its progress all the comforts of modern civilisation. Every station is picturesque and even artistic. No two stations are alike in style, and all are neat, substantial, comfortable, and comparable to the best rural stations anywhere in Europe or America.

The Great Siberian follows the rule of excellence and abun-There, at every station, just as on the European side of the Urals, the traveller sees, on entering the handsome dining-room, the immense buffet loaded with freshly cooked Russian dishes, always hot and steaming, and of a variety not attempted in any other land excepting at great hotels. You select what fancy and appetite dictate, without any supervision. To dine at a railway restaurant anywhere in the Russian Empire is one of the luxuries of travel. Your dinner costs only a rouble-about two shillings, and what a dinner you secure for the money !

RAIL AND RIVER SYSTEM WITHOUT PARALLEL.

The route has been admirably chosen :-

The track runs across the upper waters of the great rivers, just about where they begin to be easily navigable. This will enable the navigation of the Obi, Venisei, and Lena to be taken advantage of for the extension of commerce throughout their entire length. When all is finished there will not in the world be so splendid a system of communication by rail and river combined as in Siberia... In the wake of the new line towns are springing up like mushrooms. Many of these will become great cities... All the chief goldfields are in this southern latitude.

AN INCOMPARABLE LAND.

Siberia consists of three belts: the desolate Tundra, 200 to 500 miles broad; the Taiga, or much wider belt of forest; and the zone of the Steppes:-

It is the region of the Steppes, that endless natural garden which again makes Siberia an incomparable land. Sheeted with flowers, variegated by woodlands, it holds in its lap ranges of mountains, all running with fairly uniform trend from north to south, while in its heart lies the romantic and mysterious Baikal, the deepest of lakes. Through the spurs of the Taiga, running irregularly through the lovely Steppes, passes the new railroad, which thus taps the chief resources of the land. It will open up the forests, the arable country land, the cattle-breeding districts, and, above all, the mineral deposits. Here is a fine coming opportunity for the capitalists of the world.

"THE HUB OF ASIA."

Tomsk is reached by a branch line eighty miles long :-

Tomsk will become the "hub" of Asia. It lies near the centre of the new railway system. It has a telephone system, is lighted by electricity, and possesses a flourishing university with thirty professors and three hundred students . . . Both for pasture and for the culture of cereals, the vast territory between the Obi and the Yenisei will be unrivalled in the whole world. Kurgan is the capital. It will become an Asiatic Chicago. The town of Obb is a striking sample of the magical results of the railway. Three years ago not a house stood on the site of this city of 14,000 people, in which are to-day many handsome buildings, including several churches. The whole country was till recently a scene of wild desolation.

Into this rich region will be transplanted millions of mujiks from the overcrowded and outworn Western territories. The writer concludes :-

The future possibilities of this railway are little dreamed of by the world at large. The Russians tell us that when their grand line is open throughout, the journey from Moscow to Newchwang or Vladivostock will be made in four days, and Shanghai may be reached from London in nine days. As to the fare, it will certainly be possible to go from London to Shanghai, by using this Russian line, for £40 first class, about half of the present fare to China by the cheapest sea route viâ

Youth in Command of American Industry.

Some conditions of the American iron and steel industries, as seen through British eyes, are presented by Mr. Walter Dixon in Cassier's for July. Two of his comparisons may be quoted-as to the management and as to the labour :

Under the head of management the writer took under consideration the practice which has numerous and very widereaching issues, viz., the almost supreme control exercised by young men over the largest and most important industries. One of the first things to impress a stranger is that the most enormous concerns are very largely managed and controlled by young men. The writer was not surprised that, so far as the electrical business was concerned, this should be so, seeing that is a more or less new development; but the same practice seems to prevail

Perhaps the best generalisation of the American's sentiment might be defined by the saying of the principal of a large concern, with representatives in all the large cities of the States, and whose managers are all under thirty-five years of age, when he stated that "he and his countrymen had come to the conclusion that a young man's intuitions were as much to be depended upon as an old man's deliberations," and that "you got there much quicker." This, of course, is largely antagonistic to British practice.

As to labour, Americans have far greater faith in machinery than we have :-

The writer was told by the director of one company that they were always prepared to spend from six to ten thousand dollars on a machine which will replace one skilled man, and their works certainly appear to verify the statement. The fewness of workmen is not, however, more strange than the activity of those who are employed.... Just as our own men, generally speaking, are bent on doing as little as possible in a given time, the American workman is bent on doing as much as possible. . . There is one point in which all employers of labour are unanimous, and that is, that one of the most serious problems to be faced is the want of conscientiousness and integrity in British labour.

num pape Saha at th whic unde cont Chil Afric (1) the v the (3) Cha dista effec of ex from slow the

the

had built

one

char Sok

dom

spar

unlin

prod

disc does

M

desi It to b part Tra cost trifle the first Han six c Fran migh of th rank worl

pref fifte

strai

ficul

be o

terri

with oasi it co Oas obje of b shift cour judio more

A RAILWAY ACROSS THE SAHARA.

M. PAUL LEROY-BEAULIEU has in the first July number of the Revue des Deux Mondes an exhaustive paper on the scheme for building a railway across the Sahara. He says, truly enough, that no one can estimate at this early stage the precise value of the vast territories which France has acquired in Africa, some of which are undoubtedly available for agriculture, while the rest may contain as much mineral wealth as that which has made Chili, South Africa or Australia famous. The French African empire consists of three important divisions: (1) on the north, formed by Algeria and Tunis; (2) on the west, consisting of Senegal, the Ivory Coast, Dahomey, the bend of the Niger as far as Lake Tchad; and 3) consisting of the Congo territories and those on the Chari and the Ubanghi. Of these the third is the most distant, and it is where the occupation of France is least effective, and where most remains to be done in the way of exploration. All three divisions are completely isolated from one another, and communication between them is slow, precarious and intermittent. It was at the time of the Fashoda crisis that M. Leroy-Beaulieu remembered the project for a railway across the Sahara which he had supported twenty years before. If it had been built then the whole Colonial future of France, and one may even say her political future, would have been changed, and the rich provinces of central Soudan, Sokoto and Bornu would not have fallen under the dominion of England-France, in fact, would have been spared the humiliation of Fashoda, and an almost unlimited market would have been found for the products of Algeria and Tunis. M. Leroy-Beaulieu disclaims any anti-English feeling. France, he says, does not want to rob England of her possessions, but desires only not to lose her own.

ITS DIFFICULTIES.

It is not too late, M. Leroy-Beaulieu thinks, even now, to build this railway, and it would cost about a tenth part of what Russia has spent on her two railways, the Trans-Caspian and the Trans-Siberian. The line would cost some eight to ten millions of pounds sterling, a mere trifle, the price of a dozen or so of cruisers. The idea of the line is at least forty years old, and was apparently first formulated in all its beauty in 1859 by General Hanoteau, who adopted for his motto, "The tropics in six days from Paris." Subsequent events having deprived France of certain territories, the possession of which she might then have aspired to, have rendered the problem of the railway easier to solve. Indeed, it would not take rank by any means among the longest railways of the world. The distance from Biskra to Sinder, or, if it be preferred, to Kanem, on Lake Tchad, would be about fifteen hundred miles, allowing for deviations from the straight line necessitated by possible engineering difficulties. A considerable part of this enterprise could be constructed immediately within the limits of French territory which is effectively occupied. Connected with the scheme, too, is the project of uniting the great oasis of the Sahara at Air with the French Soudan, which would be about five hundred miles, or a little more, and it could be ultimately prolonged to the east as far as the Oasis of Bilma. M. Leroy-Beaulieu bravely meets the objection, which will occur to everybody, of the difficulty of building a line on a sandy desert. He denies that shifting sands are characteristic of the Sahara. Of course there is a good deal of sand, but it can be judiciously avoided; and he thinks that rocks are much more characteristic of the Sahara than anything else.

He quotes the opinion of M. Choisy, an engineer who inspected the Desert in 1880, and who declared that he had travelled for days together without finding enough sand to dry the ink of his letters. The scarcity of water is undoubtedly an important point; but M. Leroy-Beaulieu explains that small oases are frequently met with, and the dryness of the Desert is much less than is generally believed, and may be greatly mitigated by modern methods of well-sinking.

WHAT IT WOULD COST.

We now come to the important question of cost. M. Leroy-Beaulieu has inspected the line from Sfax to Gafsa, which opened up the great deposits of phosphates in the southern part of Tunis. That line passes over a desert region, and it was built in eighteen months at a cost of about £2,400 per kilometre, the most difficult portions costing about £3,000 a kilometre, and the whole line was made in anticipation of an enormous traffic. On this analogy the Trans-Saharan railway should cost not more than ten millions of pounds, for labour is cheap, and the principal expense would be in bringing the rails to it is not necessary to show any very clear estimate of the place. It may be noted that M. Leroy-Beaulieu anticipates a very large movement both of passengers and goods. The passengers would be not confined to officials and their families, but would include globe-trotters, and no doubt the patients of Mr. Cook.

THE WORLD'S INCREASING YIELD OF GOLD.

MR. H. M. CHANCE writes in the Engineering Magazine for July on "The Enormous Increase in the World's Production of Gold." He recalls his prediction, made some time ago, of a fall in the value of gold owing to its being produced more cheaply: a prediction which he claims to see fulfilled. He offers a further anticipation:—

The production of gold may therefore be expected to increase steadily for a number of years from the following sources: (1) Enlargement of existing plants; (2) Discovery of new gold fields; (3) Discovery of new 'deposits in old districts; (4) Development of low-grade mines discovered in the past but unworked because of high cost, but now worked because of better and cheaper processes, cheaper materials and transportation; (5) Working of placer deposits with steam shovels and dredges; (6) Increased production of copper, lead, and other ores carrying gold; (7) Note: The exhaustion of old mines is probably more than offset by the ability to mine cheaply at much greater depth.

How eager and thorough is the modern chase after gold may be inferred from this paragraph:—

The opening of the Trans-Siberian railway, the completion of the great North and South road through Africa, and the industrial development and railroad building in South America, open to civilisation vast regions in which gold may be found and which ultimately must be the scene of extensive mining operations. English and French capitalists have already engaged American experts to examine the Siberian provinces for promising gold deposits in anticipation of the possibility of profitable mining when cheap transportation is assured. Russians, Frenchmen and Americans are now exploring the North-eastern Siberian provinces and report extensive areas of gold-bearing territory. Peru, Bolivia, the U. S. of Colombia and Brazil are being scoured by hundreds of English and American prospectors and investors for gold mines; Western Australia is likewise being searched from shore to shore, and in South Africa the prospecting of new regions never ceases. These added to the Arctic fields (the climate of which the miner no longer fears) promise an immediate and continuing increase to the present large annual output of gold. In almost every district old mines are increasing their output, and formerly abandoned or unworked mines are becoming regular producers.

new It

ttle-

Tere

iles

ntre

hted

nirty

ture

Obi

gan

own

vay.

v of ngs,

s of

ern

d of

heir

to

and

s to

to

out

viâ

eel

ted

his

ind

onide-

by

One

ous

ung

ical

ore

vail

ent

rge

tes,

hen

cluded iere

to

in

hey

lars

heir

of ally

me,

mi-

ced

KISSING: ITS ORIGIN AND EXTENSION.

By Professor Lombroso.

THE kiss as a theme for the criminal pathologist is a combination of ideas likely to send a cold shudder down the spine of those addicted to the gentle custom. Professor Lombroso takes as occasion for his article in the August Pall Mall Magasine what he calls "an epidemic of kisses in America." The fact that Lieutenant Hobson, of the Merrimac, was, in the course of his tour, kissed by ten thousand women, appears to him so striking as to call for pathological examination. He remarks on the reserve of the Anglo-Saxon race, which makes kissing between men absolutely unknown. Stanley and Livingstone meeting in the heart of Africa merely shake hands. This reserve makes the ten thousand kisses more remarkable.

THE KISS A LATE INSTITUTION.

The Professor notes that the kisses were given by women, not by men, and that being "superior to the other white women of Europe, the Anglo-Saxon woman is more sensitive to suggestion, more readily excited by man." The kiss being originally a maternal act, the writer argues that woman is more predisposed to it than man. He claims to have proved that "the kiss is a gesture which appeared very late in human development." It is unknown to the yellow and negro races, who rub noses instead; and in the white races "down to Homeric times it bore a solely maternal significance." The kiss "never occurs in the love scenes" described by Homer. "In ancient Sanskrit poetry, again, the kiss is always maternal" or filial.

MATERNAL, NOT AMOROUS, IN ORIGIN.

This is Lombroso's conclusion as to the origin of the kiss:-

It would seem, then, that the kiss, which amongst ancient and uncivilised peoples is unknown as a symbol and harbinger of love, sprang from the entirely maternal act of feeding commonly practised by birds, and very frequently too by savages. We are told that the Furgians do not use any kind of cup, but assuage their thirst by sucking up water from the spring through a reed. A child would die of thirst if the mother did not supply his needs by filling her own mouth with water and thence introducing it into the mouth of her babe. From this act the first kiss was probably evolved—a kiss not amorous, therefore, but maternal. Children kiss only when they have been taught to do so, and not before they have attained the age of six months. . . The lips and breast, from being exclusively maternal organs, became the organs of love. The same is true of the kiss; but it remains less characteristic of the man than of the woman. . . When a woman feels the need of expressing her highest admiration and love, it is more natural to her than it is to a man to do so by means of a kiss.

EVIL OF A CROWD-ESPECIALLY OF WOMEN.

A further explanation is found by the Professor in the suggestibility of a crowd. He believes association harmful to what is best in man. He says:—

The crowd is a domain in which the microbe of evil develops more readily than the microbe of good, because the good elements of the individual are eliminated by numbers, or by the presence even of a single morbid element. Disturbances arise mainly from the stronger influence which the few depraved persons in a crowd exercise upon it; for, being of an active nature, they oversway the virtuous, who are by nature more passive. This baleful influence is yet more marked in a crowd of women; partly because it includes a larger proportion of hysterical persons who give and receive suggestion more readily than others, and partly because, aside from hysterical tendencies, women are more open to suggestion, more inclined to run to extremes, than men. . . . In a highly cultured race, in a crowd where women preponderated, and under conditions of the most justifiable enthusiasm, the outcome, albeit no crime, was nevertheless a breach of social decorum, a violation of that sense of modesty which is so keen in the Anglo-Saxon, for whom the price of a stolen kiss may amount to a heavy fine.

OTHER USES OF KISSES.

The Professor would strip the action of the American women from much of its indelicacy by reminding us that "the kiss may bear many interpretations besides that of love":—

It has been said that the kiss is the symbol of love and respect, of friendship and gratitude; that it is a token of peace and charity, that it has somewhat the nature of a pledge. We see, therefore, that above and beyond the maternal and the amorous the kiss is a symbol of respect and veneration, and we may add of fellowship. St. Paul exhorted his followers to kiss in token of fellowship: "Greet ye one another with an holy kiss." Amongst the ancient Romans the kiss was a sign of salutation. As a mark of reverence it is yet more common. . . .

Margaret of Scotland, daughter of Louis XI., passing through a room where the eloquent French preacher Alain Chartier lay sleeping, kissed him on the mouth. "It is not the man that I kiss," she said, "but the mouth whence issues such sublime discourse."

HOBSON NOT MAD!

Professor Lombroso has a surprise in store for his readers. He does not end, as was to be expected from his usual diagnosis, by pronouncing Lieutenant Hobson mad and the contagious centre of madness. He never hints that there is anything savouring of mental unsoundness about the naval hero! He declares, on the contrary, that "few men are so worthy of admiration and enthusiasm as Hobson, whose Merrimac exploit is one of the bravest deeds of our own times."

A Quaint Wedding Custom.

THE shying of an old shoe after a newly-married pair is a custom which has naturally aroused much curiosity as to its origin. The ancient practice of marriage by capture has often been hauled in to explain the practice: the old shoe flung after the bride was taken to be a survival of the somewhat hurried way in which her friends supplied her trousseau. A writer in Macmillan on Anglo-Saxon womanhood offers another explanation. In the old Saxon marriage:—

After the ceremony the bride's father, or guardian, gave the purchase-money to the husband, receiving from him in return a wed, or security, that he was willing to fulfil his part of the bargain, whence comes our modern word wedding. For this settlement the bride's friends made themselves responsible, and could be called upon to refund the money if the father failed to pay it. The father then gave the bride's shoe to the husband, who touched his wife on the head with it, as a sign that he claimed marital authority over her, and that he took her future maintenance and guardianship on himself. This explains the origin of the custom that we still retain of throwing old shoes on the wedding-day after the departing couple.

May we connect with this custom the German phrase for a domineering wife that "she carries the slipper"?

THE position of women at the Restoration is the subject of a short study in the Humanitarian, by Mr. A. R. Cleveland. He claims that "a marked improvement took place in the position of the married women at this period," and "not the less was the social status of all educated women improving." There was less of bondage and inequality.

influ que ofte

and long puts sinki

mode

S

cris

As

tinu

"D

the

M Life prec and cam take less put 1

forti

The medit lower being it is to though much Abintered refers a dec open expec existe fifty horiz

MI

forge the in He closes who p mode "T the co

"THE DYING OF DEATH."

ost vas

hat

for

an

nat

of ct

nd

ee,

dd

en

S. 19

on.

igh

lay

t I

me

his

his

ad

nts

ess

ry,

nd

of air

ity

by

:e:

a

ner

an

on.

the n a

the

this

and

to

nd,

he

ure

the

on ase

the

Mr.

ve-

at

of

SUCH is the catching and rather misleading title of a crisp essay by Mr. Joseph Jacobs in the Fortnightly. As he explains in his first sentence, he does not mean the annihilation of death by the established certainty of continuous existence here and hereafter. He only means: "Death as a motive is moribund." He finds "perhaps the most distinctive note of the modern spirit" in "the practical disappearance of the thought of death as an influence directly bearing upon practical life." He frequently insists that "Death has lost its terrors and is often regarded as the last and best friend."

CONTRAST WITH THE MIDDLE AGES.

In this respect he forcibly contrasts the present with the Middle Ages. "Death was king throughout mediæval Europe." The Church was strong in the dread he inspired: "we can see from Dante how vividly a man's fate after death is connected with any survey or reminiscence of his life in the sublunary world. Death and the Devil rule over them all." But now—

The Church in all its sections is devoting its attention more and more to this life than any other. Death is regarded no longer as a King of Terrors, but rather as a kindly nurse who puts us to bed when our day's work is done. The fear of death is being replaced by the joy of life. The flames of Hell are sinking low, and even Heaven has but poor attractions for the modern man. Full life here and now is the demand; what may come after is left to take care of itself.

EXPLANATIONS OF THE CHANGE.

Mr. Jacobs suggests various causes for the change. Life in the Middle Ages was shorter and far more precarious. Modern progress has increased the security and extended the duration of life. "Nowadays death cames later, with more warnings of his approach, and takes us less by surprise. We are more willing to go, less eager to stay."

Mr. Jacobs finds another reason in the tendency to put power into men's hands after they are forty. "The forties are the decade of disillusion."

TOO BUSY TO THINK OF DEATH.

Then-a more readily admissible explanation-

The hurry-scurry of modern life leaves no one time to meditate among the tombs. The increased number of interests lowers the intensity of any single one, and prevents us from being able to concentrate our attention on the subject, which, if it is to be thought about at all, makes a demand upon our whole thought. We have so much to think about we cannot think much about anything.

Absorption in the present, in present duties and present interests, is probably the secret of all that Mr. Jacobs refers to. But when he goes on to infer that this implies a decay of belief in existence after death, the inference is open to question. A robust and active man at forty expects to live till fifty, and believes in his continued existence after forty-nine. But he thinks as little of fifty as he thinks of death. Both are beyond the horizon of immediate and clamant interest.

THE EFFECTS OF TOWN LIFE.

Mr. Jacobs finds in town life a greater readiness to forget the disappearance of friends. And town life is on the increase.

He grants that town life in loosening friendship draws closer the ties of family life. Yet it is generally the old who pass; and their passing is often so lengthened out by modern medicine as to make the end seem merciful.

"The stress and strain of modern life make us regard the cessation of life with much more equanimity than of old." Nirvana is one of the attractions of Buddhism to modern minds. Town life begets sameness of life. And, says Mr. Jacobs, "with this dying out of individuality, the belief in personal immortality tends to fade simultaneously." "We are getting more humble; we are realising the possibility that the universe can manage to get on without us. The world forgets us while we live; we are getting to fear or think that God may forget us when we die."

THE CHANGED ATTITUDE OF THE CHURCH.

People, in short, "do not think about the grave perhaps at all." Mr. Jacobs finds signs of this everywhere—in "the increasing popularity of cremation," and "the disappearance of Hell from popular theology"—

The most significant of all, however, is the attitude of the Church in all its branches. The old idea of the clergyman was of the man who prepared us for another life. This is being gradually changed to a conception of him as a social regenerator.

. . . At the root of half the socialism of the day is the thought that this life is the only one with which men have practically to do.

The keen thirst for pleasure, the hot chase after wealth, the increasing popularity of suicide, are cited as further proofs of the "dying of death."

AN IMPORTANT QUALIFICATION.

Mr. Jacobs does indeed allow that death is not dying without a struggle. In mysticism, occultism and "other obscurantisms" he sees proof of a reaction against the disappearance of death from the modern mind. This reaction apart, Mr. Jacobs finds the resultant sentiment takes two forms: the question of a future life is an insoluble mystery without practical effect on present conduct, but open to mere speculation; or personal life grows to be considered extinct at death. Just at present the former tendency seems to Mr. Jacobs to prevail.

The loss of belief in personal immortality results often either in a feverish quest after present enjoyment, or, with the higher and the better mind, there is "increased social activity and a striving to make things better all round"

AN OLD TESTAMENT REVIVAL?

Mr. Jacobs concludes with a striking reminder :-

The nation that gave the conception of righteousness to the world managed to do so without bringing death into the account at all. One of the most striking things about the Old Testament is the complete absence of death as a motive from its pages. . . . Death was dying two thousand years ago, but he revived to rule the world almost to the present day. Shall we see the revival?

The Temperature of the Ocean.

THE Geographical Journal for July contains an important paper on the temperature of the floor of the ocean and of the surface-waters of the ocean, by Sir John Murray. He brings out the striking contrast between the temperature conditions on the surface and on the bottom of the ocean:

Of the entire sea-floor 92 per cent. is overlaid by water having a temperature under 40 deg. Fahr. (under 4'44 deg. C.), while of the entire surface of the ocean only about 16 per cent. has a mean temperature under 40 deg. Fahr. (under 4'44 deg. C.). From the data available a preliminary attempt was made at a rough estimation of the proportion of the entire bulk of water in the ocean with a temperature below 40 deg. Fahr. The result arrived at is that probably more than 80 per cent. of the whole mass of ocean water has a temperature under 40 deg. Fahr., while less than 20 per cent. has a temperature exceeding 40 deg.

QUEER FACTS AND FANCIES ABOUT FISHES.

MR. MATTHIAS DUNN writes in the Contemporary Review on what he enumerates as "the seven senses of fishes." He deals with each sense in turn. He says "the eyes of most fishes are separate in their actions, so that they can survey two objects in opposite directions at the same time." This, he suggests, explains the old idea that fish did without sleep in following a ship for weeks together; one eye slept while the other eye kept watch: facts which "point to a double nervous system, or possibly to a dual existence in some of the fishes." The writer concludes from facts as to the sense of touch that "the nervous system in the bodies of fishes generally is not of a very high order" or peculiarly sensitive to rain.

THEIR VOCAL AND MUSICAL UTTERANCE.

On hearing in fishes remarkable suggestions are cited:

Dr. Day leaned to the idea that some fishes have voices which may express fear, anger, danger, and conjugal endearment . . . Dr. Day states . . . also that the corrina, a fish found in the Tagus, emits sounds resembling the vibrations of a deep-toned bell, and that other fishes give out purring noises which can be heard from twenty fathoms under water. Further, that in the Island of Borneo there is a singing-fish which sticks to the bottom of boats, and which regales the occupants with sounds varying between those of a Jew's-harp and an organ; and that a sole in the waters of Siam attaches itself to the bottom of boats and gives out sonorous music.

THEIR APPRECIATION OF HUMAN MUSIC.

The writer recounts one incident which seems to suggest the possibility of pilchards being able to appreciate sounds in the shape of human music:—

About the year 1840 large pilchard seines in the summer months, manned by some eighteen hands, were in full swing fishing in Mevagissey Bay. One of them, owned by Mr. Peter Furse, had singers of the choir belonging to the Methodist chapel among the crew, and one evening when pilchards were scarce, and no fish had been noted by the sixty craft watching the sea, the two boats of this seine closed together to practise music for the coming Sunday service. They had not done this very long before pilchards were seen springing out of the water around them. The stringed instruments were quickly dropped, and in a few minutes the men were prepared to enclose the fish; but when the sounds ceased no more fish could be discovered. After waiting a considerable time, no fish appearing, the boats again dropped alongside each other to finish their practice. The sweet sounds had not been long echoing from the cliffs when again the pilchards sprang and played around them. Fortunately, this time, the boats were in a better position, and quickly these lively creatures were surrounded, much to the satisfaction of the owner, for it was found in the morning that they had a splendid shoal, while no other seine in the bay had observed or caught any.

THEIR ELECTRIC SENSE OF COMING STORMS.

The two senses beyond the five are "the electric dermal sense" and "the magnetic dermal sense." The writer finds or divines the seat of both to be in the lateral lines of fishes. He says:—

When the storms send their earth-currents along the deep, far ahead of their course, the fishes in the track with their electric cells catch the inspiration and instantly know whether it is a gale, storm, or tempest which is coming; and they act accordingly... The feeding fish, well knowing that the storm will break up and destroy the connecting medium between their olfactories and fheir food, are anxious to take in a reserve to sustain them until communication can be again established.... It is nothing uncommon with sailors at sea to observe these electric indications at the masthead of ships before and during storms. These Corposants, or St. Elmo's fires, seem to be nothing more than electric currents interrupted in their course by the ship, and sent into the air by way of the masts. I have seen them several times: their light is certain and distinct.

Consideration of the habits of fishes in migration and homing—the unerring directness with which they make for their shore-goal—leads the writer to infer the presence of a magnetic dermal sense. It is held that all basic rocks are highly magnetic, and their magnetic power is intensified by the friction of the waves. Possibly all shores are more or less magnetic; and the fishes may have a magnetic indication of the whereabouts of the headlands and shore. "And in this instance may not the brain itself, assisted by the dermal magnetic tube, be a substitute for the loadstone?"

IS GROUSE-SHOOTING HUMANE?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, writing in Blackwood on "Our Obligation to Wild Animals," calls attention to—

The remarkable and perplexing fact, . . . that neither the chosen people nor Christians are bound by their religion to pay the slightest regard to the feelings of animals. There is not a word about mercy towards dumb animals in the Sermon on the Mount; not a word in all the writings of the Fathers, so far as known to me; not a word, apparently, from all the teachers of Christianity until we reach the dawn of rationalism in the eighteenth century, when an English country clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Grainger, scandalised his congregation and jeopardised his reputation for orthodoxy by preaching the duty of humane treatment of beasts and birds. The more strange all this, because humane treatment of animals is sedulously inculcated in the Koran.

Yet while applauding mercy to dumb creatures, the writer recognises the humane results of vivisection. He does not think that sport is cruel, even in the taking of animal life. But for deerstalking and fox-hunting, both deer and fox would long since have been extinct. He takes an illustration yet more apposite to August:—

The strange part of it is that the more severely, but fairly, a moor is shot, the more surely will its grouse population increase. Very different would be the result if grouse were left to the tender mercies of each other. Take any moor of high reputation you like—I care not whether in Yorkshire or Perthshire—put it in the hands of an extreme humanitarian who objects, on principles which it is impossible not to respect, to the taking of animal life in sport, and see what the state of that moor will be at the end of three or four seasons. Instead of packs so numerous that they seem to darken the heavens as they fly over the boxes, there will be a very limited number of pairs of old birds, some barren, some with moderate families, each old cock jealously guarding his territory and furiously driving off every weaker individual of his own kind which presumes to crop his heather. These few strong old birds have asserted their right, and in virtue of their might drive away all their younger relations.

A CURIOUS hint on railway travelling is drawn from the experience of the late John Mason Cook by a writer in Blackwood:—

When years of railway travelling, which averaged annually some 40,000 miles, produced certain alarming symptoms, he made a discovery that may be worth giving to the public. He found that the threatened trouble, something spinal, disappeared when he no longer sat with his back to the engine. He always hereafter faced it, and that the principle is sound will be borne out by others whom he advised to do the same, the present writer included. All who are called upon to do much railway travelling will be wise to sit "facing" the horses.

The writer holds decidedly that it was the Kaiser's visit to the Holy Land that killed John Cook.

to co op ha an bo

in

en

hi

ha

free lawas the con

shi

bro

cre

spin ma coa lithe com sim troit ord

each print say, ignor of l account and fash T the or it seen cere

to ta so, also T far

T

they are

A COMMUNISTIC COLONY IN THE COTSWOLDS.

DARLEY DALE describes in the Humanitarian a curious case of "Communism in the Cotswolds." a year ago the village of Shepscombe near Stroud became the abode of a small band of Communists who came from the Tolstoian Colony in Essex. "They refuse no one, honest or dishonest, healthy or diseased, moral or immoral." Among them was a Doctor of Philosophy in Leipzig University, a Fellow of the Chemical Society, and a Lecturer at the Royal College of Science:—

It is certainly a striking fact that in this little band of enthusiasts there are three other highly-educated men besides him, two of whom are graduates of one of the universities, who have had the courage, for courage it needed, to give up everything they possessed-career, money, position, home, family, propertyto live this life which to them is not only the highest they can conceive, but the only one they can reconcile with their opinions.

Only recently "a farmer from another part of England has joined the colony, bringing with him his steam-plough and all his farm implements and machinery; he has also bought forty more acres of land." Of their social life these features may be noted :-

To live in the present, and for the present, is part of their creed; the future must take care of itself, and the thought of it does not disturb them.

They do not regard Tolstoi as more than a pioneer; perfect freedom of opinion on all subjects exists among them.

It was with the doctor's money that the Shepscombe land was purchased, but they destroyed the title-deeds, and should they abandon the property, he who will can, as far as they are concerned, claim it.

Each has his own clothes, but directly he felt that a coat or a shirt, a watch or a ring, was any barrier between him and his brother, he would renounce the article in question, counting the spiritual gain of being thereby brought nearer to his brotherman, of greater value than the watch or the ring, the shirt or the Dress at the communal colony at Shepscombe is reduced to the smallest amount prescribed by decency, not to mention conventional requirements. The men, for the most part, wore simply a shirt, open at the neck, and knickerbockers or linen trousers, with sandals on their feet; bare arms and legs were the order of the day.

The women had also bare arms and feet, and were dressed in very short print pinafore dresses, open at the neck, and sun-bonnets; but rational dress is adopted by them on more ceremonial occasions.

They have no laws, no rules; they disapprove of all law; each one is to be a law to himself, and they trust that their principle of goodwill to men will keep them right. Love, they say, should govern the world and everyone in it; but they ignore one side of love entirely—its severity; their very doctrine of love is based on a misconception of what the truest and best love is.

In accordance with these views they reject all marriage ceremonies, religious or legal; love is the only bond which, according to them, can or should bind man and woman together; and at Shepscombe there are two couples living together in this fashion.

They are not quite agreed as to what course is to be pursued if the love between a man and woman thus joined together ceased, or if either were unfaithful to the other; the prevailing opinion seemed to be that both were free to do exactly as they pleasedto take another wife or husband if it seemed good to them to do so, but all held that when love ceased the union should cease

They carry their refusal to recognise any law or authority so far as to think it wrong for a parent to command a child, and still more wrong to punish it if it refused to obey.

They consider it wrong to take life, even the life of a beetle . . . they are perforce vegetarians . . . All the members of this colony are total abstainers, but the use of alcohol is not prohibited.

"AN OPEN-AIR REFORMATORY."

MISS EDITH SELLERS, whose studies on social questions in Europe have formed so valuable a feature of modern periodical literature, describes in the National Review "The Open-Air Reformatory at Eggenburg," in This school of correction was devised and is controlled by Dr. Schöffel, the head of the Home Office. He has been carrying on a war of extermination against the criminal class in Austria, and this is one of his most effective measures. The writer says :-

To treat a child as a criminal is simply absurd, he holds; if it has gone astray, the fault lies not with it, but with its surroundings, and no matter how depraved it may seem, he scoffs at the idea of its being irredeemable. Let it be placed in wholesome surroundings, be well fed, kindly treated, and have plenty of work to do, and it will soon become quite a different being, the Doctor maintains. On one point he holds very strong views-if waifs and strays are to be saved they must be taken into the country; nothing whatever can be done for them so long as they are in a town shut up within four walls. They must be forced to lead a healthy life out in the open air all day, and they must be humanised by having aroused, so far as in them lies, a love of the country and country ways—of animals, birds, flowers, and trees, as well as of their fellow-creatures. It was not until 1885 that Dr. Schöffel had an opportunity of reducing his theories to practice. In that year, however, the Landtag granted him the money wherewith to build a reformatory, and Eggenburg is the result.

ON THE LINES OF A HOMESTEAD,

There are at present some 300 boys in the institution, for the most part the blackest of black sheep, the Ishmaels by birth. His idea is to get them to follow the kind of life led by the sons and daughters of the peasant farmers. So he has organised his reformatory on the lines of a homestead. They are turned loose bareheaded and barefooted on the farm, and kept continually at work. During the winter months they are taught indoor occupations. Besides this physical and technical training, they receive the usual education and military drill:

They are also grouped into fourteen families, and each family is under the special care of an official, who acts as labour-master and house-father, and is responsible to the Director for the well-being and safe-keeping of all its members.

ADVANTAGES OF BARE FEET.

The boys have plenty of excellent food, the cost per head per day is rather less than 11d. There is one wing sedulously kept apart from the rest of the premises, where eighty-three girls are taught :-

The windows are wide open the whole day long, and there is not a shoe or a stocking to be seen. The Lady Superior assured me that, since her charges go bare-foot they have not had a quarter so many colds as they had in the days when they went shod. Certainly the majority of them looked remarkably rosy and well when I saw them.

A THOROUGH SUCCESS.

The boys and girls are in great request among employers. During the nine years the institution has been at work :

Of all the children who have been trained at Eggenburg, 84'4 per cent, are now, so far as careful observers can judge, leading useful lives and doing honest work in the world. They have been fitted, in fact, to earn their own living, and are earning it. Thus, in one very important respect, Dr. Schöffel's experiment is a thorough success

Miss Sellers concludes with the remark which many will be found to echo: "Would we had a few such institutions in England!"

XUM

een nd ike ace sic

is all nay the not be ood en-

her ion iere the the rom of atry

tion

the

nge usly the He g of oth He y, a ase. the tion ut it rinof be rous

xes. ome usly aker her. d in the r in ally , he He ared ways orne esent lway

visit

APPLIED SOCIALISM. VA

REMARKABLY interesting, and even useful from the practical philanthropist's point of view, are two articles published in the July numbers of the Revue de Paris, in one of which M. Lefèvre gives a concise and accurate account of the Paris Assistance Publique, while in the other M. Halévy describes the Belgian workhouses.

THE FRENCH ASSISTANCE PUBLIQUE.

As most people interested in this class of subject are aware, the French have properly speaking no Poor Law, and almost everything is done through the agency of private charity, which, whether it takes the form of asylums and hospitals managed by the great religious orders, notably by the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Sisters of Charity, and so on, or of the dole system organised by groups of wealthy Frenchmen and Frenchwomen, are not in any sense under the control of the State. The only organisation which in any way recalls our Poor Law system is the Assistance Publique, which is, perhaps, the most unpopular form of philanthropy ever devised, and is widely believed by all classes to be managed in an utterly incompetent, if not dishonest, manner. M. Lefèvre holds a brief for the Assistance Publique, and he says that, in spite of what is generally believed, it does a great deal of good work on an extremely limited income. In each quarter of Paris is established one or more Bureaux de Bienfaisance, to which all the poor of the locality have a kind of right to apply, not only when they are starving and penniless, but for letters admitting them to the public hospitals, for a doctor on the eve of a confinement, and for admission to the public asylums. The funds are not raised by any direct or indirect taxation, but the municipality of Paris doles out each year a considerable sum to the Assistance Publique, while a certain number of eccentric individuals, who have nothing better to do with their money, and who distrust the many active forms of private charity, leave the organisation their fortunes. Still, during the last twenty years there has always been a deficit, which has been made up by the town. The Assistance Publique was first organised in the year 1849, when it disposed during the first year of £120,000, but now the municipality alone awards it each year the enormous sum of close on a million pounds sterling. The Assistance Publique has under its direction a considerable number of hospitals, day nurseries, orphanages, and even convalescent homes. The Paris municipality has sometimes been accused of making the Assistance Publique a political instrument; and certain it is that those who apply to it for help are generally Republicans, and are better treated if they are known to be so. As seems to be the case in this country, where the workhouse is exceedingly unpopular with the poor, who, as we all know, will do almost anything to avoid having to go there, to be in any sense dependent on the Assistance Publique is regarded by the Paris workman as degradation far greater than that of depending for help on some form of private charity.

A BELGIAN EXPERIMENT.

M. Halévy's paper is really a study of a profoundly interesting example of applied or practical Socialism, to which the recent disturbances in Belgium lend additional importance. In 1874, two militant Socialists, Van Beveren and Pol Dewitte, met at Gand, in Flanders, amid circumstances of the utmost depression for their cause. The former was a Socialist of the German type, while the latter had been to America, and was full of practical organisations of the Anglo-Suxon kind, Dewitte advocated the establishment of practical realisations of Socialistic theories in the form of co-operative syndicates. A compositor named Anseele was the life and soul of the movement. "Let us found," he said, "a bakery in conformity with our principles—a socialistic bakery." A collection produced a little over £3, but that was better than nothing; and the Société du Vooruit was soon selling its first loaves of bread. The apostolic fervour of Anseele triumphed over extraordinary obstacles. The serious Flemish workmen were by degrees attracted to the movement, partly, no doubt, by the name of Vooruit, which may be translated "Forward!" It is too often forgotten that self-sacrifice comes as naturally in a way to man as selfishness; and, indeed, the patrons of the new bakery had to be self-sacrificing out of their small wages, for the bread was rather expensive as compared with the ordinary bread baked under non-socialistic auspices. Gradually the bakery prospered, and new departments for selling fuel, clothes, medicines and so on were added. In 1892 the members of the society numbered 15,000, each representing a family, and the turnover was commensurate with this large constituency. The members do not receive their dividends, as we should call them, in cash, but in tickets entitling them to buy to an equivalent amount at the Vooruit shops. It gives evening parties, it has a newspaper and library of its own, it organises singing and symnastic classes. The special needs of women and children too are as carefully studied as those of the men. What an impressive spectacle this is of 30,000 lives closely united by an idea! The scheme spread in Flanders, but among the Walloon population it aroused at first no enthusiasm. Some labour troubles in 1886, however, which were suppressed by troops, disposed the Walloon Socialists to abandon their impracticable attitude and to imitate their Flemish neigh-This adhesion of the Walloons rendered the Belgian Labour Party extraordinarily strong. They exhibit a practical visible realisation of a socialistic life, whereas the Socialists of France and Germany have merely succeeded in forming political parties of the ordinary type. The Belgians have twenty-six district federations, and every day 15,000 families are fed and clothed. The production of bread, for example, rose from 1,260,000 kilos in 1889 to 7,500,000 kilos in 1896. But from the point of view of socialist propaganda the Houses of the People, to which this modest bakery movement has led, are perhaps more important. These houses, established out of the profits of the trading operations, are used for social gatherings, where cheap and healthy temperance drinks are sold (for these co-operative Socialists do not sell alcohol), concerts, meetings for the discussion of political, literary, and ethical questions, and so on. These recreations are particularly valuable, because they bring together the various members of each family, and so do much to restore the solidarity of family life which the factory system inevitably disintegrates. There is something of a religious fervour among these co-operators. Thus in some Walloon districts the workers habitually call their House of the People "the Church." It is nothing less than a silent, economic revolution that these people have accomplished. For some time the capitalist class did not realise the importance of what was going on. Then competition was tried, a large bakery in Brussels being established to sell bread below cost price; but the workers remained faithful to their own institution. Naturally there is a certain amount of jealousy between the heads of the organisation; but the discipline is extraordinarily strong.

TI Edu 1898 able " pas It is elem techi subje Kind noning t for 1 Thre Cook encou entire The by m at G £7 aj the c since booki

Strare de traini:
The success cause e the on years hany ""

prison.

less pe

per h

the ve

One less al only tremer safe P

educat

of grea

of the artistic revival of indu

The
is matte
the Ang
art in a harsh o Parado: of Uni
bent ar
her ow she has well for us to abandor

develop

which fa

Scottish

IRELAND'S "SPIRITUAL NATIONALITY."

te

of

he

n-

ın

ts

le

us e-

ch

en

as

he

ry

lly ng

92

ch

n-

do

in

a-

ng

it

ial

ed

nis

ne on les

ps,

IC-

h-

he

ev

fe.

ve

he ict

nd

se

96.

he

ery

ese

ng

nd

ive

he

ns,

ole,

ch

ily

es.

ese

the

the nic

or

the

ion

ned

ned

s a

the

ng.

THE first article in the Quarterly Review is based on the Report of a Viceregal Commission on Industrial Education in Ireland. The Report was presented in June, 1898, but, though "one of the most important and valuable documents in the records of Irish education," it has "passed almost entirely unnoticed by the English press." It is "a most complete and capable summary of modern elementary education upon the side where it approaches technical instruction." Unfortunately, almost every subject dealt with is labelled "Not taught in Ireland." Kindergarten, hand and eye training, are practically non-existent in Ireland. Only two schools-both belonging to the (Catholic) Christian Brothers-earned a grant for manual training from South Kensington in 1807. Three-quarters of Irish scholars are untrained in drawing. Cookery, laundry work, and domestic science need encouragement. The reviewer remarks on "the almost entire absence of national music from Irish schools." The teaching of agriculture was provided for from 1848 by model farms; but these were so badly managed that at Glasnevin feeding-troughs of solid granite costing £7 apiece were supplied too small to admit the nose of the cow! The theory of agriculture has been taught since 1873, but with little result, owing to the purely bookish way in which instruction is given. Yet the cost per head of the Irish schoolchild is £2 6s. 61d.-almost the very same as in England.

A GRAVE PROTESTANT DEFECT.

Strange to say, the reformatories and industrial schools are declared to be the only centres of systematic industrial training in Ireland—

They are exclusively denominational, and some of the most successful work of persons who have devoted their lives to the cause of religion has been done in these institutions. Almost the only drawback to this limitation is that there has for several years been no reformatory in existence for Protestant girls, and any "young offender" of this class must of necessity be sent to prison. The industrial schools are rather more industrial and less penal than in England.

One wonders to find the Protestantism of Ulster so careless about saving young girls from the prison brand. If only the prison had been a Catholic convent, what tremendous efforts would have been made to provide a safe Protestant home for the first offender!

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY NEGLECTED.

These depreciatory observations concerning Irish education lead up to what the reviewer calls "a question of great interest in connection with the practical training of the Irish people—that of the extent to which the artistic genius of the Irish people may be capable of revival and practical application under a suitable system of industrial education":—

The high development of Irish art in the earlier Middle Ages is matter of common knowledge. But the Danish invasions and the Anglo-Norman Conquest put an end to the growth of native art in any direction. In Ireland the sword was never dry, and harsh or mistaken laws blighted what the sword did not destroy. Paradoxical as it may seem, it is really only since the Act of Union that Ireland has been free to follow her own bent and evolve an artistic and literary culture reflecting her own genius and circumstances. The manner in which she has treated the opportunity is very curious, and might well form the subject of a closer study than space permits us to give it here. Scotland, after her Act of Union, abandoned the conception of a political nationality, but developed an artistic and literary nationality, the products of which far surpassed anything she had originated under a purely Scottish government. Ireland, while persistently asserting her claim to the mere externals of nationality, has been far less concerned about her inward, her spiritual nationality, than either Scotland or Wales, which do not concern themselves about the externals at all. Since the Union, Ireland has shuffled off her ancient language, with its thousand years of history and its striking imaginative literature, with almost indecent haste. She has neglected the priceless treasure of her ancient national music, and her Western peasantry sing the music-hall songs of London. The Irish harp and the Irish pipes have given way to the banj and the concertina. The people have even in thousands of caseschanged their names, lest any trace of their Celtic nationality should cling to them.

Even "the Celtic Renaissance" has interested the English more than it has the Irish public. Dublin University has "not in the whole literature course a single work relating to the imaginative literature of Ireland, nor in the whole history course a single book upon any period of Irish history."

THE DUM-DUM BULLET.

THE Rifle is the subject of a most interesting historical sketch in the current Quarterly Review. The writer treats of its development, manufacture, ammunition. He touches on the genesis of the bullet which discussions at the Hague have made famous:—

The shape of the bullet is a matter of greater difficulty than might be imagined. In the first place, the bullet is slightly bigger than the bore of the rifle; and this, with the severity of the spiral, necessitates a jacket or outer covering of hard metal. otherwise the softer material would be blown through the barrel without taking the grooving—would strip, as it is technically called—and indeed would be partly softened by the heat from the explosive and from friction. Originally the jacket was thickest at the point, and so strong that, whilst penetration was enormous, stopping power was wanting; in other words, one bullet might easily go through half-a-dozen men, yet, unless it happened to hit a vital spot or a bone, they need not be disabled, and might therefore continue to fight. This was amply illustrated in the Chitral campaign, during which our soldiers began to lose confidence in their weapon; whilst the enemy, quick to recognise the different effect of volleys, were inclined to attack British infantry armed with the Lee-Metford rather than Native infantry armed with the Martini-Henry.

The Indian military authorities at once set about designing a bullet which, whilst maintaining range, should have the required stopping power. The result was the Dum-Dum bullet—so named after the place near Calcutta where it is made—of which much has been heard. The difference in appearance between it and the original pattern is comparatively slight. The shape is exactly the same, but the jacket is differently arranged; instead of having its greatest strength at the point, it is weakest there—indeed, at the apex a small part of the core is uncovered, but does not project. It was tried in India, and was said to give better results at one thousand yards than the bullet then in use.

On its alleged inhumanity, the reviewer remarks :-

Our primary requirement in a bullet is that it shall have sufficient stopping power, whether used against man or beast. The enemy, whether civilised or savage, must be stopped in his charge; more than this is not required, but less will not suffice. There must be no question of our right to efficient armament, and this should never be forgotten by our representative at any meeting where modifications of bullets or other parts of our armamy be proposed. It happens that with the development of the rifle, in order to secure efficiency at long range, the velocity of the bullet has become so great that very severe wounds at short range will sometimes be inflicted; nor is it possible to avoid this. All that need be said is that expert testimony from observation in the field tends to prove that the wounds from the Dum-Dum or the newest pattern of our rifle bullet are, if anything, less severe than those from the Martini-Henry, and very much less severe than those from the Snider.

"THE SUBCONSCIOUS HINDU MIND":

ITS MOST DISTINCTIVE IDEA.

DR. FAIRBAIRN gives in the Contemporary Review the second instalment of impressions derived from his tour in the East, under the title "Race and Religion in India." He confesses to the great difficulty of seeing things as the Hindu sees them. Yet he finds a singular identity of intellectual attitude among the diverse races and schools of India—an identity which he calls "the subconscious Hindu mind," which, as the creation of collective experience, "antedates personal experience, and determines the processes of the conscious reason." He distinguishes it from the subconscious mind of Europe by calling the latter a philosophical and the former a metaphysical mind. He traces the peculiarity of the Hindu mind to its being surrounded by a Nature which seemed from its exuberant fertility to have a sufficient reason for its being within itself: the creative power is felt to be immanent. On the other hand, "the religion Europe believes was born in the Syrian desert, and is possessed of the transcendentalism which found its occasion in the wilderness and its cause in the human

BRAHMA.

The writer thus essays to put in speech what he describes as "the most characteristic and inexorable of all Hindu ideas, the idea which has no counterpart in any Western system":—

If we could conceive matter without its mechanical properties and could construe it as a sort of metaphysical entity, an infinite homogeneous mass, capable, without losing its identity, of throwing off atoms, or conscious centres of force, each of which should be incapable of destruction but capable of absorption into the mass whence it had come-we should have an approximate idea of ultimate being as the Hindu conceives it. But the peculiarity of his idea does not lie so much in what we may term its noumenal as in its phenomenal form: the conscious atoms that undergo ceaseless transformations according to a law which their own actions at once constitute and administer. For the extraordinary and characteristic note of the Hindu mind is that it conceives its absolute Being as realised in space and time under the form of an absolute and self-governing individualism. Brahma stands at the beginning of phenomenal or individual existence, the impersonal source of all personal being; and he stands also at the end, the impersonal bosom, as it were, which receives the depersonalised; but what lies between is no concern of his, or rather of its, only of the detached or individuated atoms. Their acts are the providence which governs, and their successive states are the creations of their own wills. They issued into individual being without any choice of their own; but only by their own choice, or by repeated choices maintained through many forms of individual existence, can they return to impersonal existence in the source whence they came.

What most perplexes the European in the East is "the spontaneous and instinctive expression of its subconscious mind:" "it thinks without effort and as it were unconsciously, in the terms of what we have since Spinoza learned to call Pantheism."

ABSENCE OF HISTORICAL CRITICISM.

The writer assumes mostly the attitude of a docile and observant student in presence of a stupendous problem; but he remarks on "the indifference to history and the inaptitude for criticism" which the Hindu mind conjoins with unwearied speculative activity. He says :-

The two things I most expected to find in India were serious difference in metaphysical ideas and considerable agreement in the critical methods of European scholars. But the exact opposite was the case: there was more agreement in metaphysics than in the methods of literary or in the results of historical

He instances a Hindu sage who met all his distinctions between early and later Vedas with the invulnerable assumption that all the Vedas are eternal. Thus, he observes, "one learns to appreciate in India the extraordinary worth and force of ancient, foreign and secular classics in education."

MAETERLINCK ON THE MODERN DRAMA

Cornhill for August contains a paper by Maurice Maeterlinck on the modern drama. He remarks on the decay of exterior action. He rules out all attempts at an "impossible marriage of past and present"-of Greek legend or Romanticist adventure with modern thought. He declares :-

The modern drama has flung itself with delight into all the problems of contemporary morality, and it is fair to assert that at this moment it confines itself almost exclusively to the discussion of these different problems.

The movement was, he says, initiated by the dramas of A. Dumas fils, and reaches the loftiest point of human consciousness "-"the limit of the resources of modern dramaturgy "-in the dramas of Ibsen.

THE PASSING OF THE DRAMA.

But, argues the writer, with the growth of "the enlightened consciousness" the conflict of duties or interests out of which the drama springs will fade away :-

None of these sombre, blind and pitiless duties which so fatally impel mankind to death and disaster will readily take root in the consciousness that a healthy, living light has adequately penetrated; in such there will be no room for honour or vengeance, or conventions that clamour for blood. Prejudices that call for tears will no longer be found there, or the justice that demands unhappiness. The gods who insist on sacrifice, the love that asks for death, all these will have been dethroned, and when the sun has entered into the consciousness of him who is wise, as we may hope it will some day enter into the consciousness of all men, no duties will be discovered therein but one alone, which is, that it behoves us to do the least possible harm and the utmost good, and love others as we love ourselves; and from this duty no drama can spring.

THE VISION OF "A NEW THEATRE."

Love, then, is to be the end of the drama as well as the end of the law: yet only, apparently, of the drama as we have known it. The writer has a vision of a "new theatre," prophecies of which are present in the upward struggling soul of man

But until such time as the human consciousness shall contain more useful passions and fewer nefarious duties, and the theatre of the world shall consequently present to us more happiness and fewer tragedies, we must still recognise the existence, at this very moment, deep down in the hearts of all men of loyal intention, of a great duty of charity and justice which undermines all the others. And it is perhaps from the struggle of this duty against our egoism, indifference, and ignorance that the veritable drama of our century shall spring into being. Hauptmann has made the attempt in "Die Weber," Björnson in "Au delà des Forces," Mirbeau in "Les Mauvais Bergers," de Curel in "Le Repas du Lion," but all these very honourable endeavours notwithstanding, the achievement has been not yet. Once this gap has been bridged, on the stage as in actual life, it will be permissible perhaps to speak of a new theatre—a theatre of peace and happiness, and of beauty without tears.

MR. CHARLES SHELDON'S story, "For Christ and the Church," which is appearing in the Puritan, promises to be a sort of modern "Dialogues with Devils." The second instalment, in the August number, reports another interview between the parson and His Satanic Majesty.

TI an in cock who Ange the The Ad > itself, Her r young grand settle and s gainin she in is the all the At went childr the h

less 1

appea

artist's time s

duties

ing in The entire at Bar Adèle of the reply t she re subjec reflect tude o world ment be a gotten he sto artist s inspira

cordin

there

pretty

Mer

sidered posed) ings. peasan cottage her ha the di attemp picture "Ange from i sentime of the worker day, ce hour w

prayer

good t

feeling

tancy, t

MILLET'S MODEL.

THE Artist for July contains an interesting account by N. Peacock of Adèle Marier, the model who posed for Millet in "The Angelus," painted in 1859, when the peasant girl was eighteen. The writer says :-

Adèle Marier was born in Barbizon itself, and lived there all her life. Her mother dying when she was very young, Adèle was brought up by her grandfather, a Bohemian, who had settled in the small, unheard-of village, and started weaving as a means of gaining his livelihood. The house she inhabited, and in which she died, is the same long, low building where all the looms were kept.

At seventeen years of age Adèle went to Millet's to look after the children, and help the mistress of the house generally. It was doubtless her refined face and graceful appearance which appealed to the artist's sense of beauty, for from the time she first entered upon her lowly duties we constantly see her reappear-ing in his pictures.

The "Angelus" was painted almost entirely from notes in Millet's studio at Barbizon, yet, strange to say, Mère Adèle had no recollection whatever of the man who posed with her. In reply to my question she said quaintly, "C'était un homme," that was all she remembered. It seems a fitting subject for a melancholy train of reflections that the man whose attitude of prayer has gone forth to the world as the most beautiful monument of sweet resigned toil, should be a mere waif and stray, quite forgotten by the woman at whose side he stood for many hours while the artist sought to carry out his touching inspiration, and between whom, according to the natural order of things, there were the makings of a very pretty idyll.

Mere Adèle told me that she considered "L'Attente" (for which she posed) the best of her master's paint-Millet simply represented a peasant woman standing at her cottage door, screening her eyes with her hand, looking anxiously out into the distance, waiting-without any attempt at archæological detail. The picture is as full of feeling as the "Angelus," though differing greatly from it. In the latter the religious sentiment is evoked by the sounding of the bell which announces to the workers in the fields the close of the day, cessation of labour, the sunsethour when every true peasant offers up prayer and praise to the Giver of all good things. In "L'Attente" the feeling is that of the hush of expectancy, the strained quiet of the anxious

DOORWAY OF MILLET'S STUDIO. (Reproduced by permission from the Artist.)

erable is, he extraecular

ctions

aurice on the at an Greek ought. ill the rt that

amas uman odern

"the

ne dis-

es or ay :ich so y take ht has nonour iudices justice crifice, roned, n who e conein but as the na as " new pward ontain ossible e our-theatre ess and at this intennes all s duty ritable n has là des n "Le s not-

is gap

e perpeace

d the ses to econd inter-

JAPANESE LITERATURE.

IN Tilskueren for July, Dr. George Brandes has an interesting article on "Japanese Literature." The paper gives a comprehensive and critical review of Japanese poetry and prose from the earliest days, together with many examples of lyrical art and details as to the authors. Japan owes no debt of gratitude for progress and culture to Corea, which, unable to improve its own conditions, has had no sort of influence on the neighbouring State. Deep and lasting, on the other hand, has been the culture influence which China has exercised over Japan since the year 400, standing in the same position with regard to its history of civilisation as Greece and Rome do to our own, while India, again, has been to it what Palestine has been to Europe. For from India about the year 600, Buddhism was brought into the country, displacing the old Shinto religion, as Christianity displaced the former religions of Europe.

EARLY CULTURE.

The first book written in the Japanese language, and preserved to posterity, is the Kojiki, a book of chronicles, containing the oldest myths that form the groundwork of the Shinto religion, and which becomes more and more historical up to the date at which it concludes, the year 628. Already in 670 there were schools all over the country, and only a little later a University was founded at which the students were taught history, Chinese classics, law, and mathematics. Japan was therefore a long way ahead of Europe in the matter of general culture. The Japs of those days were also well a lyanced in painting, sculpture and mathematics. Buddha was in need of magnificent temples, and the famous colossal bronze statue of Ruddha at Nara belongs to those far distant days.

THEIR POETRY.

Japanese poetry can be traced back to the seventh century. It is in many ways different from ours, and has much narrower limits. It can boast no "Iliad," no "Divine Comedy," no narrative poem, no philosophical, political, or satirical verse. Dramatic poetry came into existence in the fourteenth century, but reached no height, and has nothing to commend it. Japanese poetry is, in fact, lyrical only, and so brief that we might call it epigrammatic. It consists of small bits, either expressing some emotion or describing nature. It is verse in praise of love and wine, expressive of longing or sorrow, descriptive of the murmur of brooks, the snow on the mountain-top, bird-song, moonlight, flowers, rain and wind. But of sunset and of starlight the Japanese poet never speaks.

And poor as the Japs are in choice of subject, yet poorer are they in forms of yersification. Their orthography would limit them to five rhymes, so they prefer no rhyme at all, and the uniform length of their syllables robs them of rhythm. The one thing that distinguishes poetry from prose in the Japanese language is the alternate use in the former of verses of five and seven syllables. A tanka, the most frequently used form of poetry, consists of five lines of five, seven, five, seven, and seven syllables
-thirty-one syllables in all. This makes a whole poem; and from the seventh century to the present day Japanese poetry has been confined to this narrow form, compared to which our sonnet, as Dr. Brandes says, is an epos. Even to-day the Mikado gives his courtiers each new year certain subjects to put into tankas. For the Japanese poets, be it noted, are all of rank, or at any rate of the upper classes. There are no humble lyrists. And amongst the bards are as many women as men. The art of writing verse is a dainty and aristocratic accomplishment. But books are never published by any one author. Instead, the Mikado causes collections to be made of the best poems written during a given period; and one such anthology from the beginning of the ninth century furnishes us with four thousand poems.

The Japs are of a strongly rational turn of mind. Even in poetry they dislike metaphor. They never personify qualities or ideas. This would seem to show the same peculiarity of character which has hindered them from having either portrait-painting or monumental sculpture. The personal has no charm for them. They are, on the other hand, much given to rhetoric.

POSITION OF WOMEN.

Feminine influence on the intellectual life of Japan waned when the Mikado lost power and the Shoguna, or secular emperor, took the reins. With the new order came new morals. Fealty became the chief virtue; and absolute devotion and blind obedience the most sacred duty. A favourite hero in Japanese history and romance was Nakamitsu, who murdered his innocent son, and offered his head in place of that of the Emperor's son, who had been found guilty of some crime punishable by Revenge was also a sacred duty, and was a glorified theme in Japanese poetry and romance of that day, as in certain Icelandic sagas, or as love is in our own European novels. As Chinese ideas crept in and woman's influence waned, religion declined, and purity was chiefly understood to mean the refusal of a widow to re-enter the married state. Prostitution, for instance, was allowable and even laudable in the case of a young girl with poor parents to support or help; and the courtesan became the glorified heroine of every novel.

In 1867 came the great revolution, overthrowing the Shoguna, and once more giving power to the Mikado. The English language was introduced, and European culture with it; railways were laid; law, army, navy, educational system, telegraphy, all were reformed after European models. The first newspaper was published in 1872. At the end of 1894, in spite of a strong censorship, there were no fewer than 814 newspapers and magazines. Then came translations of European books; first, Smiles' "Self-Help" and Mill's "Liberty," then the works of Kant and Spencer. "Ernest Maltravers" was the first European novel introduced into Japan, and met with great success. Fénelon's "Télémaque" and "Robinson Crusoe" were translated as moral books. Fénelon's "Télémaque" and As merely light literature "The Three Musketeers," "Don Quixote," and the works of Rider Haggard and Jules Verne are exceedingly popular.

LATEST WRITERS.

The newest Japanese authors, belonging to the Progressive party, are influenced by both Japanese and European literature. Sudo Nansui in one of his books sandwiches Japanese writers between the European ones he mentions, thus: Lytton, Bakin, Scott, Tanehiko, Hugo, Shunsui, Dickens and Ikku. He absolutely worships the political novel. The heroine of Nansui's novel, "Modern Women" (1887), which depicts Tokio as it will be when it has become a modern industrial town, is a charming dairymaid. This occupation does not denote humble position, but the reverse, as up to the present day cow's milk has never been used as food in Japan, and only a highly educated lady would dare to set at defiance the prejudice against its use as nourishment for humans.

MR. HUDSON MAXIM tells "the story of smokeless powder" from its beginning to the present time, with several amusing illustrations in Cassier's for July.

a n in was ren stor he " D

pres unc eith con his con nate hop he juda be a part muc nob A Pitc affe for : uter

7

N

Yor occ: Too with D foun of ti note pass Arcl pock Pres no a "Is are!

a ca 66 Cor seve

W

is or H app: "ne was mast "set name

STORIES FROM THE MAGAZINES.

C. W. HECKETHORN strings together in Gentleman's a number of anecdotes about "the Old Doctors." Here is one touching Dr. George Fordyce, who came to London in 1762:—

Unfortunately he was given to drink, and though he never was known to be dead drunk, yet he was often in a state which rendered him unfit for professional duties. One night when he was in such a condition he was suddenly sent for to attend a lady of title who was very ill. He went, sat down, listened to her story, and felt her pulse. He found he was not up to his work; he lost his wits, and in a moment of forgetfulness exclaimed— "Drunk, by Jove!" Still, he managed to write out a mild prescription. Early next morning he received a message from his noble patient to call on her at once. Dr. Fordyce felt very uncomfortable. The lady evidently intended to upbraid him either with an improper prescription or with his disgraceful condition. But to his surprise and relief she thanked him for his prompt compliance with her pressing summons, and then confessed that he had rightly diagnosed her case-that unfortunately she occasionally indulged too freely in drink, but that she hoped he would preserve inviolable secrecy as to the condition he had found her in. Fordyce listened to her as grave as a judge, and said: "You may depend upon me, madam; I shall be as silent as the grave."

Two other oddities may be quoted :-

A doctor, I forget his name, having obtained some mark of distinction from the Company of Apothecaries, mentioned at a party that the glorious Company of Apothecaries had conferred much honour on him. "But,' said a lady, "what about the noble army of martyrs of patients?"

A famous physician of St. Bartholomew's was Dr. David Pitcairn, who died in 1809. It is said that he was occasionally affected in his speech; thus he is reported to have asked a lady for a pinch of snuff in the following terms: "Madam, permit me to immerse the summits of my digits in your pulveriferous utensil, to excite a grateful titillation of my olfactory nerves."

SHAMMING DRUNK? OH, NO!

Mrs. Tooley contributes a sketch of the Archbishop of York to the Lady's Realm for August. Dr. Maclagan occasionally travels third-class, it appears, and Mrs. Tooley tells how narrowly he once escaped serious trouble with fellow-passengers:—

During one of his journeys about the diocese, Dr. Maclagan found himself in a railway-carriage with two drunken men. One of them complained that he had been robbed of a five-pound note, and was determined to search the pockets of his fellow-passengers. "I began to feel very uncomfortable," says the Archbishop, "as I happened to have a five-pound note in my pocket. However, I determined to sit quietly and feign sleep. Presently came the challenge: 'I say, neighbour!' But I made no answer. Then the man grabbed me by the arm and shook me violently, but I did not wake up. He kept on shaking, but still I remained impassive. Then his friend interposed with: 'I say, Bill, leave him alone, can't you? He drunker'n you are!'"

Would naturalists describe the prelate's appearance as a case of "protective mimicry"?

A MERCIFULLY LONG PSALM.

"Fra' Auld Lang Syne" is the title of a paper in Cornhill, in which Mr. F. B. Harrison gathers together several stories, hoary perhaps, but fresh to some. Here is one:—

Humour can hardly be expected on a scaffold, and, when it appears in such a scene, is usually somewhat grim. It was hardly humour which suggested the very lengthiest possible "neck-verse" to Montrose's chaplain. This unfortunate cleric was condemned to death as a punishment for his devotion to his master. Arrived at the place of execution, he was ordered to "set out a psalm." Even now he expected a reprieve; so he named the Hundred and nineteenth Psalm, which was cordially taken up by the Presbyterian officials present. "And it was well for him that he did so, for they had sung it three parts through before the reprieve came. Any other psalm would have hanged him."

ANOTHER "HANGING" JOKE.

The date given to the next old story suggests that originality can hardly be claimed for the witticism of one of the signers of the American Declaration of Independence—"If we don't hang together, we shall all hang separately." This is the incident cited by the writer—"certainly humorous, whether it be fact or fiction":—

A Scotch parson, in the great Rebellion, said in his canting prayer, "Lord, bless the Grand Council, the Parliament, and grant that they may all hang together." A country fellow, standing by, said, "Amen, with all my heart, and the sooner the better; and I'm sure 'tis the prayer of all good people," "Friends," says the parson, "I don't mean as that fellow means; but pray that they may all hang together in accord and concord." "No matter what cord," answered the ru-tic, "so 'tis a strong cord."

"AN UNSUSPECTED ISLE IN FAR-OFF SEAS."

Pursuing her "Colonial Memories" in Cornhill, Lady Broome tells of a strange kind of honeymoon resort, more of the type that poets dream of than matter-of-fact young couples generally select:—

There are many islets, some five miles or more away from Trinidad, and towards the Bocas or mouths of the great river. These little islands are a great feature of Trinidad, and splendid places for change of air or excursions. They all have houses on them, and one tiny islet may, I think, claim to be the smallest spot of earth which holds a dwelling. It is just a rock, on the top of which is perched a small but comfortable and compact house. Beyond its outer wall is, on one side, a minute plateau about ten or twelve feet in length, and that is all the exerciseground on the island. I was assured it was the favourite honeymoon resort, which certainly seemed putting the capabilities of companionship of the newly-married couple to a rather severe test! Fishing, boating, and bathing are the resources at the command of the islet visitors, and the air is wonderfully fresh and cool on these little fragments of the earth's surface. Whenever I could make time it was my great delight to take the Government launch with tea and a party of young friends to one of these islets, and it was certainly a delightful way of spending a hot afternoon.

THE IRISH CULT OF MATTER IN THE WRONG PLACE.

Mrs. Orman Cooper supplies many instances, in the Nineteenth Century for August, of what she calls "The Humours of Ter-na-Nog," otherwise the "Land of the Young," which is an ancient name for treland. The following incident suggests that if cleanliness be next to godliness the Isle of Saints has still a step to take:—

"Granny the Thimbleman," is a woman, lives in a ditch, and probably never heard of the feminine utensil signalised in her name. She knits woollies for the "quality," and confesses to exist on "cold purtaties and point." Granny was once offered, by a courageous English visitor, a shilling to wash herself, "Gould" would have been refused coupled with such an "unnathural" condition.

"I've heerd ov' washin' a corpse, but never ov' washin' a live wan," was her remark as she turned indignantly away.

I have said that dirt is a giant hard to fight in the beautiful land of Ter-na-nog. The woman who had never heard of "washin' a live wan" is, I think, equalled by another who came to me lately about her sore leg.

"They tell me, doctor darlint, that washin' might scotch the heat out of it! But I wouldn't adventure to do it without askin' your advice. Not for the worlds. I'm an ould woman now, doctor dear, an' a drop of water has never gone near my body."

I advised a goodly supply of aqueous fluid, preceded by a thorough application of alkali and potash in the form of soap, and the old woman hobbled off quite satisfied with my scientific words.

by

ions

ven

g of ms.

ven

nify

ame

rom

ure.

the pan

, or der

and

red

nce

and

on.

by

s a hat

our

and rity

to ice,

ing

the

the

do.

ean

vy,

ter

red

or-

nd

S:

the

vas

net

nd

ks.

'S."

nd

ro-

nd

ks

ies

go,

he

ern

en

ng

ble w's

a

he 985

ith

HOUSING THE CITY TOILER:

WHAT THE GUINNESS TRUST HAS DONE.

MR. C. S. BREMNER contributes to the Fortnightly a paper overflowing with facts and inferences about "London Buildings." Out of this storehouse of information, almost bewildering in its profusion of material, may be selected the story of the Guinness Trust, as an illustration of rehousing the labourer with philanthropic purpose and making it pay:—

The Guinness Trust began operations in 1889. Sir E. C. Guinness (Lord Iveagh) gave £200,000 for the purpose of providing good working-class dwellings in London, besides £50,000 for Dublin. The Goldsmiths' Company added £25,000 to the first sum in 1893. The trustees would seem to have been wise stewards of that which was entrusted to them, for now the capital fund stands at £298,000, £73,000 of this having been derived from rents and investments. The net income, after making a contribution to the depreciation and contingency fund, was £8,600 in 1898. This would seem to confirm the opinion expressed by Dr. Elgin Gould, who, in his report for Mr. Carroll D. Wright, the American Commissioner of Labour, states that money invested in housing the working classes is remunerative, yielding a sure, safe, and stable return, and that there is absolutely no reason why every working man in receipt of a fair wage should not have a "favourable living environment." His opinion is of unique value, as he personally visited many of the great cities of Europe and America to report upon what was being done.

The Guinness Trust is filled with youthful enthusiasm, and undertakes successfully what a few years ago no company would have dreamt of. The arrangements are astonishingly complete. One of the latest Guinness buildings, at Page's Walk, Bermondsey, illustrates admirably what will doubtless soon come to be the essentials of tenements erected where cubic feet are counted with parsimonious care. The four buildings are of handsome appearance, and show that decoration has not been completely disregarded. The courtyards lying between are respectable, though they do not quite fulfil the recent requirements of the London Building Act. The wide staircases are lined with excellent glazed white tiles. . . In every court there is a supply of hot water for household purposes; at stated intervals, boiling water for breakfast and tea. All walls are distempered, buildings fireproof. The little cooking-range uses a minimum of fuel, and gives out a maximum of heat; there is a wardrobe in the bedroom, or in the living-room if the tenement is oneroomed; excellent arrangements exist for ventilation. The coal-bunker has two flaps; one in the middle to be used when it is full, one on the ground to be used when the supply is running out. There are baths with hot and cold water, to be used by men and boys on stated nights when the porter is in attendance, by women and children when the porter's wife is on Every tenant can see a clock in his courtyard, over, there is a club, with papers, chess, dominoes, and in this particular one a piano has been added. Penny-in-the-slot gasmeters are supplied in a certain block to those who want them. A teacher of a neighbouring Board School observed that her children had improved in appearance since the opening of Page's Walk Buildings, but whether cleanliness results from better conditions, or whether the clean seek out such buildings, is not quite easy to determine. In all the Guinness Buildings small sheds can be had for stowing perambulators and boxes at the modest rental of a weekly penny. Rents are moderate, a three-roomed tenement costing from 4s. to 5s. 3d. per week. To this must be added 6d. (3d. for a one-roomed tenement) weekly charged for blinds, bath-room, club-room, chimneysweeping, hot water.

The Guinness Trust are very strict not to accept as tenant a man earning a higher wage than 25s. The latest report states that the average weekly earnings of each family were 18s. 14d. On receipt of an application for a tenement the applicant must state his wage on a form, and the management go so far as to verify the statement: a form is sent to his employer, who fills in the amount of wage.

HAMPOTIAN STERN PARAMETER PROGRAMMENT AND STEEL PROGRAMMENT AND ST

LONDON according to the London Government Act (1899) to consist of 28 boroughs and (still) one City.

of the

Ai the i

Ang

hum
I to ex
I Secre
Fu India
ordin
As marat to be native Fin Moha Thi Rit Britis

one-s price

yet it

abroa the 1 furth been the (which There Our fi of on restori of reci at lib foreign circun elastic all cou

Empir Interi

Kar tells to princi outlin minist to rec Cabin paper

all the Wester months

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THE August number is scarcely up to the high average of the Contemporary. Dr. Fairbairn on Hindu Pantheism and Mr. W. Durban on the transformation of Siberia demand separate treatment, as also Mr. Dunn's strange stories of fishes and their seven senses.

THE DOGMAS OF THE ANGLO-INDIAN.

An amusing satire of the official mind concerned with the management of our Eastern Empire is entitled "The Anglo-Indian Creed," by "a Heretic." After much goodhumoured raillery, the writer sums up its articles:—

I believe that long residence in India alone qualifies any one to express an opinion on any Indian question.

I believe that all interference, whether from the Indian Secretary or from debates in Parliament, is pernicious.

Furthermore, no external criticism is to be tolerated on any Indian official, either in the Press or on the platform or inordinary conversation.

As I believe that Lord Ripon and his works are anathema maranatha, so am I bound to confess that the forward policy is to be practised.

And though it be lawful to regard missionaries with toleration, yet it is essential for a right faith to believe that of all natives native Christians are the worst.

Finally, for complete orthodoxy, it should be allowed that Mohammedans are in all ways superior to Hindus.

This is the true Anglo-Indian faith.

COBDEN A FOOL.

Ritortus in his second paper on the Imperialism of British Trade denounces in the name of Free Trade the one-sided system introduced by Cobden. It has lowered prices and reduced profits at home and driven our capital abroad. The consequent tribute which comes back to the British foreign investor in increased imports still further cuts out British products. Our agriculture has been ruined, our manufactures are following suit: and the Government has stood "paralysed under the spell which was worked upon all England by one fool!" Therefore—

Our first duty will be to defend it (our trade) against the inroads of one-sided Free Trade and of one-sided pawn trade, by restoring perfect Free Trade, reciprocity, and equality by means of reciprocal and countervailing duties. That done, we shall be at liberty to arrange our commercial intercourse with each foreign country or with each colony according to the peculiar circumstances of the case. We might hereby create a great elastic commercial system working in harmony with the interests of all countries concerned. We might thereby ensure to our World-Empire the conditions of a sound and healthy growth.

Internal reforms would then be possible.

CHINA'S REFUGEE REFORMER.

Kang Yeu Wei writes on the "Reform of China," and tells the story of the recent coup detat. He gives the principal contents of his "Memorial to the Emperor," or outline of suggested reforms. He advocated a body of ministers pledged to a reform policy; a memorial office to receive proposals and to interview memorialists; a Cabinet with twelve departments of State under it. The paper concludes with the characteristic lament:—

All reforms were reversed and reformers put in bonds; thus all the Empire became dumb, and dared not speak about Western ways. This has now gone on for more than six months. Whoever speaks of Western ways is regarded as a dangerous man, and persons look up and down the road lest they should be found out, and China is thus bound to old ways more than ever. It only leans on Russia, and in this way allows itself to be easily divided up and ruined. Alas!

LIGHT RAILWAYS AND TRAMWAYS.

Mr. Robert Donald calls attention to the growth of what he terms a new tramway monopoly. It springs from a misuse of the Light Railways Act. He says:—

Light railways, left undefined in the Act, have become synonymous with tramways, and are being promoted chiefly in urban districts. Instead of relieving distressed agriculture, they are enriching joint-stock companies. The chief object aimed at by the promoters is not to put the country districts in communication with the markets in the towns, but to join one town to another and take over the tramways in each. The Light Railways Act of 1896 is supplanting the Tramways Act of 1870.

There is no purchase clause for light railways. There are no obligations as to width, upkeep and local control of roadways. "An alien money power takes possession of the streets of a town without paying anything for the privilege." Happily, the Light Railways Act expires in 1901. "In the meantime, the best way that municipal authorities can preserve their interest in tramways is to take advantage of the Light Railways Act themselves."

The Countess Martinengo Cesaresco contributes a fine study of "Nature in the Last Latin Poets."

THE AUSTRALASIAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE June number is all alive and athrill with the prospect of the referendum on Federation. There is a sheaf of last messages from leading Australian statesmen, urging the voters to do their duty at the polls. Federation and the Australian cricketers in England appear to be the two absorbing interests of the hour. The Birthday honours for the Chief Justice of South Australia and the Mayor of Sydney excite the remark that "the omission to confer distinction upon any Australian politicians inevitably suggests to the cynical that applicants have been many and eager, and the task of selection invidious." The acting-editor regrets the little interest taken by Australians in the Pacific problem, and calls attention to Germany's steady policy of encroachment in that ocean. The Hon. R. W. Best, Minister for Lands in Victoria, records impressions of his tour in New Zealand. He was surprised to learn that there were many instances of Maori men, and women too, who were educated at the ordinary high schools, and who adopted for years English habits and customs, going back to their old Maori habits and mode of life. One young woman whom we met had done so." He reports that persons of mixed descent are proud both of their English and their Maori blood. He is impressed by the general prosperity prevailing in New Zealand.

To a very excellent number of the Atlantic Monthly Mr. Mark H. Liddell, treating of the right approach to English Literature, offers this as his definition:—

Literature is that part of recorded human thought which possesses, or has possessed, a more or less general and abiding human interest.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THERE is plenty of varied reading in the August number, but few articles of eminent interest.

LIMITATIONS OF NAVIES.

Sir G. S. Clark discusses "The Limitations of Naval Force." He calls attention to another phase of the age-long duel between boat and wheel when he says:—

Sea-borne trade has increased enormously in importance and volume, gaining steadily in speed and safety of transit; but land communications have received an incomparably greater development. The distribution of trade is now largely a matter of railways, which are exerting a powerful influence upon the commercial systems of the world, and changing what may be called their strategic centres. Directly and indirectly, railways threaten the sphere of influence of sea power.

His finding is :-

The conclusion seems inevitable that our sea power, relatively and absolutely more potent for the defence of the Empire, is distinctly less capable of exerting decisive pressure upon an enemy, and therefore of bringing a great war to a conclusion.

He closes with a hint as to the effect of the influence of the location of great stores of coal on the commercial and naval future.

WHY ARE BRAINS DETERIORATING?

Colonel H. Elsdale asks this question, accepting the fact of deterioration on the authority of Mr. Gladstone and other experts. His answer is that we are cultivating the receptive at the expense of the creative faculty in our higher and lower education. Against a Benagalee Baboo in our competitive examinations, he says, a young Shakespeare or Bismarck or Darwin would stand no chance. Nervous impatience is another cause which shows itsel in shorter sermons, tit-bits, popular magazines, and so forth, which tend to the dissipation of brain energy and make concentration largely impossible. Democracy in politics and industry tends towards mediocrity. The writer hopes for some great genius or great world movement to intervene and save us.

THE WOMEN'S CONGRESS CRITICISED.

Miss Frances Low contributes "A Woman's Criticism of the Women's Congress," and she certainly does not spare her sisters. The majority of the discussions, she says, were of a futile kind, characterised by wild notions and a complete and fatal want of any central principle. She is especially severe on the discussion of the servant girl problem, on the ethics of wage-earning, and the disparagement of home life:—

The general effect of the Congress was misleading and mischievous because it was not representative and impartial; in the professions the experiences of successful women only were given; the life of the average journalist or actress, with its struggles, its sordid anxieties, its overwork and underpay, was never referred to, there being a universal conspiracy to represent woman's wage-earning work as wholly desirable and beneficial. Because also large statements about woman's equility, equal pay, and so forth, mean nothing at all unless they are carried to their logical conclusion, and tested by their practical and permanent effect upon Society. So that to know whether wage-earning is desirable for married working women, we ought to have the joint testimony of working men and women as to whether present experiments in wage-earning of this kind are satisfactory; and to know where the practical difficulties of the servant question lie, we ought to have the views of persons actually concerned—of fathers of the working class, who prefer their daughters going into factories, of servants themselves, and of middle-class householders of small means.

A PLEA FOR NEWFOUNDLAND.

Sir William Des Voeux, formerly Governor of Newfoundland, rehearses the history of the connection of England with Newfoundland, and after going over the interminable Treaty Shore question urges the incorporation of Newfoundland with Canada, which would, he says, put an end to the indifference with which the interests of the former have been treated:—

Negotiations with this object have hitherto failed mainly on a question of money; and the difference between what Newfoundland was willing to accept and that which Canada off-red, though a considerable sum, is incomparably less than the debt which is morally due to our oldest Colony. If England were to assist with this sum, it is probable that there might still be accomplished that complete Confederation of British North America which Her Majesty's Government have always considered as desirable. When the claims of Newfoundland become more generally appreciated, it may be hoped that the national conscience will demand the payment of at least this compensation for three centuries of wrongs.

A BYRON MYSTERY.

Mr. Frederick L. Gower raises the question "Did Byron Write Werner?" and undertakes to show by circumstantial evidence that Byron was not the author of Werner, but that it was written by the writer's grandmother, the Duchess of Devonshire. His sister, Lady Georgina Fullerton, told him that the Duchess wrote the poem, and gave the MS. to her niece, Lady Caroline Ponsonby, and that she some years later handed it over to Lord Byron, who subsequently published it in his own name. The motive suggested is the sordid one of raising money.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Field-Marshal Sir L. Simmons writes on "The Excessive Armaments of Russia." He is angry with the editor of the St. Petersburg Herald, who invited him to give his opinion on the English military system with a view to its reform. He replies by suggesting the Russian army as a more suitable subject for the investigations of the St. Petersburg Herald. He asserts that Russia is the only one of the great military powers who could reduce her forces to a vast extent without the slightest risk. He admits the sincerity of the Tsar, but says he is held in leading-strings by designing statesmen. Mr. Michael MacDonagh contributes an interesting study of "The Evolution of the Parliamentary Oath," showing how it began in 1563 in the reign of Elizabeth, and was successively extended and accentuated, subsequently modified and reduced, until it is now the simplest of formulas. He advocates its abolition, as it expresses no other obligations than those which, oath or no oath, devolve upon every subject. No oath or affirmation is required of any member of either the French or German legislature. Mr. Arthur D. Milne gives a somewhat supersensitive account of the worries attaching to life on the Nile south of Fashoda. Professor Mahaffy scornfully denounces "The Recent Fuss about the Irish Language," the revival of which he considers would be a calamity. Dr. St. George Mivart asks: "What Church has Continuity?" and applies tests which the Anglican will not relish. Mr. W. J. Stillman writes on "The Decameron and its Villas," endeavouring to identify the localities which Boccaccio describes as the scenes of the telling of his famous tales. Mr. Edmund Robertson, M.P., insists as against Sir Sidney Sheppard that there is no casus belli in South Africa.

relato and thes Dr. Err Klo

dec Mc Root If t not a g mon say A Uni men of J in I oper field inte esta cour app mak in a

Chi

the wish refo which that the Chinati aggr H

gat ster the inte but Thu que con P who Bois with incr

1

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THERE is little sign in the National Review of the relaxed tension in public affairs which we are accustomed to associate with August. It is as strenuous and alert and eager as if it came out in mid-winter, and not in these sultry heats. Special notice has been given to Dr. Fitchett's view of the South African crisis, Mr. Ernest Williams's "Study in Booms," suggested by Klondike, "Ignotus's "discussion of the Franco-German rapprochement, and Miss Edith Sellers on an Austrian "Open-Air Reformatory."

AMERICA'S FIRST FOREIGN STATE LOAN.

Mr. A. Maurice Low, reviewing the month in America, declares that there is not a cloud upon President McKinley's political horizon; his re-nomination is certain. Roosevelt will not be a Presidential candidate till 1904. If the boom in trade lasts another year, McKinley has nothing to fear at the polls; otherwise Mr. Bryan has a good fighting chance, and the issue will again be the monetary standard. Passing to finance, Mr. Low says:—

Among other things this marvellous year has witnessed in the United States has been the placing of the first foreign Government loan, a task now being undertaken by the banking house of J. P. Morgan and Co., who, with the aid of their associates in London and Berlin, are converting the Mexican debt from a 6 to a 5 per cent. loan. The approval given to this financial operation by the Press shows that America is glad to enter this field; and a foreign loan, if the security is fairly good and the interest is not too low, and is vouched for by a house of established reputation, is sure to be readily subscribed for in this country. Russia could not find a more propitious moment to appear in the United States as a borrower, and if she does not make use of her opportunity now she will not have such another in a decade.

EGYPTIANIZING THE YANGTSZE VALLEY.

Mr. R. A. Yerburgh, M.P., writing on our duty to China, sums it up in what he calls the "Egyptianizing of the Yangtsze Valley." He disclaims all intention of annexation, and says:—

We are already overburdened with territory, and no man can wish to add to its extent. No, in assisting in the task of reforming the administration of the Yangtsze region upon lines which have been so brilliantly successful in Egypt, my view is that we should be adopting the one course which would tend to the infusion of new and vigorous life into the decrepit body of China which would, by renewing her youth and arousing a national spirit, give her sufficient strength to repel foreign aggression and hold her vast Empire together.

He presses for reforms in the Army, the Code of Law, and in Finance. He estimates that the land tax, as gathered from the tax-payers, amounts to eighteen millions sterling; but only three and three-quarter millions reach the hands of the Imperial Government. The likin on internal trade ought to yield nearly fourteen millions; but just a little over two millions is exactly received. Thus tax and likin show a leakage of at least twenty-five millions sterling annually.

THE MOTIVE OF THE ANTI-DREYFUSITES.

The editor, in his Episodes of the Month, answers the question often raised—What could be the motive of the conspiracy against Dreyfus? He says:—

Prominent members of the French Headquarters Staff, all of whom, remember, are miserably underpaid, from General de Boisdeffre, with his £1000 a year, down to Commandant Henry with his £200, were engaged in 1894, as for years past, in nereasing their incomes by selling confidential information to he foreign military attaches in Paris, of whom Major von Schwarzkoppen (as he then was), representing Germany, was the most important. Esterhazy acted as outside broker. Usluckily, some one in the swim—probably Colonel Cordier—had seen the bordereau, which Esterhazy had left for Major von Schwarzkoppen in the ordinary course of business, together with the packet of documents enumerated therein . . . To save Esterhazy, whose detection would have involved their own exposure, it was imperative to fasten this compromising document upon some one who would act as "a lightning conductor," in Mr. Conybeare's expressive phrase. Dreyfus was selected because, being a Jew, he would rouse the frenzy of the Anti-Semites, who at that time were rather grav-lled for matter

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. F. C. Conybeare invokes the memory of Jean Calas as the text for renewed invective against the Anti-Dreyfusites. Major Darwin reviews the progress of British expansion in West Africa, and holds that our aim must now be not to extend but to develop our territories. The editor in his chroniques somewhat prematurely pronounces the exclusion of women from the borough councils to be the end of Woman Suffrage, and adds that "To have knocked both Home Rule and Woman Suffrage on the head in the same decade is no mean achievement for the 'doomed' branch of the legislature."

GAINS AND LOSSES FROM KLONDIKE.

THE author of "Made in Germany" (Mr. Ernest E. Williams) contributes to the National Review what he calls "Klondike: a Study in Booms." He endeavours to compute the gain to the world's wealth which has been derived from Klondike, and to enter on the other side the losses it has caused. He quotes several estimates, and concludes: "Up to the end of 1898, therefore, it is safe to say that Klondike has not furnished the world with more than three and three-quarter millions' worth of gold." On the other side he cites Miss Flora Shaw:—

that up to the 1898 season thirty thousand persons went to, or started for, Klondike, and that less than a seventh of their number got any gold out of the district at all. And it is doubtful if more than a small portion of these four thousand adventurers cleared their expenses. The other twenty-six thousand certainly did not. And it is estimated on the same authority that, in spite of the roughnous and privations of their lives, the thirty thousand pilgrims paid in the aggregate at least ten millions sterling for their pilgrimage. It seems rather a poor piece of business, to put ten millions into a concern, and to get out less than four millions; for, even supposing that a lot more gold is taken out of Klondike in the future, the getting thereof will always entail great expense, so that, unless the life of the Yukon mines is very prolonged and very fruitful, it is not at all likely that the six millions of capital already sunk will, after deducting future working expenses, be returned to the world.

He puts on the other side the terrible sufferings which have been endured, and the loss to the world involved in the withdrawal from productive pursuits of the pioneering energies of 30,000 robust men. The Canadian Government has lost, not gained over Klondike, and the prospect of the Gold Region ultimately being used for agricultural or pasture land, he dismisses as out of the question. He concludes that if Klondike had not given forth one ounce of gold to the world, the world would not have been appreciably poorer. He makes the blue book published by Mr. Ogiwie, the Canadian Government Commissioner of the Yukon, principally responsible for this boom.

"SOME Poets in Love" is the theme of what is perhaps the principal paper in Temple Bar for August.

ew-

the

ra-

lys.

s of

n a ndred.

lebt

e to

be orth

on-

and

hat

this

oid

by

of

ddv

he

ne

er

vn

of

he

he

to

a

of

is

ce

le

el

ie

RS

ly

of 10

re

d

1-

r-

e

y,,,

11

e

of

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE current number of the Quarterly has in it plenty of variety and plenty of life. It will probably be chiefly famous for its onslaught on Sir George Trevelyan's "American Revolution" and its unflattering account of the Fathers of the United States. That and two or three other articles claim separate notice.

HOW THE REICHSBANK UNIFIES GERMANY.

A most instructive paper on banking tells us that the deposits in the banks of the United States "amount to very nearly eleven hundred and fifty millions sterling, with capital and reserves of £350,000,000 more." The American Comptroller reckons the banking resources of his country at about £20 a head; those of the United Kingdom work out at about £25 or £28 a head, according as we include or not the deposits of our savings banks. The Bank of France holds in gold about £70,000,000 or £80,000,000—more than twice the holding of gold in the Bank of England. The figure for the Bank of Germany is nearly £30,000,000. A special facility offered by this Bank is worth mentioning :

By the arrangements of the Bank of Germany, money may be paid in to the credit of any person who has an account at an office of the Bank of Germany at any other office throughout the empire, and it is placed to the credit of that person without There is no need for the person who makes the payment to have an account with the office through which payment is made, and no charge is made for the transaction. The assistance which this facility for the transmission of money gives to business is exceedingly great, especially when we consider the distances to be covered. Thus the payment of a debt in Memel, close to the boundary of Russia, may be made at Hamburg, and a like service can be rendered between an inhabitant of Kiel, close to Denmark, and one of Constance, close to Switzer-

HOW THE FRENCH BECAME GOOD COOKS.

The art of dining is a theme well handled by a writer who explains why the French beat the English in the French and English started fair in the Darker Ages; but the English, safe from invasion after the Conquest, even through the ferment of their civil strife, lived in tolerable plenty. On the other hand, distracted France was frequently reduced to extremity of famine. It is impossible to exaggerate the misery of the lower orders under the exactions of the Crown and the Barons, when the land was being ravaged by Shearers and Flayers. Dire necessity was the mother of strange resource; the starved peasant took to dressing snakes and frogs, snails and beetles: for his pot-herbs he gathered docks and nettles from the ditches; he scrambled for acorns and beech-mast with the swine of his seigneur, and threw scruples to the winds. Everywhere the rustic was learning the first principles of cookery in the hardest of schools, and the burghers in the cities, constantly besieged, enjoyed almost equal advantages. They made salmis of rats, and fricassies of mice; they feasted on horses, cats, and dogs; they became experts in the manipulation of carrion. interesting to note the almost identical effect of similar influences north of the Tweed.

Poverty as a school of cookery is possibly a new idea to many readers.

WHAT MODERN MYSTICISM AMOUNTS TO.

A study of modern mysticism leads up to the following

The novi homines of our modern Renaissance bring us back again from Aristotle to Plato, from the study of outward things and the systematised knowledge of them to the contemplation of the mysterious beauty and the latent unseen forces which they envelop or conceal. The point wherein they differ from the religious mystics is this, that their obscure perceptions are rather in the nature of psychical research than spiritual experience; that they are concerned with the natural rather than the supernatural in their "introspective hunting for the soul of things.

Assigning, then, to modern mysticism its proper place in the continuity of the movement as a whole, we may say that so far as it represents the mystical idealism of the invisible Church of devout deep-thinking minds, in their ardent pursuit of absolute truth, dissatisfied with the narrow traditions of theology and with the final pronouncements of materialistic science, we may hail it as a healthy manifestation of recent thought. To accept its claims as possessing scientific certitude, or as supplying a new form of faith, would be an extravagant error.

SCOTLAND A THEOCRACY.

T

di

L

of

B

m ez

of

T

in

aı

to fr

to

a

b

fa

di

li

aı

aı I

fu

E

is

o

SI

T

it

A paper on "The Scottish Churches" opens with a reminder that there is a church to every five hundred of the population, and practically built by them. "Scotland's claim to be accounted the most compact, national, and yet democratic theocracy at present existing, must be allowed to be exceptionally strong." After a survey of the whole ecclesiastical field in Scotland, he limits the number of really burning questions to three :-

Will the present negotiations for union between the Free and United Presbyterian Churches be carried to a successful issue? Will such success be followed by an active movement for Disestablishment on the part of the new body which will thus be created? Will the Establishment be able to withstand

About the success of either Union or Disestablishment, he says, in effect, " I hae me doots."

THE BANANA A FOE TO PROGRESS.

The Philippines and their future are discussed by a writer who sees America provided there with a Labour Question ready made of a most serious kind. He says:-

We are in Malay lands, where that foe to progress, the banana, flourishes, and where labour wears no lovely face. Hands for town work, for the tobacco factories, it is possible to get, but there are serious labour-difficulties attending nearly every other venture. The Philippine Christian native is hopelessly indolent. It is not till he is nearly starving, and has been beaten by the tax-collector, that he feels called upon to attempt to get more. Employers of labour aver that the moral and domesticated native is a mistake. They prefer those imbued with a spirit of gambling, the haunters of the galleras, where the backing of the favourite precipitates a return to work.

POINTS FROM MONTESQUIEU.

Montesquieu's account of his travels in Italy is reviewed in a paper which is lit up by many good sayings coined or quoted by the author. Here are a

"A man ought to have his ties; man is like a spring, he goes the better, the tighter he is bound.

President de Brosses wrote that oblivion of the art of ruling sprang from absorption in elections. Elections were no longer the means of government, but the end of statesmanship.

That is a sentence to be written deep in the conscience of the politician. Of the Germans, Montesquieu wrote :-

They are good creatures, though at first they seem wild and fierce. They are like an elephant, which at first sight looks terrible; then one pats it and it calms down; one flatters it and puts a hand upon the trumpet, and then jumps upon its back.

Here is a shrewd remark about the Papacy :-

De Brosses, after confessing the contempt in which the Papacy was held, concludes, "Yet a clever Pope will always have the power of making himself courted, of playing a part, aye, a very large part on the European stage." This role, he explains, is that of international arbitration, which even Protestant Powers would welcome, if once the Pope were to make himself respected.

There are charming and appreciative papers on the novels of Ferdinand Fabre, a Frenchman but no Parisian, and on Mrs. Oliphant's autobiography.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

THERE is much excellent matter in the current number of this quarterly. Separate notice has been taken of articles on the Peace Conference, the fall of the Western Roman Empire, and on British finance in the nineteenth century.

THREE PERIODS IN NINETEENTH CENTURY FINANCE.

The writer of the last-named divides the century into three periods according to the dominant financial policy. The first ran from 1800 to 1825. It was financially It raised the National Debt from £270,000,000 to £900,000,000. It was a time of heavy and multiplex taxation. But it saw the resumption of cash payments (1821) and the amalgamation of British and Irish exchequers (1817). The second or middle period (1825-1875) was marked by economy in expenditure, which almost stood still; it was the period of Peel and Gladstone and the establishment of Free Trade. The third period has seen an enormous increase in expenditure, chiefly on army and navy, but also in subventions to the local rates, which the writer condemns as an unsound policy. The total of £38,000,000 spent on Army, Navy, and Civil Service in 1875 has risen to the total of £70,000,000 in 1900. The National Debt sank from £900,000,000 in 1816 to £780,000,000 in 1875, and to £647,000,000 in 1900. The writer applauds our adhesion to Free Trade as the most creditable chapter of modern finance.

IN DEFENCE OF VIVISECTION.

A writer on the ethics of vivisection refers to the vast number of animals at present mutilated without protest by farmers, shepherds, and breeders. He quotes an estimate based on the German cattle census that in the German Empire there were thus "vivisected" in a single year 65,000 horses, 650,000 cattle, 2,000,000 lambs and sheep, 8,000,000 pigs. He goes on :—

Let us clear our minds of cant and look facts frankly in the face. A duke, going to preside at a meeting against vivisection, dines off animals who have been vivisected; he may even eat live oysters and the livers of geese in whom disease has been artificially induced. The ladies with him wear furs, feathers, and ospreys. He drives to the meeting behind vivisected horses. In fact, the only form of vivisection he objects to is that which furnishes, not luxury, amusement, or vanity, but knowledge. Everything else is sanctioned by immemorial custom; this alone is unfamiliar to him, and he tries to destroy it. . . . We have anæsthetics and morphia in the hands of the physiologist, nothing of the kind to help the farmer, the shepherd, the butcher, the sportsman, and the gamekeeper.

Then follows a resolute endeavour to rob vivisection of its horrors, to prove the efficacy of anæsthetics, and to suggest the inferior sensitiveness of the lower animals. "A horse with a compound fracture of the leg, while waiting for the knacker to kill it, will often be found standing on its three legs quietly grazing, and even moving about."

PRIMITIVE v. PAGANISED CHRISTIANITY.

A paper on "the meaning of rites" opens with a contrast between the Christian worship of the second and of the fifth centuries. The change is traced to the importation of heathen rites, vestments, and superstitions—"the fatal policy of conciliating pagan populations." The article closes with a kindred contrast :

To-day we see side by side two pictures very like those which we first considered as contrasts. The simple building with dark wooden walls; the single light shining on the black-gowned figure in the pulpit, and on the open Bible; the wooden table before the minister as he faces his flock. Or, again, the great fane with its storied windows, its incense, its crosses and banners, its gleaming vestments of gold and silver, its altar, and its storm of sacred song. The one offers to a harassed world the peace proclaimed in the Gospel; the other, the venerable rites of consolation of Mother Church. Both are in their way beautiful to the eye, and both appeal to the heart; but the latter brings with it the dangers of superstition.

OTHER ARTICLES.

A writer on the problem in China holds that the opposition of the natives to Western innovations has been much exaggerated, and he refers to their readiness to use the steamboat and penny post. He advocates a reformed and independent China and, as a means to this end, the removal of the capital from Pekin, preferably to Nanking. There are most interesting appreciations of Mrs. Oliphant and Montalembert. There is also an endeavour to set in a more favourable light the character and career of Lord Clare, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and inveterate foe of Catholic emancipation.

A CENTRAL ASIAN MAGAZINE.

It is always interesting to receive evidences of enterprise in a new country even when that country does not happen to be our own. It is a far cry from Tashkend to the banks of the Thames, and I wonder how many persons in England have seen the first number of Russki Turkestan, a new magazine published in the former city by the tri-weekly newspaper of that name. Russian Turkestan in general get-up is not quite up to the level of the best English quarterly, but as it can print at pleasure in Cyrillic, Latin, and Arabic characters, it may claim superiority in at least one respect. A long and interesting article describes "How Samarcand became a Russian Town" in 1868, and is of considerable historical interest, being compiled from unpublished documents now preserved in the archives of Turkestan. It throws an interesting light on the advance of Russia in Asia to know that thirty years ago the Governor-General of Turkestan had "full power to declare war and conclude peace with the neighbouring Khanates." It was only this consideration which prevented the Emperor Alexander II. carrying out his wish to return Samarcand to the Emir of Bokhara, after the failure of the latter in the Holy War which his subjects forced him to declare.

An article on popular justice in Russian Turkestan illustrates the customs of the people and the tenacity with which they retain their old ways in the midst of a considerable Russian population. The natives still elect their own judges and hold their own trials in their own language. In a Turcoman court the litigant must sit down to hear the judgment or receive sentence. The payment to the imam for marriage, we are told, is forty kopecks, or a shilling. Among the Russians the Sarts have a reputation for cunning which the following anecdote illustrates. A wealthy Sart in Tashkend, wishing to increase his authority among the natives, was accustomed to hold receptions, at which he invariably secured the attendance of some high Russian officials. After much intriguing he managed to secure a promise from a certain General K. to pay him a visit at an appointed hour. Half an hour before the time he astonished his guests by announcing that he was going to send for the General to drink tea with him, and accordingly pretended to despatch a messenger. Shortly afterwards the General turned up, as appointed, to the general astonishment of the natives, who wondered at the greatness of a patron who could secure the attendance of Russian generals merely by sending for them.

ar

of

te

nd

ay pt

d

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE August number has not lowered its standard to the claims of the holidays. It has an excellent array of timely and instructive studies, one half of which asks for separate treatment. Of these "The Dying of Death," by Mr. Joseph Jacobs, is the most sensational. Mr. Louis Garvin's examination of the causes of Unionist unpopularity is, perhaps, the most brilliant.

ON HOTEL REFORM.

Major Arthur Griffiths, writing on "Hotels at Home and Abroad," has much fault to find with those at home. The huge barracks erected in the West End with all the latest American improvements show little regard for individual idiosyncracies; the guest sinks into a number, and everything is arranged in the mass. "The adoption of a nearly uniform system of prices, of meals and the fare provided, of service and accommodation," is another feature of modern hotels. The writer complains of the disappearance of plain and popular dishes from the bill of fare, the multiplication of kickshaws with ambitious names, and the costly profusion of the table dhôte. He grants an improvement in the furnishing of bedrooms and providing of public rooms. He hails the first signs of introducing the continental custom of an inclusive charge. "It is the adherence to long-established but often vexatious exactions that drive such crowds of holiday-makers to continental hotels."

CHAOS IN MOROCCO.

Rev. H. R. Haweis, writing on "Morocco Up to Date," tells sad stories of consular corruption, of which the following is a sample:—

A late Consul, who shall here be nameless, had a choice collection of coins: he declared they had been stolen. A rich Moor was accused as the culprit, or accomplice. The Sultan was approached; a compensative sum, 25,000 Spanish dollars, was demanded, and paid over to the Consul. The Moor and members of his family were immediately thrown into prison, their goods were seized to pay the indemnity, and five of them were practically beaten to death. It turned out afterwards that the more valuable part of the collection, said to have been stolen, had remained intact in the hands of the Consul—that it was more than doubtful whether anything had been stolen. Not long before the Consul's death he offered to sell the whole collection to a private gentleman in Tangiers! This offer was declined. The Consul died quite lately in the odour of sanctity, and after his death the coins were sold by auction!

Mr. Haweis recognises a recent improvement. He urges that Great Britain should keep a sharp eye on the designs of France, and when the present Vizier dies, be ready to forestall her.

THREE LITERARY ARTICLES.

Mr. Arthur Symons sketches Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, and finds an intellectual pride, which hated mediocrity, to be the basis of his character:—

The last word of Villiers is faith; faith against the evidence of the senses, against the negations of materialistic science, against the monstrous paradox of progress, against his own pessimism in the face of these formidable enemies. He affirms; he "believes in soul, is very sure of God," requires no witness to the spiritual world of which he is always the inhabitant, and is coatent to lose his way in the material world.

The new light on Ibsen's "Brand," communicated by M. A. Stobart, is the suggestion that Ibsen has clothed in dramatic drapery the tenets of the Danish philosopher Kirkegaard, with his characteristic ideas—"inwardness, paradox, and isolation"—uttermost surrender of the finite will to the Divine Will, insisting as that does on All or Nothing. Shakespeare and Molière are compared by M. Jules Claretie in a paper read by him at the Lyceum. He closes with a reference to Shakespeare's value as a peacemaker between French and English by virtue of his many admirers in both peoples.

CORNHILL.

Cornhill for August is a very good number, and ranks above the August average. It opens with a poem by Mr. George Meredith, entitled "The Night Walk," which the uninitiated, after glimpses of strange beauty wrapped in appropriately nocturnal obscurity, will pass by with due awe and reverence. The battles of Mars-la-Tour and Gravelotte are described by Herr David Blättner, who took part in both. The Peace Society might do well to employ Mr. Blättner as a peripatetic exponent of the horrors of war. Mrs. M. L. Woods sketches prettily the carnival at Madrid. Mr. Henry Erroll discusses the plight of certain "pariahs of Western Europe," notably the Cagots in France. The name Cagot is traced to Canis and Gothus, "a dog of a Goth," with possible reference to the Arian heresy held by the Goths. They were themselves, however, Orthodox Catholics, yet from some unexplained reason treated as pariahs. A study of the pastoral drama on the Elizabethan stage leads Mr. W. Wilson Greg to generalise thus:—

The dramatic pastoral has always been, probably must always be, a merely "literary" kind. It is not from the great dramatists, not in the great dramatic periods, that we must look for the fairest flower of this plant. We are now in the age of the Novel, an age which demands what it is pleased to call "realism," It is not in such ages that the pastoral can flourish: it needs a society in which the poetical instincts of a people are struggling to free themselves from the trammels of everyday existence, when art and life have become dissociated, a period in short of unrealisable ideals, which is a period of decay.

Under the heading of "The Sensibility of the Critics," Mr. Stephen Gwynn defends his "decay of sensibility" in a previous issue against the attacks of Mr. A. Lang and Mr. Walkley. The battle is over his estimate of Miss Austen. Mr. Gwynn concludes, obdurate:—

I know perfectly the society that she will keep in Paradise, and there is none from which I would more contentedly be excluded. Both Mr. Lang and Mr. Walkley say that for this heresy I shall probably go to a place that is not Paradise, and Mr. Walkley bids me beware of meeting her even in Elysium, for in the next world she will still be formidable. I am sure that she would pass me with the calmest indifference, but I am not sure that Mr. Walkley would get off so lightly. I said she was unlovable, but I did not call her Jane, much less "the gentle Jane." I picture to myself Mr. Walkley presenting himself to her with this paragraph from his panegyric as a credential: "In an age of 'sensational' headlines, kinematographs, motor-cars, and boomsters, we could do with a gentle Jane or two." In such an event the state of Miss Austen's panegyrist would probably be worse than that of her detractor.

M. Maeterlinck on the modern drama, Lady Broome's Colonial Memories, and F. B. Harrison's stories "Fra' Auld Lang Syne" claim separate notice.

Mr. C. F. Dewey's Article on the German Emperor.

WE regret that in a recent review of the Harmsworth Magazine we drew conclusions with regard to Mr. Dewey's article about the German Emperor which were, in the opinion of Mr. Harmsworth, who has examined the question, not justified, and for which we desire to express our regret.

Sep alar land

aspe Mag cour to V "the male cone deba Lon W they objecthe t beca

justi

their

to th

66 of a and para Locabi polici is priman Libe comingrea desp them scrip his the afte by The ran

L

The whee the accordadd equipped term the new

Fitz

inco

N

of t

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THE August number is readable, vigorous and alive. Separate notice has been taken of Mr. Donovan's alarming account of "The Yellow Invasion of Queensland," and of "A Plea for an English Bayreuth."

"THE DIVINE RIGHT OF THE MALE."

"Ignota" writes with pardonable vehemence and asperity on the action of the Government relative to Miss Magill as overseer, and to women as London borough councillors. She heads her paper "Privilege v. Justice to Women." She traces the attitude of both parties to "the belief in the divine right of the male, because a male, to determine at his pleasure the careers and conditions of the lives of women." She thus sums up the debate which ended in excluding women from the new London municipalities:—

Women perfectly understand the issue raised. It is because they desire justice and truth in all social relations; because they object to privileged male vice, to cruelty, whether glorified by the title of "Science" or decorated with the name of "Sport"; because they desire to see peace amongst the nations, and justice between all classes, that they are refused recognition as members of the body politic. They are outlawed because of their very virtues. The very grounds alleged for the opposition to the claims of women are the strongest assurance possible of the final triumph of the woman's cause.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AS A TORY.

"Mr. Chamberlain as a Tory Minister" is the subject of a vigorous diatribe by Mr. T. M. Hopkins, the tone and point of which may be gathered from the concluding paragraph:—

Lord Salisbury would have been well advised in forming his Cabinet if he had left Mr. Chamberlain outside, and adopted a policy of pure Toryism. The thin veneer of Liberalism which is put to Mr. Chamberlain's credit has caused annoyance to many Conservatives, and has not given satisfaction to any Liberals. Mr. Gladstone, in giving Mr. Chamberlain office, committed an error; Lord Salisbury, in doing so, committed a greater error; and Mr. Chamberlain, as a Tory Minister, is despised to-day by Conservatives, as he was when his abuse of them exceeded reason and decency, in spite of his servile su'scription to their views and his professed regard for themselves.

A CURIOUS CHINESE ORACLE.

Lieut.-Colonel John Macgregor gives a description of his attempt to visit the Temple of Heaven at Pekin in the year of the present Emperor's accession. He found afterwards that the Temple had been burned, it was said, by lightning. It was also the year of famine and flood. The soothsayers recalled an old Chinese prophecy that ran something like this:—

When an old hag governs and a young man reigns,
When the dearth and the deluge distress the land,
And the Temple of Heaven no more remains,
Then watch for the sword, which is close at hand.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. George St. Clair gives an astronomical explanation of the mythical "birth of Apollo in a floating island." The floating island was the equinoctial point which when the year was only 360 days seemed to move through the annual circle. The birth of Apollo—the full and accurate year—marked the intercalation of the five additional days and the consequent fixation of the equinox. So the floating Asterie became the fixed Delos. Mr. H. G. Wintersgill writes firmly and temperately on the Anglican compromise. He blames the Evangelicals for intolerance: the Ritualists having never tried to oust them from the Church. Mr. F. C. Fitzwilliam, writing on ground rent in relation to the income tax, urges the justice of imposing income tax on the entire value of the property which passes into the ground landlord's hands on the expiry of the lease. An unnamed writer compares the Dreyfus case with the celebrated trial which Browning revived in "The Ring and the Book." A. F. B. depicts Socialism from an outside point of view, with the intention of replacing blind horror by intelligent appreciation. Literary articles deal with Dr. Barry's novels, Mr. Thomas Hardy's poems, and the story of Maurice de Guérin and his sister's love.

THE REVUE DES REVUES.

THE Revue des Revues for July 15th, like most of the other French magazines, is chiefly notable for the silence with which it lets the Dreyfus case pass by.

THE SPIRIT OF ISLAM.

The number opens with the first instalment of a remarkable article by an anonymous writer, entitled "La Turquie peut-elle Vivre?" in which the elements which have made the Turkish empire, and are now unmaking it, are discussed with exceptional penetration. Reforms, says the writer, are impracticable in Turkey as long as the Mussulman rule maintains itself. The Turk is, first of all, distinguished by spiritual indifference. Leaving the country of his origin, he became successively Buddhist, Christian-Nestorian, and Mahometan, changing his religion with his conquests and the exigencies of policy. The secret of the Turk's immobility is that he is the victim of a fixed idea that God has given him the dominion over the Christian world. The Turkish family is merely a microcosm of the empire, a mixture of all nationalities without anything in common. It is this which explains the tyranny of Islamism, which both in State and in family is the only moral bond.

GERMAN versus ENGLISH.

M. Fernand Herbert, Professor at the École des Hautes Études Coloniales, discusses the question whether a knowledge of English or German is the more important for a Frenchman. German and English are the two official languages of the French University establishments, but in reality the number of students of German exceeds the number of students of English by about three to one. This is explained by the fact that at St. Cyr and the Polytechnique German only is required. But all the world is not officer or engineer, and while 60 millions only speak German, "500 millions-d'après M. Stead" (?) -speak English. In 1897 French trade with Germany amounted to 700,000,000 francs, and with England to 2,600,000,000. Including English colonies, the amount would be vastly exceeded. A knowledge of English would be the best weapon in a commercial struggle with England. With the German it is too late to struggle. The German knows enough French to teach it in England. German, says M. Herbert, repels the Frenchman, while English encourages him; and the result is that the French pupil, beginning with German, never learns enough to be of practical use, whereas, if he had chosen English, he would soon have been in a position to draw advantage from it.

OTHER ARTICLES.

M. Camille Flammarion, writing in the section devoted to Psychology and Occultism, gives some remarkable cases of return from the grave, all testified by the names and addresses of the persons concerned. M. Henri Coupin writes on "The Circular Tours of Animals," and gives some curious information as to the migrations of birds and beasts. M. Dante Vaglieri supplies an illustrated description of the treasures of the Roman museum of the baths of Diocletian.

m.

a

his

ks

by

ed

th

ur

er.

do

nt

29

m

e

ld

X

d

0

at

of 11

n

THE FORUM.

Mr. Lucy's article on "Lord Rosebery and the Premiership" has been noticed elsewhere. The other articles in the July number are not of special interest.

COLUMBUS INSANE.

The most eminent name in the number is that of Professor Lombroso, which is affixed to an article devoted to proving that Columbus was morally irresponsible, and a psychopath. Professor Lombroso examines the appearance, handwriting, and style of Columbus, and his moral sense as illustrated by his conduct, and finds in each of them traces of a disordered mind. Of his falseness, Professor Lombroso says :-

In his official correspondence he lied continually. He claimed have found an abundance of gold and spices. He lied when to have found an abundance of gold and spices. he asserted that there had been other admirals in his family, and when he affirmed that he had navigated all the West and the East. He lied when he said that for seven years all the world had rejected him, that he was the object of universal ridicule, that one monk alone had taken pity on him. . . And this art of ignorant and impudent lying had become, as it were, proverbial in Portugal; so that when he returned the first time from America, many would not believe a word he said, but wished to interrogate the aborigines secretly.

THE FUTURE OF THE NEGRO.

Mr. W. H. Councill, President of the Negro College at Normal, Alabama, devotes a paper to the above problem. Race problems, Mr. Councill points out, always did and always will exist; and the highest Greek intellect never got within a glimpse of universal racial equalisation. Nor will education solve the problem, but by fostering ideas of equality in the Negro mind only make the tension more acute. The real solution of the problem lies in voluntary emigration :-

Senator Morgan's ideas about repatriation, cruel and hard as they appear, seem to me to point to a glorious destiny for the Negro. Anglo-Saxon prejudice is but the voice of God calling to the Negro to arise, and go and make himself a people. I do not think, however, that there will be any wholesale emigration; for the present Negro is doubtless here to stay,—and it may be providential that he is. It requires a somewhat different Negro to settle and graft a new civilisation in a foreign land. But the next few generations will see a Negro with views as far different from the views of the Negro leaders of to-day as day is different from night. There will be no statutory laws oppressing the Negro, no disposition by legal sanction to drive him from the country; and yet he will go. His own pride, the desire to redeem Africa from its darkness, and, last, the allurements of a thousand superior advantages for mental and material gain, to be attained through hardship and adversity, will be irresistible. He will no longer, as now, look for easy highways to success. This will check increase and, in a bloodless, natural way, solve the problem, which the pride and greed of the Anglo-Saxon race

"THE TRUST PROBLEM AND ITS SOLUTION."

Ex-Senator W. A. Peffer, writing under the above title, deals mainly with the carrying trade in the United The proper solution, he urges, is organised State competition:

Let Congress begin by providing for the early construction of a national freight railroad with double tracts from St. Louis to San Francisco, and follow that immediately with three others like it-one from Chicago, by way of St. Louis, to Galveston, Texas; another from Jamestown or Bismarck, North Dakota, by way of St. Louis, to Savannah, Georgia; and a third from St. Louis to New York city. The aggregate length of these several lines would not exceed 5,500 miles; and the roads could be built and equipped for about 250,000,000 dols. This amount could-if it were deemed necessary, rather than to issue Treasurynotes-all be borrowed from our own people on 21 per cent.

fifty-year bonds. These roads, in the beginning, need carry nothing but freight and the heavier classes of mail matter; they should be supplied with motive power sufficient to haul not only Government cars, but those of all persons or companies applying for transportation; and the employes should be protected from political intermeddling by a tenure dependent only on efficient and faithful service.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. I. D. Whelpley writes on "The Currency of Porto Rico," where no stable rate of exchange has been established since the annexation of the island. Mr. H. W. Rogers deals with "International Law in the Late War," which seems to have been singularly barren in precedents and problems. The Hon. F. C. Penfield writes on Mr. Jacob Schoenhof publishes his Rosicrucianism. second article on "A Centennial Stocktaking," and gives some interesting statistics as to the rise and fall of grain production in the various European countries.

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

THERE is no article of striking importance in the Italian reviews for July. The best articles in the Nuova Antologia are all of literary interest. Maurice Rava writes sanely and sympathetically of Huysmans, though apparently without much intimate comprehension of the religious side of his character. He dwells more especially on his earlier novels, which many of his admirers prefer not to read for themselves, but of which some knowledge is necessary if his work is to be appreciated as a whole, and gives an admirable summary of their leading To the mid-July number Sr. Chiarini, characteristics. the distinguished critic, contributes a long study of the youth of the veteran poet Carducci, and of the political aspirations and patriotic enthusiasms that formed the groundwork of his poems. The novelist, F. de Roberto, continues his critical essay on Balzac and his women friends, with curious quotations from the letters of his many anonymous female correspondents, and Matilde

Serao brings to a close her novel "La Ballerina."

The Civiltà Cattolica (July 15th) is exceedingly indignant with the Ave Maria and the Catholic World for having republished in America certain letters attributed to Clement XIV. when Cardinal Gangavelli, the authenticity of which, if the Civiltà is to be believed, is far from established. The Jesuit organ regards the publication as yet another manifestation of the insidious disease of "Americanism." The Civiltà is also The Civiltà is also Publishing a series of articles on "Presentiments and Telepathy," quoting many well-established historical examples. The number for July 1st, under the title "Decadence and Depravity in Art," prints a critical article on Tolstoi's "What is Art?" approving in general of his attitude, and pointing out that Manzoni's novel, "I Promessi Sposi," is a unique model of what fiction ought to be.

In the Rivista di Scienze Biologiche, edited by Dr. Celesia, Prof. Lombroso writes on the transmission of acquired characteristics, with some curious details concerning Hottentot women.

The Rivista Italiana di Sociologia publishes an interesting account taken from the Senchus Mor of the custom of fosterage or the boarding-out of all children with foster-parents, which, it appears, prevailed extensively throughout Ireland in the early centuries.

THE July number of the Etude is an interesting Bach number, with a series of articles on the life of the master and the study of his works.

sta Sü

an sej

no

pla

Cu

an

vol

the

pre

do

Th

reo

the tha twe

Th

qui

dis

agi

An

ren An

the Yo hui son

say

hav obt

of

alm

"T

whi

An

Poi

hav

Rei

Mr

I

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

BEYOND the articles on a "Russo-American Understanding," "Universal Peace" by the Baroness von Süttner, and Mr. Sydney Brooks's article on "England and the Transvaal," which have been noticed elsewhere, the North American for July contains nothing calling for separate notice. The number opens with a poem by Mr. Swinburne on "The Channel Passage, 1855," which will not do much to enhance his reputation.

THE UNITED STATES IN CUBA.

"An Officer of the Army of Occupation" writes on "The Logic of our Position in Cuba," and declares plainly that a purely military occupation must be a failure, and that only through an affirmative vote of the Cuban people can annexation be accomplished. A feeling of irritation is growing up against the Americans and increasing every day the occupation continues, and votes for annexation are daily lost. If America desires the eventual annexation of Cuba she should redeem her promise and fix a date for withdrawal. Can this be done? The writer says, Yes:—

There can be no doubt that the "pacification" of the island is now accomplished. City for city, the towns of Cuba are more peaceful and orderly than those of the United States. There never was a more docile, quiet people. When the reorganisation of the army was being considered, last December, the chiefs of our army were almost unanimously of the opinion that fifty thousand men would be required in Cuba. At present twelve thousand is the number fixed upon by the Government. These troops have practically nothing to do. All reports of "bandits" are zealously forwarded to the United States by correspondents, and half of them are lies. The country is as quiet, as "pacified," as it ever has been or ever will be. The "pacification" has been "accomplished." It is time for us to "leave."

The Americans, says the writer, are hated for their discourtesy. The American common soldier forces his way everywhere, and if he wishes to make himself disagreeable, all classes are exposed to annoyance. Insults by the soldiers are fiercely resented by the Cubans. The American military government is a tyranny, and as a means of rapprochement a failure:—

And the extent to which this is the case is indicated by the remark sometimes now heard in Cuba, that, as between the American military control and the Spanish military control, the Spanish was preferable.

GREATER NEW YORK.

Mr. Bird S. Coler, Comptroller of the City of New York, sums up the results obtained by the merging of a hundred municipal corporations into one, and makes some suggestions as to future reforms. A rise in credit, says Mr. Coler, is one of the most notable results:—

During the past twelve months, the bonds of the municipality have sold in the open market for higher prices than had been obtained for many years for similar securities. To-day the bonds of New York City, considered as investment securities, rank almost as high as those of the National Government.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Major-General Miles continues his historical survey of "The War with Spain" by describing the operations which resulted in the capture of Puerto Rico. Mr. Andrew Lang writes on "Golf from a St. Andrews Point of View," and describes some recent heresies which have been introduced into the game. Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer defends the Public School of America against Mrs. Harding Davis. Mr. George H. Hull has an article on "Pig Iron and Prosperity."

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

SIGNS of the dull season are preceptible in the Revue des Deux Mondes for July, but there are nevertheless enough articles of interest to maintain on the whole the reputation of the leading review of France. We have noticed elsewhere M. Leroy-Beaulieu's paper on the Trans-Saharan railway.

M. VALBERT.

Naturally M. Brunetière explains to his readers the great loss which the Revue has suffered by the death of M. Cherbuliez, better known to English readers by his nom de guerre of G. Valbert. The name of Cherbuliez is assured of immortality, and his place in the history of French literature is already assigned him; his stories mark an epoch in the art of fiction, and some of them may be ranked among the highest models of French prose. In the other and hardly less difficult sphere of criticism, Cherbuliez was an acknowledged master, and his death is a terrible loss not only to the Revue des Deux Mondes, but also to the wider interests of French literature in general. A pathetic interest attaches to an article in the first July number of the Revue by M. Cherbuliez, evidently one of the last he ever wrote. It is a review of a book by Mr. William Harvey Brown, an American naturalist, recording his investigations in Mashonaland and Matabeleland. This is written with all M. Cherbuliez's old ability, lucidity, and charm of style, and will serve only to increase the general regret at his loss, for he certainly took high rank among the few critics of international reputation.

BISMARCK.

M. Benoist reviews in two articles the career of Prince Bismarck, basing his account on the recent crop of Bismarckiana which has appeared in the train of Busch's book, as well as on certain earlier historical studies. He divides the life of the great Chancellor into two periods: the period of struggle, and the period of triumph; and he regards Bismarck as the nineteenth century Machiavelli, who did not for a moment consider the morality of the means which he employed, not because he supposed the existence of two moral standards, but rather because he thought that in politics there is no morality at all—that is to say, that politics is one thing and morality is another. Of those last eight years of his life, after the young captain had dismissed the old pilot, M. Benoist does not say much. The humiliation of those last years marks in his eyes the limitations of Bismarck's greatness; spoiled by success, disgrace lowered him, and he failed to take advantage of the last gift which fortune offered him, namely, the supreme greatness of bearing adversity as well as he had borne success.

WASHINGTON.

The increasing interest in America which is now displayed in France is illustrated by M. Lefaivre's article on the Federal capital at Washington. He gives a lively description of the town, the anomalous system by which it is governed, and the social life of this most unique of American cities.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned a study by M. Dastre of the peculiar disease known as appendicitis; an amusing travel article by M. Bellessort on the Far East, and the beginning of a series of papers by the clever writer who takes the name of Arvède Barine on the Grande Mademoiselle, daughter of Gaston d'Orléans and nioce of Louis XIII.

carry

they

only pply-

ected

y on orto

tab-

. W.

Jar."

ents

on

his

rives

rain

the

iova

lava

ugh

the ally

efer

edge

ole,

ling

rini,

the

ical

the

rto.

nen

his

ilde

gly

rld

ters

elli.

red.

the

ilso

and

cal

itle

cal

in

ni's

hat

Dr.

of ils

an

the

ren

ely

ch

ter

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

WITH the exception of two articles, the one dealing with the French Poor Law system, known as the Assistance Publique, and a most interesting account of the Belgian workhouses, noticed elsewhere, both the July numbers of the Revue de Paris are undistinguished by any particularly interesting or brilliant contribution. Here, as indeed in all the French reviews, the two most interesting subjects of last month—the Peace Conference and the Dreyfus affair—are not so much as alluded to.

The place of honour is given in the first July number to some extracts from the unpublished memoirs of the Duc de Choiseul, who was ambassador at Rome towards the middle of the eighteenth century. The narrative is evidently authentic, but can be considered really interesting only to the historian who occupies himself with the then history of the Papacy.

MADAGASCAR.

In curious contrast is the conclusion of M. Lavisse's account of how France has tried to civilise Madagascar, with the active aid of the military occupation. He touches lightly on the much-discussed missionary question, and evidently only considers it important inasmuch as it represents British, as opposed to French, interests. He says that the natives have no religious instinct, but that they consider that England represents Protestantism, and France Catholicism. He admits that the religious question played a considerable part when the education of the natives was under discussion; accordingly one of the French administrators hit upon the brilliant idea of dissociating Protestantism with Great Britain by arranging that the great French Protestant missionary society, la Société des Missions Evangeliques, should take over the schools and the chapels of the London Missionary Society. So now, according to M. Lavisse, Protestant, Catholic, and Government schools all compete amicably together in teaching the young Malagasy idea to grow.

A FRENCH VIEW OF THE L.C.C.

To see ourselves as others see us is always supposed to be in every way good for the soul. Every London County Cauncillor should read, mark, and inwardly digest I. Pasquet's account of the government of London. London," begins the writer, "is not a town; it is rather, as say the English themselves, a province covered with houses." Greater London, he points out—that is to say, London and her suburbs-has a larger population than Belgium, and he goes on to develop, very cleverly and very clearly, all that led to the evolution of what we now know as the County Council. He dates the first real reform in municipal government from the year 1855, and even those who perhaps know a good deal on the subject may learn something more by studying this curious and typically French article. M. Pasquet naturally looks at London from a foreigner's point of view. Among the things which seem to him to call most loudly for reform is the ground landlord system, and he quotes at great length from Mr. Bamfield's pamphlet on "The Ground Landlords in London." He has much to say concerning the water monopoly. "No one would dare," he observes significantly, "to ask Londoners now to drink, as they did at the beginning of Victoria's reign, the yellow liquid that surges up and down between Westminster and London Bridge. Still, not till the terrible cholera epidemic of 1849, and the consequent Bills, did the companies bestir themselves to the point of building proper reservoirs and filters"; and he compares the Paris water rate and the London water rate in a fashion very unfavourable to the latter. Touching the question of gas, he points out that in Paris gas costs the consumer rather more than double what it does in London, and he declares that certain British towns give the gas for nothing to their fortunate citizens.

POLAND.

While all the world is discussing the Finland question, the Revue de Paris analyses what the writer, M. Esse, is pleased to call the Polish crisis, which, if what he says is true, would go to show that the Tsar has an even more serious problem to tackle in Poland than in Finland.

THREE HISTORICAL ARTICLES.

The second number of the Revue de Paris, like the first, opens with an historical article, in which M. Droz tells the story of the Minister Foucquet's trial. author has evidently consulted all the possible authorities; but it is difficult to see why, with so many contemporary events of palpitating interest, the editors of the Revue should accept or commission a contribution which might just as well have been published at any time within the last fifty years, and which can be really interesting but to a very small section of their readers. Scarcely more topical is an elaborate study by M. Faguet on Taine. Yet a third contribution to the Revue, which can only boast of a very academic interest, but which is yet worth perusal if only for the singular charm with which it is written, is M. Jusserand's picturesque account of "A Duke and His Town," that is to say Vespasian of Gonzaga, Duke of Sabionetta. Sabionetta is now a suburb of Mantua, and there last year M. Jusserand made a pilgrimage in order that he might reconstitute the strange, romantic history of Vespasian of Gonzaga, one of the heroes of the sixteenth century, who fought, loved and poetised, as well as found time to build the town from which he took his title. In three years he turned the village into a city full of beautiful buildings and boasting a university, a public library, and a mint; indeed, even during his lifetime the medals struck at Sabionetta were sought after by collectors. He died early in 1591, and very soon after his death prosperity seems to have left Sabionetta, and now, though much remains that is beautiful, few travellers find their way there, and even the ubiquitous Baedeker has not a word to say for Sabionetta.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION OF 1900.

M. Corday gives an interesting sketch of the forthcoming Paris Exhibition of 1900. The opening ceremonies will take place on April 15th, and after seven months of intense activity and life the great Exhibition buildings, covering the Champs Elysées, the Invalides, the Champs de Mars, and the Trocadéro, will all be closed on November 5th following. Indeed, if the present scheme be carried out, the Exhibition of 1900 will be on an incomparably larger scale than that of ten years ago, and there will be as it were a miniature Paris within the larger town; even now there has grown up around the forthcoming Exhibition a mass of periodical literature. The Exhibition will have two railways-one driven by electricity, the other in which the rails will move; in a word, everything will be done to inaugurate in a fitting manner the twentieth century. Among the many wonders of the Exhibition, one specially appealing to the historic imagination will be the reconstruction of old Paris, built on piles sunk in the Seine.

fro and d'A ma ch: wh pos Fo.

do

sig

COL

For ear and pro and eac in the control of the contr

deli arm Cor lack omi cha wer Fra for nun onc

Polar by Cor. M

The

Y

Som killed less cern the sma the chawkilling be a coffer various control of the coffer various c prop of the occu Edw Man fiction

LA NOUVELLE REVUE.

ALTHOUGH Madame Adam follows the general mot d'ordre concerning the Dreyfus affair-surely a notable sign of the times when the independence of her mind is considered—the July numbers of the Revue, if considered from the historical point of view, are of exceptional value and interest. M. Maçon, one time secretary to the Duc d'Aumale, contributes a striking paper on his beloved master. In a very few pages he sums up admirably the chequered but well-filled and well-lived life of the Prince, who occupied in the Orleans family much the same position held in England by the Duke of Cambridge. For the second son of Louis Philippe was destined from early youth to become the head of the French army, and the year 1848, which put an end to so many brilliant promises, practically ruined the Duc d'Aumale's career and shattered his dreams of fame. M. Maçon describes each successive phase of his master's long life-his exile in England; his return to France; his military service under the Republic; his second exile; his return to Chantilly, and the closing years of his old age.

Another historical study, and one which would have delighted the Duc d'Aumale himself, deals with the French army le iders of the old régime. The officers led by Condé, Turenne and Marshal Saxe have been hitherto lacking historians. General Rebillot supplies the omission, and he tells, even in these few pages, many characteristic anecdotes of the preux chevaliers who were among the now vanished glories of old monarchic France. Equally charming to those readers who care for the romance of history is an article in the same number which tells the story of the fine old palace once inhabited by the Duc de Lauzun, and which, in our own day, sheltered, among other literary Bohemians, Theophile Gautier.

Yet more history. The second number of the Nouvelle Revue opens with a lengthy account of various mediæval Polar expeditions, notably that organised and commanded by two Dutchmen, Jacob van Heemskerk and Jan Cornélis Rijp, in the year 1596.

M. Leon Séché adds a chapter to the curious story of the Jensenists, describing those of them who survived into the Consulate and First Empire.

The English Illustrated.

THE English Illustrated opens with an article by Mr. C. W. Gedney on "Victims of Vanity," in which he gives some particulars as to the varieties of birds which are killed every year to adorn the headdresses of women. In less than two years four of the chief English firms concerned in this traffic sent for auction plumes representing the slaughter of 300,000 egrets. This represents only a small proportion of the imports to England alone, and the demand on the Continent and in America is as great. Laws have been passed by various States to prevent the killing of egrets, but they are not enforced and never can be until the possession of such feathers is made an The crowned pigeon, the humming bird, various birds of paradise, the toucan and the owl suffer proportionately. Mr. John Munro describes some "Pests of the Wire," or birds and animals which make an occupation of damaging telegraph apparatus. Mr. Edward Fraser writes on "The Evolution of the Modern Man of War," but says nothing new. There is the usual fiction.

Cassell's Magazine.

IN Cassell's Magazine for August Mr. Fletcher Robinson, continuing his series of "London Night by Night," gives an interesting sketch of life on the river. The rescue of would-be suicides seems to be the chief excitement of a boatman's life; and the boatman interviewed by Mr. Robinson attributes most cases to gambling:—

Why, I know of men earning their two to three quid a week who live on bread and beer, and a kipper maybe, and all to put a few shillings on the favou ite for the next big race. When John Burns was at Brotherhood's yonder I used to hear him pitching it hot into the hands during the dinner-hour along of their gambling. He didn't mind if it made him unpopular or not, didn't John.

Pearson's.

Pearson's for August has a strong savour of holiday travel about it. Mr. D. T. Timins describes the Trains de Luxe of the world, with pictures of the interior of these palaces on wheels. Mrs. F. Nevill Jackson writes on Royalty Incognito, and tells the favourite names used by it. The Queen is the Countess of Balmoral, the Prince of Wales the Earl of Chester, the Duchess of York the Countess of Killarney, the Empress Frederick the Countess of Cronberg, the ex-Empress Eugénie the Countess de Pierreponds, and so on. Mr. Turner Morton brings up the theme—most attractive in this sultry weather—of the harvest of the ice, the gathering of the cold solid for commercial purposes in Norway and in Switzerland. Weatherby Chesney tells the story of the construction of the giant rafts of timber on the Pacific Coast. Much interest attaches to Marcus Tindal's account of the Sappers of the Queen—the Royal Engineer Corps.

The Woman at Home.

THE most interesting afticle in the Woman at Home is that in which Mrs. Tooley describes "The Holiday Homes of Celebrated Women," such as Miss Florence Nightingale, Mrs. Gladstone, Lady Henry Somerset, and Madame Sarah Grand. Miss M. A. Belloc writes on "Women Millionaires," and gives an interesting account of the philanthropic works of Miss Helen Gould, who first came before the American public as contributor to the war-chest on the outbreak of the war with Spain. Miss Gould is a strong advocate of the Temperance movement, and was a great friend of the late Miss Frances Willard. Mr. Max Pemberton continues his novel, "Féo."

The Sunday at Home.

THE Sunday at Home for August has several articles of interest, of which that of Mr. Wardlaw Thompson describing a visit to Tutuila, an island in the Samoan group, is the most topical. Mr. Thompson thinks that European influence is the chief obstacle to the spreading of real Christianity among the natives. He says:—

The disreputable beach-comber of a few years ago has almost entirely passed away, with all the pernicious influence exerted by his evil example; but the trader, the planter, the tourist, and the man-o'-war's man, are everywhere, and the influence they exert is on the whole not at all helpful to the Christian life. The tourist and the man-o'-war's man, thoughtlessly or for worse reasons, encourage the natives to reproduce for their benefi. old licentious dances and other relics of past heathenism, even though these have been discountenanced by the people themselves as the result of Christian teaching.

Mr. W. Soltan describes the mission boat Le Bon Messager and her work in France. Mrs. I. Fyvie Mayo begins an historical sketch of the City of Aberdeen. "The Murder of Agrippina" is described by Mr. Cyril Grey.

t of

res

a

the

the

in

ive

on,

, is

ore

the

roz

he

es :

iry

1110 tht

he

out ore ne.

aly

vet

ch A

ga,

of

a ge,

he

nd

m

he

ng

en

ere

nd

eft

is

en

for

he-9

en

on es,

be nt

on 0,

he he

re.

by

in

ng

rs

ic

ilt

Fr.m " The United States of Europe."]

POPE LEO XIII.

(Photographed in 1892.)

196

W

us a unim fellov thrill of th every brief round are and l is no dom tollin old a has home who seat life, chair laugh not cradl filled glear easte funer the 1 not in On t of th the ! each altog lips. seem

> Bu race troub to us for in know know of an ing co of hi aspir great a sub ecsta dream

* " I lated f 7s. 6d.

THE BOOK OF THE MONTH.

THE POPE LEO XIII.* AS SEEN BY HIS VALET.

WHAT is it that makes the world of men interesting?

Not the mere myriad number of units of human kind which inhabit this planet. When we talk of twelve hundred millions of human beings, they are to us as the sand on the seashore, not only in number unimaginable, but each unit is indistinguishable from its fellows. It is true that to the disciplined imagination united to a heart full of sympathy there is something thrilling, almost to the point of awe, in the thought of the innumerable multitude of human beings, who every day pass through all the tragic episodes of life's brief career. At this moment round how many death-beds are gathered weeping wives and helpless children? There is no district in all Christendom in which this day the tolling knell has not warned old and young alike that one has gone hence to his long home. And if death is always with us, a perpetual visitor who flits silently from seat to seat in the great banquet of life; continually emptying chairs and stilling the merry laughter of the guests, life is not less busy. How many cradles have already been filled since this morning's sun gleamed bright above the eastern horizon; and if the funeral bell ceases not, none the less do the marriage bells not intermit their merry jingle. On this planet every moment of this day is consecrated by the first kiss of virgin love, each as fresh and new and altogether miraculous and inconceivable as thefirst kiss that ever was pressed on human lips. So in our meditative moments, when all the world seems one vast family, we are constantly in the presence of an unending dream, intermixed with an equally unending comedy, sometimes developing into the rollicking farce of human life. In the collective joys and sorrows, the aspirations and despairs of humanity, there is a theme greater than any which the dramatist has ever handled, a subject for reverent contemplation, and even awe-struck ecstasy, vaster than that which has ever inspired the dream of any poet.

HOW FEW ARE THOSE WE KNOW.

But to the majority of human beings the rest of the race does not exist. How few there are, if we take the trouble to think, who are in any sense a living personality to us. How many men, women and children are there, for instance, in the world whose names we so much as know, whose faces we recognise, to say nothing of the knowledge of their inner self? We are all like mariners, embarked in crazy craft of our own, in which we navigate the ocean of time. The crew with which we sail, those who dwell within the four walls of our house, or whom we meet at business, in the field or in the shop, are alike our fellow-passengers or our comrades of the crew. But all the other millions of mankind are but as the crews of ships which pass in the night, with whom it is a more chance if we should so much as exchange a momentary salute, and know them no more for ever. Humanity, therefore, consists for most of us of the half-dozen or dozen individuals among whom our daily lot is cast, who eat at our table, who serve in our regiment, or work by our sides, while all the rest of our fellowmen are like the invisible stars, so remote as not even to send the faintest ray through the black immensity of space. But that which enables us to realise the existence of other lives than our own, and helps to bind us, to some extent, into conscious union with the rest of the race, is the existence of commanding personalities or of highly-placed personages, or of great geniuses, whose character, whose power, or whose genius makes them distinctly visible throughout the gloom that surrounds us.

Hence the immense importance in the education of the race and in the widening of the sympathies of man, of the existence of notable personalities of men who, either by character or destiny, tower up sufficiently above their fellows to be visible at a distance. There are never many such men, but they never fail, and it is they who, more than any others, help to keep up the interest of mankind in man, and by their mere existence weave the potent strands which help to bind the whole human race into a conscious practical whole. It is one of the uses of thrones that they serve as pedestals from which human units, themselves often no better or wiser than the mass of ordinary men and women, can be seen from afar, and by the mere fact of their visibility quicken the interest in their personality, which, in its lowest form is no doubt sufficiently open to ridicule, but which nevertheless contains within itself the germ of much good.

PIO CENTRA, VALET OF LEO XIII.

THE COMPANY OF THE STAR.

It is a misfortune, no doubt, when the individual thus elevated above his fellows is unworthy of the attention which his mere elevation suffices to command; but even in the sins and vices and crimes of the highly placed there are lessons which would not be learned were they manifested in meaner men. But when, in addition to a ^{* &}quot;Pope Leo XIII. His Life and Work." By Julien de Narfon. Translated from the French by G. A. Raper. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 7s. 6d.

COUNTESS PECCI, MOTHER OF LEO XIII.

lofty position, its occupant is himself a man of commanding character, of great piety, and of noble soul, it is difficult to over-estimate the benefit which his visibility and conscious presence among the children of men confers upon the race. It is as if in the black and cloudy midnight sky, from which all stars have fled, a radiant planet glowed with silver splendour before our eyes. The star is far off, no doubt, unapproachable, but we see it, and the great immensity of space is no longer cavernous, hollow, and void, and the light wave which bears its twinkling waves adown the darkness makes us feel less alone. We have at least the company of the star.

THE POPE À LA FIGARO.

This train of thought has been suggested by the perusal of M. Narfon's book upon the Pope. In itself it is no very notable book. M. Narfon is a very pleasant writer on the Figuro who does his duty in the place to which his natural gifts have led him, but who would be the first to admit that he is not exactly the kind of man to interpret the inner soul of Leo XIII. His function is humbler, and he discharges it to perfection. He is a first-class gossip, and his book about the Pope enables us to form a more vivid conception of the man as he lives and moves, and eats and drinks, and walks and sleeps amongst us. His book, "Le Pape Intime," helps us to see Leo XIII. as he is seen by his valet-close at hand, in the privacy of the Vatican. And as such it has its uses. It not only enables us to fill in the little character touches which are indispensable to the realisation of any man's character, but it abounds in those familiar details which the more stately historian and biographer pass by as unworthy of their notice. But for the ordinary man, who knows but very few men outside his own family circle, there is something very interesting in this picture of the Pope as he actually lives amongst us.

LEO XIII. AS A MAN WHO NEEDS TO BE SHAVED.

We all, in a more or less shadowy fashion, realise the Pontifex Maximus, who claims to be the vicar of Christ, and who is indubitably the one Christian minister to whom the immense majority of christened men and women look up with a respect, reverence, and love; but such a man, by the unique splendour of his position, is too remote from our daily life. The Pope who sits in the chair of Peter, the Pope who is recognised by a hundred millions of human beings as the divinely appointed vicar of Christ, and custodian of the oracles of the living God, is hardly human. Authority has placed him upon a pinnacle so lofty, that most of the ties of average ordinary life are snapped. We cannot reach up to him. He moves in a sphere apart, and in so far as he does this he loses his hold upon our interest, and the more we look up to him as the Pope the less we are apt to realise him as a man. The benefit of such a book as this of M. Narfon is that we see the Pope without a tiara or his pontifical robes. We are introduced to him as a man among men -a man who, although he has succeeded in attenuating his body almost to vanishing-point, has, nevertheless, a body with a head on it which needs to be shaved as much as any City clerk, a man who takes his walks abroad in his garden like any country squire, and who needs to be fed and to sleep as much as any match-girl in the east. of London. Let us, then, with the aid of M. Narfon's. entertaining pages, which have been well translated into English for the English-speaking world, endeavour to realise for ourselves how the Pope has spent this very day on which these pages meet the eyes of our

m

b

SC

sl

ac

ch

of

m

th

fa

th R: th

wi N:

lai

ga

SS. LEO XIII. IN 1843, ARCHBISHOP OF DAMASCUS AND APOSTOLIC NUNCIO IN BELGIUM.

HIS RISING AND DRESSING.

This morning in the Vatican, in a very narrow bed raised a step above the marble floor covered with a thick carpet, the Pope lay sleeping. In the half light of the alcove, festooned by heavy curtains, is the image of the Madonna, holding the infant Jesus in her arms. At the foot of the bed, beneath a crucifix is a prie-dieu, carved with the Papal escutcheon, on which the Pope's "Book of Hours" lies on a red cushion. It is a few minutes before six. Outside the room is standing the man who more than any other is in closest contact with the sleeping Pontiff. This is the Chevalier Pio Centra, a man unknown to fame, but well known in the Vatican as the Pope's valet. Some years ago he was a hatter in Rome, but entering the Pope's service he displayed so much devotion that the Pope made him a Chevalier of the Order of St. Gregory. Pincio—to give him the name by which he is familiarly called in the Vatican household-has come from his rooms in which he lives with his family close to the Pope's private chambers. It is his duty to call the Pope of a morning at six o'clock. Punctually at that hour he enters the apartment and rouses the sleeper. The Pope is a light sleeper, and is often awake and at work before Pincio enters the room. The moment the Pope rises, Pincio partly dresses him, and the Pope offers his first daily prayer. Then returning from the prie-dieu, he surrenders himself to his valet, who brushes his hair and shaves him. room is fragrant with eau - de - cologne, which the Pope uses in his ablutions. Then, his toilet being complete, the Pope, followed by his valet, passes into a small apartment adjoining his bed-room. The altar is raised only one step; on either side of the case in which the pyx is kept are some marvellously artistic candelabra and two statues of saints. The Pope says mass slowly, with deep reverence, his valet, Pincio, acting as acolyte. The Pope then attends another mass, which is said by the chaplain on duty for the day. This is his thanksgiving.

BREAKFAST AND GARDEN.

Mass having been said, the Pope breakfasts on a little chocolate or café au lait, the milk for which comes from a flock of goats presented to him by the villagers of his native place. They are penned within the myrtle hedges of the Vatican gardens, and are great favourites of the Pope, who often goes to them and talks familiarly with their shepherd. Breakfast over, Cardinal Rampolla arrives at eight o'clock, and the business of the working day begins. After Cardinal Rampolla has gone, the Pope goes out for a short walk in the Vatican gardens. Leo is much interested in horticulture, and does not forget to admonish the gardener when the plants under his charge are not prospering. M. Narfon tells us that on one occasion when some ivy was languishing and the gardener excused himself on the ground that the soil was bad, the Pope replied, Wou don't know what you are talking about, or else you think we believe everything you are pleased to tell us," after which admonition the Pope gave the gardener a regular lecture, which made him exclaim as soon as the Pontiff's back was turned, "He can teach everyone, from the Cardinals to the gardeners. You can't get over him,"

RECEIVING PREFECTS AND VISITORS.

After his morning stroll through the gardens, the Pope returns to his reception-room, where he receives the functionaries who several times a week have to report to him on the business of the household and the general government of the Church. It is like a Sovereign receiving his Ministers. The Prefect of the apostolic Palaces comes, and the major domo of the household and the Prefect of the various congregations and others. After their business is despatched, visitors are received who have been granted a private audience. The Pope sits throughout; the visitor bows on entering, he bows again in the centre of the apartment, and bows a third time when he kisses the Pope's slipper. The visitor remains standing, and when the audience is finished, he walks backwards to the door. This ceremonial is only insisted upon in the case of Catholics. The only rule laid down for heretics was made by the Pope himself, who when he was asked how a distinguished American

VIEW OF THE VATICAN GARDENS FROM THE ENTRANCE.

Protestant should comport himself, replied: "Tell him to do just as if he were being received by the President of the United States."

AT DINNER.

In this way the morning is passed. At two o'clock the Pope dines. He always dines alone. His dinner consists of a consommé and eggs. On rare occasions he takes a little meat. He drinks claret, which has been supplied for years past by some pious nuns in the Gironde. He eats with great rapidity, and is very glad if he is permitted to take some salad, mixed with plenty of vinegar. This, however, is forbidden him by his doctors, much to Leo's regret. But even Popes sometimes cannot resist the temptations of the palate, and a few months ago the Pope was taken so ill in the middle of the night that, the doctor had to be summoned in haste, when his patient humbly confessed that he had broken his instructions and eaten the coveted salad. Sometimes when he is bolting his frugal meal, he asks his secretary to sit at table, but it is only for conversation, and not to share the meal. Dinner done, the Pope takes a short nap, after which he is taken for a drive in the gardens.

lives

the.

rist.

r to

and

but

n, is

the dred

ricar

God,

n a

nary

s he

k up

n as rfon.

fical

men

ting

ss, a las road

s to east

fon's

into

r to

this

our

D,

THE TWO HOURS' DRIVE.

He steps into a special chair, and is carried by his footmen to the garden railings or to the gate of Paul V., where his carriage awaits him. It is either a black landau with red wheels, or a large varnished wood vehicle, both of which are upholstered in white damask. It is drawn by a pair of large black Roman horses. The Pope's stud only consists of twelve horses, four of which are for his own use. There are besides two mules which are used for carrying relics, etc., sent by the Pope to the Roman Churches. When the Pope has seated himself in the Pontifical procession is formed. It consists of two Swiss Guards carrying halberds, and two Noble Guards preceding the chair-bearers, after whom come an officer of the Noble Guard and a Chamberlain. The procession generally crosses the Raphael rooms, map galleries, tapestry and candelabra salons, and reaches the garden by the grand staircase of the museum, where the Pope, before getting into his carriage, throws a red mantle over his shoulders, and puts on a hat of the same colour. The carriage, with its two footmen standing behind in black coats and high hats to match the coachman, is escorted by mounted Noble Guards. Any person accompanying the Pope sits opposite, not beside him. The drive, which usually lasts two hours, is always taken in the same place, through a magnificent avenue of plane trees and oaks, extending from the Angelica Gate to the Cavalleggeri Gate. Whilst driving the Holy Father reads, or talks to those who accompany him. Sometimes he gets out of the carriage and walks for a few moments with the help of a gold-caded cane. To be sure, he can manage without this cane, and he displays a certain amount of pride in so doing, and even walking more briskly when there are rumours in Rome that the Pope

STUDY, SUPPER AND SLEEP.

When he is brought back, he is carried to his apartments in the same portentina, and passing with light and rapid step through a red velvet door, he enters his study. No sooner is he seated than the electric bell sounds, and the secretary, Mgr. Angeli, rejoins his master. The study where the Pope works is a simple room, containing an official desk under a crucifix, and a few chairs upholstered in red stuff. At a little distance from the desk is his armchair, and a small table covered with green velvet. As the Pope sits at work you can hear the twittering of the singing-birds which are kept in a cage behind the hangings. At ten o'clock the Pope sups. He then tells his rosary in company with the prelates on duty in his private chapel. After this has been done, the newspapers are read to him, having been carefully prepared for his reading by his secretary, Mgr. Angeli, who marks and annotates the passages most likely to interest the Pope. Long after midnight the electric light burns bright in his room, and he often does not go to bed until one in the morning. Even then, after he has dismissed his secretary, Mgr. Angeli is never sure that he may not be waked in the few hours reserved for sleep in order that he may attend his master and write at his dictation. M. Narfon says :-

Leo XIII. sleeps very little, and as he cannot endure prolonged inactivity, he frequently fills up the time of waiting for Morpheus by wooing the Muse, or thinking out some encyclical whereof the first sheets are lying on his writing-table. Perhaps his ideas worthline into corresponding which he for the form the list state of the control of the arrives, half asleep, resignedly seats himself at his table, and writes, from the Master's dictation, a set of Latin verses, or one of those wonderful compositions that carry the bread of truth from Rome to the uttermost parts of the earth.

HIS "BIT OF FRANCE."

Such is the life which the Pope has spent to-day if, as is possible enough, he is still in the Vatican; but as it is now mid-summer. the routine of his existence may differ,

During the summer the Pontiff spends nearly the whole of the day in the historic Leonine tower. This massive structure dates from the end of the ninth century and the reign of Leo IV., who built it to protect the city of Rome against the Saracens. The Leonine tower consists of three floors. The Pope usually occupies a large round room lighted by two windows. The walls are nearly sixteen feet thick. In the recess of a third window, walled up, is a couch on which the Holy Father can enjoy the siesta so dear to the Roman heart. I should also mention an exact reproduction of the Massabiella grotto in the most poetical and charming spot in the palace. A statue of our Lady of Lourdes stands in the hollow of the rock. The Sovereign Pontiff often has himself carried to this grotto to tell his beads. He delights in tending the flowers growing all around. When a cardinal asked him one day why he visited this spot so frequently, Leo XIII. replied, "It's my bit of France."

CARDINAL SVAMPA.

Once a week the Pope goes to confession to Mgr. Pifferi, an Augustine friar, who is sacristan of the apostolic palaces. Every week Leo XIII. receives absolution at the hands of Mgr. Pifferi, from whose hands he will receive extreme unction when his time comes to die. Although the Pope expects to live for a long time yet, he is quite sure he will die suddenly, and his meditations upon his decease have been embodied in his Latin poem entitled "Leo's Last Prayer," which the translator of M. Narfon's book renders thus in English: -

TO GOD AND THE VIRGIN MOTHER.

Leo's Last Prayer. After a final gleam the sun pales, clothes itself in shadow, and dying, downward sinks; black night descends, O Leo. It seizes thee; no more the generous blood courses through thy dried-up veins; life flees thy exhausted body.

Dea funera But object The O men

Ma in the And a mot Rec will a

Th

does and : Pope " His of st willow ting. were living pierci const some an a seem great spect who i him,

> The I was n of an liness smiles will to tion o the p blazo shines On attent delica

Ver

a litt Fathe

with

agate taken The tomed in co break inton The Frenc his r (" Th

stimu

W book perso For i lit th extra Ins

electr

a yea

Death throws his fatal dart; thy bones, enveloped in the funeral shroud, shall lie imprisoned beneath the cold stone.

But the soul, released from bondage, soars up to heaven, the object of its hopes.

29

is

er,

he

es

ıs.

ly

he rd

an

so

he

ur

he

11

The soul hastens; the end of its long journeying is at hand. O merciful God! hear its anguished cry!

May I reach heaven, and, O last boon of all, delight for ever in the divine light and presence of my God.

And be with thee, O Virgin, whom I, a little child, loved as a mother, and now, an aged man, cherish still more ardently.

Receive me into heaven, and I, a fellow-citizen of the saints, will attribute so splendid a reward to thee.

TWO PICTURES OF HIS HOLINESS.

The Pope has often been described, but M. Narfon does well to reproduce the descriptions of M. Firmantine and Madame Séverine. M. Firmantine, who saw the Pope leaving his chair on his way to the study, says: "His wasted body sprang erect, as if impelled by springs of steel. There was an air of majesty about the tall willowy form, and the head (a splendid one) was fascinating. The broad forehead was pale as ivory. The lips were colourless, but the eyes lit up and vivified this living skeleton. They were black, deeply set and piercing. The fire that issued from them seemed to have consumed the face in which they were set. There was something terrifying in their brilliancy. There was an airy lightness in his tread." The frail, hight form seemed to M. Firmantine to "glide before him like a great wing, while a hand so diaphanous as to be almost spectral, waved a gentle benediction." Madame Séverine, who interviewed the Pope eight years ago, thus describes him, as he appeared to her at the time of audience:—

Very pale, very upright, very thin, his person hardly visible, a little earthly clay in a covering of white cloth, the Holy Father was sitting at the end of the room in a large arm-chair, with his back to a console-table surmounted by a crucifix. The Pope appeared to me "whiter" than he was painted. He was more human and more touching; less of a sovereign, more of an apostle, and almost a grandfather! A tender, timid kindliness seems to lurk between his lips and peep out when he smiles; but the long firm nose reveals will, inflexible will, the will that can wait! Leo XIII. appeared to me like an incarnation of his family arms. His form is as slender and stately as the pine standing out against the ground azure of the Pecci blazon. His eyes are clear and bright as the morning star that shines at the summit of his heraldic tree.

One feature of the Pope's personality attracts and retains attention almost as strongly as his face. I refer to the long, delicate, diaphanous, beautifully chiselled hands. With their agate-like nails, they remind one of precious ivory ex-votos, taken out of their case for some special occasion.

taken out of their case for some special occasion.

The voice sounds far off, exiled by prayer, and more accustomed to rise towards heaven than descend to us. Nevertheless, in conversation it comes back to earth from time to time, and breaks its Gregorian recitative with something like a major intonation.

The Pope expresses himself both elegantly and correctly in French, with just a touch of his own nationality to flavour his remarks. The characteristic Italian exclamation, Ecco! ("There!") recurs constantly, like the snap of a whip, to stimulate or change the conversation.

ELECTRIC LIGHT IN THE VATICAN.

We have said enough to illustrate the character of the book. There is plenty more copy in it of the same kind, personal gossip about the Pope and all his belongings. For instance, M. Narfon tells us that the Vatican is now lit throughout with electric light, and that this is not an extravagance but a great economy.

Instead of an annual expenditure of at least £600 on gas, the electric light would not cost more than £72, or a saving of £528 a year, which in three or four years would cover the cost of fitting the electric light. The current was obtained by means of a specially-contrived waterfall, 43 feet in height, the water being supplied from the Eagle basin in the Vatican gardens. The waterfall generates a force equal to ten horse-power, which is transmitted by a turbine to a dynamo, and suffices for the 600 electric lamps in the Vatican. By order of the Pope a figure of the Virgin holding the infant Jesus in her arms was placed on one of the walls of the electric lighting shed.

PAPAL FORCES AND FINANCES.

It was said that the Pope had no right to be present at the Hague Conference because he had no standing army, but the Grand Duke of Luxembourg was represented, and the total standing army of Luxembourg consists of 150 soldiers and 150 gendarmes, 300 in all, whereas the Pontifical army consists of 100 Swiss guards, 120 gendarmes, and the Noble Guard, a total armed force of 600 officers and men. The Pope spends £280,000 every year on the administration of the Church. The maintenance of the Vatican itself, including the pay of the army, amounts to £100,000. Peter's Pence have fallen off very much since the Pope gave his support to the French Republic. When they were at the maximum they amounted to £400,000 per annum. The French Conservatives had no hesitation in cutting down their contributions to the Peter's Pence in order to teach the Pope a lesson. His jubilee, however, came opportunely to his assistance, when presents amounting to £1,600,000 were given to him by the faithful throughout the world. Most of his money is said to be invested in London with the Rothschilds.

CARDINAL SERAFINO VANNUTELLI.

The Pope, according to M. Narfon, is the greatest of Latin writers that ever lived. The following passage is a trifle tall:—

s e e s

His compositions have the conciseness of Tacitus, the richness and elegance of Cicero, and the grace of Sallust-the three classical prose authors whom the Pope prizes above all others.

The Pope writes both in prose and in verse, and he has even written charades for a Roman magazine entitled "Vox Urbis." As very few of our readers will have seen any specimens of the Pope's verse, I quote here the translation of one of the longest of the Pope's poems. It was translated first from the Latin into French by a Jesuit, and then from French into English, as follows :-

CARMEN SÆCULARE.

In memory of the most happy day on which the Franks, led by Clovis, gave themselves to Christ.

The peoples of this earth arise, inspired By God, who power gives and takes away. All human greatness doth He make and mar As pleaseth Him; for He alone is great.

Before the threatening Teuton hordes, the Franks Were giving way, when, to the King of Heaven, Clovis, with dawning faith allied to fear, Stretched forth his arms and raised imploring eyes.

"O Thou whom Clotilde humbly doth adore, Save us; Thy awful sway I meekly own. All, all I yield; my country and my life. Save us, O save us, Lord, and I believe.'

Fear vanishes; the Franks take heart anew, Hope dawns again on every brow and heart. A foaming mountain torrent now, the Franks O'erwhelm their bloody tyrants of the eve.

Thy cry, O Frankish king, the Lord bath heard; Thou triumphest, but, mindful of thy word, Thy neck shalt thou before the Church incline; To holy Rheims the bishop welcomes thee.

Whose be these standards in the church? Behold! Before Christ's altar kneels a mighty king. His warriors leads he to the holy font, And all the people follow in his train.

Tremble, O Rome, and view thy wakening might ! O Queen 1 O Mother! spread thy arms o'er all! The faith of Christian France hast thou received: Of France, the chosen race that is to be.

Thy eldest daughter she; her mighty sword Shall hold thee scatheless and protect thy rights. Her generous sons no prouder boast shall make Than faith in Peter, greatest king of all.

From age to age, behold, her heroes come ; Fierce Astolph's conqueror leads the goodly throng, Waving his sword, the sword of Frankish might, The Pope's defender and the Holy See's

He comes. Rome is avenged, and with his arms Once more doth Victory cross the Alps. His sword Italia frees and carves a kingdom out To place beneath the Roman monarch's sway.

But have a care; behold the threatening clouds That gather o'er thy head. Alas, they seek To mask thy brow with error. O beware, And let thy glorious past unsullied shine!

Let Christ remain thy king! Let every soul Be open to His word; let hatred cease, Let Sect give up its captives, let the world. Behold your union and the strength it gives. Though centuries have passed, thy heart is still A spring of life: let life well up again As in the past. O valiant sons of France To Vesla's banks press on, and onward still. Thy name resounds, O France, on Orient's shore. The path that shook beneath thy feet O seek Again, and let thy hand set up the cross Of Christ, and bear salvation unto all.

HOW HE LEARNED FRENCH.

When the Pope has signed his encyclical he never publishes it, but allows it to remain for several weeks in a locked drawer, the key of which he keeps himself. Then, when he has carefully read it over and revised it, he sends it to the printers. Many remarkable things are told of the Pope, among others that he learned to speak French admirably in ten days. M. Narfon says :-

After having served as delegate to Spoleto and Perugia, Mgr. Pecci received the appointment of Papal Nuncio at Brussels. On the way thither he was detained at Nimes about ten days, which delay he managed to utilise by taking lessons in French, which he had previously only a slight acquaintance with. When he arrived at Brussels he was able to express himself with correctness and even elegance.

M. Narfon will pardon me if I apply to this anecdote one of the stories found in his own pages. "What would you do," one of the princes of the church was asked, "if the Holy See tried to force you to admit that two and two make six?" "I would admit it at once," was the reply; "and before signing I would ask, 'Would not you like me to make it seven?'" So we are quite willing to. believe that the Pope learned to speak French in ten days-of which he had previously but a slight acquaintance—nay, we are even willing to believe that he acquired the gift in ten minutes! His apostolic predecessor on the Day of Pentecost received the gift of tongues in as many seconds.

A CURIOUS PROPHECY.

There is a good deal of interesting matter in the book, concerning the early days of the Pope with his mother who believed in him from the first. M. Narfon quotes a very curious prophecy from some bombastic Italian poet. who lived in the Pope's native village, which is a very striking instance of the poetical prophecy literally ful-

Like Jove's eagle, he shall perch upon the rocky summit. It is written in the Eternal Book of Fate, that he shall be crowned with the tiara and hold the sceptre. I see him seated on a lofty throne, the cross on his breast and the tiara on his brow. Italy, the Low Countries, France, England, the shore of Africa itself shall see and admire his virtues. Some day he shall be adored on earth, his glory shall be seated on the throne, and the omni-potent God who rules over all shall make him the Shepherd of Christ's flock.

TIFFS WITH HIS CARDINALS.

The Pope when a boy was passionately fond of shooting. His shooting days are long since past, but this is another of the human ties which unite him to the rest of his fellow men. These touches of human nature are not wanting, for the Pope seems to be a man who is capable both of administering sharp reproof and of frankly confessing his error. For instance, finding himself thwarted on one occasion by Cardinal Oreglio, he told him sharply :-

"Will your Eminence please remember that I can not only bestow the hat but take it away?"

"Holy Father," quietly replied Cardinal Oreglia, "you have that power; but if you use it against me, I shall consider myself happy to suffer for having spoken the truth."

This incident occurred at the beginning of the year 1884.

On March 27th following, Leo XIII., realising that in Cardinal Oreglia he had to deal with a man and not with a courtier, appointed him camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church, or, as we have already explained, the eventual head of the executive power during the next vacancy in the Holy See.

On another occasion he was so put out by Cardinal Parrochi that he asked him to resign. The wily Cardinal asked for time, and then, when the Pope sent to ask him conv to b Libe It disp adm 1838 of E pron

M

troop

for 1

two

" I

rem

thin

Pop

camp infor and guide the With Pecc throu sente And In

had

by p

of g

M

storn

for his decision, he asked for more time. At the end of two days Cardinal Parrochi sent his answer. He said: "I have fully reflected, and I consider it my duty to remain at my post so long as your Holiness does not think fit to relieve me of it." The delay had given the ges are speak Pope time to think it over, and the period of reflection convinced him that Cardinal Parrochi was too useful to be sacrificed, even although he was opposed to the Liberal policy adopted in relation to the French Republic.

BRIGAND QUELLER.

It is not generally known that the Pope in his carly life displayed qualities which would have made him a good administrator in the North West Provinces of India. In 1838 he was despatched as Papal delegate to the province of Benevento, then in a very unsettled state, and took prompt and vigorous action against the brigands:—

Mgr. Pecci began by satisfying himself that the Pontifical troops could be relied upon. He then drew up his plans of campaign with the utmost secrecy. He obtained the fullest information on the districts in which brigandage chiefly flourished, and despatch d columns of troops led by reliable and experienced guides. The result soon surpassed all expectations. Most of the robber chiefs were arrested, and their gangs dispersed. With a view to restoring confidence among the people, Mgr. Pecci had the dreaded chiefs loaded with chains, and marched through the streets of the city. He also took care that all sentences passed by the Courts were carried out to the letter. And brigandage died out for want of brigandas.

AS ADMINISTRATOR.

In those days the territorial sovereignty of the Pope had afforded opportunities to ecclesiastics for acquiring by practical experience some knowledge of the difficulties of government. When he was in command at Perugia, he had a pretty lively time:—

Mgr. Pecci's term of office was very stormy, but fruitful-stormy, because he was twice, in 1849 and 1860, brought face to face with a revolu ion. In 1849 the Garibaldians took possession of the city, and the Austrians, under the command of Prince von Lichtenstein, were preparing to attack them when Mgr. Pecci intervened, with the result that order was restored without bloodshed. Eleven years afterwards, September 14th, 1860, Perugia was captured by an army of 15,000 Piedmontese under General de Sonnaz. The enemy took possession of the seminary and the Bishop's palace.

He was philanthropic and humanitarian in his administration, publishing a set of rules for the management of the Monte di Pietà, or State pawnbroking system. The same desire inspired his important encyclical on the social question—a Pontifical act of incalculable importance, which earned him the title of the workmen's Pope. To return to Perugia, Mgr. Pecci founded in that city a great number of charitable institutions—a boys' orphanage, a home for female penitents, a women's almshouse, an apprentices' association, a benevolent society in aid of indigent priests, etc. His love for the poor was only equalled by his zal for the house of God.

ONE TOO MANY FOR HIS DOCTOR.

I will conclude this string of extracts from a very readable book by the following anecdote of the Pope and his doctor—one of the delightfully human touches of nature which make the whole world kin:—

Last year, when the Pope was suffering from hoarseness, the doctor advised his patient to considerably curtail a discourse he was to deliver during the day. Leo XIII. pocketed the powder, and thought no more about it. As to the discourse, the Hely Father did not omit a word of it. In vain did the doctor, who was present, repeatedly clear his throat with much emphasis as a reminder to the Pope to economise his strength. His Holiness kept on and even purposely raised his voice. After finishing his address he sent for Dr. Lapponi, handed him the powder, and said, laughing, "Here, my dear doctor, take your powder yourself; you evidently need it more than I."

The Pope takes snuff, and when it was prohibited during his recent illness, he suffered keenly.

From " The United States of Europe."] sons in e with. If with ecdote would d, "if o and is the t you

about

ing to.

n ten naintnt he stolic
the book, other otes a poet, very fult. It lofty Italy, itself dored omnierd of

but the ture no is d of ding glio,

you sider

tinal rtier, er, as utive

inal inal him

Some Notable Books of the Month.

THE TRAIL OF THE GOLD-SEEKERS.

BY HAMLIN GARLAND.

WHEN the reports of the discovery of gold in the far North-West of Canada attracted a countless swarm of human beings, as a magnet draws to itself a multitude of iron filings, Mr. Hamlin Garland determined to follow the trail of the gold-seekers, to be one of them, and to record their deeds. He has written a fascinating book of travel and adventure. It is a book of a literary man turned traveller, and not of a traveller turned author. The volume, therefore, has a finished grace and polish about it too often lacking in the bald narration of the explorer and discoverer. Mr. Garland did not choose to follow the usual route to Dawson City. He joined the rush when the horrors and perils of the Chilcoot and the White Pass were being published broadcast. Gold-seekers were casting about for new routes to the land of gold. In many cases they discovered infinitely worse and more arduous paths, some of them manifestly impossible. But when a man has caught the gold fever, he has done with common-sense. Mr. Garland selected a route which he admits was "absurd and foolish." It was that which started from the Canadian-Pacific at Ashcroft, and made its tortuous way northward between the great glacial coast range on the west and the spurs of the continental divide on the east. He was not a gold-seeker, but a nature hunter, and he willingly took the long way round and the hard way through.

THE LONG TRAIL.

At Ashcroft Mr. Garland joined the long trail. He had made arrangements to have supplies delivered at two points on the route, but even then it was necessary to carry every crumb of food in one case three hundred and sixty miles and in the other four hundred. The town swarmed with gold-seekers all eager to move northward. Having bought horses and provisions, Mr. Garland and his partner started for the Klondike at the end of April. They soon began to feel a respect for the narrow little path they followed. It was hardly an arm's span in width, but it was over eight hundred miles in length, and wound ever northward. This respect deepened into awe when they began to climb the great wooded divide which separates the Fraser River from the Blackwater. wild forest settled around them, grim, stern and forbidding. They were done with civilisation. Everything that was required for a home in the cold and the heat was bound upon their five horses. They had to carry bed, board, roof, food, and medical stores, a load which had to be handled four times a day. There is a great deal of work on the trail—cooking, care of the horses, together with almost ceaseless packing and unpacking, and the trouble of keeping the pack horses out of the mud. From five in the morning till five at night they toiled. Soon one tremendous fact impressed them. There were no returning footsteps on this trail. They all pointed northward, none south. The land before them was a mystery-no one knew what its character might be. Over mountains and down valleys, across streams and through forests, the trail wound its inexorable way. At times the scenery was indescribably beautiful, at others insufferably monotonous. Now the journey was a delightful excursion, but at other times it seemed a sort of motionless progres-Once their tent was set up and the baggage arranged they lost all sense of having moved at all.

THE GOLD FEVER.

Gold seekers such as Mr. Garland, well provided with provisions, had a hard time of it. But there were others, seized by the gold frenzy, who started on the long journey with only 40 lbs. of supplies and three or four dollars in Soon their hands became like claws, and their knees seemed about to pierce their trousers. Mr. Garland describes the life they led :-

At first the trail was good, and they were able to make twenty miles each day. The weather was dry and warm, and sleeping was not impossible. They camped close beside the trail when they grew tired—I had seen and recognised their campingplaces all along. But the rains came on, and they were forced to walk all day through the wet shrubs, with the water dripping from their ragged garments. They camped at night beneath the firs (for the ground is always dry under a fir), where a fire is easily built. There they hung over the flame drying their clothing and their rapidly weakening shoes. The mosquitoes swarmed upon them bloodily in the shelter and warmth of the-trees, for they had no netting or tent. Their meals were composed of tea, a few hastily-stewed beans, and a poor quality of sticky camp bread. Their sleep was broken and fitful. They were either too hot or too cold, and the mosquitoes gave way only when the frost made slumber difficult. In the morning they awoke to the necessity of putting on their wet shoes and taking the muddy trail, to travel as long as they could stagger forwerd. In addition to all this, they had no maps, and knew nothing of their whereabouts, or how far it was to a human habitation. Their only comfort lay in the passing of outfits like mine. From such as I they "rustled" food and clothing.

THE RUSH TO RUIN.

The gold-seekers do not supply the human element in this grim narrative of travel. There is something inhuman and uncanny in the feverish eagerness with which these men push northward to a frozen land, encounter unheard-of perils and endure fearful sufferings, because some thousand miles away gold may be gained. Mr. Garland says :-

They seemed like mechanisms. They moved as if drawn by some great magnet whose centre was Dawson City. They appeared to drift on and on toward that human maelstrom going irresolutely to their ruin. They did not seem to me strong men—on the contrary, they seemed weak men—or men strong with one insane purpose. They set their faces toward the Golden North, and went on and on through every obstacle like men dreaming, like somnambulists—bending their backs to the most crushing burdens, their faces distorted with effort. "On to Dawson!" "To the Klondike!" That was all they knew.

THE ART OF BUCKING.

It is a relief to turn to the animal life on the northward The horses, at least, are more human than the men. Mr. Garland's description of them and their ways is charming. His devotion to his own horse, Prince Ladrone, is almost pathetic. He was, however, an exceptionally fine animal. Others were not. An amusing chapter is devoted to discussing the psychology of the Blue Mat, a little blue-gray cayuse. He was a past master in the art of bucking. Mr. Garland says:—

Something took place. I heard a bang, a clatter, a rattle of hoofs. I peered around the bay and saw the blue pony performing some of the most finished, vigorous and varied bucking it has ever been given me to witness. He all but threw somer-saults. He stood on his upper lip; he humped up his back till he looked like a lean cat on a graveyard fence; he stood on his toe calks and spun like a weather vane on a livery stable; and when the pack exploded and the saddle slipped under his belly, was li spurte drizzle ever d and s savag man a great starva were might upon in the were through count and ri forest: were a savag

Cro

he kic

The

Garla

descri

remar

little

there

descri

At mined Passcompa deserv The hailste

madly

terrib

of carr the pre we pas land, Nature hard, burden where had br sleighs most (iron le scene.

Mr. fields, he kicked it to pieces by using both hind hoofs as featly as a man would stroke his beard.

RELENTLESS NATURE.

The worst part of the journey was yet to come. Mr. Garland has interspersed his chapters with verses describing the difficulties of the way. There is nothing remarkable about them and the book would have lost little had they been omitted. Occasionally, however, there are a few striking lines, as, for instance, the following description of Relentless Nature:—

with

thers,

urney

ars in their rland

wenty

eeping

when ipingforced pping th the fire is their uitoes

of the

were uality

They

e way

rning

s and

agger

knew uman

s like nt in hing

with

, en-

ings,

ned.

n by

They

going

men

with olden

men

most

n to vard

vays ince

an sing

the past

le of orm-

ng it

mer-

till his

and elly,

VIINA

W.

She laid her rivers to snare us,
She set her snows to chill,
Her clouds had the cunning of vultures,
Her plants were charged to kill.
The glooms of her forests benumbed us,
On the slime of her ledges we sprawled;
But we set our feet to the northward,
And crawled, and crawled, and crawled!
We defied her, and cursed her, and shouted:
"To hell with your rain and your snow.
Our minds we have set on a journey,
And despite of your anger we go!"

THE GREAT SILENT LAND.

Crossing the Big Divide was a terrible experience. It was like swimming in a sea of green water. The mud spurted under the horses' hoofs, the sky was gray and drizzled moisture, and as they rose they plunged into ever deepening forests. Hazel bushes, alders, wild roses, and grasses were left behind and the forest became savage, sinister, and silent. It was a land of torture to man and beast. There was no living thing. It was a great silent land. The journey became a grim race with starvation. Each day food became scantier, and they were compelled to move no matter what the weather might be like. Descending the Divide the horses slid upon their haunches and were unable to turn themselves in the mud. They crushed into the tangled pines and were in danger of being torn to pieces. The trail ran through a barren, monotonous, silent, gloomy, and rainy country. It had almost no wild animal life. Its lakes and rivers were for the most part cold and sullen. Its forests were sombre and depressing. The mosquitoes were a distraction but not a pleasant one. At night the savage insects could be heard like the roaring of a far-off hailstorm. The horses rolled in the dirt, snorted, wheeled madly, stamped, shook their heads, and endured most terrible sufferings.

THE WAY OF DEATH.

At Glenora Mr. Garland abandoned the trail, determined to reach the coast and enter by way of the White Pass—the Way of Death. The trail over the Pass was comparatively easy, but it appears in the past to have deserved its gruesome name. Mr. Garland says:—

The waters reeked with carrion. The breeze was the breath of carrion, and all nature was made indecent and disgusting by the presence of carcasses. Within the distance of fifteen miles we passed more than two thousand dead horses. It was a cruel land, and land filled with a record of men's merciless greed. Nature herself was cold, majestic, and grand. The trail rough, hard, and rocky. The horses laboured hard under their heavy burdens, though the floor they trod was always firm. . . . Everywhere were the traces of the furious flood of human kind that had broken over this height in the early spring. Wreckage of sleighs, abandoned cattle, heaps of camp refuse, clothing, and, most eloquent of all, the pathway itself, worn into the pitiless iron ledges, made it possible for me to realise something of the

Mr. Garland did not get further than the Atlin gold-fields, and then returned to civilisation. (Macmillan.)

BIG GAME IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

M. Foà's Exploits.

M. EDOUARD FOA'S handsome volume, "After Big Game in Central Africa" (A. and C. Black, 21s.), is the most interesting book on sport which has appeared for many a long day. It is filled from cover to cover with graphic descriptions of the killing of lions, elephants, rhinoceroses and innumerable other wild beasts which haunt the jungles of Central Africa. M. Foà has a consuming passion for the pursuit of big game. There is no animal in the African continent which has not contributed a victim to his deadly rifle. Elephants, rhinoceroses, giraffes, hippopotami, lions, buffaloes, leopards, elands, zebras, antelopes and crocodiles, besides many other varieties, fell before M. Foà's well-directed bullets. Between 1891 and 1893 he shot 704 animals; between 1894 and 1897 1,228 wild beasts, of which 488 were large animals. It is his exploits during this latter period that he describes. It is impossible to give an adequate idea of the wealth of information contained in his volume about the habits of wild animals and how they are killed. The book ought to be read in its entirety. A few extracts, however, will convey some idea of the nature of the book.

THE DEATH OF A MAN-EATER.

M. Foà has much to say about lions and their ways. He has had many a narrow escape from death at the claws of the King of the Jungle. He does not, however, believe that the lion is brave. It fears man and always gives way before him. M. Foà has lived for years in the midst of lions, but has never come to any harm. The lion has three enemies, the most formidable of which is the wolf, which can, and sometimes does, kill the lion. Its other foes are snakes and thorns. M. Foà narrates many stories of how he has killed lions by day and night. The following account of the shooting of a man-eater, which had carried off a fourteen-year old boy from a village, is typical of many encounters. The lion has taken refuge in the grass. M. Foà says:—

I consider whether everything is ready, and I enter the grass, my finger on the trigger, eyes directed well in front, ears on the stretch without making the slightest noise with my feet . . . We hear a rustling in the grass ten yards aherd; we see the tops move, but nothing more. We continue to advance slowly. Ah! there is a tree to my right! A sign to Kambombe, who climbs like a monkey, and in a trice he is at the fork on the look out . . "There is the child," he says, in a stifled voice, "but no lion" . . Then turning his head to the right: "There he is! . . . Quick, this way!" And, guided by his gesture, I run to my right; then, a thought striking me, I beckon to the villagers who follow us to approach, and with a movement of my arm tell them to wind round the grass to the left. I send Rodzani to ask them to make a noise, so as to drive the lion towards me. I myself take up a position in a glade, standing motionless, all my faculties brought to bear on that square of brush which I count upon seeing the lion leave. Kambombe gives me information in a low voice from his tree. "He's off . . No, comes this way . . . He stops and looks in the direction of the men . . . He raises his mane . . . Ah, he comes in your direction! . . . At walking pace . . . He's going to pass the ant hill Ah, if you were here! How well I see him . . . He looks behind him . . . There he is! there he is! Get back a little, get back!" One can understand with what anxiety I hear these words. Following his advice I retire two steps. My men are behind me with their weapons ready. "Only fire in case of necessity." I tell them . . . "Don't hurry yourself," murmurs Tambarika. The rustling grass bends forward, then opens on either side, and the lion walks out eight yards away from me, looking behind him, engrossed by the noise of voices. Upon turning his head he sees me standing motionless, shows his teeth, and snarls without deviating from his path. At the same time his tail rises, he flattens his ears, and I see he is going to charge at the very moment when, having followed him with my rifle, and aiming at the nape of his neck, I pull the trigger His four feet give way under him and he falls stone dead without a movement.

HOW NOT TO DO IT.

Compare with this the native method of dealing with a man-eater, for they leave other lions severely alone. About eighty natives set out in pursuit, accompanied by M. Foa and some of his men. They formed a circle round the lion, and as soon as it made its appearance began firing wildly :-

Bullets come hissing above my head, by my side, everywhere; and a piece of iron passing with a dry noise near my ear strikes the trunk of the tree, behind which I take shelter immediately. During the space of ten minutes the seventy-two muzzle-loaders are fired, loaded and again discharged. Two more bullets strikeny shelter; others pass by with a prolonged buzz. At last the cries cease, the smoke clears away, and I understand that the hunt is abandoned. My men come to tell me what has happened. The lion tried to find an opening at several points of the line time after time and the shots drove him back. But he took advantage of a breach in the human barrier and escaped by the place we entered without having apparently been wou ided. Not so the natives, eleven of whom are wounded, two of them seriously. This is an extraordinary moderate number, considering that eighty men formed a circle of fifty yards towards the centre of which they fired, fortunately rather high from all points of the circumference, during a quarter of an hour. My men are uninjured or hardly injured at all, having thrown themselves on their stomachs as soon as the fatillade began.

PURSUED BY AN ELEPHANT.

M. Foa shot numbers of elephants, but on one occasion very nearly met his death from an infuriated animal which he had woulded and was tracing in the forest. He gives a very vivid description of the pursuit :-

No sooner have we arrived than, within terrifying proximity, there breaks upon our ears a ery of rage, a shrill trumpet blast similar to the shriek of a sirene, and a black mass, which we have not even time to look at so near is it to us, bursts like a locomotive from the thicket which we are skirting. Each of us leaps aside in search of safety. Msiambiri and I dash straight ahead through the hole made by the herd. . . . The ground trembles . . . a sinister rustling of the leaves, the breaking of branches, the shriller and shriller trumpet blasts tell us that the elephant is behind us and overtaking us
... There is no doubt about it. ... We throw down our heavy rifles so as to run the quicker. It is impossible to describe the terror mingled with rage which fills me at this moment. During our mad race all my thoughts are summed up as follows: "No rifle . . . many elephants killed with impunity, this is the hour of reckoning . The game is up . . . a rapid vision of my native country . . That is all ... And now, clenching my fists, I run and jump in a supreme struggle for life . . . Minu es slip by and seem to be bours. Some one, whom I recognise as Msiambiri, though without seeing him, brushes past me. Our feet pass swiftly over the ground. Trees upon trees flash past , . . Behind us the shrill cries stop, but on our heels are heavy footsteps which shake the ground; a powerful spasmodic breathing is heard; then warm air passes over my shoulders and neck... Heavens! it is its trunk! "Tchitamha! tchitamba" (trunk), murmurs the wretched fellow at my side. On we fly, maddened and blinded, bruising ourselves in grazing trees, insensible either to thorns which tear us or to branches which whip our faces... It is useless!... I shall soon grow feeble and fall ... Then I hear as in a dream the cry, "A mala!" ("It is all over"), usered in despairing accents, and I see a body rise in the air ... I am alone . . . The noise has ceased . . . I continue running for a few seconds unconsciously, but the awakening comes. I stop, and the terrible reality stares me in the face . . . Yes, I am saved; but the other is dead!—and through my fault. Remorse and regret complete my distraction. I lean against the tree faltering, overcome.

The man was not dead, however. He had escaped by a miracle, and shortly afterwards had the satisfaction of standing beside the dead body of his enemy.

SKINNING AN ELEPHANT.

M. Foà gives many interesting details which enable us to realise better the huge bulk of the African elephant. Here is an elaborate description of the skinning of one of these huge beasts. When it comes to removing the internals, he says:—

You would think you were looking at children struggling with an enormous milky-white eiderdown. As the liver, heart, and lungs are already removed, the body of the animal forms an immense cavity, generally full of blood; and to be more at their ease, ten of the men get inside, where, covered with blood and bathed up to the knees in it, they continue their work. The head is detached, then-the blood having been previously gathered in skins-all help in turning over the body. the parts are detached the natives proceed to make biltong. By . working from eleven until eight o'clock, all that one can do that day is to carry the two elephants to the camp and to pile the meat there as well as may be into a veritable mountain. the average, forty men are required to carry a female elephant thus cut up, flesh and bones included; fifty-two for a male. When the bones have been taken out and the flesh is dried, the numbers are reduced to about one-half-that is, twenty-five men for a male, twenty for a female. One can estimate the approximate minimum weight of a living animal at two tons for a male and rather over one ton and a half for a female.

A RHINOCEROS'S CHARGE.

Another dangerous animal is the rhinoceros. His charge is terrible, although hardly as dangerous as that of the buffalo when the latter is in the grass and not in the open. The following is M. Foà's description of a rhinoceros's charge:—

In the midst of broken branches, overturned shrubs, and trampled grass, appears a huge mass which charges in our direction with the speed of a locomotive. We have only time to jump on one side. The animal passes, but so quickly that I cannot take aim, being hindered from doing so by a tree. It disappears in the grass. But in a few seconds we hear it returning on its steps, again seeking for that vitiated air, that smell of the enemy which has provoked its anger. It snorts and searches, turns and turns again like a gigantic pointer, with this difference, that the rôles are reversed-we are the game which it is looking for. . . . This cursed vegetation is so thick that there is nothing to do but to wait; it is impossible to fire. I see the top of the grass wave and the shrubs lean over; I can guess, therefore, the position of the animal, but it remains invisible. However, its anger increases, and it continues to snort, making a noise somewhat similar to the grunting of a pig, only louder and deeper. It draws near. . . . From which way is the wind blowing? It is impossible to say, for the earth is wet and there is no dust. . . . Time is pressing. . . . Ah! it charges us a second time! This time I see my animal a moment before it is upon us; although going at a gallop, it is not travelling over the ground so quickly as it was. We have jumped aside, and everyone is hidden . . . Stationed behind a tree, I see it advance splendidly, and I decide to stop its passage. Doubtless smelling our fresh tracks, it slackens its pace when in front of us, and I take advantage of this to fire two shots, which make it swing round in a direction opposite to ours. Before disappearing through the smoke it receives another express bullet.

HOW WOLVES CHEAT THE CROCODILE.

M. Fod has many interesting things to say about the African wolf—how he hunts his game, and how even the lion falls a prey to his tactics. I have not room for game hides meth wate done when

and e

O

quot

relat to t insta Or meas befor was intest with were hardl disco light. head found me in never rather ball,

there

six ya

and a unabl

these

TH
"Anring s early, scribe
for Ve are ge
The
prope
Vol.

All under ately, with f

In to occup of the the cri Ameri Island important has be

Some remini or his quotation, except for the following fact, which is interesting evidence of the intelligence of the wolf:—

When traversing the country in every direction in search of game they continually cross rivers, and, knowing that the water hides one of their worst enemies—the crocodile—this is the method they adopt to avoid it. Assembling at the edge of the water, they bark so as to attract the crocodiles; when this is done they set off at full speed either up or down stream, and when a hundred yards away throw themselves into the water and cross the river in a body in the deepest silence.

CROCODILES.

Of the crocodile M. Foà has nothing so pleasant to relate; in fact, some of the discoveries he made in regard to this reptile were gruesome in the extreme. For instance:—

One morning when we were at lunch, one of these reptiles, measuring a good length, which had been killed the moment before, was dragged ashore, and they came to tell us that a man was in its stomach. Upon verification, it was found that its intestines contained at least part of a human body. An arm, with the hand attached, a foot, with the ankle, and a few ribs were withdrawn, each part being clean cut from the body and hardly damaged, though the flesh was swollen and the skin was discoloured under the action of gastric juices shielded from the light. On the following day another crocodile, containing the head and the shoulders of the man, a part of whose body we had found on the previous day, was killed. This discovery caused me in future to open the crocodiles which I shot, a thing I had never thought of doing before; and thus I found several times rather strange things, including half a goat-skin rolled into a ball, and a red loin-cloth. At Lake Nyassa, two years later, there was taken from the stomach of a gigantic crocodile, over six yards long, an assortment of twenty-four copper bracelets and a large ball of frizzy hair, which the horrid beast had been unable to digest, after having devoured the native lady to whom these objects belonged.

INDEX TO THE PERIODICALS OF 1898.

THE ninth volume, covering the year 1898, of the "Annual Index to Periodicals" is now ready, and intending subscribers would do well to send in their orders early, as the edition printed is a very small one. Subscribers are also advised to see that their sets are complete, for Vol. III. is now out of print, and other early volumes are getting very scarce.

The following table of pages shows how the Index proper has developed since 1890:—

Vol. I. (1890) 64 pages | Vol. V. (1894) 175 pages | II. (1891) 74 | VII. (1895) 224 | VII. (1892) 109 | VII. (1896) 218 | VIII. (1893) 152 | VIII. (1897) 228 | VIII. (1898) 241 pages.

All who have had any experience in index-making will understand how much more unmanageable, proportionately, is the material of an index of 240 pages compared with four indexes of sixty-four pages each.

In the Index of 1898, the American war with Spain occupies a foremost place, for in addition to the history of the war, we have many articles on the American Army, the creation of an American Navy, the Cost of the War, American Territorial Expansion, Cuba, the Philippine Islands, etc., etc. The Partition of China is another important topic of the year, and in consequence China has become a very tedious heading in the Index.

From how many points of view Mr. Gladstone has been discussed is also revealed by the Index of last year. Some of the articles are personal characteristics or reminiscences; some writers regard him as a political or historical figure, others are more concerned with his religion or theology; two very interesting notices deal with him as an author, supplying at the same time bibliographies of his contributions to literature.

Foreign literature plays an important part in our periodical literature, and the references under German, French, Italian, and other Foreign Literatures are very numerous. There are, for instance, seven interesting articles on Edmond Rostand and "Cyrano de Bergerac."

In History, Napoleon and Nelson continue to be engrossing topics; and Mr. Andrew Lang and Miss A. Shield seem to have made the House of Stuart, especially the Young Pretender, a subject of their own. But it remains to be realised what interesting volumes could be made by collecting and binding together in one volume all the articles of the year on these and many other topics. The articles relating to English History would indeed make many volumes. Another branch of History might be named "Local History." There is scarcely an English county which is not included in the Index, and cross-references to all places mentioned elsewhere than under the county's name are carefully added in every instance. There are nine general articles relating to Yorkshire, besides references to some sixteen Yorkshire places to be found in other parts of the volume.

But enough has been said to give an idea of the contents of the book. It is published at 10s. nett. A specimen page will be sent to any address, and a specimen volume will be sent on approval for ccst of postage.

HERO-WORSHIP GONE MAD.

By no stretch of the imagination can Mr. E. A. Vizetelly's volume on "Zola in England" (Chatto and Windus) be regarded as a notable book. It is, however, a curious one, which could only have been written by a man wholly devoid of the sense of humour. Here we have the ne plus ultra of hero-worship. In the pages of this book the reader may learn how M. Zola bought a shirt collar, what he had for breakfast, and many equally important and interesting details. The whole record is a trifle ridiculous. Any satirist in search of a theme will find in this volume ample material ready to his hand. But it is not the actions and words of the master alone which are carefully recorded. Mr. Vizetelly has extended the scope of his work so as to include the doings of numerous disciples amongst whom he occupies a distinguished position. The reader will find set forth with minute detail the particulars of the various panics which seized Mr. Vizetelly on overhearing odd scraps of French conversation in the public streets or in railway carriages. It would be unkind to mention the number of French detectives which M. Zola's guardians discovered in all manner of unlikely places, and the marvellous feats they performed in cluding these imaginary pursuers.

One incident in the book is interesting. On the night before the death of Colonel Henry became known in England, Mr. Vizetelly's daughter, Violette, had a remarkable dream, which was repeated several times. Next morning, at breakfast, she told M. Zola that she had had a frightful dream. "I was in a big black place," she said, "and there was a man on the ground covered with blood, and people were crowding round him with great excitement. And I saw you, M. Zola, and you came up looking like a giant, and waved your arms again and again, and seemed well pleased." On opening the London papers they found the announcement that "Colonel Henry has been found dead in his cell at

Mont Valérien."

o pile On phant male. d, the e men proximale

that ot in

of a

ved ;

and alter-

d by

n of le us

ant.

one

the gling

eart,

ns an

their and

The

ously

ce all

n do

By -

, and n our y time that I e. It ear it r, that ts and th this nich it there ee the guess, isible. naking louder wind there is us a re it is g over e, and lvance nelling and I swing pearing

at the en the in for

DAVID HARUM.

PERHAPS the fact that the scene of the book is laid in Central New York State will at first somewhat detract from its popularity in this country. But the charming skill with which the character of old David Harumhorse-trading country banker-is drawn will of itself compel interest. The author, Edward Noyes Westcott, finished the book on his deathbed, but not the slightest trace of the consumptive's sufferings appears in his writings. After reading "David Harum," the only regret is that so gifted a writer and so clever a portrayer of character should be lost to us for ever.

The book is a novel, through which runs an unobtrusive love-story, but the chief figure in the volume is the quaint old country banker David Harum. His dry wit fills the pages with stories whose humour is never overdrawn, and yet which would keep a whole party in a constant state of merriment. Harum was supposed to be somewhat of a skinflint, but was in reality one of the most generoushearted of men. His conversations with John Lennox when they went driving in his buggy reveal the true character of the man.

The first story which Harum tells relates to his being taken in by the "Deakin" over a horse, and his subsequent revenge. His sister, Mrs. Bixbee, was much shocked, as she had previously a high opinion of the deacon. Here is a short extract from the conversation :-

"Quite a while ago-in fact not long before I come to enjoy the priv'lege of the deakin's acquaintance—we hed a deal. I wasn't jest on my guard, knowin' him to be a deakin an' all that, an' he lied to me so splendid that I was took in, clean over my head. He done me so brown I was burnt in places, an' you c'd smell smoke 'round me fer some time."

"Was it a horse?" asked Mrs. Bixbee, gratuitously.

"Wa'al," David replied, "mebbe it had been some time, but at that partic'lar time the only thing to determine that fact was that it wa'n't nothin' else."

"Wa'al, I declare!" exclaimed Mrs. Bixbee. . . . "I'm

'mazed at the deakin."

"Yes'm," said David, with a grin. "I'm quite a liar myself when it comes right down to the hoss bus'nis, but the deakin c'n give me both bowers every hand. He done it so slick that I had to laugh when I come to think it over. . . .

All David's keenness and hard bargaining came out in his horse-trading affairs, for which his maxim was, "Do unto the other feller the way he'd like to do unto you-an' do it fust." There is always a strong element of common sense in all Harum's saying and doings. He is also somewhat of a philosopher. Referring to the troubles which every one encounters, he says they resemble fleas on a dog. To quote his own words: "A reasonable amount of fleas is good fer a dog—they keep him f'm broodin' on bein' a dog."

Speaking of his former clerk, David says :-

"An' talk! Wa'al, I think it must 'a' ben a kind of disease with him. He really didn't mean no harm, mebbe, but he couldn't no more help lettin' out anythin' he knowed, or thought he knowed, than a settin' hen c'n help settin'." . . . Fact is," said David, "the kind of honesty that won't actually steal 's a kind of fool honesty that's common enough; but the kind that keeps a feller's mouth shut when he hadn't ought to talk 's about the scurcest thing going."

A good cigar caused Harum to express himself as follows :-

"Andy he used to say, 'Boys, whenever you git holt of a ten-dollar note you want to get it into ye or onto ye jist 's quick 's you kin. We're here to-day an' gone to-morrer,' he'd say; 'an the' ain't no pocket in a shroud'; an' I'm dum'd if I don't think sometimes," declared Mr. Harum, "that he wa'n't very fur off neither. 'T any rate," he added . . . "'s I look back, it ain't the money't I've spent fer the good times 't I've had 't I regret; it's the good times 't I might 's well 've had an' didn't. I'm inclined to think," he remarked, with an air of having given the matter consideration, "that after Adam an' Eve got bounced out of the gard'n, they kicked themselves as much as anythin' fer not havin' cleaned up the hull tree while they was about it."

When David went to dine with his friend Price at Newport, his experiences as he recounts them make perhaps the most amusing chapter of the book. At the dinner party he is induced to tell a tale concerning Elder Maybee, which will perhaps not appeal to those who do not know the ways-and the "perfume"-of skunks:

"Wa'al," I says, "the' ain't much to it in the way of a story, but seein' dinner must be most through," I says, "I'll tell you all the' was of it. The elder had a small farm 'bout two miles out of the village," I says, "an' he was great on raisin' chickins an' turkeys. He was a slow, puttering' kind of an ole foozle, but on the hull a putty decent citizen. Wa'al," I says, "one year, when the poultry was comin' along, a family o' skunks moved onto the premises an' done so well that putty soon, as the elder said, it seemed to him that it was comin' to be a ch'ce between the chickin bus'nis an' the skunk bus'nis, an' though he said he'd heard the' was money in it, if it was done on a big enough scale, he hadn't ben edicated to it, he said, an' didn't take to it any ways."

So the elder set a number of traps, and "ketched an ole he-one—the president of the comp'ny." He went for his gun, but had no powder left, so set off to the town to "One of the ladies, wife to the judge, name o' Pomfort, spoke up an' says, 'Did he leave that poor creature to suffer all that time? Couldn't it have been put out of its misery some other way?'

"'Wa'al, marm,' I says, 'I never happened to know but one feller that set out to kill one o' them things with a club, an' he put in most o' his time fer a week or two up in the woods hatin' the didn't windle in gen'ral soci'ty, an', in himself,' I says. 'He didn't mingle in gen'ral soci'ty, an', in fact,' I says, 'he had the hull road to himself, as ye might say, fer a putty consid'able spell.' "

Harum, although a great judge of a horse and a splendid driver, did not see much use in riding :-

"Never c'd see the sense on't," declared David. "I c'n imagine gettin' on to a hoss's back when 't was either that or walkin', but to do it fer the fun o' the thing's more 'n I c'n understand. There you be," he continued, "stuck up four, five feet in the air like a clo'espin, havin' your backbone chucked up into your skull, an' takin' the skin off in spots an' places, expectin' ev'ry next minute the critter'll git out f'm under ye. No, sir," he protested, "if it come to be that it was either to ride a hossback fer the fun o' the thing or have somebody kick me, an' kick me hard, I'd say, 'Kick away.' It comes to the same thing fur's enjoyment goes, and it's a dum sight safer."

These few brief extracts give a slight idea of David Harum as he is depicted in Mr. Westcott's book. It is almost impossible to open it without coming upon some droll saying or laughable incident. The particular number before us is published in Toronto by Wm. Briggs, and bears "168th Thousand" stamped on the cover. The sale in America has been deservedly enormous.

THE Revue de l'Art contains several articles of special interest. It gives a whole series of notices of the Salons of 1899, and discusses at considerable length the pictures, the sculpture, the architecture, decorative arts, etc. Another interesting article is that by Léonce Benedite on Gustave Moreau and Sir Edward Burne-Jones; Two Idealists. Paul Lafond tells the life-story of Goya, the famous Spanish artist, 1756-1828. The Revue is beautifully illustrated and altogether artistically produced.

Arm S Tei b Wie

Boo Can D'A A Fras Ja Fulf

Lod Nel Rob 16 Shar

Ley

Spei St. (

Falk Foà, Geor

Tuck Vizet Barn

Brah Ac Dime Good ing Lloyd

Vieto

O'Bil

Farra

BOOKS RECEIVED.

gret; I'm n the unced ythin' it." e at nake t the hose '-of story, you miles ckins ozle, one unks s the ch'ce ough a big lidn't

d an t for n to poke that other

one n' he atin'
n', in
say,
d a c'n
at or
I c'n five d up aces,
r ye.
er to kick

avid
It is ome nber
and
The

lons
ires,
etc.
e on
Two
the

uti-

BIOGRAPHY, ETC.		Scott, Sir Walter. Castle Dangerous and Chronicles. (10 Illustra-
De Narfon, Julien. Pope Leo XIII. His Life and Work. (Translated from the French by G. A. Raper). Illustrated. dy. 8vo.		tions.) Vol. XXIV. of Border Edition. l. cr. 8vo. 758 pp. (Nimmo) Shakespeare, Wm. Henry V., Henry VIII., Titus Andronicus	3/0
Dowkoutt M.D. Goo. D. "Tell Them." or the Life Story of a	7/6	Romeo and Juliet. Vol. VII. The Eversley Series. cr. 8vo.	2
Medical Missionary. cr. 8vo. 256 pp	6oc.	Sterne, Laurence. A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy.
	000.	cap 8vo. 164 pp	1 1/6
ESSAYS, BELLES LETTRES, ETC. Arnold, Sir Edwin. The Gulistan; being the Rose-Garden of Shaikh		Welsh, Rev. R. E. In Relief of Doubt, cr. 8vo. 330 pp. (Bowden)	3/6
Sa'di. cr. 8vo. 222 pp	3/6	Wordsworth, William. The Sonnets of Wordsworth. cap 8vo. 285 pp. (Dent) net
Sa'di. cr. 8vo. 222 pp	1/0	POETRY.	-,-
Century. dy. 8vo. 402 pp(Nimmo)		Aveling, Henry. Poems and Paragraphs. cr. 8vo. 186 pp. (Digby Long) net	5/0
FICTION.		Crowley, Al. ister. Jephthah and other Mysteries, Lyrical and Dramatic. med. 8vo. 224 pp
Blackmore, E. Angels Unawares. dy. 8 o. 335 pp (Digby Long) Boothby, Guy. Dr. Nikola's Experiment. l. cr. 8vo. 340 pp	6/0	Lee-Hamilton, Eugene and Annie. Forest Notes. cr. 8vo, 94 pp. (Richards) net
(Hodder and Stoughton) Cameron, Mrs. Lovett. The Craze of Christina. cr. 8vo. 288 pp (John Long)	5/0	Longstaff, Wm. Luther. Weeds and Flowers. cr. 8vo. 152 pp. (Greening)	3, ~
D'Annunzio Gabriele. The Vicgins of the Rocks. Translated by	6/0	Rogers, Alexander. Lakhmi, the Rajput's Bride. cr. 8vo. 160 pp.
Agatha Hughes). l. cr. 8vo. 248 pp	6/0	Russell, Rev. Mathew. Idyls of Killowen, cr. 8vo. 140 pp. (Jas. Bowden)	3/6
Japan. cr. 8vo. 342 pp(Hutchinson) Fulford, John. Some Unoff-nding Prisoners. cr. 8vo. 301 pp(Installation)	6/0	Thomson, Robert. The Heavenly Bridegroom. cr. 8vo. 90 pp. (Stock)
Levs. John K. The Black Terror: A Romance of Russia. cr. 8vo.	6/0	REFERENCE BOOKS.
340 pp(Sampson Low) Lodge, Mrs. The Mystery of Monkswood. cr. 8vo. 316 pp.		Actes de la Conférence de Bruxelles (1874). paper. 399 pp
Nelson, H. Arnold. The Romance of the Greystones. I. cr. 8vo.	6/0	Dückershoff, Ernst (a German coal miner). How the English Work-man Lives. paper. cr. 8vo. 97 pp	1/0
37 app. (Ward, Lock) Roberts, Morley. A Sea Comedy (The Express Series) cr. 8vo.	3/6	Garnett, Dr. R. The Library Series, No. 5. Essays in Libraryship and Bibliography. cr. 8vo. 243 pp(G. Allen) pet	6/0
166 pp(John Milne)	2/6	and Bibliography. cr. 8vo. 343 pp(G. Allen) net Guyot, Yves. Analyse de l'Enquête (l'affaire Dreyfus). cr. 8vo., naner. 288 pp.	fr. 50
166 pp	6/0	paper. 328 pp	2/6
(John Long)	3/6	Minutes of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of England, and the Reports of the Synod's Committees, and other Papers. med. 8vo.,	2/4
St. Clair, William. Zobeir; or, Turkish Misrule. cr. 8vo. 246 pp (Digby Long)	3/6	paper. pp. 338-652
Stuart, Alexander. Mr. Miggs. cr. 8vo. 240 pp (Sampson Low)	3/6	paper. pp. 336-532
Stuart, Esmè. In the Dark. 1. cr. 8vo. 340 pp[Digby Long) Thynne, Robert. The Story of a Campaign Estate. 1. cr. 8vo. 430 pp. [Digby Long]	6/0	Snelley, Henry C. Chats About the Microscope. Hustrated. cr. 8vo. 102 pp(Scientific Press)	2/0
HISTORY AND TRAVEL.		toa pp
Falkner, J. Meade. A History of Oxfordshire. dy. 8vo. 327 pp.		by whom Committed? 96 pp (Ed. Atkinson, Brookline, Mass.) The Country Gentlemen's Catalogue, 1899. 4to. 311 pp (E. Fisher and Co., London)
Foà, Edouard. After Big Game in Central Africa. (30 page and 37	7/6	(E. Fisher and Co., London) Thureau-Dangin, Paul. La Renaissance Catholique en Angleterre au	1/0
other illustrations.) Translated by Frederic Lees. med. 8vo. 330 pp	21/0	Thureau-Dangin, Paul. La Renaissance Catholique en Angleterre au XIXe Siècle. Part I. Newman et le Mouvement d'Oxford. med. 8vo., paper. 335 pp
Garland, Hamlin. The Trail of the Gold Seekers. cr. 8vo. 264 pp. (Macmillan)		8vo., paper. 335 pp(E. Plon, Nourrit et Cie., Paris) Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, Vol. XX., Part IV. DaDer. 232-345 pp(Asher and Co.)	3/0
George, T. O. Historical Notes on the Yoruba Country and its Tribes. cr. 8vo. paper. 87 pp (Kaufmann, Lahr, Baden)		paper. 237-235 pp	1/0
loleand, Barral La Colonisation Française en Annom et ou Tonkin		RELIGIOUS.	./0
Illustrated. cr. 8vo. paper. 248 pp. (Plon, Nourrit et Cie., Paris) 3 ft Tucker, Bishop. Toro, visits to Ruwenzori (Mountains of the Moon).	r. 50	Booth, Bramwell. Books that Bless. cr. 8vo. 192 pp. (Salvation Army)	1/o 3/6
Illustrated. 5r pp	1/6	Byrde, Rev. R. A. High Ains at School. cr. 8vo. 134 pp. (Elliot Stock) Crosby, Ernest. Plain Talk in Psalm and Parab e. med. 8vo. 188 pp. (Brotherhood Publ. Co.)	5/0
(Chatto and Windus)		Galton, Arthur. The Message and Position of the Church of England.
MISCELLANEOUS.		cr. 8vo. 238 pp
Barnett, P. A. Common Sense in Education and Teaching. cr. 8vo.	6/0	Herron, Geo. D. Between Cæsar and Jesus. cr. 8vo. 278 pp (Allenson)
Brahn, Ludwig. Herodes der Grosse und Kleonatra - Droma in s		Pennington Rev Arthur Robert. The Counter-Reformation in Europe.	3/6
Acts. paper. 177 pp		"med. 8vo. 280 pp
	2/6	Times.) By the Author of "The New Koran," cr. 8vo. 16.) pp (Williams and Norgate)	3/6
ing of B— House. I. cr. 8vo. 250 pp (Redway) net	2/0	Trotter, I. Lilias. Parables of the Christ-Life. (With 15 Coloured Plates.) 50 pp(Marshall Bros.)	3/6
Goodrich-Freer, A., and John, Marquis of Bute. The Alleged Haunting of B— House. I. cr. 8vo. 250 pp	3/0	SOCIAL.	9
		Ferris, Alfred J. Pauperising the Rich. 1. cr. 8vo. 432 pp
Victor, W. Deutsches Lesebuch in Lautschrift. Part I. cr. 8vo. 160 pp	3/0	Jaurès, Jean. Action Socialiste. First Series, paper, 559 pp
NEW EDITIONS.		Jaurès, Jean. Action Socialiste. First Scries. paper. 359 pp (Geo. Bellairs, Paris) 3 f Moore, J. Howard. Better World Philosophy. l. cr. 8vo. 274 pp. (Ward, Waugh Co., Chicago)	30
Althaus, Julius. The Value of Electrical Treatment. dy. 8vo 166 pp. (Longmans)	3/6
(A. and C. Black)	0/6	The Foreign Policy of the United States: Political and Commercial.	6/0
Herrick, Robert. Hesperides. In two vols. cap. 8vo. 300 and 214 pp.		(Addresses at the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 1899.) l. cr. 8vo. 216 pp	41

A NEW CENTRE OF SOCIAL HELP FOR THE NEW BOROUGH.

To the Readers of the REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

FRIENDS,—By the kindness of the Editor I am permitted to address you directly. I ask you to assist in the erection of a new centre of social help in one of the most necessitous regions of working-class London. The London Government Act, just passed, creates within the metropolitan area a number of new boroughs. But one of these, on behalf of which I plead, has pre-eminent claim to be called The New Borough. It is as yet without a name; its boundaries are not yet precisely defined. Its area may however be roughly outlined by saying that it will include the parliamentary divisions of West Southwark, West Newington, and Walworth. It will cover what is now popularly known as The Borough, and on that ground alone might take the title of "The New Borough." But there are other and graver distinctions which make it stand out conspicuous among the new municipal areas.

It combines three superlatives of misfortune. (1) It is practically co-extensive with the Poor Law Union of St. Saviour's, Southwark, which, of all unions in the kingdom, has the largest proportion of aged pauperism to the population. Mr. Charles Booth reckons that four out of every five persons over sixty-five years of age in this area are paupers. (2) It comprises those districts lying immediately to the south of Blackfriars Bridge, which Mr. Booth's investigations have shown to be the very poorest in all London. (3) It includes Walworth, which, according to available statistics, is the most densely crowded Parliamentary division in the Metropolis. To the new borough, therefore, belongs this triple eminence of woe:—

It has the largest proportion of aged pauperism of any union in the kingdom.

It contains the most utterly poor districts in the whole metropolis.

It contains the most over-crowded division in London.

It is, in a word, the Metropolis of les misérables. Yet it lies there, within a mile or less of all the great centres of commerce, journalism, law, and government. With its well-nigh quarter of a million of poverty-stricken inhabitants, it touches on the very heart of the Empire. It harbours in profusion the conditions that breed anarchy and revolution. Circumstances are readily conceivable under which it might develop into a Parisian Commune within striking distance of all that is most vital in our Imperial life.

I want you to help in transforming this dread potency of civic calamity into the well-ordered abode of civic health. The very concentration of these social miseries at the most sensitive centre of our world-embracing dominion ought to appeal with compelling power to the sympathy of every patriot and Christian.

My special plea is for Walworth and its terribly congested population. The ward in which Browning Hall stands numbers over 268 persons to the acre as against 56 persons per acre for the whole of London. One acre actually houses 1,000 persons. During the stifling heat of summer the police have some difficulty in persuading the people who dwell on this awful acre to go into their homes for the night. They would rather sleep out on the streets than be shut up in their half-suffocating dens. For human beings herded together in this fashion, the least that can be asked is some cheery supplement to home, some centre of temperate refreshment and genial good-fellowship. Public-houses, I need hardly say, swarm on every hand; and drunkenness abounds. I ask you to enable us to provide something better than the gin palace for the poor workers of Walworth.

The Robert Browning Settlement with which I have the honour to be associated, is erecting a MEN'S CLUB-HOUSE, with a coffee-tavern open to the public, on one of the very best sites that could have been secured. It stands in Walworth Road,—that swollen artery of South London life—at its intersection with other important lines of traffic. It is also only a few yards from Browning Hall. It will contain gymnasium, reading-room, billiard and bagatelle rooms and other accessories of a good club. For want of suitable premises of this kind the work of the Settlement has from the first been seriously crippled.

Appeal is now made to the public by the Building Committee, which includes, among others, Mr. Arnold Pye-Smith, J.P., Chairman, F. F. Belsey, J.P., Edwin Jones, J.P., George E. Morgan, Evan Spicer, J.P., and William Stead as Secretary. The cost of the structure is put at £3,500, and of the furniture at £500: in all £4,000. Towards this total, donations and promises have been received amounting on July 30 to £1,150.

Gladly and gratefully recognising the kind help which readers of this REVIEW have rendered to the Settlement, and especially to our Country Holidays Fund, I beg with the more confidence to press upon you the claims of our Club-house.

Will you not help us to bring a little more of the brightness of home into the lives of the ill-housed and over-thronged men of Walworth? Will you not help us to offer counter-attractions to the drink-shop? Will you not enable us to erect this important adjunct to our manifold service of the neighbourhood, aimed as that is at the social, moral and religious elevation of the people? Donations will be thankfully received by the Treasurer, Mr. Charles W. Link, 14, Chichester Road, Croydon, or by myself.

Just on the eve of this extension of our material base, I was privileged to receive a most kindly message of sympathy from the son of the great poet who used to worship in our Hall as a boy, and whose name is therefore borne by the Settlement. Mr. R. BARRETT BROWNING, in the course of a letter written from Palazzo Rezzonico, Venice—the house where his father passed away—under date of July 20th, expresses himself thus generously :--

Although I am living out of England, I keep in touch with all that interests me, and have therefore been able to watch with the warmest satisfaction the successful growth of the "Browning Settlement" under your wardenship.

I need scarcely assure you how gratified my father would have been by so much work being done with such enthusiasm and unflagging zeal, and I do not hesitate to say that he would most certainly have rejoiced in his heart, and felt honoured indeed by his name being associated with it.

I have read the reports you were good enough to send me, describing all that has been achieved under your guidance, and I hope I may be permitted to express my own pleasure and satisfaction in the success which has attended your efforts in a noble cause.

Earnestly pleading for a response not altogether unworthy of the great name of Browning, and corresponding in some measure to the needs of the neighbourhood,—I remain, sincerely yours,

F. HERBERT STEAD.
Robert Browning Hall, Walworth, London, S.E., August 1st, 1899.

T

In t

In

the puls lang allo the mod only text of o it." the mei Fra the dou stu tha

bee

boy

con

sen

the point that ask stude cert land be is I all by face it with the point that the point that the point that ask stude cert land be is I all by face it with the point that ask stude cert land the point the point that ask stude cert land the point the point the p

is a the a s La

Liv

whi

Mo are the hele giv

I

you con to b man larg

full

LEARNING LANGUAGES BY LETTER-WRITING.

THE discussions about the teaching of modern languages are as earnest across the Channel as they are here; and the difficulties appear as great. In the current number of the Revue des Revues there are two interesting papers on the subject of school reform. In one of them Professor Fernand Herbert contends that the present arrangement, by which German is compulsory and English elective, should be changed, both languages placed on the same footing, and parents allowed a choice for their sons. He also remarks upon the stupidity of the average schoolboy attempting two modern languages simultaneously, an attempt which only confuses, with the result that he learns neither. His text is: "We must learn modern languages; the safety of our commerce, our industries, our nation depends upon I have not space to quote his arguments, although they apply to us as much as to the Professor's countrymen. One instance I must give. The majority of girls in France learn English instead of German (the contrary is the case with boys), and the comment is: "This is doubtless because English is the easier language to I have hitherto taken a secret pride in the fact that our language is so difficult for foreigners, and have been taught that girls can learn difficult things as well as boys! M. Mieille, who is nothing if not a reformer, has contributed his quota to the subject-in an earnest sensible remonstrance and appeal. He shows briefly the rôle played by those proficient in living languages, points out that French needs are changing, and that the spirit of adventure should be cultivated, asks why such an officer as Marchand had not studied English, and then proposes a reform which is certainly novel. His suggestion is that the modern language class for Lycée boys under twelve should be conducted by a lady, alleging that mothers would be much happier if such were the case. I think that is likely, and am reminded of a Sunday-school where all the boys were taught by ladies and all the girls by gentlemen, with a very happy result; but think of the faces of the masters of, say, University College School if it were proposed to them to introduce lady teachers. Living languages are to the modern side of a school that which Greek and Latin are to the classical side. This is an axiom of education, says M. Mieille, but he questions the practice of it. What would a classical master say if a sixth form boy gave only one hour a day to Greek and

the

ive

JB-

of

It

ith

nes

ng

ird

od

he

sly

old

in

nd

ire all

es

nt,

eg

ns

he $^{\mathrm{1d}}$

an ur

18

2

r.

or

of

to

re

G,

0,

15

h

le

d

st

d

DANISH CORRESPONDENTS.

I have to thank those gentlemen and ladies who have so readily responded to the appeal sent forth last month. More than half are already provided for; the remainder are aged from eighteen to twenty, and their letters are the most eager, so I hope more friendly hands will be held out, or, rather, that more pens will be ready. I give one of the many letters as a specimen:—

Copenhagen.

Dear Sir,—I lately have read in a paper of this town that you had connections over all the world, and, when desired, procured young men who wished to correspond one or another language, connections with equally situated. The purpose of this letter is to beg you kindly, if obtainable, to connect me with a young man who wish to correspond Danish. I am occupied on a larger commercial office, and, if I should mention any special interestings, it must be for literature and theatre. Yours respectfully,

A DUTCH PRIMARY SCHOOL.

Dear Friend, -- I have just come in tired from a visit to one of the schools here, and sitting down to have a quiet rest, it occurred to me that you might like to hear about my visit. In this delightful city, with its lovely trees, its tranquil and yet busy people, clear blue sky and pure air, one feels in tune with one's surroundings; and the school, though a primary one, and not far from the Jewish quarter, was not a discord. The headmaster received us most cordially. One difficulty was language. We began in French; but mynheer at length confessing that he comprehended my English better than my French, and that he himself could not enlarge upon any technical details in a language foreign to him, a very odd mixture of Dutch, French, and English resulted. We were first shown the school garden. The enclosure contained many trees, one of each kind, so that the city children might learn about them as country children can. Each class has also its own garden of many different plants, cultivated with much care, and interesting enough to induce the children to come early to attend to them. Potatoes and geraniums, beans and currants, radishes and thyme were there, with dwarf apple trees and flowering shrubs. The school has its own pigeons and chickens, so that the children may learn about them practically, and the children were called to let me see them feed them. merry little class came out; but alas! the pigeons had been fed already, and when the children began a soft call, they were disgusted with such prodigal irregularity, and would only preen their feathers and look inquiringly down. The schoolrooms were as well "thought out" as the garden—light, large, and airy; small classes; clean children; pictures everywhere. I was not surprised to hear that in Holland a compulsory law was not necessary. I must stop now, but will write again later .-

GERMAN CORRESPONDENCE.

As before said, the German masters are most thoroughly systematic in their arrangements, and this is fully shown by the interesting report of the "Deutschen Centralstelle fur internationalen Briefwechsel," published this month. The scholars in correspondence number 4,882. The schools interested are: German, 189; French, 185; English, 72; American, 29. Thus the schools in correspondence show a total of 475. Surely it is not difficult to realise that the results both to teachers and scholars, even now when the scheme is in its infancy, must be great. What will its maturity achieve? I should like English schools to come to the front more, and I hope more exchanges will be effected.

NOTICES

An Englishman in London would like to exchange lessons with a Frenchman over here.

The young English builder's apprentice who wants to correspond with some one similarly occupied in the United States has had no reply; nor has any one offered to write to the Canadian mentioned at the same time.

Italian, Dutch, and Norwegian lads seek English correspondents.

Several French parents will "exchange" their sons with English boys for holidays.

It is impossible to answer every application, but sooner or later correspondents are found for all who apply, and I am delighted when friends write and tell me how they get on. All are asked to send a card so soon as the first letter is received from abroad, and to renew the application if after two months no letter has been received. Ladies, alas! often have to wait much longer. Adult applicants are asked to contribute one shilling towards the expense of search.

ART IN THE MAGAZINES.

Architectural Review.—Effingham House, Arundel St., Strand. is. August.

Supplement: —"Archway, Portugal Street," by F. L. Emanuel. Architecture and Crafts at the Royal Academy; Illustrations. The Work of William Hackstoun. Illustrated, D. S. MacColl. An Ethical Retrospect of the Traditions and Aims of Sir Edward Burne-Jones, Illustrated, J. Atwood Slater.

The Durability and Preservation of Paintings. James Leicester.

Art Journal .- J. S. VIRTUE. 18. 6d. August.

Frontispiece:—"A Children's Picnic," after S. Melton Fisher. Killin and Its Neighbourhood, Illustrated, Rev. Hug' Killin and Its Neighbourhood. Macmillan.

The Edinburgh Pen and Pencil Club. Illustrated. T. A. Croal,

Mr. Melton Fisher and His Work. Illustrated. A. C. R.

Recent Losses in Old London. Illustrated. F. Rinder. The Liverpool Academy of Art. Illustrated. Ernest Radford. The Paris Salons. Illustrated.

Andrew Marvell in Highgate. Illustrated. Rev. Alex. Ramsay. Reminiscences of Millais. R. Lehmann.

Pottery and Porcelain at Bethnal Green. Illustrated. E. F. V.

Art Journal Jubilee Series .- J. S. VIRTUE. 18. 6d. No. 7. Supplements:-"A Middlesex Lane," after F. Slocombe; "A Hopeless Dawn," after Frank Bramley.

John MacWhirter. Illustrated. Studies and Sketches by Sir Edwin Landseer. Illustrated.

Continued.

Japanese Art. Illustrated. Continued. Sir R. Alcock. Notes on Bookplates. Illustrated. M. A. Tooke. Lighthouses of Old. Illustrated.

Hubert Herkomer. Illustrated. The Building of the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. Specimens from the Paris Exhibition of 1878. Illustrated.

Artist.-Constable. 18. July.

Frontispiece :- "Study of Head," by Joseph Southall. John Henry Lorimer and His Art. Illustrated. S. C. de Soissons

"The Elf" and Some Bookplates, by James J. Guthrie. Illustrated.

Adèle Marier, Millet's Model. Illustrated. N. Peacock. On the Designing and Making of Carpets. Illustrated. F. J. Mayers.

Critic.-July.

Thackeray's Contributions to Punch. Continued. Illustrated. S. Dickson. John W. Alexander, Portrait-Painter, Decorator, Illustrator.

Dome.-UNICORN PRESS. 18. July.

The Glasgow School at Knightsbridge. C. J. Holmes. Supplement:—"The Harness-Menders," after A. Hugh Fraser.

Edinburgh Review .- July.

Some Aspects of Modern Art.

Frank Lesile's Popular Monthly.—August.
Weddings in Art. Illustrated. C. F. Carter.
F. Hopkinson Smith as a Water-Colourist. Illustrated. Perriton Maxwell.

Good Words.-August.

Reminiscences of the late Sir John Steell. Illustrated.

Idler.-August.

J. W. T. Manuel; the Realist at Home: Interview. Illustrated. Arthur Lawrence.

Journal of the Ex-Libris Society .- A. AND C. BLACK. 25, July. Annual Meeting and Exhibition of the Ex-Libris Society. Illustrated.

Lady's Realm.-August.

C. Goldsborough Anderson and His Portrait Sketches. Illustrated. Miss E. M. Symonds.

Magazine of Art. -- Cassell. 18, 4d. August.

The New Salon, 1899. Illustrated. Henri Frantz. Limoges Enamels, Continued, Illustrated, Rev. S. Baring-Gould.

George C. Haité, Painter. Illustrated. Walter Shaw Sparrow. The Royal Academy. Continued. Illustrated.
Domus Domi; the House in Town. Illustrated. Halsey

Ricardo.

Eugène Muntz's Life of Leonardo da Vinci. Illustrated. Sir Walter Armstrong.

The Works of Benjamin Constant. Illustrated. Emile Vedel. Supplements:—"The Diver," after H. S. Tuke; "Sir W. B. Richmond," after George Phoenix; "Walberswick," after

New Century Review .- August.

The Garrick Club Pictures. Percy Fitzgerald.

New England Magazine.-July.

Hiram Powers. Illustrated. Henry Boynton.

Nineteenth Century .- August.

The Marlborough Gems. Charles Newton-Robinson.

North American Review .- July.

The Tercentenary of Velasquez. Charles Whibley.

Pall Mall Magazine.-August.

Punch Notes. Continued. Illustrated. F. C. Burnand. Volendam: a Dutch Barbizon, Illustrated, P. G. Konody, Pearson's Magazine.-August.

The Art of the Age. Continued. Illustrated.

Royal Magazine.-August.

The Devils of Notre Dame. Illustrated. Mary Fermor.

Strand Magazine.-August.

Marcus Stone; Interview. Intustrated.

A Peep into Punch, 1880-1884. Illustrated.

Studio .- 5, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN. 18. July. The Work of W. Reynolds-Stephens. Illustrated. A. L.

Frantz M. Melchers. Illustrated. Pol de Mont. M. F. Landry, Swiss Medallist. Illustrated. L. Forrer. Leaves from the Sketch-Book of Mortimer Menpes; Illus-

The Home Arts and Industries Exhibition. Illustrated. Esther Wood.

The International Exhibition at Knightsbridge. Illustrated. J. Stanley Little. Supplements:-Two Studies, after Paul Helleu; "Summer," after W. Reynolds-Stephens; Decorative Panel, after K. Womrath, etc.

Studio.-SUMMER NUMBER. 28, 6d. "Beauty's Awakening.". Illustrated.

Wide World Magazine.—August.

Madame Amyot in Search of Her Goddess, Mlle. Sophia Ribbing, in the Castle of Christiansborg. Illustrated.

Windmill.-SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 18. July. Urbi et Orbi; Pictures by Paul F. Maitland. Illustrated. Charles Kains-Jackson.

Windsor Magazine.-August.

C. Napier Hemy; a Sea-Painter at Work. Illustrated. Wilfrid Klickmann.

212

The Hida

Ang

Whe

The Phile

AY The Wha

Ann

Ecor

The

Prot

Anci

Tou Wor

A

Anir Eliz

Eng The The

The Cha A C Chir The An

Lett

Spo

Pan

The

Lav

The

Kar

Th

LIST OF THE LEADING CONTENTS OF CURRENT PERIODICALS.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN.

American Historical Review .- MACMILLAN. 3s. 6d. July. The County of Illinois. Carl E. Boyd. Hidaigo and Morelos. Henry C. Lea. John Bell of Tennessse. J. W. Caldwell. The Battle of Gettysburg. J. F. Rhodes. Anglo-American Magazine. - Bream's Buildings, Chancery Lane.

lus-

ng-W.

sey

Sir

el.

B.

ter

lt

1.

Wheat in the North-West. Prof. Willet M. Hays.
From Eydtkuhn to Vladikavkas. Mrs. George Donaldson.
The War's Legacy to the American Teacher. George B. Chandler.
Philosophy of Explosive Wave Action in Guns. Continued. Illustrated.
Hudson Maxim.

Hudson Maxim.

A Young American's Life in Spain. Franklin C. Bevan.

The Amount and Distribution of the Sun's Heat. Evan McLennan. What I saw in Africa. Alden Bell.

Annals of the American Academy.—P. S. King and Son, 2, Great Smith Street, Westminster. 1 dollar, July. Economic Aspects of Charity Organisation. C. E. Prevey. The Philadelphia Nominating System. W. J. Branson. The Relative Stability of Gold and Silver. E. S. Meade. The Constitutional Position of the German Emperor. P. Zorn. Protection of Working Men. C. R. Woodruff.

Antiquary.-Elliot Stock. 6d. August.

Ancient Kentish Colonies in Anglo-Saxon England. Continued. T. W. All Central Consists in State Continued Continued Continued Continued Mrs. I. S. Robson, Egyptian Antiquities at Burlington House,
All Saints' Church, Orpington, Kent. Illustrated. J. Russell La.kby.

Architectural Review .- Effingham House, Arundel Street.

18. August. Bourges and Its Churches. Illustrated. Continued. S. N. Vansi tart. Barley; the Church and the Village. Illustrated. Rev. J. Frome Barley; the Wilkinson, Argosy.-Macmillan. 18. August.

Animated Flowers. Elizabeth of Heidel'erg. Illustrated. Chas. W. Wood. Death; What Should be the Fear? Miss P. W. Roose, Atlantic Monthly.-GAY AND BIRD. IS. July. Atlantic Monthly,—GAV AND BIRD, 18. July.

English Imperialism. William Cunningham.
The Plot of "Much Ado about Nothing." H. H. Furness.
The Tenement: Curing Its Blight. Jacob A. Riis.
The True American Spirit in Literature. Charles Johnston.
Chas. Kirkpatrick Sharpe; a Virtuoso of the Old School. Leon. H. Vincent.
A Colonial Diary. Agnes Repplier.
Chinese Sketches. Elizabeth Washburn.
The Right Approach to English Literature. Mark H. Liddell.
An English Writer's Notes on England. Vernon Lee.
The Autobiography of a Revolutionist. Continued. P. Kropotkin.
Letters of Bayard Taylor and Sidney Lanier. Continued. Henry W. Lanier.

Badminton Magazine.-Longmans. 18. August.

A First Grouse Drive. Illustrated. Percy Stephens.
Public Schoolmen in First-Class Cricket. Harold Macfarlane.
Sportsmen in Summer; 'Neath Summer Suns. Illustrated. Geo. E. Sportsmen in Summer; Neath Summer Suns. Illustrated. Geo. F.. Collins. Pampas of South America; Across a Desert of Grass. Illustrated. S. Scott-Moncrieff.

The Coast of Northern New Brunswick; a Haunt of the Canada Goose. Illustrated. Arthur P. Silver. Lawn Tennis. George R. Wood.

Bankers' Magazine.-Waterlow and Sons. 38, August. The Gold Reserve of the Banks.
The Report of the Indian Currency Commission.
Three Years of American Expansion. W. R. Lawson.

Bibliotheca Sacra. - KEGAN PAUL. 75 cents. July. The Influence of the Bible upon the Human Intellect. President J. E.

Kant's Theory of the "Forms of Thought." James B. Peterson. Religious Thought in Scotland in the Victorian Era. Rev. James Lindsay. The Catechumenate: Its Achievements and Poss bilities. Rev. Thomas Chalmers.

Chalmers.
The Mission Sunday School as an Ethical and Social Lever. Rev. H. Francis Perry.
My Time at Rugby (1869-74). Rev. Henry Hayman.
Prayer in War-Time. Edward Mortimer Chapman.
The Abiding Realities of Religion. President John Henry Barrows.
The Hour of China and the United States. Henry William Rankin.
Alvah Hovey. With Portrait. Prof. John M. English.

Blackwood's Magazine.-BLACKWOOD. 28. 6d. August

The Ghost-Dance of the French. Life in Pahang, Malay Peninsula; In Chains. Hugh Cl'fford. More about Wildfowl-Shooting in the Outer Hebrides. Gilfrid W. Hartley. Experiences in a Quarantine Camp.

Our Obligations to Wild Animals. Sir Herbert Maxwell. The Pavilion and the Links: The Old Order and the New. A Boer War; the M'litary Aspect. wrote." Andrew Lang.

"History as she ought to be wrot The Loss of Moshi, With Map. The Position of the Government.

Board of Trade Journal. - EVRE AND SPOTTISWOODE. 6d. July. The Trade, Industry and Shipping of Mexico. With Map. Trade and Industry of Korea. Match-Industry of Japan. New Japanese Customs Law.

Bookman,-Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. July. Multiple Reviewing, Symposium, Robert Wallace, Illustrated, Wm. Wallace, Bookman. - AMERICA). DODD, MEAD AND CO., NEW YORK. 25 cen's. July.

Wessex; Thomas Hardy's Country, Illustrated, Clive Holland, Francisque Sarcey, With Portrait, Adolphe Cohn, Edwin Markham; Author of "The Man with the Hoe." With Portrait, J. M.
The Significance of the Civil War To-day. Ira S. Dodd.

Canadian Magazine. - ONTARIO PUBLISHING CO., TORONTO.

Canadian Magazine.—Ontario Publishing Co., Toronto.
25 cents. July.
The Adventures of a Prisoner of War. Wm. Hodgson Ellis.
Dante's Divine Comedy. Continued. Prof. Wm. Clark.
How the French Captured Fort Nelson. Beckles Willson.
Work and Workers in Rural England. Illustrated. Cifton Johnson.
Birds of the Garden. Continued. Illustrated. C. W. Nash.
Wm. McLennan. Illustrated. E. Q. V.
With Rifle and Rod in the Moose Lands of Northern Ontario. Illustrated.
W. Ridout Wadsworth.
Empire Day. W. Sanford Evans.

Cape Illustrated Magazine.—44, Shortmarket Street, Cape Town.

Habits and Customs of the Korannas. Beta.

Captain.-George Newnes. 6d. August. Cricket in the Colonies. Illustrated. J. Richards. A Harrow Boy's Day. Illustrated. Herbert Vivian. When You leave School; Something in the City. Continued. A. E. M. Foster Bowling, Fielding, and General Hints. C. B. Boys' Camps. Illustrated. George Bullivant. C. B. Fry.

Bayreuth and the Wagner Festival. Illustrated. Dora M. Jones.
Fashinable Fads and Fancies. Illustrated. Dora M. Jones.
Fashinable Fads and Fancies. Illustrated. Mrs. F. H. Williamson.
The Tallest Dwellings in the World. Illustrated. F. M. Holmes.
English Piers. Illustrated. Henry Dawson.
Duel between the Fifth Lord Byron and Mr. Chaworth; a Duel at Close.
Quarters. Illustrated. W. W. Hutchings.
A Great Western Express: the "Relief Cornishman." Illustrated. Herbert
Russell. Russell

London by Night. Illustrated. Continued. B. Fletcher Robinson. Cassier's Magazine .- 33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. July. Casser's Magazine,—33, Bedford Street, Strand. 18. July. The Strength of the B. itish Navy. Illustrated. Archibald S. Hurd. Some Conditions of the American Iron and Steel Industriss. Walter Dixon. Development of the Steam Turbine. Illustrated. C. A. Parsons, Influence of Motive Power on Cotton Mill Design, Stephen Greene. Electricity in Marine Work. Illustrated. S. Dana Greene.
The Mine Defence of Santingo Harbour. Illustrated. Lieut. E. E. Cape-

Depreciation. Joseph Nasmith. The Story of Smokeless Powder. Illustrated. Hudson Maxim.

The Story of Smokeless Powder. Illustrated. Hudson Maxim.

Century Magazine.—Macshillars. 18, 4d. August.

Feast Days in Little Italy. Illustrated. Jacob A. Ris.
Glimpses of Wild Life about My Calin. Continued, Illustrated. John Burroughs.
Alexander's Invasion of India. Illustrated. Benj. Ide Wheeler.
The Yangtze-Kiang; the River of Tea. Illustrated. Eliza R. Scidmore.
The Churches of Auvergne. Illustrated. Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer.
Negro "Spirituals." Illustrated. Marion A. Haskell.
The People of the Reindeer; Life among the Nomadic Lapps. Jonas Stadling.
In the Whirl of the Tornado. Illustrated. J. R. Musick.

Tornadoes, Cleveland Abbe.
Powerful Electric Discharges, Illustrated, J. Trowbridge.
The Protection of Electrical Apparatus ag inst Lightning. Alex. J. Wurts.
Needless Alarm during Thunderstorms. Alex. McLabe.
Franklin as Jack-of-All Trades, Illustrated, P. L. Ford.
The Present Situation in Cuba. Maj.-Gen, L. Wood.
The Cuban as a Labour Problem. Wm. W. Howard.

Chambers's Journal .- 47, PATERNOSTER Row. 8d. August. On the Life and Death of Books. Joseph Shaylor. On the Life and Death of Books, Joseph Amayor, Bogus Antiques, Secondary Education in England, Mid-Ocean Shells. C. Parkinson. Scotch Fisher Life as It was and Is, The Proof. Reader. Michael MacDonagh, How Sailors find Their Way at Sea. C. C. Marriott.

Chautauquan.-KEGAN PAUL. 105. 10d. per annum. July. The Paris Exposition of 1900. Illustrated. Thomas B. Preston.
Twenty Years an Editor. Theodore L. Flood.
Trusts. Prof. Ernest A. Smith.
Old Violins. Illustrated. Wm, Armstrong.
The Great Southern Railway Terminal at Boston. Illustrated. Jane A.

Christian Quarterly .- 73, LUDGATE HILL. 50 cents. July. The Greatest Religious Teachers compared with Jesus. Rev. D. R. Dungan. The Twentisth Century Ministry. J. B. Jones. Modern Phases of Unbelisf. A. M. Chamberlain. Progress of Thought among the Disciples. W. T. Hilton. The Chronology of the Bible. F. M. Brunar, Jesus; the Great Teacher. Dean W. T. Moore, Modern Socialism and the Teaching of Jesus. Chas. M. Sharp. The Institutional Church. W. W. Wharton.

Church Missionary Intelligence?.—Church Missionary Society, Salisbury Society.

The Paramount Claims of Foreign Missions. Bishop Perowne.

The Outlook of the Farther East. Rev. Geo. Ensor.

Urgent Needs for Clergymen in the Missions. D. H. D. W.

The Uganda Mission. Continued.

Church Quarterly Review .- SPOTTISWOODE AND CO. July. The "Hearing" at Lambeth on Incense.
The New Dictionary of the Bible. Vol. II.
Pastor's History of the Pop-s.
An American (Dr. Lucius Waterman's) View of the Post-Apostolic Age.
Spiritual Letters of Dr. Pusey.
The Hidden History of the Oxford Movement.
Evolutionist Autobiography.
The Life of Shakespeare.
The Beginnings of the Reformation.
The Three Creads. The Episcopate of Bishop Charles Wordsworth.
The Bishop of Oxford's Charge.

Classical Review .- DAVID NUTT. 18. 6d. July. On Some Misinterpretations of Greek Astrological Terms. R. Garnett. Notes on Silius Italicus. Walter C. Summers.

Contemporary Review. - ISBISTER AND Co. 28. 6d. August. Race and Religion in India. A. M. Fairbairn.
A New Tramway Monopoly. Robert Donald.
The Reform of China. Kang Yeu Wei.
The Saven Senses of Fishes. Matthirs Dunn.
"As Established by Law." Canon MacColl and J. Horace Round.
Nature in the Last Latin Posts. Countess Martinengo-Cesavesco. Adure in the last Latin Forts, Countess startmengo-ce. Arms and the Gentleman. Z.
The Trans-Siberian Railway. W. Durban.
The Anglo-Indian Creed. A Heretic.
The Imperialism of British Trade. Continued. Ritortus.

Cornhill Magazine. - Smith, Elder and Co. 28. August. Cornhill Magazine.—SNITH, ELDER AND CO. 18. Aug
The Battles of Mars-la-Tour and Gravelotte. David Blättner.
Colonial Memories. Continu d. Lady B.oome.
The Modern Drama. Mauricz Maeterlinek.
The Carnival at Madrid. Mrs. Margaret L. Woods.
Concerning Catalogues. E. V. Lucas.
The Pastoral Drama on the Elizabethan Stage. W. Wilson Greg.
The Sensibility of the Critics. Stephen Gwynn.
Fra' Auld Lang Syne. F. Bayford Harrison.
Pariahs of Western Europe. Henry Erroll.
Conferences on Books and Men. Continued. Urbanus Sylvan.

Critic.—G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1s. July, Edw. Noyes Westcott. Illustrated. Forbes Heermans. William Morris. J. L. G. Francisque Sarcay. Othon Guerlac.

Critical Review .- SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, 18. 6d. July. Hastings's Dictionary of the Bible. Vol. II.
Jastrow's Religion of Babylonia and Assyria.
Communication on the Uncertainties of the Avesta and Their Solution.

Dial .- 315, WABASH AVENUE, CHICAGO. 10 cents. July 1. The Chicago Schools.
Plays and Players of a Season. W. E. Simonds. July 16. Victor Cherbuliez.

Dome.-UNICORN PRESS. 18. July. Robert Schumann. J. F. Runciman.

Dublin Review .- Burns and Oates. 6s. July. Pastor's History of the Renaissance. Rev. W. H. Kent.
The Triumph of St. Thomas. Merwin Marie Snell.
Dramatic Art and Church Liturgy. Rev. E. King.
Louisa Mary; the Last Stuart Princess. Miss Alice Shield.
The Religion of the Future. Henry C. Corrance.
The Reality of the External World. Rev. W. R. Carson.
Textual Critic'sm of the Hebrew Text. Rev. J. A. Howlett.
The Mazarinus MS. Rev. Fr. Andrew.
Medizeval Grammar Schools. J. B. Milburn.

Economic Review.-RIVINGTONS. 38. July. Economic Review.—Rivious. 30. July.

Economic Fatalism. H. A. L. Fisher.

Democracy in New Zealand. W. W. Carlile,
Christian Social Work in Denmark. Prof. H. Westergaard.

Old Age Pensions. H. W. Wolff.

Saving and Spending. Prof. A. W. Flux.

The New Trades Combination Scheme and the Interests of the Consumer.

E. J. Smith.

The Political Theory of the Ante-Nicene Fathers. Rev. A. J. Carlyle.

Edinburgh Review .- Longmans. 6s. July. British Finance in the Nineteenth Century, The Life and Writings of Mrs. Oliphant, Lord Clare. The Meaning of Rites The Ethics of Vivisction.
The Ethics of Vivisction.
The Fall of the Western Roman Empire.
The Conference and Arbitration Montalembert. The Problem in China.

Educational Review .- 11, LUDGATE HILL. 4d. July. The Present Work of the London School Board. Agnes J. Ward.
The Pronunciation of the Latin C. Rev. W. W. Skeat.
Open or Public Days in Schools. Amos Henderson.
National Education in Sicily. Irene Vespii.
Summer Meeting of the Incorporated Association of Head Masters at Engineering Magazine .- 222, STRAND. 18. July. Why American Engines are built for English Railways, Illustrated. Charles

Rous-Marten.

The Enormous Increase in the World's Production of Gold.

The Work of the Naval Repair Ship Vulcan. Illustrated. Gardiner C. Sims and W. S. Aldrich. Machine-Shop Management in Europe and America. Continued. H. F. L. Orcutt.

The Engineering Development of Porto Rico, Illustrated, H. M. Wilson. Efficiencies of Modern Steam-Boilers and Furnaces, R. S. Hale, The Great Magnetite Deposits of Swedish Lapland. Illustrated, David A. The Buildings of the Paris Exposition. Continued. Illustrated. Jacques

Boyer.
The Evolution and Future of the Gas-Engine. Illustrated. Georg Lieckfield.

Engineering Times .- 3, ARUNDEL STREET, W.C. 18. June. Lord Charles Beresford on the Future of British Trade in China: Interview. Ben H. Morgan.
High-Speed Steam Engines. Continued, Illustrated. W. Norris.
Legislation as to Measurement. J. Greevz Fisher.
Machine Tools. Illustrated. Ewart C. Amos.
The Utilisation of the Waste Gases of the Blast Furnace. W. H. Booth.
Artesian Wells. Illustrated. C. Isler.

English Historical Review .- Longmans. 5s. July. Bernard the King's Scribe. J. H. Round.
The Guidi and Their Relations with Florence, Continued. Miss Eckenstein.
Some Pamphlets of the French Wars of Religion. Arthur Tilley.
The Neapolitan Republicans and Nelson's Accusers. Captain A. T. Mahan.
The Account Roll of a Fifteenth-Century Iron-Master. Gaillard T.

English Illustrated Magazine .- 198, STRAND. 6d. August. Birds: Victims of Vanity. Illustrated. C. W. Gedney. The Evolution of the Modern Man-of-War. Illustrated, Edward Fraser. The Duchess of Devonshire. Illustrated. J. M. Bulloch. Pests of the Telegraph Wire. Illustrated. John Munro.

Englishwoman,-8, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. Some Representative Secondary Schools. Illustrated.
Royal Authors. Illustrated. B. Colt de Wolf.
Old Irish Rings and Their Romance. Illustrated. L. M. McGraith.
A Visit to Samoa. Illustrated. F. Dunbar.
The Lady Journalist. Illustrated. F. M. Steele.
Some Colonial Nursing Centres. Illustrated.
Mary Russell Mitford. Illustrated. Halboro Denham.

Englishwoman's Review .- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, 18, July. The International Congress of Women.
Special Labour Legislation for Women.
Baroness Gripenberg.

Johan: Polypl The S Music ev Ba The '

The V An H R The S The I Misre: Ja The F

> Prof. K Some Great Notti Dom: F Britis

Villier

Bicyc

The F

New Franc Hotel The I Moro Why Shake The S Lord The The Was

The The (Inter A Th Fran

A Da

Stors The An C The Roya The

G The Some Fried Hay Phili

Add Exp On t Etude. - T. PRESSER, PHILADELPHIA. 15 cents. July.

Johann Sebastian Bach. Illustrated.
Polyphonic and Monophonic Music. Dr. H. A. Clarke.
The Study of Bach; Symposium.
Music for Piano:—"Caprice Celeste," by C. Troyer; Bach's "My Heart ever faithful," transcribed by A. Lavignac; Gavotte in G minor, by Expositor.-Hodder and Stoughton. 18. August.

The "Mystical" and "Sacramental" Temperaments. Rev. J. R. Illingworth worth.

The Word "Atone" in Extra-Ritual Literature. Rev. Prof. A. B. Davidson,
An Historical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians. Prof. W. M. Ramsay.
The Seven Vials. Rev. Dr. J. Monro Gibson.
The Doctrines of Grace. Rev. John Watson.
Misreadings and Misrenderings in the New Testament. Prof. A. N.

Januaris.

The Place of Writing and Destination of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Rev.

George Milligan.

Expository Times .- SIMPKIN MARSHALL. 6d. August.

New Testament Criticism. Ada Bryson. The Hititie Inscriptions. Prof. P. Jensen. Prof. Margoliouth and the "Original Hebrew" of Ecclesiasticus. Prof. Ed.

The Great Text Commentary. Continued.

Fireside .- 7, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. August. Some Misuses of Advertisement. H. Somerset Bullock.
Great Wits and Some of Their Wit. Continued. Rev. J. Isabell.
Nottingham; the City of Old King Cole. Illustrated. Robert Maudsley. Domestic Servants in Former Days. Illustrated. G. Holden Pike.

Fortnightly Review, -CHAPMAN AND HALL, 28. 6d. August.

Fortnightly Roview.—CHAPMAN AND HALL. 28. 6d British and Dutch in South Africa. H. A. Bryden. Williers de L'Isle Adam. Arthur Symons. Russia's Great Naval Enterpriss. Continued. S. Bicycles as Railway Luggags. J. Allsebrook Simon. New Light on Isben's "Brand." M. A. Stobart. France Since 184. Continued. Baron Pierre de Coubertin. Hotels at Homs and Abroad. Major Arthur Griffi.hs. The Dying of Death. Joseph Jacobs. Morocco Up-to-Date. Rev. H. R. Haweis. Why is Unionism Unpopular? J. Louis Garvin. London Buildings. Miss C. S. Brenner. Shakespeare and Molière. Jules Claretie. The Struggle for South African Supremncy. Diplomaticus.

Forum.-GAY AND BIRD. 15. 6d. July.

Lord Rosebery and the Premiership. Henry W. Lucy.
The Trust Problem and Its Solution. W. A. Paffer.
The White Race and the Tropics. Trux un Beal., Was Columbus Morally Irresponsible? Prof. Cesare Lombroso.
The Inordinate Demands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Milton H. Smith. H. Smith.
The Currency of Porto Rico. James D. Whelpley.
The Future of the Negro. W. H. Councill.
International Law in the Late War. Henry Wad: Rogers.
The Treaty-Making Power in America. Judge Chas. B. Elliott.
A Centennial Stocktaking; the Aspect. Jacob Schoenhof.
Rosicrucianism: Under the Rose-Cross Symbol. Frederic C. Penfield.
A Theory of the Drama. Ferris Greenslet.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly.—141, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK. 10 cents. August.

A Day of President McKinley's Life. Illustrated. Mrs. J. A. Logan.

Genealogical Magazine. - Elliot Stock. 18. August. The Arms, Crest, and Supporters of Stourton. Continued.
An Old Scottish Manuscript. Continued. Chas. S. Romanes.
The Archipiscopal Seals of Canterbury and York. J. G. Pedrick.
Royal Descent of Lional Cresswell. Continued.
Duchy of Lancaster "Inquisitiones Post-Mortem." Continued.
Stokes. The Deceased Wife's Sister.

Gentleman's Magazine. - CHATTO AND WINDUS, 15. August.

The Old Doctors. C. W. Heckethorn. Some Literary Landmarks of a Northern Height (Hampstead). W. C.

Some Literary Endomines Sydney. Friedrich Ludwig Jahn; the Father of Gymnastics. W. Gowland Field. Hayton; a Cumberland Parish. T. H. B. Graham. Philip Massinger's "Fatal Dowry." H. Schütz Wilson. Some Causes of Changes in Dress. C. Fortescue Yonge.

Geographical Journal.-Edward Stanford. 28. July.

Address to the Royal Geographical Society. Sir Clements Markham.
Explorations in the Bolivian Andes. With Maps. Sir Martin Conway.
On the Temperature of the Floor of the Ocean, and of the Surface Waters of the Ocean. With Maps. Sir John Murray.
The Swedish Arctic Expedition of 1898. With Map. Prof. A. G. Nathorst.
The Bathymetrical Conditions of the Antarctic Regions. With Maps.
Henry K. Arçtowski.

Geological Magazine. - DULAU AND Co. 15. 6d. July.

Note on the Molar of a Trilophodont Mastodon from the Base of the Suffolk Crag. Illustrated. Prof. E. Ray Lankester.
The Glaucophane Gabbro of Pegli, North Italy. Illustrated. John

British Cretaceous Madreporaria. Illustrated. Robert F. Tomes.

Girl's Own Paper, -56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. The Home of the Earls Poulett. Illustrated. Clotilda Marson.
The Pleasures of Bee-keeping. Illustrated. F. W. L. Sladen.
Practical Aids to the Culture of Lillies. Continued. Chas. Peters.
Old English Cottage Homes. Continued. Illustrated. H. W. Brewer.

Girl's Realm .- HUTCHINSON AND Co. 6d. August.

The Girlhood of the Duchess of York. Illustrated. Sybil.
Lobster Doll Collection. Illustrated. Louise J. Miln.
Girl-Gardeners at Swanley College. Illustrated. Miss E. M. Symonds.
Swimming for Girls. Illustrated. Clive Holland.
Open-Air Photography. Illustrated. Christian H. Curle.
On Filration. Miss Alice Corkran.
The Pleasures of Picnicking. C. S.-M.

Good Words.-ISBISTER. 6d. August.

The Romance of Inland Navigation. Illustrated. H. G. Archer.
On Dogs That go into Society. J. J. Waller.
The Midland Railway: In and Out of St. Pancras. Illustrated. John Pendleton.

Echoes of the French Revolution. Sophia Beale. A New Light on Cheese. G. C. Nuttall. Thirsty London. J. Deane Hilton.

Great Thoughts .- 28, HUTTON STREET, FLEET STREET. 6d. August. Francis Adams; Poet, Journalist, and Rebel. With Portrait. S. G.

Miss Agnas Weston on Work amongst the Blue-Jackets. Illustrated.

Miss Agnus Weston on Wish analogs and Raymond Blathwayt.
Austin Dobson. With Portrait. Rev. R. P. Downes.
Augustus Hare at Home. With Portrait. Raymond Blathwayt.
Rev. Frederick Wm. Robertson; a Great Prose-Writer. With Portrait.

Humanitarian .- Duckworth and Co. 6d. August.

Outdoor Exercise for Women. Susan, Countess of Malmesbury.
Communism in the Cotswolds. Darley Dale.
Objections to Woman Suffrage Considered. Lady Grove.
Deteriorating Families. Lucien Wetherall.
Mind and Morals in Animals and Savages. A. O'Neill Dannt.
The Position of Women at the Restoration. Arthur Rackham Cleveland.
Hands as an Index of National Character. Eileen Clements.

Idler .- 3, PATERNOSTER Row. 18. August.

The Cafés of Holland. Illustrated. S. L. Bensusan. Apes: Our Near Relations. Illustrated. Gambier Bolton. A Recollection of Great Hitters. Illustrated. Capt. E. G. Wynyard. At Earl's Court Exhibition. Illustrated. Walter Emanuel.

Index Library .- 172, EDMUND STREET, BIRMINGHAM. 215. per Prerogative Court of Canterbury Wills. Continued. Dorset Wills. Gloucestershire Inquisitiones Pos:-Mortem. Continued.

International .- A. T. H. BROWER, CHICAGO. 10 cents. July. Quaint Old Nantucket. Illustrated. Ellye H. Glover.

-SWAN SONNENSCHEIN AND CO.

International Journal of Ethics.—Swan So 2s. 6d. July.

The New "Ethical" Philosophy. John Watson. Good Citizenship and Athletics. C. S. Loch. Instruction of the Young in Sexual Knowledge. E. The Right of the State to Be. W. W. Willoughby. Affection in Education. Edw. Carpenter. The Mission of Music. S. A. Barnett. E. Lyttelton.

Irish Ecclesiastical Record.—24, Nassau Street, Dublin, 18.
July.

The Birthplace of St. Patrick. Very Rev. Edward O'Brien.
Dr. Russell of Maynooth. Rev. Matthew Russell.
Freemasonry and the Church in Latin America. Rev. Philip Burton.
The New Legislation on the Index. Rev. T. Hurley.

Irish Monthly.--M. H. GILL AND SON, O'CONNELL STREET, DUBLIN. 6d. July.

R'chard Dowling. P. A. Sillard. Dr. Thomas Nedley; In Memoriam. Visit to the Colosseum. Very Rev. Jerome O'Connell.

Namur La Belle. T. A. W. Irish Writers of the 19th Century. Rachel's Tears. Rev. M. Russell.

Irish Rosary .- 47, Little Britain. 3d. August. The Confederation of Kilkenny. Illustrated. Sacerdos. Saint Ita. C. J. M.

at

ries

C.

on.

ues

ld.

ia:

Jewish Quarterly Review .- MACMILLAN. 3s. 6d. July. Responses of Maimonides in the Original Arabic. Rev. G. Margoliouth.
The North Arabian Land of Musri in Early Hebrew Tradition. Rev. Prof.
T. K. Cheyne.
The Bible in Neo-Hebraic Poetry. A. Feldman.
An Introduction to the Arabic Literature of the Jews. Continued. Prof.
Moritz Steinschneider.

Prof. Schirger on Life under the Jewish Law. I. Abrahams.
Geniza Specimens; a Letter of Chushiel. Prof. S. Schechter.
Notes on the Critique of the Text of the Targum of the Prophets. Prof.
W. Bacher.

Journal of Geology,—Luzac and Co. 50 cents. June. American Homotaxial Equivalents of the Original Permian. C. R. Keyes. Correlation of Carboniferous Rocks of Nebraska with Those of Kansas. Journal of Geology.-Luzac and Co. 50 cents.

The Nebraska Permian. W. C. Knight.
The Diamond Field of the Great Lakes. With Maps. W. H. Hobbs.
Replacement Ore Deposits in the Sierra Nevada. H. W. Turner.

Journal of Political Economy .- P. S. King and Son. 75 cents.

June. sion of Specie Payments, Dec. 1861. Wesley C. Mitchell. Organized Labour and Organized Capital. Harry P. Robinson.
Historical Changes in the Monetary Standard. W. W. Carlile, Insolvent National Banks in City and Country. Ward A. Cutler.

Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute.—Northumberland Avenue. 6d. July.
Life in the Malay Peninsula. Hugh Clifford.

Journal of the Royal United Service Institution.— J. J. Keliher and Co. 2s. July.

The Bicycle for War Purposes. Illustrated. Captain B. F. S. Baden-Powell.

The Strategic Relation of Persia to British Interests. Sir Richard Temple. England's Sick Soldiers in Flanders in 1742-8. John T. Bramhall.

Lady's Realm.-HUTCHINSON AND CO. 18. August. Lady's Realm.—HUTCHINSON AND CO. 18. August.
The Queen at Windsor. Illustrated.
Zamp.ich, Bohenia, and Its Ghosts. Illustrated. Francis Count Lützow.
Hurlingham and Ranelagh. Illustrated. Mrs. Stepney Rawson.
Valley Cycling Tours in Germany. Illustrated.
Hens and Their Golden Eggs. Illustrated. W. M. Elkington.
On the Desirability of Long or Short Engagements. Symposium.
His Grace Archbishop Maclagan. Illustrated. Mrs. Sarah A. Tooley.
August in Scotland. Illustrated. Constance, Countess de la Warr.
On the Weasing of Old Lace. Illustrated. Mrs. F. N. Jackson.
Isabella, Duchess of Rutland; a Beautiful Duchess. Illustrated.

Land Magazine. -149, STRAND. 18. July.

South Africa. Major-Gen. C. E. Luard.
Farm Buildings, Gilbert Murray.
The Latest Revolution in Ireland.
Sir Walter Gilbey. With Portrait.
The French Poultry Industry. Edward Conner.
The Condition and Prospects of the Agricultural Labourer. Alfred J. H.
Cresnii.

Crespi.
The Law of Land Tenure and Its Amendment. James Long. The Land Question in France. S. F. Nayler.

Leisure Hour .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. The Railway Station at the Bank of England. Illustrated, W. J. Gordon. Forests I have camped in. Dr. Gordon Stables. Fighting the Pestilence in India. Illustrated. A. V. Stewart. A Reminiscence of a Quist Spot in the Engadine. Illustrated. C. Gurney. Diving Adventures. Illustrated. W. B. Northrop. Richard Holt Hutton. With Portrait. John Dennis. A Parcel of Anecdotes. Continued. Miss Elsa D'Esterre-Keeling.

Library Association Record.-Horace Marshall. 18. July. Gabriel Naudé; a Librarian of the Seventeenth Century. George Smith. How to Catalogue a Novel by Its Title. John A. Stephens.

Library World .- 4, Ave Maria Lane, E.C. 6d. July. Indicators. Illustrated. James D. Brown.
The Arrangement of Periodicals. E. A. Baker.
List of Books on Electricity. F. J. Burgoyne.

Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.—36, Southampton Street, Covent Garden. 18. July. The Salon in Old Philadelphia. Anne H. Wharton.

The Saton in Old Patianesiphia. Anne ri, wharton. Small Deer. Ernest Ingersoll.
What are Women striving for? Sara Y. Stevenson.
Building a Trust. H. W. Thomas.
Self-Propelled Street Vehicles. G. J. Varney.
Simon Lake's New Argonaut. With Diagram. C. S. Clark.

London Quarterly Review. - Charles H. Kelly. 2s. 6d. July.

London Quarterly Review.—CHARLES H. KELLV. 25. 6
Anthropology and Christinnity. Alex. Macalister.
George Borrow. Dora M. Jones.
Can We explain Life by Vitality? L. C. Miall.
The Influence of Methodism on Scotland. Richard Green.
Richard Cadbury. Hugh W. Strong.
The Present Pope and the Future Conclave. Henry J. Piggott.
The Evolution of a Reference Bible. J. Anthony Barnes.
Protestantism and the French Genius. Onesime Prunier.
The Cromwell Tercentenary. C. Silvester Horne.
Out on the Essex Marshes. Robert McLeod.
Mark Twain. Anne E. Keeling.

Longman's Magazine.-Longmans. 6d. August. Great Ormond Street, London, Prof. Hales,
The Critical Essay in France, Paul Bourget,
A Farmer's Year. Continued, H. Rider Haggard, Madame de Sévigné; a Great Letter-Writer, S. G. Tallentyre.

Lute. - PATEY AND WILLIS, 2d. July. Madame Blanche Marchesi. With Portrait. Anthem: -- "O Praise God in His Holiness," by Cuthbert Harris.

McClure's Magazine .- 10, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND. 10 cents. July. The Automobile in Common Use. Illustrated. Ray Stannard Baker. Soldier Police of the Canadian North-West. Illustrated. W. A. Fraser. The Ugsolved Problems of Astronomy. Illustrated. Prof. Simon Newcombe. Lincoln's Great Victory in 1864. Illustrated. Ida M. Tarbell. Rudyard Kipling. C. E. Norton.

Macmillan's Magazine, -- Macmillan. 18. August. The Lake of the Mournful Cry. A. G. Bradley.

Anglo-Saxon Womanhood,
A Plea for the Domestic Servant,
Man's Love for Nature. Rev. E. J. Newell.

Manchester Quarterly.—Sherratt and Hughes, 27, St. Ann Street, Manchester. 6d. Jul.

Down the Danube. Illustrated. W. V. Burgess.
Anthony Trollope. Frederick Barker.
The Enormity of Fiction. J. D. Andrew.
Ivan Vazoff. Joseph Angeloff.
On the Law Case; Shlyolck v. Antonio. James T. Foard.
Tragedy as It was Written. Arthur W. Fox.

Medical Magazine.-62, KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C. 15. July. The Compulsory Notification of Phthisis. Hasdai ben Schaprout: a Mediæval Physician and Statesman. Foreign Editor.

Editor.

How Surgery became a Profession in London. Continued. Illustrated. D'Arcy Power.

The Early Recognition and Treatment of Mental Defects in Children. Dr. H. Rayner.

Influenza; a Modern Epidemic. J. F. Palmer.

Ancient Irish Medicine. Dr. T. M. Madden.

The Treatment of Cardiac Failure. Dr. F. de H. Hall.

Metaphysical Magazine. - GAV AND BIRD. 18. July. The Dual-Unity of Mind. Concluded. Quaestor Vitae.

A Technical Analysis of Thought and Its Faculties, Continued. Paul Avenel.

The Memory of Past Births. Charles Johnston.
Plato's Doctrine of "Being." C. H. A. Bjerregaard.

The Straight Gate and Narrow Way. Harriet S. Bogardus.

"There's Rosemary; That's for Remembrance." Irene Langridge.

Mind .- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE. 38. July. On the Relation between the Philosophy of Spinoza and That of Leibnitz. Dr. R. Latta.

Can there be a Sum of Pleasures? Rev. Hastings Rashdall
On Shadworth Hodgson's "Metaphysic of Experience."

Missionary Review of the World.—44, FLEET ST. 18. 3d. July. Ramabai and the Women of India. Illustrated. D. L. Pierson. Wm. Duncan's Work on Annette Island, Alaska. Illustrated. Rev. E. Marsden.

The Christian Settlement at Metlakahtla. Illustrated. Wm. Duncan. Reform Movements in China. Rev. Arthur H. Smith.

Monist.-KEGAN PAUL. 25. 6d. July. A Study of Job and the Jewish Theory of Suffering. Professor James A. Myths in Animal Psychology. Professor C. O. Whitman. Biology and Metaphysics. Professor C. Lloyd Morgan. Friedrich Nietzsche's Uebermensch. Dr. Heinitch Goebel and Ernest Immorality as a Philosophic Principle; the Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche. With Portraits, Dr. Paul Carus.

Month.-Longmans. 1s. August. The Personal Character of Mary Tudor. J. M. Stone,
Catholic Progress in England. James Britten.
Concerning Lourdes and Pilgrimages. C. P. Whiteway, James Wadsworth; an Apostate at St. Omer, r6:8-1622.
The International Congress of Women. (1) A. Streeter, (2) M. D. Petre.

Monthly Musical Record.-Augener. 2d. August.

Lost Ideals. F. Peterson. The Critical Burden. E. A. Baughan. Mazurka for Piano by Felix Borowski.

Municipal Affairs .- P. S. King and Son. 25 cents. June. Water Supply in London and Philadelphia; a Tale of Two Cities. Milo R. Malth

Maltbie.

Municipal Government of Padua. Prof. L. Einaudi.
The Larger Transportation Problems in Cities. Edw. E. Higgins.
Duration of Franchises. Charlton T. Lewis,
State Oversight of Police. Frank Moss.
The Ford Bill. John De Witt Warner.
Taxatip of Personalty. Lawson Purdy.
The Single Tax applied to Cities. Byron W. Holt.

AW TTLDWLTTMTT

Musical Herald .- J. Curwen. ad. July.

Mr. Frederic James. With Portrait.
Choral Contest at Luxemburg. Editor.
Song in Both Notations:—"It was a Lover and His Lass," by Thomas Morley.

Musical Opinion.—150, HOLBORN. 2d. July. Harmony in the Ancient Eastern World. Continued. Dr. Henry Hikes. Edouard Batiste. Rev. J. T. Lawrence.

Musical Times.-Novello. 4d. August.

July.

mhe.

dy. reign

ated.

Paul

nitz

uly.

. E.

s A

rnest

Irich

min

o R.

Ben Davies. With Portrait.
Song in the Synagogue. Rev. F. L. Cohen.
'Early Bodleian Treasure: "a Bodl-ian Treasure.
Mendelssohn and Rosenhain.
Anthems: "The Savérifice of God," by Herbert W. Wareing. "Angel Voices, Ever Singing," by Rev. E. Vine Hall.

National Review .- EDWARD ARNOLD, 2s. 6d. August.

NALIONAI ROVIEW.—EDWARD ARNOLD. 2s. 6d. August. The Rapprochement between Germany and France. "Ignotus." Our Duty towards China. R. A. Yerburgh.
Jean Calas. F. C. Conybeare.
Klondike; a Study in Booms. Ernest E. Williams.
The Church as a Profession. Rev. Douglas Macleane.
American Affairs. A. Maurice Low.
British Expansion in West Africa. Major Darwin.
Eggenburg Open-Air Reformatory. Miss Edith Sellers.
The Australian View of the South African Crisis. Rev. W. H. Fitchett.
Greater Bittain.

Natural Science.—Young J. Pentland, Edinburgh. 18. July. Notes on the Habits of the Northern Fur Seal. G. E. H. Barrett-Hamilton. Excavations on Puffin Island. Philip J. White. F. W. Headley on Evolution. Dr. R. F. Licorish.

Meteorology and Ethics.
The Comparative Chemistry of Our Forest Trees. Dr. P. Q. Keegan.

Some Considerations concerning Symmetry. Prof. R. J. Anderson.
The Flora of the Alps. Prof. A. W. Bennett.
The Scope of Natural Selection. J. Lions! Taylor.
Stray Impressions of the Marine Invertebrates of Singapore and Neighbouring Islets. F. B. Bedford.
A Theory of Sleep. Prof. A. L. Herrera.

New Century Review.—434, STRAND. 6d. August.
English Poetry at Cambridge and Elszwhere. John Hudson.
Sir Walter Besant on the Rewards of Literature. An Autho., International Congress of Women; the Women Who would! Hilary North.
The English Channel; a Cosmopolitan Channel. T. H. S. Escott.

Heine. Joseph Forster. New England Magazine.—5, Park Square, Boston, 25 cents. July. Jordans; Where Wm. Penn is buried. Illustrated. H. C. Shelley. Essex, Connecticut; a River Town. Illustrated. Sanuel M. Comstock. The Last Letter of John Brown. Illustrated. Charles H. Small. Lake Champlain. Illustrated. J. W. Buckham. The Religion of Rudyard Kipling. Jabez T. Sunderland. Old Rochester and Her Daughter Towns. Illustrated. Mary Hall Leonard.

New Ireland Review .- BURNS AND OATES. 6d. July. The Children of Ireland and the State. E. D. Daly.
Child Drunkards. K. L. Montgomery.
Relics of the Old Parliament House. A. Petre,
The Irish National School System. Rev. M. McPolin.
The Religious Songs of Connacht. Continued. Dr. Douglas Hyde.

New Orthodoxy. -30, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. So-Called Heresy; Playing with Words, and the Perils of Advancing Experience. Rev. Robert Tuck. Experience.

The Gospel of the Holy Ghost. Continued. Rev. Robert Tuck. Nineteenth Century.-Sampson Low. 28. 6d. August.

Nineteenth Century.—Sampson Low. 2s. 6d. August.
The Excessive Armies of Russia. Sir Lintorn Simmons.
The Limitations of Naval Force. Sir George Sydenham Clarke.
A Woman's Criticism of the Women's Congress. Miss Frances H. Low.
What Church has "Continuity?" Dr. St. George Mivart.
The Recent Fuss about the Irish Eanguage. Prof. Mahaffy.
The Connection of England with Newfoundland. Sir William Des Voeux.
Lord Ellenborough: a Reply. Lord Colchester.
Did Byron Write "Werner?" Hon. Frederick Leveson-Gower.
Why are Our Brains deteriorating? Col. H. Elsdale.
Life on the Nile South of Fashoda. Arthur D. Milne.
Life on the Nile South of Fashoda. Arthur D. Milne.
The Humours of Terna-nog. Mrs. Orman Cooper.
The "Decameron" and Its Villas. W. J. Stillman.
Madame Necker. Hon. Marcia C. Maxwell.
The Evolution of the Parliamentary Oath. Michael MacDonagh.
The Casus Belli in South Africa. Edmund Robertson.

Nonconformist Musical Journal .- 29, PATERNOSTER Row. 2d. August.

Music at Wesley Chapel, Bilston.

Anthem: -"Thou Crownest the Year with Thy Goodness," by Arthur Anthem :-" Berridge.

North American Review .- WM. HEINEMANN. 25. 6d. July. A Channel Passage, 1835. Algernon C. Swinburne.

Ex Oriente Lux! A Plea for a Russo-American Understanding. (1) Prince

E. Ookhtomsky, (2) Vladimir Holmst-em.

"Americanism," True and False. Rev. William Barry.

Universal Peace. Baroness Bertha von Suttner.
England and the Transvaal. Sydney Brooks.
American Public Schools—A Reply. Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer.
The Government of Greater New York. Bird S. Coler.
Pig Iron and Prosperity. George H. Hull.
The Logic of Our Position in Cuba. An Officer of the Army of Occupation.
The War with Spain. Continued. Major.-Gen. Nelson A. Miles.
Golf, from a St. Andrews Point of View. Andrew Lang.

Open Court.—Kegan Paul. 6d. July.
Survivals of Paganism in Mexico. Illustrated. Prof. F. Starr.
Timeo Danaos: The Recent German-American Mass Meetings and British Intrigue. Wm. Vocke.
For the Re-establishment of International Friendship. Dr. Paul Carus.
Modern French Philosophy. Illustrated. Prof. L. Lévy-Bruhl.

Organist and Choirmaster.—3, Berners Street. 3d. July. Anthem:—"From All That Dwell Below the Skies," by E. J. Hopkins. "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis," by M. Agatha Bennett.

Outing.—International. News Co. 25 cents. July.
On a Pennsylvania Trout Stream. Illustrated. Ed. W. Sandys.
Hunting Alaskan White Sheep with Rifle and Camera. Illustrated. Dall de Wesse.

Cat-Boating on Jersey Inland Waters. Illustrated. Henry T. Brown. The Golf Clubs of Chicago. Illustrated. Alexis J. Colman. Remote Norway. Illustrated. Elizabeth Taylor.

UVERIANG MONTHLY.—SAN FRANCISCO. to cents. July.

A Trip to Mount Lyell. Illustrated. Chas. E. Townsend.
The Impromptu Songs of Tyrol. Charles A. Gunnison.
Mount Hamilton. Illustrated. Alice Kirk.
Jeffersonian Principles. Morris M. Estee.
The Hearst Architectural Competition of the University of California.
Illustrated. Charles S. Greens.
Los Angeles, Southern California; Where the N.E.A. is to meet this Year.
Illustrated. Wyllys S. Abbott. Overland Monthly .- SAN FRANCISCO. to cents. July.

Paidologist .- Cambray House, Cheltenham. 13. 6d. per annum. June. The Beginning of Childhood, Mrs. Herbertson, Left-Handedness, Prof. Tracy.

Palestine Exploration Fund, -38, CONDUIT STREET, W. 25, 6d. July.

Excavations at Tell Zakarlya. Illustrated, Dr. F. J. Bliss. Excavations at Tell-es-Sâfi. Illustrated, Dr. F. J. Bliss. A Byzantine Church at Umm er Rûs. Illustrated. R. A. S. Macalister. The Ancient Standards of Measure in the East. Lieut.-Gen. Sir C. Warren.

Pall Mall Magazine .- 18, Charing Cross Road. 18. August. The Queen's Private Apartments at Windsor Castle. Illustrated. E. M.

Jessop.
America To-day; North and South. Wm. Archer.
The Upper Thames; a Poets' River. Illustrated. Mrs. E. T. Cook.
An Epidemic of Kisses in America. Prof. C. Lombroso.
Silhouettes in Parliament. Il'ustrated. Continued. F. J. Higginbottom.

Parents' Review .- KEGAN PAUL. 6d. July, August. P.N.E.U. Conference: Report.

Pearson's Magazine.-C. A. Pearson. 6d. August. The Harvest of the Ics. Illustrated. Turner Morton.
Giant Rafts. Illustrated. Weatherby Chesney.
Royalty Incognito. Illustrated. Mrs. F. N. Jackson.
Royalty Incognito. The Marcus Tind I.
The Trains de Luxe of the World. Illustrated. D. T. Timins.

Photo-Miniature. - DAWBARN AND WARD. 6d. July. Photography Outdoors. Illustrated.

Physical Review.-MACMILLAN. 35. An Interferometer Study of Radiations in a Magnetic Field. I. John C. The Electrical Resistance of Lead Amalgams at Low Temperatures. George W. Gressman. The Wehnelt Electrolytic Break. W. J. Humphreys. The Hydrolysis of Stannic Chloride. Wm. Foster, Jr.

Political Science Quarterly.-Henry Frowde. 3s. 6d. June. Problems of an Inter-Oceanic Canal. G. L. Rives.
England and Her Colonies. Continued. Prof. J. Davidson.
Imperialism and the Civil Service. Prof. G. E. Howard.
Connecticut as a Corporate Colony. Prof. H. L. Osgood.
Prices in the Confederate States. Prof. J. C. Schwab.
City and Country Taxes. Max West.

Positivist Review .- WM. REEVES. 3d. August. France and Her Critics. E. S. Beesby. Mexico. S. H. Swinny. The Power of Humanity. C. G. Higginson. Dr. Congreve. E. S. Beesby.

Practical Teacher .- 33, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August. Some Characteristics of German Universities. C. I. Dodd. Calderon.
The "John Ru-kin" School, Camberwell: Infant Department. A New Method of Teaching Reading.

Presbyterian and Reformed Review.—237, DOCK STREET, PHILADELPHIA. 80 cents. July.

The Crisis in the Church of England. Meade C. Williams.

"Our Great Philosopher" v. The Known God. Daniel S. Gregory.
The Text of the Minor Prophets. John Oman.
"It Says"; "Scripture Says"; "God Says." Benj. B. Warfield.

Morality; Intuitive and Imperative. Thomas Nichols.

Psychological Review.—Macmillan. 3s. July.
Studies on the Telegraphic Language. W. L. Bryan and Noble Harter.
Communications from the Psychological Laboratory of Harvard University.

Recognition under Objective Reversal. George V, N. Dearborn.

Public Health,-123, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE. 18. July. Census of 1901. Sanitary Accommodation of Factories and Workshops, Practical Hints on the Analysis of Water and Sewage. S. Barwise.

Public School Magazine .- 131, TEMPLE CHAMBERS. 6d. August. Wellington College. Illustrated. J. L. Bevir.
Tring Field-Day. Illustrated. R. N. Pocock.
The Fourth of June at Eton. Illustrated. Cyril Groombridge.

Puritan .- James Bowden, Henrietta Street, W.C. 6d. August. in Plymouth; the Land of the Pilgrims. Illustrated. J. R. Macdonald. A Memory of Mathew Arnold. Illustrated. J. M. Fergusson. Rev. G. Owen on China and the Reform Movement; Interview. Miss Rev. G. Owen on C. S. Bremner.

C. S. Bremner.
The Modern Mania for Sport. Wm. Clarke.
George Fox as a Social Reformer. John S. Rowntree.
The Free Church of Scotland Monthly. Illustrated.
Rev. F. W. Macdonald. Illustrated. W. Scott King.
Some Problems of Suburbanity. E. Griffith-Jones.

Quarterly Journal of Economics, -MACMILLAN. 3 dols. per annum.

July. Expansion and Protection. H. H. Powers,
On the Value of Money. W. Cunningham.
The Sociological Frontier of Economics. Edward A. Ross,
The Preconceptions of Economic Science. Continued. Thorstein Veblen.
The Sttlements with the Pacific Railways. H. R. Meyer.
The Franchise Tax Law in New York. Edwin R. A. Seligman, Municipal Ownership of Street Railways in Detroit. Charles Moore.

Quarterly Review .- John Murray. 6s. July.

Industrial Education in Ireland. The Novels of Ferdinand Fabre. Montesqu'eu in Italy. The Art of Dining. Mødern Mysticism. The Holy Sepulchre. The Rifle The Rifle,
The Scottish Churches.
The Philippines and Their Future.
The American Colonies in the Eighteenth Century.
Mrs. Oliphant's Autobiography.
Climate and Colonisation.

Quiver.-Cassell, 6d. August, Negro Camp-Meetings in the States. Illustrated. Eliz, L. Banks. Orphans of the Royal Reds and Blues. Illustrated. D. L. Woolmer, Children's Services on the Sands. Illustrated. A Chat about Juvenile Off-inders. Illustrated. Major Arthur Griffiths.

Railway Magazine .- 79, Temple Chambers. 6d. July.

Thomas C. Jenkin, General Manager, City and South London Railway. Interview. Illustrated.

The Changes in the General Managerships, Illustrated.

London and South Western Railway. Illustrated. Victor L. Whitechurch. Was Stephenson the Father of Railways? Illustrated. R. R. Dodds. Should British Railways be owned by the State? Illustrated. E. Thomas. How the Railways deal with the Fenit Mackerel Industry. Illustrated. W. Beddoes

W. Deddoes,
The Manx Northern Railway. Illustrated. Brunel Redivivus.
On the Cambrian Railways. Illustrated. T. Booth.
North Eastern Coaching Stock. W. J. Scott.
Didcot, Newbury and Southampton Railway. Illustrated.

Reliquary .- BEMROSE AND SONS, 28. 6d. July. Antiquities of Bolsterstone and Neighbourhood. Illustrated. Joseph Kenworthy. The Instrument of the Rosary. Continued. Illustrated. Henry Philibert Feasey.
Two Midlothian Souterrains. Illustrated. David MacRitchie.
The Grinlow Barrow, Buxton. Illustrated. John Ward.

Royal Magazine. -C. A. PEARSON. 3d. August. The Art of the Camera. Illustrated. Roderick Grey.
Good and Faithful Servants of the Queen. Illustrated. Wm. Will.
Adventures at Niagara Falls. Illustrated. F. A. Acland.
The Ways of a Torpedo-Boat-Destroyer. Illustrated. J. J. Bennett.
The Southern Pacific Railroad; a Remarkable Line. Illustrated. C. F. The Southe Holder. Extraordinary Stone Freaks. Illustrated. Henry G. Swift.

Saint Martin's-le-Grand.—A. F. King, Prujean Square, Old Bailey, E.C. 3s. per annum. July. The Cape Mail. Illustrated. E. E. Harrhy. Telephones. Illustrated. John Gavey. The Liverpool Post Office; Past and Present. Illustrated. F. Salisbury.

Saint Nicholas .- MACMILLAN. 18. August. On Minot's Ledge. Illustrated. Gustav Kobb... A Famous Lacrosse Struggle. Illustrated. Geo. H. Ford. With the "Rough Riders." Concluded. Illustrated. Dr. Henry La A ra. With the Motte.

Saint Peter's .- 37, Essex Street, Strand. 6d. August. Comets and Meteors. Illustrated. Norman Lattey.
The Hoblokkers of Flanders. Illustrated. Ernest Robertson.
The Art of Letter-Writing. James Britten.
The College of the English Jesuits at St. Omers. Illustrated. Rev. H.

School Board Gazette.—Benrose and Sons 1s. July.

Public Education in England and Scotland.

Legislation for the Instruction of Mentally-Deficient and Epileptic Children. School-Planning. Continued.

School Music Review .- Novello. 14d. August. A Pastoral Play in an Eighteenth Century Pleasure Garden. Wakeling Dry.
Songs in Both Notations:—"Whispering Wind," by J. Labbett; "The Duckling," by Kate Boundy, etc.

School World .- MACMILLAN. 6d. July. Dornhitories in Schools. Dr. C. E. Shelly. The System of the Winds. Illustrated. Prof. Wm. Morris Davis.

Science Gossip .- 110, STRAND. 6d. August.

Meteorites. Illustrated. J. T. Carrington. Butterflies of the Palæarctic Region. Continued. Illustrated. Dr. H. C. Lang, Armature of Helicoid Land Shells. Continued. Illustrated. G. K., Gude.
A History of Chalk. Continued. Edw. A. Martin.
British Freshwater Mites. Continued. Illustrated. Chas. D. Soar.
Submerged Forests near Hoylake. Illustrated. E. J. Burgess Sopp.

Scots Magazine.-Houlston and Sons. 6d. July. John Galt.
The Last Years of John Knox's Life. John A. Black.
Gillies of Balmakewan.

The British Army in 1759. Adam Smail. Oliver Cromwell. Kenneth Mathieson.

Scottish Geographical Magazine.—Edward Stanford. 1s. 6d. July.

Albania and the Albanians in 1838. Hlustrated. Rev. Hugh Callan. Early Exploration in North-West Canada. Alexander Begg. The Transcaspian Desert. The Western Erg of Algeria.

Scottish Review .- ALEXANDER GARDNER. 4s. July.

Scottish Review.—ALEXANDER GARDNER. 4s. July.

Early Struggles for the Indian Trade.
Golf and Its Literature. William Wallace.
Roundell Earl of Selborne. William O'Connor Morris.
Miss Ferrier's Novels.
Anent the Whitefoords. Mrs. Clement Parsons.
The Evolution of the Procurator Fiscal. Henry H. Brown.
Faunous Sultanas. Miss Lucy M. J. Garnet.
Mrs. Oliphant's Autobiography.
The Story of Tusculum. F. Gautier.
Some Remarkable Coincidences in Customs and Beliefs. Fred R. Coles.

Scribner's Magazine,-Sampson Low. 18. August.

Japanes : Flower Arrangement. Illustrated. Theodore Wores. Daniel Webster. Continued. George F. Hoar. The Letters of R. L. Stevenson. Continued. Sidney Colvin. Strad .- 186, FLEET STREET. 2d, August.

Mdlle. Eliza Kufferath. With Portrait. Gamba. G. H. Buckman. With Portrait. Rev. W. Meredith-Morris. Antonius Stradivarius. Continued. H. Petherick. Beethoven's Trios. Continued. J. Matthews.

Strand Magazine. - George Newnes, Ltd. 6d. August. Paying an Election Bet. Illustrated. From Behind the Speaker's Chair. Continued. Illustrated. Henry W. Lucy, Over the Alps in a Balloon. Illustrated. Charles Herbert.
The Australian Cricketers at Home. Illustrated. M. Randal Roberts.
Mrs. J. Wheeler Bennett's Remarkable Quilt. Illustrated. R. G. Bassett.

Sunday at Home .- 56, PATERNOSTER Row. 6d. August.

The Story of Aberdeen. Illustrated. Mrs. I. Fyvie Mayo. Spurgeon's Autobiography, Vol. III. Rev. S. G. Green. Scenes from Roman Tragedy. Cyril Grey. A Sunday on Tutuila. Illustrated. Rev. R. W. Thompson. The Mission Boat Le Bon Messager, and Her Work in France. Illustrated. The Mission B W. Soltan The London Missionary Society.

Linel Bisho Ripor Birds India

The S Some Otte: Bosto

Venic The Famo A Ba 7 The ' Comp The The

Uni Admi 2 ome Poly The The Reorg Signa The

The Char We

The

Josep The

Wate

Allg Finla Joha On t

Som A T Mar

Arc Insu

Aro. The De

Chir

Sunday Magazine. - Isbister and Co. 6d. August.

Linehouse; China Town in London Town. Annis Lennoys.
Bishop Whipple; the Apostle to the Indians; Interview. Illustrated.
Amyas Clifford.
Ripon Cathedral. Continued. Illustrated. Archdeacon Danks.
Birds; Little Winged Weavers. Illustrated. E. H. A.
Indian Women at a Mela. Illustrated. E. Granger.

Temple Bar.-MACMILLAN. 18. August.

The Salons of London. Some Poets in Love. Alfred T. Turner. Norman Ramsay. Otter-Hunting. W. Payne Collier.

у.

La

H.

n.

he

Temple Magazine.-Horace Marshall. 6d. August.

Boston Public Library; the Finest Public Library in the World. Illustrated. Philip W. Wilson.
Venice of Tod uy. Illustrated. Fred Dolman.
The Story of the P. and O. Illustrated. Gertrude Bacon.
Famous Men and Women I have met. Illustrated. T. L. Robinson.
A Barrister's Life. Alfred Doveton.

Theosophical Review .- 26, CHARING CROSS, S.W. 18. July. The Trismagistic Literature. Concluded. G. R. S. Mead. Compr.hensiveness. Col. R. Elias. The Philosophy of Plotinus. W. C. Ward. The Heavenly Kingdom of the Holy Grail. Concluded. Mrs. Cooper.

Oakley.
The "Gitâ" as a Text-Book of Devotion. Bertram Keightley.
The Christ. Mrs. Annie Besant.

United Service Magazine,—WM. CLOWES AND SONS. 28, August. Admiral Sir T. Byam Martin. With Portrait. Sir Richard Byam Martin and Adm. Sir Richard Vesey Hamilton. Some of my Shipmates. Continued. Robert Lendall. The Intercepted Correspondence of the French. Col. Sir G. S. Clarke. Marlborough. War between the Age of Turenne and the Age of Marlborough. William O'Connor Morris.

Marlborough. War between the Age of Turenne and the Age Marlborough. William O'Connor Morris.

Polybius. W. B. Wallace.
The Training of Infantry for Attack. Lieut.-Col. G. F. R. Henderson, The Royal Regiment of Artillery. Quis.
Reorganisation of the Corps of Royal Engineers. "Common Sense." Signallers; Their Use and Organisation. OOO.
The Ruilway Employment of Reservists; an Experiment Signalman. The Chinese Army. Edward Harper Parker.

Werner's Magazine.-43, East 13TH STREET, New YORK. 25 cents. July.

The Future of Poetry. Goldwin Smith.
What can be done for the Drama? William Archer.
Charles A. White: Interview.

Wesleyan Methodist Magazine,—2, Castle Street, City Road. 6d. August.

In Swiss Highland and Italian Lukeland. Illustrated. Anna E. Keeling. Dr. Henry Robert Reynolds. Continued. Dr. J. H. Rigg. Waterfalls of North Wales. Continued. Illustrated. R. Corlett Cowell.

Westminster Review .- F. WARNE. 2s. 6d. August. Joseph Chamberlain as a Tory Minister. T. M. Hopkins. The Dreyfus Case.

Privil:ge v. Justice to Women. Ignota.

Modern Ethics. Harold Thomas.
Socialism from an Outsider's Point of View. A. F. B.
Ground-Rent in Relation to Income-Tax. E. C. Fitzwillism.
Queensland Politics and Federation. T. M. Donovan.
"When an Old Hag Governs and a Young Man Reigns," etc.; a Chin:se Prophecy. John Macgregor.
Novels of Rev. Dr. William Barry. P. A. Sillard.
Poems of Thomas Hardy. W. B. Columbine.
The Birth of Apollo in a Floating Island. Geo. St. Clair.
The Anglican Compromise. H. G. Wintersgill.
Maurice de Guérin. L. E. Tiddeman.
Music in the Provinces.

Music in the Provinces.
Fallacies of the Inoculators. Dr. E. Haughton.

Wide World Magazine. - GEO. NEWNES. 6d. August. Twelve Years' Captivity in Omdurman, Continued. Illustrated. Charles Neufeld. Adventures o Cobbold. on the Roof of the World. Continued. Illustrated. R. P. How the Lasso is used. Illustrated. Howard Reynolds.
The Great "Passion" Procession at Murcia. Illustrated. Herbert Vivian.
Curiosities of the South Seas. Illustrated. Continued. Basil Thomson.
The Great Ice Cave of Dobschau in the Carpathians. Illustrated. L. H.

Eisenmann.
Among West African Swamps. Illustrated. P. A. McCann.

Windmill.-SIMPKIN, MARSHALL. 38. July. Religion and Sensuousness in Literature, etc.; the Space Between. Alyce K. Bagram.

Windsor Magazine. - WARD, LOCK AND Co. 6d. August. Windsor magazine.—WARD, LOCK AND CO. 50. August. Decorated Bicycles. Illustrated. Harold J. Shepstone. The Making of an Armour-Plate. Illustrated. Robert Machray. Recent Cricket Matches in Fiction. Illustrated. E.B. V. Christian. The Centre of England. Illustrated. Harry Golding. The Banner-Maker and His Art. Illustrated. L. W. Lillingston. Among the Kentish Fruit-Pickers. Illustrated. Fred. A. Talbot. Coastguards: the Police of the Coast. Illustrated. Archibald S. Hurd.

Woman at Home. - Hodder and Stoughton. 6d. August. The Holiday Homes of Celebrated Women. Illustrated. Mrs. S. A. Women Millionaires. With Portraits. Marie A. Belloc.

Young Man .- HORACE MARSHALL 3d. August. R. C. Lehmann at Home. Illustrated. Maurice Phillips. Revelations of the Microscope. Illustrated. James Scott. The Romance of Eastern Religion. Rev. A. Rowland. Tempyon's "In Memoriam"; a Great Book of the Century. J. Marshall Mather. Edward W. Bok; Interview. With Portrait.

Young Woman .- Horace Marshall. 3d. August. ndies' Clubs of London. Illustrated. Dora M. Jones. me. Garet - Charles: a Famous Lady Photographer. Interview. Mme. Garat -Illustrated. The Adventures of a Lady Journalist. Continued. Miss Billington. Lady Doctors. Women Who Work Among Chemicals.

THE GERMAN MAGAZINES.

Allgemeine Konservative Monatsschrift,—E. Ungleich, Leipzig.

1 Mk. July.

Finland and the Finland Question. E. von Zepelin.

Johann Kaspar Bluntschli in Baden. Continued. Pfarrer Kern.

On the Origin of the Napoleons. Von Colomb.

The Caroline Islands, the Marianne Islands, and the Pelew Islands. Ulrich von Hasel. von Hassell.

The Conservatives and Prince Bismarck's Reminiscences. Alte und Neue Welt .- Benziger, Einsiedeln. 50 Pf. July. Some Great Exhibits at the Paris Exhibition. Illustrated. F. K. A Tyro! "Edelweiss" of the 16th Century. Illustrated. J. Engel. Travel in Austria. Illustrated. Dr. G. Grupp. Martin Eduard von Simson. With Portrait. Dr. F. Schanz. The Thurn and Taxis Jubilee at Regensburg. Illustrated.

Archiv für Soziale Gesetzgebung und Statistik.—Carl Heymann, Berlin. 2 Mks. 50 Pf. Nos. 1 and 2.

The Weaving Industries and Their Organisation. Prof. W. Sombart. International Protection of Workmen. Prof. G. Cohn. Insurance against Unemployment in Switze:land. Dr. E. Hofmann.

Dahelm.—Poststrasse 9, Leipzig. 2 Mks per qr. July 8. Tyrol and Switzerland. Illustrated. Dr. J. Walther. Travel Hints. H. von Spielberg.

July 22.
Science and Polar Exploration. Dr. Klein.
Arö. Illustrated. Ernst Förster.

July 29.
The Marianna and Caroline Islands. Dr. F. Blumentritt.

Deutscher Hausschatz.-F. Puster, Regensburg. 40 Pf. Heft 14. China. Concluded. Illustrated. F. Kühnert. Gypsies. L. Heumann.

Gibraltar. Illustrated. O. Hirt. The New German Colonies in the South Seas. Illustrated. Martin Greif. With Portrait. O. von Schaching.

Deutsche Revue. - Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart.

Deutsche Revue,—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, St 6 Mks, per qr. July.

St. Petersburg at the Time of the Crime in War. Concluded. England and Russia in Asia. Sir Wm. H. Rattigan. Anarchy of Thought. Ludwig Stein. Ancient and Modern Art. Eugène Müntz.
A Picture of the Sun. A. Schmidt. Microbes. Dr. J. Héricourt.
Sleep and Fatigue. Paul Schultz.
Prince Hattfeld in Paris, Jan.-March, 1813. W. Oncken. German Politics and the Agrarian Question. Interview with Cecil Rhodes. G. Krause.
The Caroline Islands.

Deutsche Rundschau.-Gebrüder Paetel, Berlin. 6 Mks. per quarter. July.

Poetry and Politics in Alsace. F. Curtius. C. A. Busch; Early Reminiscences. National Inconsistencies in Finland. T. Pezold. Antiquities; An Open Letter to Women. Julius Lessing. The Philosophy of Peace. Ludwig Stein. Prince Bismarck's "Reminiscences." Continued. Max I Continued. Max Lenz.

Deutsche Worte.—Langegasse 15, Vienna VIII/1. 50 Kr. June. Bernstein and Social Democracy. F. Hertz. July.

The Alcohol Question and Social Politics. Dr. R. Wlassak.

Garteniaube.-ERNST KEIL'S NACHE., LEIPZIG. 50 Pf. Heft 7. Catalepsy, Dr. W. A. Nagel, Quedlinburg Castle, Illustrated, W. Heimburg. Alpine Accidents. Max Haushofer. German South-West Africa, Illustrated.

Gesellschaft .- J. C. C. BRUNS, MINDEN. 57 Pf. July r. The Beginnings of Poetry. Dr. L. Jacobowski. After Death. Paul Göhre. Henri Becque. Ernest Tissot. The Berlin Exhibition. R. Klein.

July 15.

German Culture. M. G. Conrad. Liberalism and Modern Literature. S. Lublinski. Prague Poets. H. Benzmann.

Kunstgewerbeblatt,-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 1 Mk. July. Art in Book-Printing. Illustrated. P. Schubring.

Neue Deutsche Rundschau.—S. FISCHER, BERLIN. 1 Mk. 50 Pf. July. French Lyric Poetry. Georg Brandes, The Second Future; a Proposed Grammatical Reform, Curt Eisner.

Nord und Süd.-Schlesische Verlags-Anstalt, Breslau. 2 Mks. July.

The Treatment of Consumption. G. Obertüschen. Smyrna. Paul Lindau.
The Better Man; Europe, 1898-9. Optimist.
In Praise of Stupidity. Jean Paul.

Stimmen aus Maria-Laach.—Herder, Freiburg, Baden. ro Mks. 30 Pf. per annum. July.

The Socialism of Karl Max according to Eduard Bernstein. H. Pesch. The "Social Decomposi ion" of Protestantism. R. von Nostitz-Rieneck. The Exploration of North Greenland. J. Schwarz.
Modern Hinduism under the Influence of Christian Ideas. A. Hegglin. Drinking Water and Epidemics. H. Kemp.

A Mary Stuart Trilogy. W. Kreiten.

Ueber Land und Meer.—Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, Stuttgart i Mark. Heft 12.

The Vienna Schneeberg Railway. Illustrated. Dr. M. Weinberg. Naval Life. Continued. R. Schneider. Rudyard Kipling. With Portrait. Dr. G. A. Crüwell. The Klondike Goldfields. Illustrated. O. Zahn. Schloss Hohkönigsburg. Illustrated. Pigeon-Culture. Illustrated. Dr. K. Russ.

Heft 13.

Po!

Re

En Scu

Arc Goy

The

Arc

Me

Gus

The

Nie

R

Fran

Fiel Vict

Pau

The

R Prin The Was

One The

Art

Prin

Tow The

Sism

Emil Liter The

Nap R

Gern

The Jules

Rev

R

The Cuckoo. W. Haacke.
The Lübeck Canal. Illustrated. Dr. Schulze.
Naval Life. Continued. Germany's New Territory in the Pacific. Illustrated. F. C.

Ver Sacrum.-E. A. SEEMANN, LEIPZIG. 15 Mks. per ann. Heft s. Giovanni Segantini. Illustrated.

Vom Fels zum Meer.—Union-Deutsche-Verlagsgesellschaft, Stuttgart. 75 Pf. Heft 23.

The Lukas Kranach Exhibition at Dresden. Illustrated. P. Schumann. Sankt Goar. Illustrated. Rhenanus, Servia. Illustrated. J. Beckmann.

Wilhelm Raabe. With Portrait. G. Klitscher. 1
The New German Colonies. C. von Tannhausen. The New German Colonies. C. von Neuzelle. Illustrated. A. Trinius.

Die Zeit.-Günthergasse 1, Vienna IX./3. 50 Pf. July 1. The Inquisition at Barcelona. Dr. J. Bronta. Austria's National Schools. S. Kraus. New Vienna. Dr. L. Abels.

Finland. Prof. B. Minzès. Adolph Pichler. R. C. Jenny.

Electoral Reform in Vienna. K. Presidents, Ministers and J. K. Two Years of Statecraft in Servia. Prof. M. G. Milowanowitsch. New Vienna. Continued.

July 23. Clericalism, Jesuitism, and the Dreyfus Case. Poll Adalbert Stifter; Unpublished Letters. R. Holzer.

Zeitschrift für Bildende Kunst.—E. A. Seemann, Leipzig.
26 Mks. per annum. July.
Two Greek Silver Dishes from Hermopolis. Illustrated. Erich Pernice.
Sir J. E. Millais. Illustrated. W. Weisbach.
Dürer. Concluded. K. Lange.
The Altar-Work of Piero dei Franceschi at Perugia. Illustrated. A. Aubert.

Zeitschrift für Bücherfreunde.—Velhagen und Klasing, Leipzig. 24 Mks. per ann. July.

Cologne Book-Illustration of the 15th and 16th Centuries. Illustrated.
Dr. O. Zaretzky.
Rare Books. Heinrich Meisner.
The Codex Flateyensis. Illustrated. F. Stock.
The International Book-Exhibition at Krefeld. Illustrated. R. Kautzsch.

THE FRENCH MAGAZINES.

Annales de Géographie. - 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 5 frs. July 25.

Peneplain. W. M. Davis The Anthropogeography of Corsica. F. Ratzel. From Nagasaki to Moscow through Siberia. Sylvain Lévi.

Association Catholique.—3, RUR DE L'ABBAYE, PARIS. 2 frs. July 15.'
Agricultural Syndicates and Old Age Pensions. Ch. Antoine.
The Question of Association in Germany. H. Cetty.

Bibliothèque Universelle,-18, King William Street, STRAND. 20s. per annum. July.

Eclecticism and Philosophy. Ernest Naville.
Gottfried Keller. Continued. F. Dumur.
Réclame. Concluded. Paul Scapfer.
Alcoholism and the Sale of Drink in Russia. M. Reader.
French and Euglish Detectives. Concluded. Aug. Glardon.

Correspondant. -14, Rue DE L'ABBAYE, PARIS. 2 frs. 50 c. July 10. Treedom of Education in France in 1899. H. de Lacombe.
The Congo Free State. Concluded. Jean Darcy.
Physicians and the French Academy. L. Delmas.
Murat in Spain. Concluded. G. de Grandmaison.
George Sand in Russia. H. Chantavoine.

July 25. Metz and Its Church after the Annexation. Metz and Its Church after the Annexation. F. Klein.
Unpublished Letters of Joseph de Maistre, F. Descostes.
The Map of France. A. de l'Apparent.
The Women's Congress. M. Dronsart.
The Duty of France in Africa and the Trans-Saharian Question. With Map. P. Lefebure.

Map. P. Lefébure. Physicians and the French Academy. Concluded. L. Delmas. Humanité Nouvelle.-15, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.

Napoleon I. and False Coinage. L. de Royaumont.
Some Objections to Economic Materialism. Concluded. G. Sorel.
The Situation in the United States. "Americus."

Journal des Économistes.—14, Rue Richelleu, Paris. 3 frs. 50 c. July 15.
Socialism and the Evolution and Moral Progress of Sociaties. E. Martineau. Military and Naval Veterans. E. Rochetin.
Financial and Commercial Progress in France. M. Zablet.

Ménestrel.-2 bis, Rue Vivienne, Paris. 30 c. July 2, 9, 16, 23, 2). Music in Saitzerland, Continued. Albert Soubies.

Mercure de France.—15, Rue de L'Echaudé-Saint-Germain, Paris. 2 frs. July.

The Centenary of Jean Siméon Chardin.
From Kant to Nistzsche. Continued. J. de Gaultier.
Octave Mirbeau. P. Quillard.
Human Monsters in China. J. Drexelius.

Monde Moderne.—5, RUE ST. BENOIT, PARIS. 1 fr. 65 c. July. Coimbre. Illustrated. A. Peritcolin. What We eat. Illustrated. O. Damotte. The Breton Theatre. Illustrated. B. H. Gausseron. The Bois de Boulogne. Illustrated. B. de Saint-Pol Lias. The French Salons of 1899. Illustrated. A. Quantin.

Nouvelle Revue .- 18, King William STREET, STRAND.

Nouvelle Revue, --- 18, KING WILLIAM STABET 30.5, per half-year, July 1.

A Polar Expedition of the 16th Century, E. Van Biéma. The Poetry of Pouchkine. Prince V. Bariatinsky. The Jansenists, L. Séché. Marie Bashkirtseff. Mme. R. d'Ulmès. Letters on Foreign Politics. Mme. Juliette Adam. July 15.

The Duc d'Aumale. G. Macon. The Duc d'Aumaie. G. Macon. Parliamentary Reform. A. Bisseuil. The Officers of the French Army before 1879. General Bebillot. L'Hotel Lauzun. L. Augé de Lassus. Letters on Foreign Politics. Mine. Juliette Adam.

Nouvelle Revue Internationale.—23, Boulevard Poissonière, Paris. 2 frs. 50 c. July.

The Hague Conference. Maria L. de Rute. Emilio Castelar. M. de Marcère. An Unpublished Letter from Montalembert. The French Revolution and Its Principles. P. Denis. Urbain Rattazzi. Continued. Mme. Rattazzi. The French Salons. Gustave Haller.

Réforme Sociale.-54, Rue de Seine, Paris. 1 fr. July 1. The Société d'Économie Sociale, 1838-1839. A. Delaire. The Société d'Economie in Tunis. Henri Joly. Electrical Reform. A. Lefèvre-Pentalis.

Politics and Administration in France in the Last Twenty Years. J. Ferrand.
Unpublished Pages by Emmanuel de Curzon.
The Working Classes and Emigration to the Colonies. R. P. J. B. Piolet.

Revue de l'Art. -28, RUE DU MONT-THABOR, PARIS. 7 fr. 50 C. June. La Sibylle Samb:th of Brug.s. Illustrated. Henri Bouchot. Painting at the Salons of 1899. Illustrated. Pierre Gauthiez. Engraving at the Salons. Illustrated. Pierre Lalo. Sculpture at the Salons. Illustrated. Léonce Benedite.

5.

ert.

Z1G.

ted.

h.

Sculpture at the Salons. J. L. Pascal.

Goya and His Art. Illustrated. Paul Lafond.

The Trojan War; Designs acquired by the Louvre. Illustrated. Jean

Guiffrey.

Guiffrey.

The Bardo Museum in Tunis. Illustrated. Georges Perrot.
Architecture at the Salons. Illustrated. J. L. Pascal.
Decorative Arts at the Salons. Illustrated.
Medal-Engraving at the Salons. Illustrated. Emils Molinier.
Goya. Continued. Illustrated. Paul Lafond.
Gustave Moreau and Sir Edward Burns-Jones. Illustrated. Léonce Benedite. The Monuments at Damietta and Mansourah. Illustrated. Al. Gayet.

Revue Blanche.—t, Rue Laffitte, Paris. 1 fr. July 1. Nietzsche's "Imitation." P. Finet.

July 15.
Economic Progress in Germany. P. Louis.
The Socialist Party and the Crisis in France. C. Péguy.

Revue Bleue .- FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d. July 1. France and the Catholic Church at the End of the Nineteenth Century. Bernard Lavergne.

July 8. Field-Marshal Souvorof. Alfred Rambaud. Victor Cherbuliez. Emile Faguet. July 15.

The Question of Alsace-Lorraine. X. Field-Marshal Souvorof. Continued. A. Rambaud. Paul Masson. Paul Acker.

The French Civil Code. Maurice Zablet. The Transvaal. M. Sevin-Desplaces. Recollections of Paris in 1830. July 29, The Alsace-Lorraine Question.

Revue des Deux Mondes,—18, King William Street, Strand.
30s. per half-year. July 1.

Prince Bismarck: the Militant Period. C. Benoist. The Trans-Saharian Railway. P. Leroy-Beaulieu.
Washington; a Federal Capital. P. Lefaive.
Once more the Baccalaureate. F. Brunstière.
The Colonial Principles of an American Naturalist. G. Valbert.

July 15.
La Grande Mademoiselle: Her Childhood, A. Barine. La Grande Mademoiseile: Her Childhood, A. Daffel. Art in Secondary Education. G. Perrot. Prince Bismarck; the Triumphal Period, C. Benoist. Towns of the Far East. A. Bellessort. The Romans and Their Poet, Cesare Pascarella. G. Hagu:nin.

Revue d'Économie Politique. - 22, Rue Soufflot, Paris.

20 frs. per annum, June. Sismondi ; His Economic and Social Doctrines. Prof. Hitier. Labour Bureaux. Continued, J. de Fenyvessy.

Revue Encyclopédique. - 18, King William Street, Strand. 78. per qr. July 1.

Art and Photography. Illustrated. Marcel Nicolle.
The Dutch Colonies. With Map and Illustrations. A. Mellion.

July 8.

Contemporary Armenian Literature. Illustrated. Arschak Tch-banian.

Emilo Castelar. Illustrated. Alcide Ebray.

Literature in the United States. Illustrated. B. H. Gausseron. Finland. Illustrated. Julien Leclercq. The Women's Congress. Henry Joly. July 29.

Napoleon III. Illustrated. A. Pingaud.

Revue Française de l'Etranger et des Colonies.—;2, Rue de La Victoire, Paris. 2 frs. July.

San Nen Bay, China. With Map. A. A. Fauvel.
The Pacification of Madgascar. G. Vasco.
Germany and the Carolines. With Map. J. Servigny.

Revue Genérale .- 16, Rue Treurenberg, Brussels. 12 frs. per annum. July.

The Belgian Primary Education Law. Ch. Woeste. Scandinavia; the Land of the Sagas. H. Ponthiere. Jules Lemai:re and F. Brunetiere. G. Doutrepont.

Revue Internationale de Sociologie.—16, Rue Soufflot, Paris. 18 frs. per annum. June. The Scientific Concept of the Laws of Sociology. O. d'Araujo. Nepotism. R. de la Grasserie.

Revue pour les Jeunes Filles. - 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. July 5.

Aubanal and "Mignon." Jeanne Violet.
Moll Coupe-Bourse and Jenny la Plongeus:; Two Queens of Thieves.
P. Mille.
Alexander Pushkin. R. Candiani.
M. Fantin-Latour and His Work. R. Bouyer.
July 20.

Victor Cherbuliez. L. Barracand. Blind Girls. A. Latouche.

Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 3 frs. July.

Science and Philosophy. E. le Roy. Positivism and Rationalism. L. Weber. Psychologic Deduction and Observation in Social Economy. F. Simiand-

Revue du Mondo Catholiquo. - 75, Rue des Saints-Pères, Paris.

2 frs. 50 c. July.

Franco-Russian Relations. Continued. A. Savaète.
The Contradiction of Free Thought. Justin Fèvre.
The Natade and the Blockade of Duhomey, 1850-2. Continued. A. de

African Monarchism. Continued. Dom Besse.
M.litary Justice and Discipline in the Army. Concluded. Jean d'Estoc.

Revue da Paria, -Asher, 13, Badrond Streef, Covent Garden.
60 frs. per annum. July 1.

My Roman Embassy. Duc de Choiseul. A Coloni d Method. E. Lavisse. Paris and l'Assistance Publique. A. Lefevre. The Government of London. D. Pasquet. The Pol'sh Crisis. G. Séailles.

The Triel of Foucquet. A. Droz. Taine. E. Faguet.
The Houses of Labour of Belgium. D. Halévy.
The Genesis of the Exhibition. M. Corday.

Revue Politique et Parlementaire .- 5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 3 frs. July 10.

The Paris Exposition of 1900 and Transport.
The Progress of Socialism in France. A. Richard.
The French Law respecting Accidents to Workmen. M. Bellom.
The Future Trans-Pacific Cable. P. Maistre.

Revue des Revues .- 12, Avenue de L'Oréra, Paris. 1fr. July 1. Houses of Correction in France. E. Fournière, Clark Uni ersity, U.S. Dr. Albert Schinz. The Talapoins of Siam. Illustrated. Francis Mury, The Priest in the Modern Franch Novel. G. Pellisaier. Women in Alphonse Daudet's Works. Comtesse de Magallon. Telegraphy without Wires. Illustrated.

Revue Scientifique. - FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE. 6d.

The Organisation of a Voyage of Exploration. J. Dybowski.
The Condition of the Merchant Service. Concluded. G. Fermé.
July 8.
The Venetian Fisheries. Illustrated. Thorndike Nourse.
The Study of Languages from a Psycho-Physiological Point of View. G. Saint-Paul.

July 15.
The International Geological Congress. A. Thevenin.
The Natural History of the Postage Stamp. Illustrated. H. Coupin.
July 22.
Practical Technical Education. Max Soubsiran.

Maritime War. Quillet Saint-Ange.

July 23.

The Beauty of the Human Face. G. Papillault.

Practical Technical Education. Continued. M. Soub.iran.

Revue Socialiste .- 78, Passage Choiseul, Paris. 1 fr. 50 c. July. The Naturalisation of Algerian Jews. Lou's Durieu.
The Third Congress of German Labour Syndicates. Continued. The Third E. Milhaud. The South African Question. Paul Louis.

Revue Universitaire.—5, Rue de Mézières, Paris. 10 frs. per annum. July 15. The Reform of Academic Inspection. A. Martin. Popular Education. Paul Crouzet.

Semaine Littéraire.—4. Boulevard du Théâtre, Ganeva.
15 c. July 1.

Choulette and Verlaine. With Portraits. M. Muret, July 8. P. Godet. Victor Cherbuliez. With Portrait. July 15.

Rosa Bonheur at Home. A van Amstel. July 22

The Religious and Ethical Movement in Italy. E. Bovet.

Université Catholique.—Burns and Oates. 20 frs. per annum. July 15.

Lent in 1659. J. B. Vanel.
The Jouffroy Case. Abbé Delfour.
The Roman Temples of Fourvière. F. Tournier.
The Triple Alliance. Continued. Comte J Grabinski.

THE ITALIAN MAGAZINES.

Civiltà Cattolica. - VIA DI RIPETTA 246, ROME. 25 frs. per annum. July 1.

Decadence and Depravity in Art. Italian Dialects.

The Concordat between the First Consul and Pius VII. Continued. July 15.

Presentiments and Telepathy.

An Unpublished Letter by St. Ignatius Loyola to the Duke of Tuscany.

Americanism condemned by Bishops of the United States.

Flegrea.-PIAZZETTA MONDRAGONE, NAPLES. 20 frs. per annum.

July 20. Ago. R. de Cesare. Literary Naples of Forty Years Ago. R. de Cesa The Venetian Exhibition. D. Angeli. Art and French Literature. Remy de Gourmont.

Nuova Antologia.—Via S. Vitale 7, Rome. 46 frs. per annum.

July 1.

The Imprisonment of P. Giordani. Prof. A. d'Ancona.

Elephant-Hunting in Ceylon. F. Scheibler.

Balzac's Women Friends. Continued. F. de Roberto.

July 15. Giosue Carducci. G. Chiarini.

The Florentine Sculptors of the Fifteenth Century. Prof. A. Chiappelli.
Johann Strauss. G. Menasci.
Liberty and the State. G. Ferrero. Riforma Sociale. - PIAZZA SOLFERINO, TURIN. 12 frs. per annum. July 15.

The Problem of Sociology. Prof. G. Simmel. Italian Armaments in Relation to Finance. P. F. Casaretto. Agrarian Banks according to a Recent Bill. F. Coletti.

Rivisita Italiana di Sociologia. VIA NAZIONALE 200, ROME. 15 fr. per annum

Psychology and Political Economy. F. Coletti. The Education of Children according to Ancient Irish Custom. N. Tamassia. A Crisis in Marxism. A. Labriola.

Rivisita Politica e Letteraria, -3, Via Marco Minghetti, Rome.

The Italian Phenomenon. XXX. The Reform of Agrarian Contracts. Prof. F. Luzzatto.
The Policy of Emigration for European Nations. Prof. V. Grossi.

Rivisita di Scienze Biologiche. -- 3. VIA CARLO ALBERTI, TURIN.

Acquired Human Organs. Prof. C. Lombroso. Automatic Action in the Respiratory Centres. G. Luciani.

THE SPANISH AND PORTUGUESE MAGAZINES.

Ciudad de Dios .- REAL MONASTERIO DEL ESCORIAL, MADRID. 20 pesetas per annum. July 5.

The Disruption of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Benito R. Gonzalez. Psychological Phenomena. Marcelino Arnaiz.

On the Use of the Pauline Privilege. Pedro Rodriguez.

The Disruption of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Benito R. Gonzalez. Psychological Phenomena. Marcelino Arnaiz.
On the Use of the Pauline Privilege. Pedro Rodriguez.
July 20.
The Disruption of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. B. R. Gonzalez.
Magnetic Intensity. Justo Fernandez.
Some Incidents of the Reign of Terror. E. Bire.

España Moderna. —CUESTA DE SANTO DOMINGO 16, MADRID. 40 pesetas per annum. July.

American Poets. M. C. Guerra.

Velasques and His Kindred. R. Salillas.

Educational Reform in Spain. By a Member of the Education Board.

Castelar and His Work. J. P. de Guzman.

O Instituto .- University of Coimba. 9d. July. Studies in Grecian History. Dr. F. Garofalo.

Crabio-Cerebral Topography. A. C. de Nepes. The Revolution of 1820. A. Vianna.

Revista Brazileira.—Travessa do Ouvidor, 31, Rio de Janeiro.
60s. per annum. No. 87.

Ought We to have a Civil Code in Brazil? Prof. H. I. de Souza.
Men and Things in Central Brazil. H. Meyer.
Temperature and the Sensation of Heat. Prof. H. Morze.

Revista Contemporanea. - Calle DE PIZARRO 17, MADRID. a pesetas. June 30

Conception of Crime according to the Classical and the Positivist Schools. J. D. Migoya.

Troubadours and Other Minstrels. J. L. Estelrich.

Troubadours and Other Munstrels. V. Schaffers:

One Hundred Leagues on the Frozen Volga. Continued. S. Lutoslawski.

July 15.

The Literary Influence of Sarmiento. A. L. Pelaez.
Some Thoughts on the Peace Conference. Arturo Lopes.

MAGAZINES. THE DUTCH

Eisevier's Geillustreerd Maandschrift.—Luzac and Co., 46, Great Russell Street. 18. 8d. July.

Matthijs Maris, Illustrated, G. D. Marius, Revolutionary Days at Delft in 1795. Illustrated, C. G. Hodenpijl.

De Gids.—LUZAC AND Co. 3s. July.
The Republic of the United Netherlands after the Peace of Utrecht. Prof.

The Dawn of International Law. Prof. Molengraaff.
The Cheapness of Elementary Education in France. L. E. Visser.

Vragen des Tijds .- Luzac and Co. 18. 6d. July.

The Economic Policy of Mediaval Towns. M. W. F. Treub. How the Changes in the Far East will affect Our Future. Pruys van der

The Influence of the Teachers on School Attendance. T. Nawijn.

Woord en Beeld, -ERVEN F. BOHN, HAARLEM. 16s. per annum. July. Sophie Offerman van Hove. W A Gravin of Holland. J. Betz. With Portrait, Dr. de Jong.

THE SCANDINAVIAN MAGAZINES.

Kringsjaa .- OLAF NORLI, CHRISTIANIA. 2 kr. per quarter. June 30. Bruges, Illustrated, Dr. Alexander Bugge. Fossilized Ivory. Ernest Krause.

July 25.

The Origin and Significance of Colour in the Animal World. A. Petersen.

Ringeren.-The CITY PASSAGE, CHRISTIANIA. 2 kr. per qr. July 1. The Pretenders: Modern France: Frans von Jessen. The Dreyfus Affair. Continued. R. Besthorn. July 8. Prince Victor Napoleon. Frans von Jessen.

Samtiden.-John Grieg, Bergen. 5 kr. per ann. Nos. 4-5. Esther. S. Obstfelder. Friedrich Nietzsche. Ivar Saeter. Correspondence of Jacob Burckardt and Nietzsche.

Tilskueren.-Ernst Bojesen, Copenhagen. 12 kr. per annum. July. Japanese Literature. Dr. Georg Brandes.

The Subjective Rights of the Woman Question. Dagmar Hjort. Danish Commerce, Marcus Rubin.

SUBSCRIPTION ORDER FORM FOR THE "REYIEW OF REVIEWS."

To the Manager " REVIEW OF REVIEWS,"

Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, London, W.C.

Date

For which I enclose Eight Shillings and Sixpence.

Cap

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

(AUGUST.)

I.—THE TRANSVAAL QUESTION.

COMMAND COMMAN

La Silhonette, Paris.]

[August 20.

"Rule, Britannia" is only a farce, Because if you meet many obstacles Of this nature on your road, Your chariot, Britannia, will rule no more!

THE TRANSVAAL.

Cape Times]

der

ily.

[Cape Town.

The Owl.] [Cape Town.

JOHN BULL: "Bother that cock; I shall have to wring its neck yet!"

The Owl.]

[Cape Town.

ASUTADIHISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE. VSOTSIH

South African Review.]

BRITANNIA: "I can't hold him much longer, so you had better get up."

Car Tower A PUBLIC NUISANCE!

JOE: "This must be put to rights at once!"

(-) and Bade I : Amount ordered "

(Cape Town.

Melbourne Punch.]

WHAT WAR WITH ENGLAND MEANS!

[July 6.

HISTORY OF THE MONTH IN CARICATURE.

II. FRANCE AND HER TROUBLES.

A NEW TRIPLE ALLIANCE ?

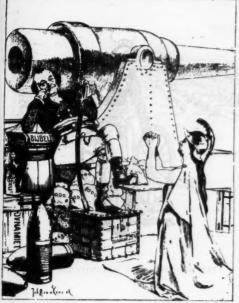

News of the World.]

[August 9.

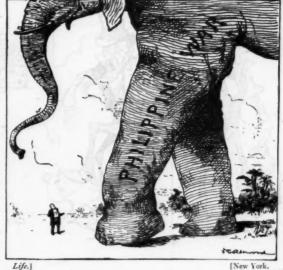

FRANCE'S POSITION: WHERE WILL IT END! A JONE HIT THE OUTLOOK FOR FRENCH MILITARISM!

III.-MISCELLANEOUS.

Amsterdammer]

McKinley: "Was it an elephant I bought, or a mammoth?"

A DUTCH VIEW OF JOHN BULL!
(Holland appealing to Britain to abstain from War.)

Ulk, Berlin.]

THE PRACTICAL ENGLISH!

Even in England they know how to make good use of the Resolutions at the Hague Conference.

Life.] [New York.

THE HARVEST IN THE PHILIPPINES.

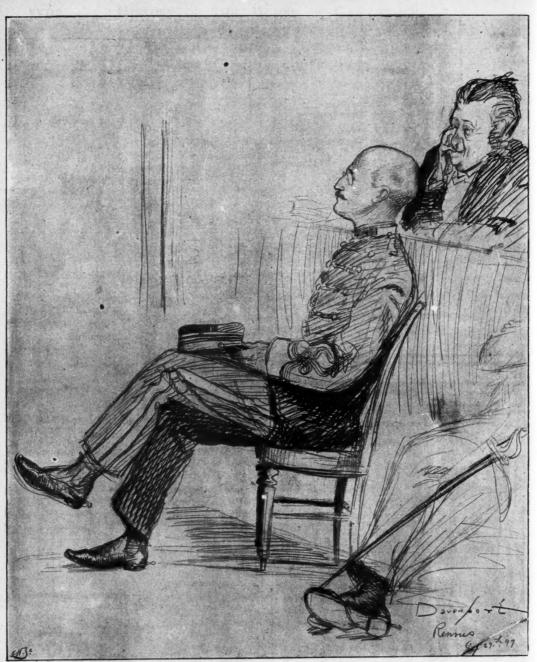

A SWISS CARICATURIST ON THE SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

PAUL: "I think that I shall be safer on the upper branch." KAISER: "Those who thwart me had better look out."

By permission of the " New York Journal."]

CAPTAIN DREYFUS AT RENNES,

With his Counsel, M. Demange.

(FROM A SKETCH BY MR. HOMER DAVENPORT.)

and s

Sum

Gove of unfact Mr. that with politi

settle

there the 1 realit are Salish Beacl the ca confid to ke that h opinio sympa nation sympa well, them withst there prepa Boers instea to the dispos spirit.

was p expres

THE PROGRESS OF THE WORLD.

LONDON, Sept. 1, 1899.

The month of August by common consent has been observed as a Summer Hollday. period of political truce. Parliament rose at the beginning of the month, and since the prorogation no party speeches have disturbed the serenity of the summer holiday. But although the platform has been deserted and the usual polemic between the Opposition and the Government is suspended, there has been a good deal of uneasy unrest in certain quarters arising from the fact that our Colonial policy is in the hands of Mr. Chamberlain, who has produced the impression that he would rather welcome than regret a war with the Transvaal, which would enable him to settle accounts with President Kruger. But for this nothing could have been more tranquil than August politics in Great Britain.

But not even Mr. Chamberlain could disturb the pleasant optimism of John Bull at this holiday season.

The newspapers, no doubt, here and there fidgeted and fumed, but among the masses of the people there was blank incredulity as to the reality of the danger of war. The reasons for this are easy to explain. First and foremost, Lord Salisbury is Prime Minister, and Sir Michael Hicks-Beach is Chancellor of the Exchequer, and despite all the cavillings and the criticisms there is an invincible confidence in the determination of the Prime Minister to keep the peace. Secondly, notwithstanding all that has been done in the way of exasperating public opinion against the Boers, there is much less popular sympathy with the Outlanders than with any oppressed nationality that has at any time appealed to the sympathies of our people. We all wish the Outlanders well, but we are not prepared to cut throats to make them more comfortable. In the third place, notwithstanding all the bellicose claque of the newspapers, there is an absolute absence of any serious military preparations adequate to the campaign against the Boers. Further add to this that President Kruger, instead of adopting an uncompromising antagonism to the British proposals, appears to have shown every disposition to meet our demands in a reasonable spirit. Therefore, all things taken into account, it was practically impossible to evoke any vigorous expression of opinion hostile to a war in which no one believes seriously.

The Danger element of danger arising from two factors which acted and reacted upon each other. The first was Mr. Chamberlain, and the second was the British Iingo party in South Africa. The intemperate speeches of Mr. Chamberlain and the extremely injudicious publication of Sir Alfred Milner's despatches excited the British Jingo in South Africa, and he in his turn set up an agitation which compelled Mr. Chamberlain to make periodical speeches which certainly have not tended to the establishment of peace. It is one of the misfortunes of the position that Mr. Chamberlain, having appealed to race sentiment in South Africa, has kindled a fire which might be a very good servant but is a mighty inconvenient master. There is a large residuum of the Old Adam in John This element has never forgotten Majuba Hill, and welcomes every and any opportunity of getting even with Kruger. It is strongly represented in the press-especially in the London press. What with Mr. Chamberlain at Downing Street, British fire-eaters in South Africa, and the unregenerate remnant in this country, there are sufficient elements of danger to justify vigilance, if not alarm.

Public Opinion against

Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Chamberlain has expressed his confident belief that if he goes to war the whole nation will support him enthusiastically, it will be found that the very reverse is the fact. Our people have no love for the Boers, and they would be very glad if the Outlanders could obtain the equal rights to which they are entitled. But if a plébiscite were to be taken whether we should send fifty thousand men out to South Africa for the purpose of crushing the Boers, the result would show that the advocates of war were in a very insignificant majority. Appearances on this matter are very misleading. The members of the Opposition shrink from taking the field against a hypothetical war lest they should bring about a real war by weakening the strength of the pressure which might have brought about a settlement without effusion of blood. once let the country understand that Mr. Chamberlain is about to be allowed to give effect to his menaces by committing this country to a war against the Transvaal, and the whole situation would be revolutionised in a moment. Our people don't intend to fight, and they are just a little uneasy lest they should be jockeyed by Mr. Chamberlain into a position from which it would be difficult to extricate themselves without humiliation. At the same time no humiliation is so great as that of waging an unjust war.

CHAMBERLAIN: "That's the way, Mr. Bull. Straight on!"

A Constitutional

There is one element in the situation to which sufficient prominence has never been given, and that is the absurdity of contemplating a campaign with the Transvaal before we have secured the support of Cape Colony. We forced representative government upon Cape Colony against the wish of the Colonists, and having done so we are bound to abide by the result. If the last elections had resulted in the return of a British majority which had installed an anti-Boer Ministry in office, our case against the Transvaal would not have been strengthened, but we should at least have secured the indispensable foothold for taking action against the Boers if such action were decided upon. But when the elections were lost, and we have our own Colony at the Cape governed by a Ministry which is hand in glove with the Boers, what can be more fatuous and suicidal than to seize the very morrow of the elections which we have lost in order to force on a campaign with the Boers? If we are going to make war to establish British ascendency in Africa, we had certainly better begin by securing British predominance at the polls in the Colony which is part and parcel of our own Empire. Owing to the lack of this preliminary precaution, we have to face the fact that the Government of the Cape Colony cannot be relied upon for support in a war against the Transvaal. Mr. Schreiner, the Prime Minister of the Cape. declared that he would do his utmost, should war break out, to keep the Cape neutral. That is to say. if the British Empire goes to war with the Transvaal Republic, that portion of the British Empire which is most immediately interested in the issue of the fight will refuse to fire a shot against the Transvaal. The situation is, no doubt, an impossible one, for once war is begun in South Africa, there will be civil war in Cape Colony; but that such a programme should be deliberately set forward by the responsible Minister of a self-governing Colony ought to be sufficient to remind our war party of the madness of the policy on which they are bent.

The Bark and the Bite of Blastus. There is, however, very good reason to believe that Mr. Chamberlain's bark is very much worse than his bite. Certainly there could not be a greater contrast than that which is to be found between Mr. Chamberlain's speech to the Unionist demonstration from his doorstep at Highbury, and the despatch which, apparently at the same time, he was sending to Pretoria. At Highbury he used menacing words concerning the sands running out, and used provocative language, which, in the mouth of a responsible Minister, is usually regarded as the immediate precursor of premeditated war. But at the same time that he was talking thus to the gallery of excited Jingoes at the Cape and in the London press, he appears to have been writing a despatch to President Kruger which was full of peace, friendship, and commonsense. Instead of scouting Mr. Kruger's offer to concede a five years' franchise and to give the Outlanders one-fourth of the seats in the Raad and a direct vote for the highest offices in the State, he accepted these concessions as bringing the Transvaal into line with the policy laid down by Sir Alfred Milner at the Bloemfontein Conference. While quietly but firmly putting aside the question that we should waive our suzerainty, he notes with satisfaction the fact that the latest proposal of the

Tra tion the with shor con the con disp be desp Sir / Onl the Sir spee des

Ca

to th The to th Free Eur will was shou ago, inde Con inco Tran clau veto wou term with any will nor The in 1 Gov any :

goes respo

the (

and

the (

Transvaal for arbitration did not involve the recognition of foreign intervention in the dispute between the Transvaal and ourselves. His despatch concluded with the sensible proposal that a new Conference should be held at Cape Town to arrange for the constitution of a proposed Court of Arbitration for the settlement of future differences, and also to consider and arrange all outstanding matters in Like master, like man. There seems to be as great a contrast between Mr. Chamberlain's despatches and his speeches as there was between Sir Alfred Milner's despatch and his public utterances. Only, whereas Mr. Chamberlain roars like a lion on the platform and coos like a dove in his despatches, Sir Alfred Milner reverses the process, and his speeches overflow with milk and honey while his despatches are full of vinegar and brimstone.

The Attitude of the Cape Ministry.

cidal

ions

n a nake

we

pre-

part

k of fact

: be vaal.

ape.

war

say.

vaal

h is

fight

The

once

war

ould

ister

t to olicy

ason

ain's

his

be a

is to

the

ury,

ime,

used

and

n of

the

t at

lery

don atch

end-

Mr.

and

the

the

the

by

nce.

tion

with

the

The policy of swearing in public at a neighbour with whom you are endeavouring to do a friendly business in private in an experiment receiving in private is an experiment peculiar to the New Diplomacy as patented by Mr. Chamberlain. There is, however, good reason to hope that, thanks to the influence of Mr. Schreiner, Mr. Stevn of the Free State, and all the best friends of the Boers in Europe and in this country, a satisfactory settlement will be arranged without any shedding of blood. It was no doubt unfortunate that President Kruger should have proposed the abandonment of the suzerainty. The term was abandoned fifteen years ago, and the solitary restriction upon the sovereign independence of the Transvaal contained in the Convention has not in practice occasioned the least inconvenience. Our right of interference in the Transvaal does not in the least depend upon the clause in the Convention which gives us a right to veto its treaties with foreign States. President Kruger would probably abandon the proposal to slay a term which has already died, and content himself with taking such securities as he can get against any future interference, which, if it takes place, will rest neither on the preamble of 1881 nor the clauses of the Convention of 1884. The true policy of all the friends of peace in this country is to support the responsible Government of Cape Colony, and to protest against any attempt to commit the Empire to a policy that goes one step in advance of the wishes of the responsible representatives of our fellow-subjects at the Cape. It is no use conceding self-government and then ignoring its results. Mr. Schreiner is for us the Cape Colony, and as long as Mr. Schreiner is in office with the elected Chamber at his back, so long must we regard his wishes and his views on Transvaal policy with the respect due to what is and must be the deciding factor in the dispute. So far Mr.

GENERAL SIR FREDK, FORESTIER WALKER.

(Newly appointed to the Command of the Troops at the Cape.)

Schreiner seems to have done very well; and if this unhappy crisis is settled amicably we shall probably owe the solution more to his good sense and tactful management than to any statesmanship on the part of the Imperial authorities. Of all the marvellous absurdities committed by our representatives in South African affairs, not even the Jameson Raid will seem more incredible to posterity than the fact that people in England should contemplate a war with the Transvaal contrary to the advice and in opposition to the declared policy of the Ministers at the Cape.

The Recantation of Lord Curzon. It will be rather a strange outcome of the bellicose menaces of the last few months if Mr. Chamberlain should be the destined instrument of establishing a system of arbitration for the settlement

JOHN BULL AND THE TRANSVAAL. (A Russian view.)

of disputes between ourselves and the Transvaal. It would not, however, be one bit more astounding than the transformation which experience has wrought in the views of Lord Curzon. The only point on which the late Liberal Cabinet was unanimous was in opposing the annexation of Chitral and the forward policy on the Indian frontier. But when they left office the policy which they condemned was at once taken up and acted upon with vigour by the present Government, Lord Curzon being the chief representative and exponent of the forward policy. His appointment to the Viceroyalty was regarded everywhere as the outward and visible sign and pledge that the forward policy would be pursued with greater vigour than ever. In Russia, indeed, Lord Curzon's appointment was regarded as almost equivalent to a notice of approaching war. In their eyes Lord Curzon was the Mr. Chamberlain of the North West frontier.

Now what has happened? He has The not been twelve months in India Abandonment before he discovers that the forward Forward Policy. policy was a mistake, that the Liberals were right, and the Unionists were wrong, and that the best thing to be done in India is promptly to undo as far as possible the mischief which the forward school has already done, and to fall back upon the old lines laid down by Sir Henry Fowler and Lord Rosebery. Instead of planting garrisons of British regulars out on the hills, they are to be withdrawn within our frontier, and the defence of these outposts of empire is to be left to militia regiments raised among the clans themselves. A system of narrow gauge railways will enable reinforcements to be hurried up if occasion should arise. The net result of this altered policy is semi-officially declared by Lord Curzon's administration to be precisely what the Liberals declared would be the case—namely, that there will be a net saving of millions to the Indian Exchequer, an increase of the fighting strength of the Indian army by the concentration of its forces, and the conciliation of the tribes, who would much rather be paid by us to defend their country than spend their lives in resisting British aggression, Surely it may be said of Lord Curzon, as it was said in the old Book concerning King Saul after his anointing, that "God gave him another heart," and that he was "turned into another man."

The facts of the situation in India The are enough to sober much more Malthusian Problem flighty persons than even Lord in India Curzon and Mr. Chamberlain. For the moment all is prosperous. Lord George Hamilton in introducing the Indian Budget reported a surplus of four millions, reviving trade, increased revenue and diminishing expenditure. But side by side with these more or less temporary although reassuring features of the situation he incidentally referred to one fact which more than anything else is calculated to give pause to our featherheaded expansionists. Since Napoleon surrendered at Sedan in 1870 the population of India has increased by seventy millions, and at the end of next century Lord George Hamilton calculates that its population will be doubled. We cannot again invoke the Malthusian trinity of war, pestilence, and famine to keep the population within the means of subsistence; but the problem of feeding double the number of people within the present limits of Hindostan is not exactly a task to be coveted. The administration of three hundred millions has been no holiday task, but what will that be to fending off famine from six hundred million human beings?

Impending Slump leading, there is going to be a heavy slump in Jingo stock all round the Jingolsm. world. We can already see signs of this in our own country. It is probable, however, that the most decisive indication of the reverse of the current which has been running so strongly in that direction will be witnessed in the United States. The Administration, as a preliminary to the establishment of a system of local self-government in Cuba, is preparing to take a census, and is holding out hopes that the Cubans ere long will be placed in possession of their autonomy. The great struggle, however, is taking place over the question of the Philippines. Signs are not wanting that the popularity of expansion across the Pacific is already on the wane. Mr. Croker, for instance, who last year was in favour of "holding fast to all we have got and reaching out for more,"

Unless all appearances are very mis-

th

al

h

th

th

to po

ar

pr

al

in

D

su

pe

D

lut

sh

an

N

ma

me

sai

an

an

Th

or

do

for

Ar

wh

CO

the

tal

Th

co

inf

in

inc

has now given his unreserved adhesion to Mr. Bryan in his opposition to a policy of expansion. The Democratic party, it is evident, will fall into line behind the young orator who fought their battle at the last election, and Republicans like Mr. Carnegie are determined to support him to the uttermost. by-election in Missouri which has just taken place has afforded the party managers the first indication of the mind of the American constituencies. The issue is fairly joined, the Republicans standing in favour of the policy of the Administration in the Philippines, and the Democrats strongly opposing it as contrary to the principles of the Declaration of Independence. The result was that the Democrat was elected by a large majority, a fact which has given rise to great searchings of heart at Washington.

Anti-English Americans.

ian

of

es.

ich

nan

on.

aid

his

nd

dia

ore

ord

or

on lus

me

ith

ng

to

ed

ts.

he

ns,

on

Ve

ar,

iin

ng

its

he

no

ne

is-

VV

he

ns

er,

he

at

es.

h-

a.

es

S-

er,

es.

on

er,

One rather unpleasant symptom in the new development of America is that some Democrats, at least, are identifying Great Britain with the identifying Great Britain with the policy of expansion, and are currying favour with the anti-British elements of the electorate by making a protest against what they choose to regard as the alliance of President McKinley with Great Britain in support of a policy of expansion. Democratic State Convention has formally condemned such an alliance; and Mr. Croker, whose support is perhaps more important than that of any other leading Democrat, has emphatically declared that he is absolutely opposed to "the habit of relying upon the friendship of England, by which we have nothing to gain, and everything to lose." Last month, the Daily News correspondent at Berlin reported a remark made by the German Emperor to an American member of Congress. "The German-Americans," said the Kaiser, "would take good care that Germany and America were friendly, and would not permit any aggressive or hostile policy towards Germany." The Americans do not contemplate any aggressive or hostile action towards Germany; but they certainly do not relish this reminder as to the extent to which foreign emigrants are relied upon to influence American policy. It is curious, but significant, that while the politicians in the United States are continually playing for the German, the Irish, and the Italian vote, the British vote is one that is never taken into account by the wirepuller in the States. The reason for this is no doubt that the British contingent, which is quite as large and much more influential than the others, merges itself so completely in the American electorate that it ceases to have any independent existence as a political factor.

Chauvinism in France. If Jingoism is declining in the United States, there is good reason to believe that it has received a serious blow in the French Republic. The effect of the Dreyfus trial at Rennes has certainly not been to strengthen the prestige of militarism or to encourage the sacrifice of every national interest to the army. The news also from Africa has tended in the same direction. A couple of French officers, Captain Voulet and Lieutenant Chanoine, at the head of a small expedition of about six hundred armed men, were recently despatched to explore the Tuareg country which lies between the Niger and Lake Tchad. This expedition misconducted itself in such a fashion that an officer, at the head of a small party, was despatched by the French authorities to arrest its leaders and bring them to trial. Adventurous officers, however, at the head of a superior force in the wilds of Central Africa do not relish the prospect of being brought home under arrest. Captain Voulet and his men shot down the Colonel who brought the warrant for their arrest, and at present they are said to be engaged in the task of setting up for themselves as independent sovereigns on the shores of Lake Tchad. The incident has produced a painful impression in France, and another expedition has been despatched to reduce the mutineers to order, but further intelligence is anxiously awaited in Paris.

GENERAL JOUBERT. (Commander of Transvaal troops.)

Notwithstanding various reports as Russla and Corea. to the rapidity with which Russia is extending her railways, there is every reason to think that we can still count upon the Russian Emperor as a powerful influence tending in the direction of peace and the maintenance of the status quo. He has issued this month an ukaze declaring that Talienwan shall be a free port during the whole duration of the lease from China. He refers to the construction of the Siberian railway as the fulfilment of the historic aim of his Empire in the bringing about of a rapprochement between the peoples of the West and of the East, and congratulates all the nations upon the gain in facilitating communications which will lighten the operations of the world's trade. The Pekin correspondent of the Times, who has been visiting Corea, sends a very interesting report as to the rivalry between the Russians and the Japanese in that peninsula. The sacrifice of Corea was part of the price of the lease of Talienwan, and everything seems to show that the Japanese are thoroughly on the alert to make good their footing and establish their position over the Coreans. This is the one point which Baron Hayashi dwelt upon at the Hague as the only possible danger to the peace of the East. He was, however, confident that a settlement would be arranged between Russia and Japan, and from the T.mes correspondent's letter from Pekin the Japanese have every reason to be contented with the result of their diplomacy in Corea.

The Absurd Story about the Tsar.

There is no truth in the ridiculous rumour circulated by M. de Blowitz as to the contemplated resignation of the Tsar. The Emperor is not a man to run away from his post, however thankless an office it may be. The Russian Tsars do not regard their thrones as office-seekers regard posts with plenty of pickings, nor do they consider that they have any warrant either from God or man in throwing up duties which they have solemnly sworn to fulfil, merely because they experience many disappointments and meet with innumerable difficulties. The reasons given by M. de Blowitz for this astonishing story were three. First, that the Emperor found himself baffled by corruption in the administration, which is no doubt true, but is no more reason for resignation than the fact that the crops failed, or that it is beyond the power of the Tsar to change the climate of Archangel. The second reason was the fact that his third child was a girl and not a boy, the first three children of the Empress, who has followed the example of her mother, being girls. This is surely the absurdest reason for suddenly summoning to the throne a young man not yet twenty-one, and who has no children at all of his own. The succession would not be made more secure. On the theory of probabilities it is more probable that the next child of the Empress will be a son, than that the Grand Duke Michael's wife, when she is discovered and married, will have male offspring. The third reason is no reason at all, for it is based upon the alleged disappointment of the Tsar with the result of the Peace Conference at the Hague. Now the Tsar is not disappointed, and has no reason to be disappointed, with the result of his Conference.

The Defeat of the Kaiser. The most notable political event upon the Continent, apart from the Dreyfus trial, which has monopolised public attention, has been the defeat of the German Emperor over the great canal scheme by which he hoped to unite the Rhine and the Elbe. The Emperor, who is very like Mr. Chamberlain both in his methods and in his objects, had set his mind upon the carrying of this bill. His invincible will, to which he had made significant allusions in his speeches, was publicly committed to secure the construction of this internal waterway. Unfortunately for the Imperial scheme, the agrarian Conservatives of Prussia regard with horror the proposal which would enable the produce of the west to be conveyed to their doors. Railway rates act in a measure as indirect protection for the agricultural products of the eastern provinces. Notwithstanding the menaces of Prince Hohenlohe and the declared will of their king, the agrarian Conservatives of the Right threw out the bill by a majority of eighty-eight. Prince Hohenlohe warned the gentlemen of the Right that, if they threw the bill out, the Emperor-King would rule Prussia without their help. Nothing daunted by this, the bill perished, and everyone held his breath for a while to see what the Prussian king would do. Would he dissolve Parliament, and dismiss the recalcitrant Conservative magistrates, and definitely break with the party which has always been the mainstay of his throne? After considering, he decided to do only one of these things. Parliament was prorogued, but misse of th admo to sup which

M.

of th

the O thoug There St. P no in least, inexp Paris

the F

Kaise

but not dissolved. Several officials were dismissed, and, in place of governing without the aid of the Right, we have had nothing but a solemn admonition addressed to those magistrates who failed to support their king and Government on a matter on which he had unmistakably made known his will.

M. Delcassé's Peter Visit to Russia. visit

is

n

nd

of

is ee

le

St

g

at

le

is 22

S

re

11,

e

18

is nt

e

d

h

n

M. Delcasse's sudden trip to St. Petersburg is stated to have been a visit of courtesy, which has had the result of demonstrating the solidity of the Franco-Russian alliance. The overtures of the German Emperor to the French Republic it was thought might have created some uneasiness in Russia. Therefore it was necessary for M. Delcassé to go to St. Petersburg to assure the Tsar that France has no intention of coquetting with Germany. That, at least, is what the Russians say about the somewhat inexplicable rush of the French Foreign Minister from Paris to St. Petersburg.

Whatever truth there may be in this explanation, there seems to be no question but that the Kaiser is losing no opportunity of sweethearting the French Republic. It is a wise and right thing to do.

Would that there were more sweethearting among the Governments of Europe and less quarrelling! The latest manifestation of this desire on his part to kiss and forget the past was afforded us when he unveiled a statue on the battlefield of St. Privat. The Kaiser seized the occasion in order to pay an eloquent tribute to the valour of the French soldiers who fell in deadly combat with the German army. He did so in a notable passage which would seem to imply that the Kaiser, like our Queen, has a firm grip of the doctrine of spirit return. He said:—

"I desire that the meaning attached to this figure shall be generally known. It stands on this blood-stained field as the guardian of all the brave soldiers of both armies, French and German, who fell here" (the Emperor laid marked stress on the words "all" and "both"), "for the French soldiers, who found a glorious grave at St. Privat, also fought bravely and heroically for Emperor and Fatherland. And when our flags are lowered in greeting before this bronze statue, and flutter mournfully over the graves of our dear comrades, so may they also wave over the tombs of our foes, and whisper to them that we think with sorrowing regard of their brave dead. With deep thanks and with an upward glance to the Lord of Hosts for the guidance mercifully vouchsafed to our great Emperor, we will recall to mind that the countless souls of all those who once stood face to face in hot encounter look down upon us this day from where they stand round the throne of the Supreme Judge, anited in the eternal Peace of God."

Photograph by]

THE KAISER UNVEILING THE MEMORIAL ON THE BATTLEFIELD OF ST. PRIVAT.

Yacobi, Metz.

What a blessing it would be if we all could reflect a little upon the cloud of witnesses which compasses us about!

The Trial of Dreyfus.

I have dealt at such length with the strange true story of the condemnation and revindication of Captain Dreyfus that it is not necessary here to do more than merely indicate the course of the proceedings at Rennes. The retrial of Dreyfus began on August 7th before a military court consisting of seven members. Owing to the heat the Court met every morning at 6.30, and gets through its business by noonday. With the exception of three days devoted to the secret dossier, all the proceedings have been public, and the trial has been followed with intense interest throughout the civilised world. All the generals have been called, from General Mercier downward, and all of them persisted in asserting that Captain Dreyfus was guilty. M. Bertillon, in his début as a handwriting expert, has succeeded even in outdoing the experts in the Piggot trial in bringing men of that profession into universal contempt. There have been several intensely dramatic episodes in the trial. The French system, which allows the accused to reply on his own account at the close of the evidence tendered by each witness against him, contributes greatly to keep up an interest in the proceedings. The generals, especially General Mercier, have done nothing to remove the almost universal impression outside France that the officers of the General Staff are not up to the level of their position. There had been a great deal of talk as to the new evidence they were to produce which would crush Dreyfus, but when they had their say every one felt that it was they, and not Dreyfus, who were the defendants in the action. Colonel Picquart proved, as was expected, a pillar of strength for the defence, and Captain Freystätter-a marine officer, who was one of the judges of the first court martial-supplied the missing evidence that had so long been sought as to the exact nature of the secret documents communicated to the Court by General Mercier. Colonel Du Paty de Clam is ill, and his evidence is being taken by commission. With the exception of Du Paty de Clam and Esterhazy, who kept out of the way, every person who could contribute anything in the shape of information, even if it were only the retailing of second-hand tittle-tattle, has been heard fully and fairly. There is only one opinion outside France on the subject, but there were many acute observers, who would not be at all surprised if the judges of the court martial were to condemn Dreyfus once more. But as the voting will be by ballot, it is probable that it will not be possible to secure the majority of five to two necessary for his conviction.

th

cr

pr

A

th

hi

w

E

ar

pr

ef

st

ur

de

ta

de

of

is

D

of

cl

CI

to

h

0

p

MAÎTRE LABORI.

The Shooting of M. Labori. The most exciting episode of the trial at Rennes took place outside the Court Room. On August 14th, as M. Labori, the brilliant and intrepid counsel of Dreyfus, was walking to the Court in company with Colonel Picquart, an unknown person shot him in the back with a revolver. When Labori fell his assailant cried, "I have killed Dreyfus," and ran off. Two priests who passed by took no notice of the wounded man. One of the bystanders stole Labori's coat, in which it was expected some important documents were to be found. The would-be assassin has not been arrested. His crime was applauded by some of the fanatical enemies of Dreyfus, who rejoiced at the disabling of their most eloquent adversary. Their delight was but of short duration. After a few days' absence M. Labori returned to Court and resumed the conduct of his client's defence.

Disturbances in Paris. Considering that the great controversy between democracy and militarism, between liberty and authority, is being fought out after five years struggle in the Court Martial at Rennes, France is surprisingly tranquil. About the middle of the month the Government arrested Paul Déroulède and a small crowd of organised conspirators, who are now in prison awaiting trial. M. Guérin, the editor of the Anti-Juif, defied arrest by the simple process of threatening to shoot any policeman who ventured into his fortress in the Rue de Chabrol. For some reason or other, M. Waldeck Rousseau shrank from what would have been the immediate response in England or almost any other country to such a defiance of the law. Instead of forcing an entrance and capturing the garrison, the authorities adopted the process of blockade. They cut off the water and gas, intercepted communication with the sewers, and effectually prevented the revictualling of M. Guérin's stronghold by occupying the street with soldiers and police. This strange and fantastic situation continued until the end of August. Possibly the French Minister allowed M. Guérin week after week in his defiance in order to give the Parisians something to talk about. As Napoleon ordered the gilding of the dome of the Invalides in order to distract the attention of the public from his defeat in Russia, so M. Guérin is allowed to play the fool in order to relieve somewhat the intense strain of the approaching crisis in the Dreyfus case.

The Outrage on the Churches.

of the nore.

that ve to

the

șide

4th,

and

ourt

own

hen

us,"

no

lers

ome

uld-

was

of

ost

ort

ori

his tro-

ili-

ity,

ars

is nth

It would have been well if the siege of "Fort Chabrol" had been the only episode calculated to distract the attention of the populace from the all disturbing Affaire. But on Sunday the 13th, an Anarchist demonstration took place in the capital, which culminated in the desecration of a couple of churches, in one of which the fanatical, anticlerical mob destroyed everything that they could lay their hands upon. Valuable pictures were cut into pieces, and the furniture of the altars torn to shreds, and everything was done to mark the hatred and loathing with which a certain section of the Parisian populace regards the Church and its priests. The authorities soon dispersed the rioters, but not before three hundred and eighty persons had been wounded, some of them somewhat seriously. Over a hundred arrests were made, and order has since then reigned in Paris. It was an ugly episode, however, and one which occurred at a most unfortunate time.

Zionism.

The third Zionist Congress, held at Bâle this month, was not less successful than either of its predecessors. The fact of the matter is that the Jews seem to have found a new Moses in Dr. Hertzl, whose handsome presence, overpowering enthusiasm and fervid eloquence carry all before them. I had the pleasure of meeting Dr. Hertzl at Scheveningen this spring, and having been myself under the spell, I can well understand the enthusiasm which he is liable to evoke. After he has gone, however, and we set to work to calculate in cold blood the success of his campaign, the prospects of Zionism do not seem quite so roseate. Nevertheless, the agitation does good, and deserves the hearty support of persons outside the ranks of the Jews. It is a good thing for a widely-scattered race to have an objective as an incentive to sacrifice and a rallyingpoint for their race. Mr. Oswald John Simon, who disapproves of Zionism, has been impelled to launch a political programme on which he is willing to stand as a candidate at the next election. To Mr. Simon Liberalism is a religion, and his Liberalism contains as its leading features International Arbitration, Universal Free Trade, and Imperial Federation, for he thinks the Englishspeaking race have a mission as sacred and as Godgiven as the people of Israel. Note that last month Mr. Arnold White published a book on the Jew question, in which a great deal of information gathered from various countries has been collected together, but beyond a somewhat hazy suggestion that the political emancipation of women may tend to counter the evils of Semitism, Mr. White's views are not very hopeful.

After the Out any incident, except the reiteraPeace Conference. tion by Mr. Chamberlain that having put his hand to the plough in South Africa he was not going to turn back. The Queen's Speech calls for little remark excepting for the absence of any expression of hope that the negotiations with the Transvaal would be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. A welcome paragraph referred pleasantly to the success which had been achieved by the Conference at the Hague in establishing a permanent Court of Arbitration-a sentence which finally dispelled the uneasiness occasioned in some quarters by the fact that the Arbitration Convention has not yet been signed by Great Britain. The elevation of Sir Julian Pauncefote to the peerage, under the title of Baron Pauncefote, was not only a well-deserved recognition of our plenipotentiary's services at the Hague: it was a proof that Her Majesty and Lord Salisbury attach the very highest value to the result of his labours. It is just a month since the signature of the Acte Final, and as yet none of the conventions have been ratified, nor have any fresh adhesions taken place. This, however, was anticipated. The Kaiser has raised Count Münster to the title of Fürst, which will be popularly but incorrectly translated as Prince, but this honour can hardly be said to have been earned by any particular service which he rendered at the Conference. The Interparliamentary Conference, which met at Christiania immediately after the rising of the Conference at the Hague, passed resolutions strongly approving of the work which had been done, and urging upon the various parliamentary groups in different countries to carry out a propaganda of education in favour of arbitration, of popularising the work of the Conference, and of securing the speediest possible adoption of the principle of arbitration.

Mr. Chaplin's
Blunder.

Mr. Chaplin's
Blunder.

Mr. Chaplin's
but two utterances deserve to be noticed. Mr. Chaplin, who is the head of the Local Government Board, has made a suggestion that something substantial could be done in the way of Old Age Pensions if a shilling a quarter duty were placed upon corn. The extra shilling, he argued, would not increase the price of bread, and the two millions would be a substantial contribution to a fund for pensioning worn-out working men. Mr. Chaplin is an old Protectionist, and he fails to understand the shudder of horror which his suggestion sent through the Conservative ranks. No Government will ever expose itself to a cry of taxing the poor man's bread, and no Imperial Government will ever propose a tax the bulk of which will be collected from Colonial produce. The other Minister who spoke was Mr. Gerald Balfour, who made sensible speeches at the Co-operative Festival at the Crystal Palace. There are many indications that co-operation is coming to the front. If Lord Grev, Mr. Horace Plunkett and a few others would spend this autumn in expounding what cooperation has done in Denmark for the Danish peasant, they would probably do more to promote the success of their cause than could be done by ten years of desultory disquisition concerning the abstract virtues of co-operation.

The Archbishops having given their decision against the use of candles in processions in church and the burning of incense in divine service, the Bishops one by one are issuing letters to their archdeacons and rural deans calling upon them to bring their clergy into submission. As the Bishop of London said, there is no authority for these usages; and it therefore becomes a universal duty to abandon them, as they are matters which are in no way essential to Christian teaching and give offence to many. Before the general consideration of what is best for the whole body of the Church, personal preferences should no doubt give way. Lord Halifax has written a long manifesto denouncing the Archbishops' raid upon incense as the worst disaster which has befallen the Church since the beginning of the Tractarian movement, and calling upon the laity to support their priests even if they should decide to defy their Bishops. It is certain that some of the clergy will refuse to abandon their beloved candles and censers, but the majority will probably take refuge in some subterfuge which will enable them to use lights and fumigate the church without bringing themselves under the censure of their Bishops. It is a dreary outlook,-this recrudescence of opposing fanaticisms.

National Convention in Ireland. Ireland has this month witnessed the first meeting of the Association of County Councils, which promises in time to give some kind of a substitute for a national convention. At the convention, which was held under the presidency of Sir Thomas Esmonde, twenty councils were represented by forty delegates. The proceedings, however, seem to have been characterised by much good sense, and were entirely free from any trace of that spirit of faction which is the bane of Irish politics. When the Liberal Government comes into power in 1902, they may be able to appeal to this Association of County Councils for the indispensable help necessary in framing the next Home Rule Bill. Whatever happens, it should be well understood that Englishmen and Scotchmen are not going so far to forget the elementary principles of Home Rule as to relieve the Irish from the responsibility of framing the measure by which they are to be governed.

Famine, Pestilence and Hurricanes. The Rev. Alexander Francis of St. Petersburg, who was last month in London, gave a terrible account of the sufferings of the Russian peasantry owing to the failure of the crops in the eastern provinces. He calculates that this famine has entailed upon the Russian Government an expenditure in relief of ten millions sterling. He did not venture upon a calculation as to what would be the cost of meeting the failure of the crops which is reported from the south. A timely fall of rain has delivered the Indian Government from the dread of famine which was entertained in July. On the other hand, the news from East Africa as to the famine fan it Th and led whi

app

is

the bel wo have res

Lis pro the fro

Ar tha soc oc ep

mi att Co Pa de 66 att

Li of

po cu A un D to

de

which prevails in the British protectorate there is appalling, and the loss of life from sheer want of food is said to be fifty thousand. This is no doubt trivial compared with the mortality of the great famines in India, but compared with the population, it represents a ghastly amount of human suffering. The hurricane which struck the Island of Montserrat and did considerable devastation in the West Indies led the Lord Mayor to open a public subscription for the relief of the survivors. Porto Rico, which now belongs to the United States, seems to have been the worst sufferer from the disaster, and the Americans have not had long to wait for an experience in the responsibilities of over-sea empire. The plague. which is still devastating Poona, has arrived at Lisbon and Oporto. Having come to Europe, it will probably be a most effective sanitationist. Note that the hot weather sent the death-rate in Dublin up from 23 to 38 per 1000 in the last weeks in August.

ich ing

n-

he

ive

sto

as

ce

ng

ey

in

eir

ill

ch

of

es-

he

of

in

b-

n,

IS

y

m

e,

of 1e

y

y

it

d

h

y

t.

n

of

n

0

e

e

S

The America Cup.

It seems that for the next two months more people in the United States and in the United Kingdom will be interested in the struggle for the America Cup between the Shamrock and the Columbia than in any other question, political, ecclesiastical or It is certainly to be hoped that on this social. occasion there will be no renewal of the unfortunate episodes of the last race, indeed all the gain that might otherwise have been won by Lord Dunraven's attempt to win the race was lost. The Venezuelan Court of Arbitration drags its slow length along in Paris, but it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the decision of the Court which will decide the future of 667,000 square miles of American territory will not attract one-thousandth part of the excited interest that will be bestowed upon the result of Sir Thomas Lipton's gallant attempt to win back the blue ribbon of the yachting world.

The Australian Cricketers.

During the hot weather the ordinary newspaper reader has been more interested in the result of the cricket matches than in the reports of political speeches. The excitement and interest culminated in the last test match played by the Australians and English at the Oval. The match, unfortunately, was not played out, owing to the Draconian rule which allots three days and no more to the playing of a match. But the English side had much the best of it, having made an unprecedentedly large score in their first innings. Of the test matches the Australians have won one, while four have been drawn. Judging by the position of the teams at the close of the drawn matches, the chances were in favour of England in three cases and of the Australians in one. If, therefore, the matches had been played out, the English cricketers that contend the old country would have won three out of the five test matches. against the county elevens the Australians have only been beaten by the three metropolitan counties, Essex, Kent and Surrey. For the rest they either won or secured a draw. Towards the close of the cricket season some dissatisfaction became audible that the Australians adopted a policy of stone-walling or obstruction, and played against time for the purpose of forcing a draw. When the next Australian team visits this country it is probable that an arrangement will be made for playing the test matches out even if they last a whole week.

Photograph by

Russell and Sons.

SIR H. H. JOHNSTON.

(New Commissioner of Uganda

The Reporters'

A very extraordinary decision was pronounced by Mr. Justice North in Treasure Trove. a copyright case, which turned upon the question as to whether reporters have copyright in the speeches which they record. Mr. John Lane published a small volume of Lord Rosebery's speeches and addresses which were reprinted from the reports which appeared in the Times. The Times brought an action claiming copyright in its reports. Mr. Justice North decided in favour of the Times, on the ground that a reporter had a copyright in his report. It would only be a step further from this to maintain that every stenographic clerk had copyright in the transcript which he makes from the notes dictated to him by his employer; even the phonograph might claim copyright, if Mr. Justice North's ruling is to be maintained. As the law stands, half a dozen reporters may have copyright in half a dozen reports of a man's speech, while the man himself has no copyright in his own utterances. The action was only a part of the general campaign which the Times is waging for the purpose of securing copyright in news, an innovation which is regarded with the gravest suspicion.

OLD AGE PENSIONS AND ORGANISED LABOUR.

THE Old Age Pensions Movement is advancing apace. How far and how fast it has travelled may be seen

MR. FREDERICK ROGERS. Organising Secretary of the National Committee.

at a glance by comparing the finding of Lord Rothschild's Committee of 1898 with the Report of the Select Committee on aged deserving poor which was published at the beginning of last month. Last year's Committee pronounced a blank negative in regard to all suggestions before it or within the terms of its reference. Nothing could be done. That was the verdict of a committee of "experts." The Select Committee of the House of Commons tells a very different story. It reports that "it is practicable to create a workable system of Old Age Pensions for the United Kingdom," and "that the attempt should be made." It offers a scheme of its own. It would elect in every poor law union a pension authority appointed by the guardians, and for the most part composed of guardians. It would entitle to a pension-any person (man or woman) who satisfies the pension authority that he (1) is a British subject; (2) is sixty-five years of age; (3)

has not within the last twenty years been convicted of an offence and sentenced to penal servitude or imprisonment without the option of a fine; (4) has not neceived poor relief other than medical relief, unless under circumstances of a wholly exceptional character, during twenty years prior to the application for a pension; (5) is resident within the district of the pension authority; (6) has not an income from any source of more than ten shillings a week; and (7) has endeavoured to the best of his ability, by his industry, or by the exercise of reasonable providence, to make provision for himself and those immediately dependent on him.

The amount of the pension would be not less than 5s. and not more than 7s. a week, to be determined by the pension authority according to the local cost of living. The pension would be paid through the Post Office. The cost should be defrayed from the common fund of the Union, and an Imperial contribution not exceeding half the total amount. The Report was eagerly bought up within a few hours of publication and two fresh editions have had since to be printed. Meantime Treasury experts are at work endeavouring in all seriousness, with unmistakable earnestness, to estimate what would be the cost of the scheme to local and Imperial funds.

All this means a great change within the twelve months, both in public opinion and in the apparent attitude of the Government. What has made the difference? The general uneasiness of the public conscience about the condition of the worn-out worker exerts a constant if silent pressure in support of the Pensions movement; but that is nothing new. What is new is that in the interval the working classes themselves have through their own organisations taken the matter in hand. New Zealand supplied the initiative with her Old Age Pensions Act. Then came Mr. Charles Booth's campaign of conferences, at which the picked representatives of the wage-earners of Great Britain as grouped together in trade unions, friendly societies and co-operative societies, pronounced unanii Age. gather in Bir ment e The confer selves Its fir and d awaite entitle the m Nation princip pensio the reg own de State woman execut ganda. gamat Stated Booth the use of copi have b the E Freder perhap known Elizab with approa societi tinuall about linewage Societ matter leadin prono they Friend lating

sympa

Actua

Societ

unanimously in favour of Free Pensions for All in Old Age. A few days before the last and greatest of these gatherings, then being organised by Mr. George Cadbury, in Birmingham, Mr. Chamberlain promised the appointment of a Select Committee.

10-ich

his

y-

d.

ve

h, vn

he

he

on ce

he

ın

p-

or

e

The district committees appointed by the several conferences met in London on May 9th, and formed themselves into the National Committee of Organised Labour. Its first work was to render its objective more precise and definite. Mr. Booth had just published his longawaited scheme. He proposed, it will be remembered, to entitle everyone to a pension when seventy years old, the man to 7s. and the woman to 5s. a week. The National Committee, while accepting Mr. Booth's general principle, and approving his suggestions for paying pensions through the Post Office as well as for making the registrar of births and deaths ascertain ages, took its own decided lines as to age limit. It demanded a Free State Pension of five shillings a week for every man and woman on attaining sixty-five. It then appointed a strong executive with instructions to institute a national propaganda. At its request Mr. George N. Barnes, of the Amalgamated Engineers, wrote a leaflet-" The Case Briefly Stated "-of which 100,000 copies have been printed. Mr. Booth has published a penny edition of his Argument for the use of the National Committee, and several thousands of copies of a verbatim report of the Birmingham meeting have been circulated in all parts of the country. On July 8th the Executive elected as Organising Secretary Mr. Frederick Rogers, late President of the Vellum Binders, perhaps the most cultured of Labour Leaders, well known for his lectures at Toynbee Hall and elsewhere in Elizabethan literature. Mr. Rogers flung himself at once with ardent energy into his new duties. approached every trade union or cluster of workmen's societies of any importance in Great Britain, and is continually receiving fresh adhesions. One singular feature about the movement is that it gives signs of bringing into line-for the first time-the three great orders of associated wage earners, Trade Unions, Friendly and Co-operative Societies. The attitude of the Friendly Societies in this matter is often misunderstood. Because a number of the leading officials in the Friendly Society world have pronounced against the principle of universal pensions, they have been supposed to express the opinion of Friendly Society men in general. But proofs are accumulating that the rank and file of the membership are in sympathy with the demand of the National Committee. Actually serving on its Executive are prominent Friendly Society functionaries like Councillor Hudson, the official valuer of the Foresters, and Mr. George Moores of the Friendly Societies Recorder. A glance at the list of members of the National Committee is sufficient to convince anyone conversant with the industrial world that British Labour is practically solid on this question. Mr. Rogers and his fellow-workers may be pardoned for believing that the development of their organisation has had a great deal to do with the altered prospects of the pensions movement. Measuring the force of their impact on the national will by the difference between the reports of Lord Rothschild's and Mr. Chaplin's Committee, they are naturally emboldened to anticipate still greater changes. They certainly cannot accept the Select Committee's recommendations as providing an adequate solution. They object at the outset to the title "deserving" poor. Who can estimate "deserts" in such a matter? They absolutely reject every proposal which links pensions with poor-law administration of any They know too well that the British workingabhors Bumble and all his works. oppose, as a discouragement to thrift, the absurd proviso that no one who is sure of 10s. a week can be pensioned; the man who has secured for himself 9s. a week is menaced with losing his 5s. or 7s. pension if he saves enough to secure another shilling! And they devote themselves with the more confidence to pushing on their own demand of 5s. for every one at sixty-five.

They are approaching most of the religious bodies by memorials or deputations. Cardinal Vaughan has graciously indicated his willingness to receive a deputation from the National Committee. Meantime his great speech to the Catholic Truth Society on the duties of the rich is a significant landmark in the progress of this question. It is doubly significant because coming not from a Manning, but from a Vaughan. Referring to the degradation which the poor felt in being compelled to resort to the workhouse, the Cardinal-Archbishop is reported to have said:—

They hoped that the Old-Age Pension Scheme might bring at least some remedy for this state of things, but it would depend upon the pension being sufficient to keep its recipient in frugal comfort. The well-to-do were afraid of its cost, but surely the rich were bound to tax themselves, or to be taxed, for their poorer brethren. He was always at a loss to understand why the colossal incomes should not be taxed at a higher rate than say the net average income of the upper classes. It was fitting that surplus and extravagance should be more heavily taxed than ordinary and legitimate expenditure.

It is a feature of this latest phase of the Labour Movement that it is absolutely unattached to any political party.

DIARY FOR AUGUST.

EVENTS OF THE MONTH.

August 1. The Belgian Cabinet resigns owing to the rejection of its Electoral Reform Bill.

gust z. The Belgian Cabinet resigns owing to the rejection of its Electoral Reform Bill. Opening of the Union of German Co-operative Associations at Berlin.

A Superior Court-Martial sits at Madrid to try the officers who surrendered at Santiago.

Mr. Seddon, Colonial Treasurer of New Zeal and, delivers his Budget Statement for the year, which closes with a surplus of $450,000.

The Interparliamentary Peace Conference is opened at Chistiania by the Norwegian Min ster of State.

M. Delcasse leaves Paris for St. Petersburg.

2. The Interparliamentary Peace Conference is opened at Ch.istiania by the Norwegian Min ster of State.

Min ster of state.

M. Delcassé leaves Paris for St. Petersburg.

The Governor, the Naval Officer, and the Legislative Council of Hong-Kong visit the new territory to explain the methods of British rule.

British rule.

3. Mr. Root, Mr. Alger's successor as American Minister of War, is sworn into office.

The Leicester Guardians resolve not to appeal regainst the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division granting a mandamus directing them to appoint a Vaccination Officer.

The South Australian Assembly pass a

he South Australian Assembly pass a resolution for an address to the Queen praying for the adoption of the Australian Commonwealth Bill as an Imperial Act of Parliament.

4. A statue of Schulze-Delilzsch, originator of Ger. an Co-operation, is unveiled in Berlin.

The British Medical Association at Portsmouth closes its meeting.
5. A railway accident occurs in France; 17 killed and 40 injured. Lord Curzon's Indian Frontier Policy receives the sanction of the Secretary of State.

6. M. De!cassé is received at Peterhof by the Tsar.

The trial of Captain Dreyfus begins before the Rennes Court-Martial in the hall of the General Pierron is appointed member of the Superior Council of War in France. The Tsar confers on M. Deleasse the Order of St. Alexander Nevski. Great hurricane in the West Indies, which Great hurricane in the West Indies, which causes 74 deaths.

8. The Legislative Assemblies of Victoria and South Australia adopt the proposal that the Australian Commonwealth Bill be passed as an Imperial Act of Parli ment.

A new Belgian Cabinet is formed under the Premiership of M. de Smet de Naeyer.

The gas-stokers of Paris, 1,500 in number, strike for an eight-hours day.

The gas-stokers of Paris, 1,500 in number, strike for an eight-hours day.

The Court-Martial at Rennes is occupied with the examination of the secret dossier in presence of Dreyfus and his Counsel.

The New South Wales Legislative Assembly agree that an address be presented to the Queen praying for the adoption of the Commonwealth Bill as an Imperial Act of Parliament

Commonwealth Bill as an Impenat Act or Parliament.

10. M. Delcassé returns from Russia to France. The First Raad at Pretoria considers the amended Constitution, and passes Article 74. Count Münster, the German Ambassador in Paris, receives from the Emperor the title of Prince of Dernsburg.

Sir James Westland is appointed a member of the Council of India.

Sir James Westland is appointed a member of the Council of India. The Legislative Assembly of Victoria adopt a motion to join the Pacific Cable Scheme. The proposal of increased representation for the gold-fields is ratified by the executive at Pretoria; the reply to Mr. Chamberlain's despatch is still under consideration. M. Mallet Prevost ends his address (of 13 days' duration) on the Venezuelan case. The Canadian Parliament closes its Session. In the South Australian House of Assembly certain revisions of the Colonial Constitution are discussed. are discussed.

are discussed.

The Statement of the Times about the furn.shing of documents by Esterhazy and Henry to the German Military Attaché in Paris is quoted in all the Paris papers.

At Dortmund the Ems Canal is opened in presence of the Emperor.

12. The Rennes Court-Martial resumes its open sittings. M. Casimir-Perior is examined, and General Merciar gives evidence at great his place. Being the Feast of the Assumption, the Rennes ou t-Martial does not sit.

Cou t-Martial does not sit.

An Impa-ial Order is issued at St. Petersburg directing that Ta-lien-wan be declared a free port after the completion of the railway. The Rennes Court-Martial resumes its sittings; Maltre Demanga applies for an adjournment owing to the absence of Malre Labori—this inconstructed.

is not granted.

Photograph by] MR. CONYNGHAM GREENE.

British Agent at Pretoria.

16. The Prussian Di.t reassembles; the debate on the second reading of the Rhine-Elbe Canal

Bill is resumed. American force attacks Angeles, in the Philippinas; takes and occupies the town.
General Roget, Colonel Picquart, and M.
Bertulus are examined before the Rennes Court-Martial.

The debate on the second reading of the Rhine-Elbe Canal Bill is concluded in the Prussian Diet: most of the paragraphs are rejected.

The Zionist Congress at Basle adopts the financial report of the Committee of Manage-

At the Rennes Court-Martial Colonel Picquart continues his deposition.

A man named Glorob is arrested near Dol who says he is the assailant of Maître Labori; this is doubted by the police. Great explosion at Liest Colliery, near Cardiff;

Great explosion at Liest Colliery, near Cardin; 2x men silled.

1). The debits on the third rading in the Prussian Dit of the Rhine-Elbe Canal; the Bill is rejected by 235 votes to 147, although the Emperor had at Dortmund pledged hanself to carry it through to carry it through.

Sir F. Forestier-Walker sails from Southampton for the Cape.

20. A Labour Demonstration takes place in Hyde Park, to protest against the rents charged for miserable rooms in London; it calls on the Government to establish Rent Courts on the lines of the Land Courts of Ireland.

Major Ross telegraphs from Sierra Leone to the Liverpool School of Tropical Diseases that he has discovered the malaria-bearing

French Colonial Office ane French Colonial Office acknowledges the truth of the news that Colonel Klobb and Lieutenant Meurier were shot in the French Soudan by order of Captain Voulet.
The Bishop of London formally notifies to the elergy of his diocese the decision of the Archibishop of Cante bury with regard to incense and lights.

M. Labori resumes his place as one of Captain M. Labori resumes his place as one of Cappein Desylus's Counsel at the Rennes Cour-Martial after eight days' absence, from wounds in the attempt to assassinate him. Captain Deasy returns to Simla after two years' exploration of Eastern Turkestan and Western Tibet.

In the Legislative Assembly of Victoria Sic* G. Turner, the Premier, introduces an Oli age Pension Bill.

23. The Royal Niger Company holds its annual meeting in Surrey House, Victoria Embark

ment.

The Emperor of Germany holds a Council at Potsdam of Prussian Ministers.

At Rennes evidence is given by a number of wirnesses, military and ci.il.

4. At the Rennes Court-Martial Colonel Mausel, who presided over the Court-Martial in 18 4, is examined as a witness; General Mercier is recalled, and M. Gobert, expert to the Bank of France, gives evidence on the writing of the bordereau in favour of Dreyfus.

In the Cape Assembly Sir J. Gordon Sp.igg gives notice of a question as to the removal of ammunition from the Orange Free State to the Transvaal in July.

25. In the Cape Assembly Mr. Schreiner defends his action in allowing guns and ammunition to pass from Port Elizabeth to the Orange Free State, as in accordance Customs Union Convention.

At the sitting of the Rennes Court-Martial a cert ficate is read stating that the health of Colonel Du Paty de Clam is such as to m: ke it impossible for him to attend as a witness.

M. Bertillon unfolds his theory on handwriting.

n Imperial ukase is issued in Russia establishing a system for the education of the children of the nob lity.

26. A Green-book is published at Pretoria containing correspondence relating to coloured British subjects from the Cape. General Joubert addresses a meeting of 500 Burghers at

Johannesburg.

The German Emperor unveils at Berlin two new groups of maible statues which he new groups of mainle statues which he presents to Berlin; they represent rulers of Brandenburg and Prussia. A Parcel Post Convention is signed between the United States and Germany.

The Venezuela Arbitration Tribunal meets in Paris after an adjournment of a week.

Lord Kitchener opens the Atbara Bridge on the Soudan railway.

M. Bertillon continues to propound his theo iss on handwriting with charts and maps before the Rennes Court-Martial.

28. In Germany the 150th anniversary of the

In Germany the 150th anniversary of the birth of Goethe is celebrated.

M. de Freycin.t. ex-Mi ister of War, arrives at Rennas. Various experts give evidence on the handwriting of the bordereau.

A d-bate takes place in the Cape Assembly on the quaston of the transit of ammuni ion through Cape Colony to the Orange Free Stat.

The girders of the new Coliscum at Chicago, now in course of construction, fall down; about 15 persons are killed and as many injured.

Hyde

ged for

on the iseas.s

bearing

vledg :s Klobb in the

oulet to the

ard to

Court-

er two

an and ria Sir"

n Old anuu: l nbark

ncil at ber of lause! 18,4, rcier is lank of

of th:

Sp. igg tate to efends inition Drange h the rtial a m: ke

hand-

Russia

of the British

ers at

h two

ers of tween

ets in ge on eo ies before

f the

rrives danca

oly on ni ion Free

lown;

many

from fr im.

MR. ELIHU ROOT. New U.S. Secretary for War.

The Session of the Prussian Diet closes.
 A gloomy view is taken of Mr. Chamberlain's speech; there is consequently an exodus of families from Pretoria.

The New Zealand House of Representatives authorise the Government to contribute towards the cost of the proposed Pacific Cable.

30. At the Rennes Court-Martial fu-ther evidence on the question of handwriting is given. M. G. Picot gives important information. Mr. Conyngham Greene, the British Agant at Preteria, hands to the State Secretary of the Republic Mr. Chamberlain's reply to President Kruger.

There is a stormy debate in the Belgian Chamber on the Government's Election Reform Bill.

31. Captain Lebrun-Renard gives evidence before the Rennes Court-Martial. The Portuguese authorities at Lorenzo Marques release the consignments of ammunition for the Transvaal Government. The Chamber of Deputies in Brussels reject by 59 votes to 31 a motion for considering the revision of the Constitution.

SPEECHES.

August 4. Mr. Rhodes, at Cape Town, on South African Affairs.

The German Emperor, at Dortmund, on the Canal System of Germany.

Rev. Dr. Lorimer, of Boston, U.S.A., at the Crystal Palace, on Co-operation, Capital, and Commerce. 15. Lord Curzon, at Simla, on Indian Railway Policy.

Mr. G. Balfour, M.P., at the Crystal Palace, on Productive Co-operation, its difficulties and importance.

17. Mr. Maddison, M.P., at the Crystal Palace, on Co-operative Production and the Copartnership of the Workers.

18. The German Emperor, at St. Privat battlefield, on the soldiers of Germany and France who fell there.

19. Mr. Herbert Paul, at Oxford, on Modern Journalism.

23. Sir George Goldie, in London, on the work of the Royal Niger Company.

24. Sir John Gorst, at Kendal, on the ne-cessity under Parliamentary Govern-ment for the people to take an interest in politics, especi-ally that parents should interest themselves in their children's education 26. Mr. Chamberlain, at Birmingham, on the Transvaal C isis.

Lord Kitchener, at Atbara, on the de-velopment of the Nile Valley through the successful construction of the railway. 28. President McKinley, resident McKinley, at Pittsburg, U.S.A., on the war with the Filipinos. Sir W. H. Prece, at the Sanitary Con-gress, Scuthamp-ton, on Moses as the greatest sanitary engineer the wold Las ever he Royal Niger Bill passes through Committee, and others are advanced a stage. 4. Lord Wemyss moves a resolution that models of public buildings should be exhibited before designs are ac-capted by the Go-vernment. Lord Lansdowne admits would be advisable when poss ble; but for the new War Office it would be impossible to comply. Some Bills are advanced a stage.

7. Standing Orders relating to private Bills agreed to. Public Bills advanced a

8. The Commons' amendments to the Lords' amendments to the Private Legislation Procedure (Scotland) Bill are he Appropriation Bill passes through all its remaining stages. The Colonial Loans Bill and the Royal Niger Company Act and other Bills are agreed to. The Lord Chan-cellor reads the Queen's Speech. Parlia-ment is formally prorogued to October 27th.

House of Commons.

August 1. Board of Education Bill as amended in Grand Committee is considered and read a thi d time.

thi'd time.

2. Third reading of and discussion in Committee of the Colonial Loans Bill; speeches by Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Labouchere. Other Bills advanced a stage.

3. Outstanding Votes for the Public Service are agreed to on Committee of Supply. Mr. Di'lon raises the question of the establishment of a Roman Catholic University. The Vote for Queen's Coll.g.s is agreed to on division.

4. Committee of Supply. The Foreign Office.

division.

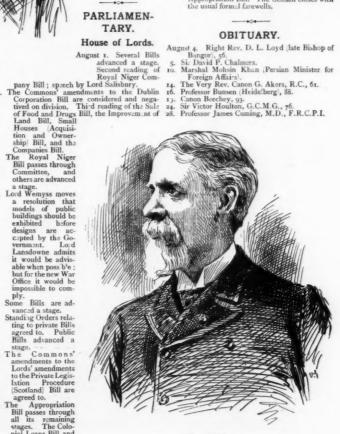

Committee of Supply. The Foreign Office citicised as to i's conduct in Uganda, Central and East Africa and Cyprus. Mr. Chamberl in replies. Fi st reading of the Appropriation Bill.

The Lords' amendments to several Bills disposed.

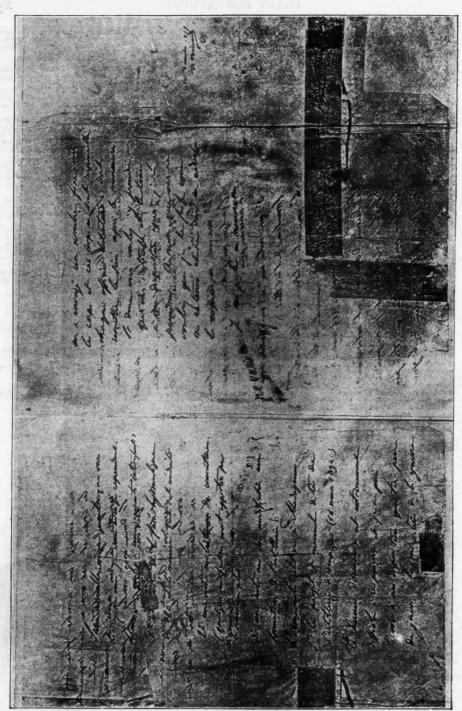

of. Second reading of Appropriation Bill. Questions answered about policy in China by Mr. Brodrick.

8. The statement of the financial affairs of India is

The statement of the financial affairs of India is considered. Speeches by Lord George Hamilton, Sir W. Wedderbern, Sir H. Fowler, and Sir W. Bhownaggree.
 Seve al questions regarding the Transsaal are put to Miristers, and Mr. Chamberlain replies at length. Third reading of the Appropriation Bill. The Session closes with the usual formal farewells.

MR. ALGER. Late Secretary for War, U.S.A.

THE FAMOUS BORDEREAU.

beg so cartiil upon not Nay the come experience of the come experience to the come experience experience the common experience experience to the common experience experience to the common experience exper

CHARACTER SKETCH.

ALFRED DREYFUS.

F the constant repetition of one's name in the papers is to be famous, then Captain Dreyfus is the most famous man who ever lived. Never since journalism began has any single man figured so conspicuously and so continuously in the newspapers of the world as this artillery officer of thirty-nine. Fame has been thrust upon him without his seeking it. He has become famous not by what he has done, but by what he has suffered. Nay, it is not even his sufferings which have fascinated the attention of mankind. The strange secret which has compelled the newspapers of Europe and America to expend hundreds of thousands of pounds in reporting the proceedings before the Court Martial at Rennes is not the attraction of torture-however great that may be. If Dreyfus had merely been racked on the Devil's Island or torn to pieces like Ravaillac before the Hotel de Ville in Paris, it would have been a seven days' wonder. But the Affaire Dreyfus has now monopolised the wonder of the world for years. Never has there been anything like it since the world began. The Tichborne case, so far as England was concerned, may be quoted as a parallel. But Tichborne was a local monster peculiar to England. Dreyfus is a prodigy of the world.

Why is it that Dreyfus has become the human unit, whose fortunes interest all mankind? It is not in his personality. When I began this Character Sketch I thought of confining myself solely to an attempt to delineate the character of the man. But that, I speedily found, would have interested nobody. For the man him-self is very much as other men. Brave, intelligent, ambitious, and devoted to his family, he is suddenly struck down in the midst of his career in the prime of his early manhood by an overwhelming catastrophe. Stunned by the terrific force of the blow, he can only ejaculate passionate asseverations of his innocence which, however, soon become inaudible in the vast silence of the waste of waters amid which he is buried alive in his solitary cell. Racked by disease, tortured by savage resentment against his unknown foe—whenever the door of his dungeon opens, even for a moment, we heard the same plaintive cry of innocence, the same impassioned appeal for justice and for vengeance. Then the door was shut to, and all was silence once more. At last, after five years, Dreyfus, prematurely aged, grey-haired before forty, is exhumed from his living grave and restored to the light of day. For a month he stands at bay before his persecutors and calumniators, the cynosure of every eye in the court, the centre of the interest, the curiosity, and the sympathy of the world. It is the same Dreyfus. Again and again he asserts his innocence. Again and again he appeals for justice. Always he presents the one unvarying spectacle of the injured victim, confronting with indomitable will and unfaltering intelligence all the machinations of his All that is very fine, very inspiring, and very useful as a spectacle for the cultivation of the higher emotions, but in itself it is not sufficient to explain the world-wide fascination of the Affaire.

Dreyfus is interesting not so much as a character as a victim. When a workman caught in a cogwheel is drawn into the midst of the revolving machinery, by the wheels of which he is being torn to pieces, the spectators are not much concerned about the personal idiosyncrasies of the individual. Their first thought is the machine and how it can be stopped. And if the men in charge of the machine are callous or indifferent, the question of their inhumanity and brutality becomes far more important than the personality of the man in the clutch of the machine.

To vary the metaphor, Dreyfus has acted as a test paper, which, being dipped into the human solution called France, reveals its character. He is important only as a test paper. His case owes its significance not to the facts which it contains about himself, but to the indication which it has not ceased to afford of the real nature of a great nation.

The Affaire Dreyfus is a Judgment Day come to France before its time. We can see no great white throne, nor Him who sits thereon, but the books are opened, and all men are judged according to the deeds which they have done since they were confronted by this Affaire. Up and down throughout the whole French nation, from the highest to the lowest, this Affaire Dreyfus has passed like a magic mirror, in which all men may see reflected the inner soul of modern France. Presidents, generals, journalists, politicians, priests—all have been tested by the Affaire. It has been as a two-edged sword, dividing asunder the joints and the marrow, and revealing, selfportrayed, the elements of nobility and of meanness, of heroism and of crime, which are all mingled in strange solution in modern France.

Dreyfus fades into infinite insignificance compared with the immensity of the issues which were raised by his trial. He was but the interrogation point of Destiny.

And what has been the answer?

So far as relates to the headquarters of the French Army -where militarism has had free course to work out its own damnation by making the Army an idol entitled to claim the sacrifice even of justice to its intereststhe answer has been, Almost entirely bad. Mili-tarism has brought forth after its kind. The man has been sacrificed to the machine, and sacrificed every time. Armies are created to give a nation independence, courage, self-reliance; but at the Frenci. General Staff there was cowardice and crime. The instinctive thought of all the great Army Chiefs seems to have been—We dare not admit a mistake. We are too weak to dare to confess the truth. At any cost of falsehood, perjury, forgery and even murder, it is necessary to keep up the outward appearance of having always done right. It is better that one Jew should be done to death unjustly than that a blow should be inflicted upon the reputation of the General Staff. That seems to have been their instinctive conviction. They acted upon it, and Nemesis has overtaken them. The injury to their reputationresulting from a frank, full admission that a court-martial had been misled would hardly have been perceptible outside their own bureau. Whereas the exposure that has followed of the tactics which they employed to cover up their blunder has made them the mark for the derision, the scorn and the indignation of the wo ld.

As at all Days of Judgment, there has been a dividing asunder between the sheep and the goats. And if the e has been a great exposure of the kind of poisonous precipitate which accumulates in the headquarters of armies, there has been a not less conspicuous demonstration of the essential goodness that is to be found in the nation at The saving salt of the nation was not lacking. We find it in the magnificent services rendered to the cause of justice by soldiers like Picquart, by senators like Scheurer-Kestner, by journalists like Lazare, Clemenceau, and De Pressensé, by men of letters like Zola, and by lawyers like Labori and Demange. They have vindicated the fair fame of France. But for the test of the Affaire than would have been comparatively unknown. Their they would have been comparatively unknown. names are now familiar as household words throughout the whole world.

Photograph by Gerschel.

[Paris.

CAPTAIN DREYFUS. (At the time of his degradation.)

It is this aspect of the Affaire as a kind of Candle of the Lord revealing the inner truth as to the degree of decadence or of virtue left in France that the Dreyfus trial has been followed with such absorbing interest. The result has been to bring to light infamies almost incredible, as well as heroism and chivalry worthy of the best days of France. But there is some danger that the very immensity of the labours of this Great Assize has to some extent obscured the general effects of the whole revelation. In order, then, to enable the reader to follow the whole narrative from first to last, I have strung together the leading items in the long exposure in the shape of a simple story told in chapter and in verse, without any pretension to literary craft. I have simply set down in order the facts which have been brought to light at Rennes.

PART I.—CONDEMNATION.

CHAPTER I.—THE VOW OF DREYFUS.

1. In the year of our Lord 1860 Alfred Dreyfus was born in Mulhouse, in Alsace, the youngest son of his

2. Now Dreyfus was a Jew.

3. When Alfred was ten years of age Napoleon made war upon Germany, intending to seize the Rhine. But the curse of God fell upon him, his armies were scattered, his throne was overturned, and his capital was captured.

4. After her victory, to protect herself against future attacks, Germany annexed Alsace and Lorraine.

5. But Alfred, although Alsatian born, was French at heart. Refusing to become German, he clave unto France, and, having chosen to remain French, he quitted his birthplace and came to Paris.

6. His boyish heart was hot within him as he thought of his native land given as a prey to the spoiler, and he devoted his life as a willing sacrifice to the cause of

7. So it came to pass that, when eighteen years old, he entered the Ecole Polytechnique and studied the art of war there, and in the School of Applied Gunnery, until at last in 1882, when he was twenty-two years old, he was appointed second lieutenant in an artillery regiment.

8. Two years afterwards, when Alfred came again to Mulhouse, he heard under his windows the German bands celebrating the anniversary of Sedan.

9. And he bit the sheets of his bed in anger, and swore to consecrate all his strength, all his understanding to the service of his country against those who had despoiled France of her dear Alsace, and thus trampled on the Alsatians in their anguish.

10. Thus did Alfred Dreyfus devote all his life to one single end, and that end the taking of Revenge upon the Germans.

CHAPTER II .- "THE REPUBLIC IS REVENGE."

1. When the wrecks of the hosts of Napoleon were being gathered from stricken fields as prey for the German conquerors, some men said the war should cease, for "the Republic was Peace."

2. But when Paris was captured and peace was signed, France said, "The Republic is Revenge."

3. And for nearly thirty years Frenchmen have offered their sons and their treasure as a living sacrifice upon the Altar of Revenge.

4. For Revenge they emptied their treasury, doubled their debt, and increased their taxation.

5. For Revenge, they passed their male youth through the Army, as the heathen passed their children through the Fire for Moloch.

6. For Revenge, they created within the Republic a military system the negation of all the principles of the Republic.

7. Militarism substituted for Liberty absolute obedience; for Equality the despotism of the non-commissioned officer; for Fraternity the slavery of the

8. And yet after doing all these things, and making all these sacrifices, Revenge seemed as far off as possible. and the heart of France grew sad within her.

9. But although Revenge was not to be had, there was the Army created as the instrument of Revenge, and for lack of Revenge the Army became the only object of her

10. And so Militarism grew more and more, and when a quarter of a century had passed the Army was almost supreme.

CH I. heir 2. Alsa what 4. world and 5. the ! Gene Pari throu 7. their telep over 8. the l 9.

Emb

pape

6.

IO pape of d auth H men then 12 relat

Itali grea 13 for v tre 1 of w 14 the 1

dece of re Drey 2. in h Écol

as " Gen into a me offic

on th

his !

of hi colle rich, 6.

he w own. only fault CHAPTER III .- MILITARISM AND ITS CHARWOMAN.

1. The Army became the God of French idolatry—the heir of the worship of Glory, Alsace and Revenge.

2. It was not ready to attack Germany, to recapture

Alsace, to achieve Revenge.

was

his

ade

But

red,

ed.

ture

h at

nce.

his ight

he

e of

, he

t of

il at

was

1 to

nds

ore

the

iled

the

one

the

ere

the

uld

ed,

red

on led gh

gh

he

di-

n-

he

ng

le,

as

or

er

en

st

3. Nevertheless, though it was thus incompetent to do what it was created to achieve, it did other things.

4. It developed an atmosphere of distrust, it created a world of espionage, and it cultivated a spirit of insolence and arrogance.

5. The less able it was to cope with the Germans in the field the more nervously anxious did the French General Staff become to discover their secrets.

6. If the German military attachés met in a room in Paris, the spies of the French Army photographed them through slits in the shutters.

7. When these attachés met to discuss business in their own apartments, the French spies fitted up a telephone in the chimney, so that every word could be overheard in another room.

8. But the crowning triumph of French Militarism was the bribing of the Charwoman.

This Charwoman was employed at the German Embassy to sweep out the rooms and empty the wastepaper baskets every night.

io. But the good dame, when emptying the wastepaper baskets was instructed to purloin all fragments of documents, and bring them to the French army authorities.

11. And often she brought so many shreds of documents that it took the whole time of one officer to gum them together.

12. This pleased them so much that they entered into relation with Charwomen in other houses, notably in the Italian Embassy, and then imagined they were achieving great things.

13. But to spy makes spies; and the habit of preparing for war by all manner of subterfuges and falsehood and treachery infects peace with some of the worst evils of war.

14. So the shadow of the Hell of War fell darkly across the peace of France; and her soldiers practised all the deceits of war in time of peace, without any opportunity of redeeming their frauds by the sacrifice of their lives.

CHAPTER IV .- THE CAREER OF DREYFUS.

 While these things were going on in Paris, Alfred Dreyfus pursued his career with success in the Army.

2. Alfred was diligent in his studies if somewhat loose in his life in his bachelor days. He entered in 1890 the Ecole de Guerre as the 67th; he left it two years later as "No. 9, very good."

3. Now the governing body of the French Army is the General Staff, consisting of two hundred officers divided into several bureaux or departments; and to be appointed a member of this body is the great object of the French officer's ambition.

4. In 1893 Alfred Dreyfus was appointed probationer on the General Staff, only eleven years after the date of his first commission, being now in the thirty-fourth year of his age.

5. The man Dreyfus was not popular among his colleagues. He was young, he was successful, he was rich, he was pushing, and he was a son of Israel.

6. Alfred Dreyfus was ambitious, and in his ambition he wished to know every one's business as well as his own. So he was suspect in an office where he was the only Jew, and disliked as much for his virtues as for his faults. 7. Before his appointment to the General Staff Alfred had married his wife Lucie, a lady tall and majestic in stature, with large expressive eyes and luxuriant hair. And she bore him two children, a son, Pierre, and a daughter, Jeanne.

 Everything smiled for them in life. Then all of a sudden came a clap of thunder so appalling that his brain reeled.

CHAPTER V .- THE BORDEREAU.

I. In those days General Mercier was Minister of War, M. Casimir Perier President of the Republic, and Colonel Sandherr Chief of the Intelligence Department of the General Staff.

Colonel Sandherr loved not the sons of Israel, and his heart was sore within him that the General Staff should be defiled by the presence of Dreyfus the Jew.

3. The assistant of Colonel Sandherr was Colonel

Henry.

4. Now Henry was a traitor.

5. Henry had an accomplice of the name of Esterhazy, by whose aid no fewer than 160 serret documents of considerable importance, including detailed information as to the French Mobilisation Scheme, were sold to Colonel Schwarzkoppen, the German Military Attaché at Paris.

6. This man Esterhazy was a scoundrel.

7. But he knew German, and he knew Henry. From 1876 he had been occasionally employed on the General Staff, and was in a position both to act as go-between and to need the money the employment secured.

8. At the end of July, 1894, Colonel Schwarzkoppen received a letter, or bordereau, written by Esterhazy.

This document begins thus:-

Sir,—Though I have no news to indicate that you wish to see me, nevertheless I am sending you some interesting items of information:

 A note on the hydrau'ic brake of the 120, and on the way in which the piece behaved.

(2) A note on the covering troops (some modifications will be entailed by the new plan).

(3) A note on a modification in artillery formations.

(4) A note relative to Madagascar.

(5) The project of a firing manual for field artillery, March 14th, 1894.

The last document is very difficult to procure, and I can only have it at my disposal during a very few days. . . . "I am just setting off to the manœuvres."

9. On August 3rd, 1894, Esterhazy arrived at the manœuvres at the camp of Chalons.

10. When Colonel Schwarzkoppen received this

10. When Colonel Schwarzkoppen received this bordereau at the end of September, he tore it up into many small pieces and threw it into the waste-paper basket.

11. That night the charwoman carefully gathered up the fragments from the basket and conveyed them to her friend at the Intelligence Department of the French

General Staff.

12. When it was pieced together, the officer saw that it supplied the clue to the person who had been betraying the secrets of France to Germany.

13. And when Colonel Sandherr received it, his heart was lifted up within him for joy, and he raged like a lion seeking whom he might devour.

CHAPTER VI.-WHY DREYFUS WAS SUSPECTED.

1. Now the clues supplied by the bordereau were

2. There was first the handwriting, then there was the information contained in it, and thirdly the fact that the author was one who had started for the manœuvres.

3. The traitor was presumably a member of the General Staff; as three of his items related to cannon, he was probably an artillery officer, and he was some one who attended the manœuvres of 1894.

4. Now there was one member of the General Staff who naturally attracted suspicion. He was the new-comer, Alfred Dreyfus. He was always ferreting about acquiring information; he was an artillery officer; he had information about covering troops; he had asked about Madagascar; he expected at one time to attend the manœuvres; and he was a Jew.

5. "I have a distrust of all Jews," said Colonel Sandherr.

6. The head or the sub-head of the Bureau in which Dreyfus served thought he saw a resemblance between Dreyfus's handwriting and that of the bordereau.

7. Then steps were taken to submit the bordereau and Dreyfus's handwriting to experts in graphology.

8. And as there were not wanting experts to swear that the forgery of Richard Piggott was the veritable handwriting of C. S. Parnell, so there was found one Bertillon, Chief of the Service for the Identification of Criminals, who at once swore that the bordereau was indubitably in the handwriting of Alfred Dreyfus.

9. But before M. Bertillon was discovered, the regular expert, Du Gobert, of the Bank of France and of the Court of Appeal, to whom the documents had been referred, had expressed doubts as to whether the hand-writing of the bordereau was identical with that of Dreyfus. Therefore he was distrusted and M. Bertillon employed in his stead.

10. By this time Colonel Henry, the accomplice of Esterhazy and Colonel Sandherr's chief assistant, became aware of the discovery of the bordereau in the writing of

11. It was necessary, therefore, in order to shield himself and Esterhazy to heap suspicion upon Alfred

12. Reports concerning the youthful escapades of Dreyfus were accumulated to prove that he had all the

13. Every reference in the secret dossiers of the General Staff to any one whose name began with D. was looked up and made ready for use against the suspected Jew.

14. One obvious difficulty was the date of the bordereau. Dreyfus knew in May he was not to go to the manœuvres. So they altered the date of the bordereau to April.

15. And so all being ready, on October 15th, 1894, the bolt fell.

CHAPTER VII.—HIS ARREST.

1. Commandant Du Paty de Clam was entrusted by Colonel Sandherr with the prosecution of the Traitor.

2. "Be so good as to present yourself at the Ministry of War on the morning of the 15th at 9 a.m. to receive a communication which concerns you."

3. So wrote Du Paty to Dreyfus. Dreyfus came. He found General de Boisdeffre and M. Grebelen waiting him.

4. On his arrival Du Paty began to dictate to Dreyfus a letter containing words similar to those found in the bordereau.

5. Dreyfus, not understanding what it meant, wrote the words dictated in a firm and regular handwriting.

6. "You tremble," said Du Paty. "Not so! My fingers are cold," replied Dreyfus.

7. The next moment M. Cochefert, Chef de la Sureté, and Henry the Traitor, entered the Bureau.

8. "In the name of the law, I arrest you," said M.

9. "But why? What does it mean? I do not understand," cried Dreyfus. "I am innocent."

10. "You know well enough," said Du Paty. "Your treason is discovered."

11. Then Henry the Traitor seized Dreyfus the Scapegoat by the arm and led him away to prison.

12. So Alfred Dreyfus was thrust into the Cherche-Midi prison on a charge of high treason, on the 15th October 1894, into a cell prepared for him the previous day by the direct order of General Mercier, who had signed the warrant for his arrest on October 14th, before the interview with Du Paty de Clam.

CHAPTER VIII .-- IN PRISON, AND DU PATY DE CLAM VISITED HIM.

1. Now the keeper of the Cherche-Midi prison was a just man named Forzinetti.

2. He says: "I found Captain Dreyfus terribly excited. He seemed to be out of his mind, with bloodshot eyes. He had upset everything in his cell. 'Give me,' he cried repeatedly, 'writing materials that I may appeal to the Minister of War.' But I was expressly forbidden to allow him to have either pen or paper."

3. "My brain reels," he said. "I am accused of the most monstrous crime a soldier can commit. I feel myself the plaything of a dreadful nightmare. I brood over this matter till I literally choke. No physical suffering is to be compared with the moral anguish that I feel whenever my thoughts hark back to this monstrous accusation."

4. Forzinetti wrote, "From the corridor one heard him groan, cry out, talk at the top of his voice, always protesting his innocence. He threw himself against the furniture, against the walls, and appeared unconscious of the injuries he inflicted on himself."

5. When prostrated with suffering and fatigue he flung himself without undressing on his bed. He took no solid food for nine days, and his sleep was haunted by horrible nightmares.

6. On the third day after his arrest, the frenzied prisoner had a visitor. Du Paty de Clam came to see if he could entangle him in his talk, or beguile him into an admission of guilt. Every day he came, and every day he went away baffled.

7. For the innocent man would not confess a crime

d

which he had never committed.

8. All this time no precise statement of the charge against him was ever furnished him, nor was he allowed to communicate with any one but Du Paty de Clam and his gaoler till December 5th.

9. Meanwhile Du Paty de Clam varied his visits of inquisition to the cell in the Cherche-Midi by domiciliary visits of intimidation to Madame Dreyfus.

10. Without legal warrant Du Paty de Clam ransacked the house of Dreyfus in the vain search for incriminating

11. Madame Dreyfus in vain implored him to give her information as to what her husband had done, and whither they had carried him.

12. "Your husband," said Du Paty de Clam, "is a traitor, a scoundrel, a coward, who practises untold debauchery, for he is as false to you as he is to his country. If you say a word as to his arrest you will be overwhelmed in ruin."

13. All this, and more also, did Du Paty de Clam say to the distracted wife on the first day of his perquisition. He repeated it the next day and the next; and for seventeen days he continued to fill the poor woman's ears with denunciations of her husband.

14. But during all this time neither Alfred nor Lucie

Dreyfus wavered a hair's-breadth from their assertion of his innocence.

der-

our ape-

che-

15th

ious

had fore

M

s a

ted.

yes.

he l to n to ost

the

this

to ver

nim

rothe

s of

ing

lid ble

ied

he

an

lay

me

rge

red

nd

of

ed ng

er

nd

old

his be ay on.

for

n's

cie

15. And Forzinetti being asked by General Mercier on October 24th for his opinion, replied without hesitation, "They are gone off on a false scent; this officer is not guilty."

16. Nevertheless, General Mercier, then Minister of War, on November 28th, when Dreyfus was still waiting trial, sent to the Figaro a statement that he had the most positive proofs of Dreyfus's treason, and that "the guilt of this officer is absolutely certain."

CHAPTER IX.-"LETTERS OF AN INNOCENT."

r. Not until December 5th was the accused man permitted to write to his wife. Then he poured out his soul to her in daily epistles.

2. "I embrace you a thousand times, as I love you, as I adore you. My darling Lucie. A thousand kisses for the children. I don't dare to speak to you more at length about them, for the tears come into my eyes when I think

3. "I have hopes in God and in justice; the truth will end by declaring itself. My conscience is calm and quiet, it reproaches me with nothing." So he wrote on December 5th.

4. "My life has now but one single aim, and that is to discover the wretch who has betrayed his country. Ah, if I only had hold of the wretch who has not only betrayed his country but has also tried to throw the blame of his infamy on me. I hardly know what torture I would invent by way of making him expiate the moments through which he has made me pass. If need be we must move heaven and earth to discover the wretch."

heaven and earth to discover the wretch."

5. Hope cheered him to the last. "I shall have to deal with soldiers who will listen to me and will understand me. The conviction of my innocence will make its way to their hearts. They will see my face. They will read my soul. Devoted to my country, I have nothing to fear. So sleep quietly, my darling, and do not be at all anxious." And visions of being once more locked in each other's arms lit up the gloom of these "sad dark days."

And so, buoyed up by false hope, Dreyfus awaited his doom.

CHAPTER X .- THE COURT MARTIAL.

I. Now when the time came for the trial of Dreyfus, the date was fixed for December 19th, and seven officers, including Colonel Maurel as president, were appointed as judges.

2. Even down to the opening of the Court Dreyfus expected his acquittal. Strong in the consciousness of his innocence, he went to the Court a soldier, to be judged by soldiers.

3. The defence of Dreyfus was placed in the hands of Maître Demange.

4. When the Court opened, Commandant Brisset, who conducted the prosecution, as Commissary of the Government demanded that the case should be heard with closed doors.

5. Maître Demange protested, but was silenced. For, said President Maurel, "there are other interests at stake than those merely of accusation and of defence."

So the doors were closed, and the prosecution proceeded.

7. The Acte d'Accusation, taking note of Dreyfus's odd behaviour in working after hours, even without leave, says it is quite conceivable that he might, without being seen by any one, have made his way into bureaux with improper motives.

8. The same Acte noting that Dreyfus, in giving up his keys, asked Du Paty to search everywhere, for he would find nothing, remarks that this was true, which was a clear proof that everything compromising had already been hidden or destroyed!

9. Further, it is alleged that he persistently denied his guilt, and protested against the charge brought against him. "When hard pressed, he gets out of it without much difficulty, thanks to the supple character of his mind."

10. He was accused of gambling; but instead of proof, the prosecution remarked that gamblers, not being very respectable, their evidence might be suspect—" therefore we have refrained from hearing them."

11. The only piece of evidence was the bordereau, which it was declared "offers a perfect resemblance to the authentic writing of Captain Dreyfus."

12. The only important witnesses against him were the experts in handwriting, of whom two condemned him while three were uncertain, and Du Paty de Clam and

Henry.
13. The "evidence" of Du Paty de Clam was a biographical notice of the accused, suggesting that everything that had been stolen and betrayed to the Germans, even when he was at the school at Bourges, must be set down to his discredit.

14. But Colonel Henry's evidence was more concise. He himself being the traitor, denounced Dreyfus to the Court.

Photograph by Pierre Petit.]

[Part

GENERAL MERCIER.

Photograph by Bui ard.]

[Paris

MAJOR ESTERHAZY.

He detailed the facts proving the betrayal of secrets, the money for which he (Henry himself) had received and divided with Esterhazy, and then turning to Dreyfus, he exclaimed, "Behold the Traitor!"

15. Nevertheless, notwithstanding all the false-swearing of the conspirators, the judges were troubled in their minds, and hesitated about condemning an innocent

16. So it was decided at the headquarters of the conspiracy to secure the ruin of Dreyfus by stabbing him in the back.

CHAPTER XI.—THE SECRET DOSSIER.

1. The accused has a right to be informed of all the evidence on which his condemnation is demanded.

2. Otherwise, secret and unsifted calumnies communicited secretly to the judges might secure the condemnation of the most innocent of men.

3. When the hearing of the evidence was over and the judges had retired into their chamber of consultation, General Mercier sent for Du Paty de Clam.

4. "Take this secret dossier," said the Minister of War,

4. "Take this secret dossier," said the Minister of War, "take it quickly to the President of the Court Martial, and tell him I give him a moral order to read its contents to the judges after the trial has closed and the last word of the prisoner and his counsel has been spoken; then bring it hither again."

5. Now the secret dossier had been made up by

Colonel Sandherr for the purpose of destroying all hope of the escape of the innocent accused.

Du Paty de Clam, knowing well the contents of the secret package, hastened to do the bidding of his chief.

7. Colonel Maurel opened the packet and read the first document. "What need have we of further evidence?" he thought; and passed the documents on to his fellow judges.

8. The documents were then read aloud in the hearing of all, the President making a comment upon each.

 When the hearing was finished, the guilt of Dreyfus appeared to be clear, as these secret documents were assumed to be true.

10. So he was unanimously condemned by the seven judges on the strength of the "evidence" illegally communicated to them by the Minister of War. The sealed packet having done its work was sent back to its author, and Dreyfus was sentenced to the doom of a Traitor.

 But after five years and infinite labour it was discovered that these secret documents were false and forged.

12. According to the evidence of Captain Freystätter, a brave and honest officer of marine infantry who was one of the judges at the first court martial and one of the witnesses at the second, the secret documents were four in number.

13. The first was the commentary by Du Paty de Clam, or biographical notice of Dreyfus, in which, on the authority of the Intelligence Department of the General Staff, Dreyfus was saddled with the guilt of betraying secrets about a shell while at Bourges, at the Ecole de Guerre, and again at the General Staff.

14. This commentary or biography was so scandalously stuffed with lies that General Mercier no sooner received it back than he carefully destroyed it, for the same reason that the assassin buries the bloodstained dagger with which he has slain his victim.

15. But a copy had been taken, and it remained undiscovered in the Intelligence Department till 1897. No sooner was this known than General Gonse, by order of General de Boisdeffre, sent it to General Mercier, then out of office, by whom it was promptly burned.

16. The second and third documents were letters from Panizzardi, the Italian Military Attaché, to Schwarzkoppen, the German, in one of which reference was made to "ce canaille de D—," who had supplied plans of Nice, and who was decidedly becoming too exacting.

17. It was suggested that "ce canaille de D—,"

17. It was suggested that "ce canaille de D——," whose charming wife the attachés went on to say they had entertained at "petits soupers," was Dreyfus.

18. Now Madame Dreyfus had never met either of the attachés, and it was well known at the War Office that "ce canaille de D——" was not Dreyfus, but another man.

19. This was subsequently admitted even by Colonel Henry. Captain Cuignet, giving evidence for the War Office before the Court of Cassation last year, expressly swore that the expression "ce canaille de D——" had no reference to Dreyfus."

20. Nevertheless the letters relating to this "canaille de D—" were put into Dreyfus's dossier as proof positive that he, Dreyfus, whose name at least began with the same letter, was a traitor.

21. The fourth document was from a foreign military attaché distinctly affirming the guilt of Dreyfus.

22. Now this foreign military attaché was Colonel Panizzardi, who never sent any such despatch as that produced to secure the conviction.

23. The telegram which he actually sent to Rome ran thus: relationambas awoid 24.

emissa 25. Court, ran: "taken.

26.

Clam guilt: War precar 27. Dreyf illegal which senter

2. I
he had bring
3. bear u
shall from though

the ti

I.

4. If rejects
5. If this a head thousaindica avoid
6. (

perha himse 7. 7 relation mysel 8. 6 Clam, the ag

sugge

your When must it.

me, it

When

favour

1. (Lebru yard of his

thus: "Dreyfus arrested. If the Captain has had no relations with you it will be well to instruct the ambassador to make an official dementi, in order to avoid the comments of the press.'

24. In deciphering the telegram which the French had intercepted, they misread the last clause to mean "our emissary is warned."

25. But instead of communicating this telegram to the Court, all that the judges were told was that the despatch ran: "Dreyfus arrested. Emissary informed. Precautions

26. Subsequently this was expanded by Du Paty de Clam into the following explicit assertion of Dreyfus's guilt:—"Captain Dreyfus is arrested. The Minister of War has proof of his relations with Germany. All our precautions are taken."

27. Thus it was that Dreyfus was convicted and Dreyfus was condemned on false evidence, secretly and illegally communicated to the Court, the real nature of which has only this year been brought to light.

CHAPTER XII.-CONDEMNED.

1. The heart of Dreyfus sank within him as the sentence was pronounced.

2. In spite of everything, up to the very last moment he had hoped that some providential chance would bring about the discovery of the true culprit.

3. When the blow fell he wrote to his wife: "I shall bear up under it, for I have promised you that I will. I shall draw the strength which is still necessary for me from your love, from the affection of all of you, from the thought of my darling children, from the last hope that the truth will be found out. I must needs feel your affection irradiating me all round."

4. He appealed to the High Military Council, which rejected his appeal without examining it.

5. He wrote to his counsel, "I shall march to meet this awful punishment which is worse than death, my head upright without a blush. I would certainly a thousand times have preferred death. But you have indicated to me my duty, dear master, and I cannot avoid it whatever the torture that awaits me."

6. On the last day of 1894, Du Paty de Clam came to suggest on the part of General Mercier that Dreyfus had perhaps only wished to set a trap, and then found himself caught in the wheels.

7. To whom Dreyfus answered, "I have never had any relations with any agent or attaché; I have never given myself to any decoying; I am innocent."

8. "If you are really innocent," said Du Paty de Clam, "you undergo the most awful martyrdom of all the ages." "I am that martyr," replied Dreyfus, "and I hope the future will show you that I am."

9. Three days later he wrote to his wife: "Continue your investigations without truce and without respite. When I am gone, try to persuade every one that they must not flag or halt in the quest."

10. And to the Minister of War he wrote: "I am condemned. I have no favour to ask. But in the name of my honour, which I hope will one day be restored to me, it is my duty to entreat you to pursue your inquiries. When I am gone let them ever inquire. It is the only favour I beg of you."

CHAPTER XIII.-THE ALLEGED CONFESSION.

1. On the morning of January 5th, 1895, Captain Lebrun-Renaud conducted Alfred Dreyfus to the courtyard of the Military School, which was to be the scene of his degradation.

2. When they were in the room together before starting, Dreyfus exclaimed: "I am innocent, absolutely innocent! I will declare it in the face of the whole people; that is the cry of my conscience.

3. Then, as they talked together, Dreyfus said, "The Minister knows I am innocent. Du Paty de Clam came to me and asked if I had not given up documents of no importance in order to obtain others in exchange. 'No,' I replied; 'I was absolutely innocent.' I desire the whole matter to be cleared up. In two or three years I hope my innocence will be proved."

4. This he said, trusting the glozing assurances of Du Paty de Clam, who said that the inquiries would be

continued.

5. But Captain Lebrun-Renaud, remembering only the question put by Du Paty de Clam, reported that Dreyfus had said, "The Minister of War knows very well that if I communicated documents to Germany, it was to have more important ones."

6. That very day the Temps reported that Dreyfus had said, "I am innocent. If I have given documents to the foreigners, it was only as a bait to tempt them into giving up more important ones. In three years the truth will be known, and the Minister of War himself will take up my cause.

7. General Mercier heard of this alleged confession, but took no steps to verify it or to obtain further information from the condemned. He was at the time writing letters protesting his innocence. "It did not occur to me," said

General Mercier, "to take any further steps."

8. And so the matter remained until when the demand for revision arose, the alleged confession was used by the Government as a conclusive confirmation of the justice of the verdict.

CHAPTER XIV .- THE DEGRADATION.

1. At nine of the clock on the morning of Saturday, January 5th, 1895, Alfred Dreyfus underwent the ceremony of public degradation in the square of the Military School.

2. After the roll of drums and blare of bugles, the sentence was read out to him condemning him to military degradation and life-long imprisonment in a fortified station

3. Then said General Darras in the hearing of all the troops in the square and of all the crowd outside, "Dreyfus, you are unworthy to bear arms. In the name of the French people we degrade you."

4. Dreyfus raising both arms to heaven cried with a loud voice, "I am innocent. I swear that I am innocent.

Vive la France!

5. But the vast crowd outside roared savagely, " Death to the traitor! Death!'

6. As the adjutant was tearing off the stripes and cuffs and all distinctive marks of the uniform, Dreyfus cried again, "On the heads of my wife and children, I swear that I am innocent. I swear it. Vive la France!"

7. Then his sword was taken from him and snapped across the adjutant's knee. As the broken fragments were flung with the scabbard and sword-belt to the ground, Dreyfus cried, "You degrade an innocent man!"

8. Gunners with naked swords, preceded by two officers, 1:d Dreyfus in penitential march along the front of the troops lately his comrades.

9. Dreyfus, with head erect, and feeling all around him the scorn of the crowd, was marched close to the railings, behind which the mob was massed.

10. At the sight of him the multitude waxed exceeding violent. A tempest of hisses greeted him. Inaudible in the tumult Dreyfus turned towards the crowd and declared, "I am innocent! Vive la France!"

11. And the crowd replied to his unheard protest; "A mort!"

12. The procession reached the reporters, the ears of he nation.

13. Eagerly he said to them, "You will tell the whole of France that I am innocent!"

14. But they replied with cries of "Poltroon! Traitor! Judas!"

15. Dreyfus drew himself up proudly and answered, "You have not the right to insult me!"

16. Whereat they yelled yet the more: "Filthy Jew; you know very well you are not innocent!"

17. And all the while the howling mob chanted savagely its monotone, "Death to the Traitor! Death!"

18. Dreyfus still with head erect, but with somewhat tottering steps, completed his march to the prison van, into which he disappeared.

19. Nor was he seen again by his fellowmen-other than his gaolers-for five years.

PART II.-VINDICATION.

CHAPTER I .- THE BURIED ALIVE.

MME. LABORI. M. CASIMIR-PERIER.

1. In those days Casimir-Perier resigned the Presidency of France, and M. Faure was elected in his stead.

2. Dreyfus, instead of being confined in a fortified place, was transported to the Devil's Island, off the coast of French Guiana, in South America.

3. And for more than a year he remained apparently forgotten by all except his family.

4. His health suffered, malaria tormented him, and the quinine taken to banish fever injured his digestion. Nervous, sleepless, lodged in a small cabin beneath a tropical sun, surrounded by an iron palisade, and cons antly watched by sentinels with loaded rifles, innocent of an abominable crime the mere thought of which was revolting to him, he suffered the most appalling moral martyrdom that can be dreamt of.

5. With the monotony of a phonograph, he repeated in all his letters the one unvarying assertion of his innocence: "I never was, I am not, and I cannot possibly be the culprit."

6. Ministers and presidents received from time to time letters containing a supreme cry of appeal from a Frenchman, a father, who now for years has lain on a bed of torture, a cry which was ever the same—namely, for the truth on this terrible drama, for the unmasking of the man or men who committed the infamous crime.

7. But they paid no more attention to his entreaties than if they had never heard them.

8. Only when agitation began to make itself felt in France they redoubled their severities.

9. M. Lebon, Colonial Minister in 1896, ordered the prisoner to be put in irons. The irons were two heavy rings, with hinges and clasps. They were connected with a rod of iron, from which branched at right angles another rod with a clasp at the end that could be fastened to the bed with a padlock. One could turn on one's side painfully, but not bend one's legs, and it was very hard to sit up in the bed.

10. "I will not please them by dying," Dreyfus said a Photograph by Gerschel.]

[Paris.

that or n

Est

the

deb

repo

was disc of t

Dev

the lette

bore

of l

too

I

I

the duty

at o

sur

imp

you

bac

Ger

1

1.

1

9

8

7

6

COLONEL PICQUART.

thousand times. And by iron power of will he conquered his ill-health, and kept death at bay in his living grave, sustained by the hope that some day he would return and vindicate his good name.

11. But it was not till after five years passed that the stone was rolled away and Alfred Dreyfus the buried alive became once more a living man among living men.

CHAPTER II .- PICQUART AND THE "PETIT BLEU."

1. And it came to pass that Colonel Sandherr resigned, and Colonel Picquart was appointed in his stead.

2. On July 1st, 1895, when Colonel Sandherr handed over the service to his successor, he said: "General de Boisdeffre is very much occupied in hunting up documents concerning Dreyfus, but my opinion is that the affair is ended. Besides, if the question ever comes up again, you have only to ask Henry for the secret dossier of this case and you will be convinced on the subject of Dreyfus's milt."

3. At the end of March, 1896, thirty-two small fragments of a petit bleu or telegram card were brought to the War Office by the charwoman of the German Embassy. Commandant Lauth gummed them together and brought the result to Colonel Picquart.

4. The petit bleu was addressed to M. le Commandant Esterhazy, 27, Rue de la Bienfeasance, Paris. On the other side there was written:—

I await before everything a more detailed explanation than what you gave me the other day with regard to the question at issue. In consequence, I beg you to give it me in writing, so that I may judge if I can continue my relations with the firm R.

5. Now, who and what manner of man was this Esterhazy, who was in confidential correspondence with the German Embassy?

6. Colonel Picquart discovered that he was a man debauched, violent, impecunious, and inquisitive; and reporting this to his superior officer, General Gonse, was ordered to continue his researches.

7. He obtained samples of Esterhazy's writing, and discovered that the handwriting was identical with that of the bordereau, for writing which Dreyfus was on the

8. M. Bertillon, who had sworn the bordereau was in the writing of Dreyfus, now declared that Esterhazy's letters were veritable facsimiles of the caligraphy of the

9. Other evidence led Picquart to press for the arrest of Esterhazy. Gonse, his superior, hesitated.

10. Then Picquart wrote to Gonse and said, "If we lose too much time, the initiative will be taken by outsiders, and that, apart from loftier considerations, will put us in an odious light."

11. But Gonse replied, "Prudence, prudence! You see the word which you must always have before your eyes."

12. On September 14th, Picquart wrote, "I think it my duty to assure you once more that it is necessary to act at once. If we wait any longer we shall be taken by surprise, shut up in a position from which it will be impossible to extricate ourselves, and in which we shall no longer find the means of establishing the real truth."

13. The next day Gonse said, "What does it matter to you if this Jew is in the Ile du Diable?"

"But," replied Picquart, "if he is innocent?"

14. "But," replied Picquart, "If he is innocess."
15. "What!" exciaimed General Gonse, "would you go back upon that trial? It would be an awful story. Generals Mercier and Saussier were involved in it."

16. "My General, he is innocent, and that is sufficient reason for going back upon it. But from another point of view, if the family find the true culprit, how shall we look then?

17. And General Gonse replied, "Oh, if you say nothing, no one will know anything about it

18. Then said Colonel Picquart in wrath, " My General, what you say is abominable. I do not know what I shall do, but, in any case, I shall not carry this secret with me into my tomb." And so saying he left the room.

19. His mind was made up.

CHAPTER III .-- OUR FRIENDS THE ENEMY.

1. It has been well said by them of old time that our enemies render us better service than our friends.

2. Of which the most famous recent illustration is the service rendered to the cause of Dreyfus by his enemy the Éclair, which, on September 14th, under the heading of "The Traitor," began the process which led to his release by publishing an article intended to seal his

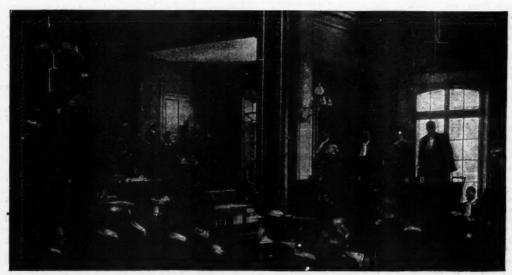

3. For the Eclair, in its zeal to destroy Dreyfus, for the first time made known to the world that his conviction had been secured by the illegal communication of secret unsifted evidence to his judges after his case was closed.

4. This afforded Madame Dreyfus ground for her first petition for Revision, and opened the way for the publication of the first Dreyfusard pamphlet, "The Truth about the Dreyfus Affair," by M. Bernard Lazare.

5. The ball had been set rolling. Where there is movement there is hope. And the Éclair had all unwittingly begun the rehabilitation of Dreyfus.

6. The good work was continued by the Matin, which, "in order to stop all pity for Dreyfus," published on November 10th, 1896, for the first time, a facsimile of the bordereau "written with Dreyfus' own hand."

7. As it was written by Esterhazy, the publication of the facsimile of the bordereau led directly to his identifi-

THE READING OF THE ACTE D'ACCUSATION AT RENNES.

(Captain Dreyfus standing in centre.)

iered rave and t the alive U." gned, nded al de nents ir is gain, this fus's ents War assy. ught dant the

8. No sooner had Colonel Schwarzkoppen seen the Matin than he said to Panizzardi, "My man is caught;

it is his writing." Esterhazy fled to Rouen.

9. But it was nearly twelve months before the identity of his handwriting with that of the bordereau convinced M. de Castro, his stockbroker, that his client was its author, and so led to his public identification.

CHAPTER IV .- THE CHOSE JUGÉE.

1. It was on 18th November, eight days after the publication of the bordereau in the Matin, and two months after the revelation of the Éclair, that the French Government took the fatal false step from which all the subsequent trouble arose.

2. Replying to an interpellation on the subject, General Billot declared that justice was done. Everything was in order, the Court had regularly and unanimously condemned Dreyfus. The Council of Revision had unanimously rejected his appeal. "Consequently it is a chose jugée, and it is not permitted to any one to go back on his trial."

3. Instantly Esterhazy came back to Paris. At the same time Colonel Picquart was despatched on a mission which left the Intelligence Department in full charge of the forger and traitor, Colonel Henry.

4. Henceforth to all arguments, entreaties, representations, the French Government was deaf. "Chose jugée!" was the answer and the only answer to all the demands for a rehearing of the case.

5. Now the condemnation of Socrates and the sentence that sent Jesus to Calvary were also choses jugées. But the judgment of mankind has revised the verdict of the Athenians and the decision of Pilate.

CHAPTER V .- FORGERY IN HIGH PLACES.

1. Henry, knowing his own guilt, and dreading exposure, bethought him of a simple method of strengthening the case against Dreyfus.

2. Before General Billot's declaration about the chose jugée, Henry set to work to manufacture letters forging the handwriting of Panizzardi, the Italian military attaché whose genuine letter alluding to ce canaille de D—was in the secret dossier.

3. He provided the ruled paper and the blue pencil. But Lemercier-Picard, a disgraced policeman, did the forging. He did it clumsily enough, constructing a series of alleged letters in which Dreyfus was expressly named apparently by the person who had referred to ce canaille de D—. This he did, as General Gonse declared at Rennes, to have "fresh proof against Dreyfus."

4. Then having provided Henry with his forged documents, Lemercier-Picard went to Colonel Schwarz-koppen and sold to him the information of what had been done.

5. Henry being now supreme at the Intelligence Department, began to scheme how to destroy not only

Dreyfus, but Picquart, whose post he held.

6. Picquart had proved impervious to pressure. "If you tell nobody," said General Gonse, "nothing will be known." "That is abominable," answered Picquart; "I will not carry this secret with me to the grave."

7. So it was resolved to hurry him to his grave before he could disburden himself of his secret.

8. So Picquart was despatched on a mission along the most exposed frontier of Tunis—a mission so purposeless and so perilous that the General on the spot, not understanding that Picquart was sent to be killed like Uriah the Hittite, refused to allow him to proceed further than Gabes.

 Murder therefore having failed, Henry resorted once more to forgery, in order to manufacture evidence which might consign Picquart to a living grave.

To. When Henry was at the Intelligence Department, the art of destroying reputations by weaving a cunning web of forged letters and telegrams of French officers became almost the only art of war in favour at the French

War Office.

11. Henry opened Picquart's letters in his absence, and one day came upon a playful missive written by the secretary of an old lady whose salon Picquart visited. In this there was an allusion to an officer, also a habitué of the salon, as le Demi-Dieu, and to Picquart himself as le Bon Dieu.

12. This letter Henry copied before sending to Picquart; not understanding it, but feeling that anything mysterious may easily be made mischievous, he forged a bogus telegram to Picquart, which was intended to graft a suggestion of treason upon the allusion to the Demi-Dieu.

13. This telegram which, when it was written, was never sent, was added to the mass of forgeries with which Henry filled the pigeon holes of the War Office, where the secret dossiers were kept, ran thus: "Your abrupt departure has filled us with dismay. Your work is compromised. Speak, and the Demi-Dieu will act. Speranza, Dec. 15, 1896."

14. Now "Speranza" was a pseudonym of Du Paty de

Clam.

CHAPTER VI.-SCHEURER-KESTNER.

I. In May, 1897, Colonel Picquart having written to Henry complaining of the mystery made about his departure, and the lies told to conceal it, received a letter from the Forger accusing him of making mysteries and of misconduct while in office.

2. It was intended to be the opening of the attack upon Picquart. But as will be seen it opened a door through which revision was secured for Dreyfus.

3. Now as this alleged misconduct consisted in the action which he had taken to unearth the treason of Esterhazy, Picquart felt that the toils of the conspirators were now being thrown around him. He came to Paris to consult his lawyer, Leblois, with whom he left copies of his correspondence with Gonse concerning the authorship of the bordereau, and then returned to Tunis.

4. About this time the Vice-President of the Senate was a just man, an Alsatian, Scheurer-Kestner by name, who had long been ill at ease about the fate of Dreyfus.

5. To him went Leblois, the lawyer, carrying with him Picquart's correspondence with General Gonse, which showed that the bordereau was written not by Dreyfus, but by Esterhazy, and that General Gonse himself at that time considered revision possible.

6. Scheurer-Kestner no soone: read this correspondence than his mind was made up. He saw that Dreyfus was innocent, and at once set about endeavouring to save him.

7. As Vice-President of the Senate, he saw M. Meline, Prime Minister of France, and implored him to see that justice was done.

8. But M. Meline hardened his heart and would not let Dreyfus go.

9. At that time General Billot, who was Minister of War, had been for 25 years a close friend of Scheurer-Kestner. To him therefore the old man went, saying, "Surely my old friend will hear me."

ro. But although Scheurer-Kestner implored General Billot almost on his knees to look into the matter, to make a personal inquiry, to read the dossiers and the Gonse-Picquart correspondence himself. But the heart of General Billot was even as the heart of M. Meline.

repland In no upoo the I Gertime In the I am I ar

I.

saw

M. 6

with

Kes

agai pape artic milli press 6. hazy War

still Du I two treas
2.
Bon
Sper
proo

Este knew Picq retur 4. Este Picq dossi Kais close duly

camp

11. "Prove to me that Dreyfus is guilty," said Scheurer-Kestner, "and I will proclaim it on the house-tops."
"He is guilty," said the General. "Prove it to me," he replied. And General Billot said, "I cannot."

12. But instead of making inquiries General Billot no sooner bade his old friend farewell than he turned upon Scheurer-Kestner a deluge of insults and abuse in the organs of the War Office.

nce

nt.

ing

ers

ich

ce,

he

In

of

as rt:

le-

ıg.

as ith

ce.

ur

rk

ct.

de

to nis a

es

ck

or

he

on

rs

ris

es

rte

ie,

m

ch

ıs,

at

ce

n.

e.

at

ot

of

er-

g,

al

to

he

13. So the appeal to the Government of France and to General Billot, Minister of War, had failed, and the time for the appeal to the nation was nigh at hand.

14. As his reply to the abuse showered upon him in the press, Scheurer-Kestner wrote to the Matin: "I am convinced of Dreyfus's innocence, and more than ever I am resolved to pursue his rehabilitation."

CHAPTER VII.—ESTERHAZY.

I. It was in September, 1897, that Scheurer-Kestner saw General Billot, and in October of the same year M. de Castro, the stockbroker of Esterhazy, was startled by discovering the identity of the writing of the bordereau with the handwriting of his client.

2. On November 7, 1897, M. de Castro took Esterhazy's letter to Scheurer-Kestner, which confirmed him more and more in the conviction that Esterhazy was the man.

3. When news of this double identification reached M. Mathieu Dreyfus, he hastened to publish it to the world. On Nov. 15, 1897, he wrote to the papers a letter addressed to General Billot naming Esterhazy as the author of the bordereau, and challenging him to prosecute the real traitor.

4. As matters were now becoming warm, Colonel Schwarzkoppen, whose "man" was now publicly identified, deemed it expedient to quit Paris and return to

Berlin.

5. The publication of Dreyfus's letter was the signal for action all along the line. Ferocious denunciations against the Jews and all who supported Dreyfus filled the papers which the French masses read, and it became an article of faith that the Jews had formed a syndicate with millions at its back for the purpose of corrupting the press and liberating the traitor.

6. That was one response to the accusations of Esterhazy; but as it was insufficient, the forgery factory at the War Office became busier than ever.

CHAPTER VIII.-THE STRANGLING OF FORGER NO. I.

r. Picquart, the man who had begun everything, was still at large. To draw the toils more tightly round him Du Paty de Clam, with the aid of Esterhazy, manufactured two bogus telegrams, which were written so as to imply treason.

2. One dated November 10th ran thus—"Stop Bon Dieu. All is discovered. Affair very serious. Speranza." The other was thus worded—"They have proof that the bleu was fabricated by Georges. Blanche."

3. Picquart's name in one of the telegrams was spelt as Esterhazy spelled it, without the "c," and as no one knew of the petit bleu but Esterhazy and the War Office, Picquart recognised the source of the forgeries and returned to Paris to expose the fraud.

4. At the same time that Du Paty de Clam and Esterhazy were sending these bogus telegrams to Picquart, General de Boisdeffre sent one of his aides de camp to communicate to M. Rochefort that the secret dossier contained seven letters written by Dreyfus to the Kaiser Wilhelm, and one, the contents of which he disclosed, by the Emperor Wilhelm to Dreyfus. All this duly appeared in L'Intransigeant, December 13.

(Photograph ly Gerschel.)

Now all these letters were forgeries, nor has anyone ventured to produce them in any of the trials which have taken place.

6. On the same day that this lie about the Emperor appeared, Lemercier-Picard forged a bogus letter signed "Otto," which was supposed to be addressed to Esterhazy's mistress, complaining of her "exigence" and stating that she had not handed over all the documents mentioned in the bordereau.

7. This he took to M. Reinach, a friend of Dreyfus, in the hope that he would buy it for use as evidence against Esterhazy, who would then be vindicated by an exposure of the forgery.

8. But M. Reinach refused to fall into the trap. Then Picard, not caring to make no money over the venture, photographed the letter, and forging Reinach's writing, wrote "Copié" on it in the corner, and then carried it of to M. Rochefort, swearing that Reinach had paid him 10,000 francs to forge this document as evidence against Esterhazy.

9. M. Rochefort bought the forgery and published it with many comments in the Intransigeant. For this, however, he was prosecuted by M. Reinach, who exposed the whole fraud and had M. Rochefort sent to gaol.

Io. But when a conspirator takes to cheating his fellowconspirators he goes too far. With this exposure it was felt the career of Lemercier-Picard should close. So he was found strangled one morning in his own apartment.

CHAPTER IX.—"NOT THIS MAN, BUT BARABBAS!"

1. When in October Esterhazy learned that his share in the bordereau was discovered, he went to Colonel

Schwarzkoppen, to whom he had delivered so many secret documents. 2. And he said unto him, revolver in hand, "I will kill either you or myself unless you will go to Madame Dreyfus and declare that you have dealt with her husband and not with me-Esterhazy."

3. Esterhazy was livid, haggard, and in abject terror. Colonel Schwarzkoppen refused his request but promised not to betray him.

4. Esterhazy then wrote a letter to himself signed "Speranza," which purported to be from a non-existent mistress of Colonel Picquart's, who professed a great desire to save Esterhazy from a conspiracy to ruin him by a gang of whom Picquart was the chief. This letter was promptly deposited in the archives of the War Office

5. When the prospect of trouble arose over the bordereau Esterhazy threatened to expose Du Paty de Clam, who had written him compromising letters, unless he secured his acquittal.

6. Under this threat of the blackmailer, Du Paty de Clam abstracted from the secret dossier the document referring to "ce canaille de D-," instructing him to return it to the War Office, pretending that it was given him by an unknown woman.

7. This was done. Du Paty promptly invented the story that this document had been abstracted from the dossier by Picquart, whose mistress, having compassion on Esterhazy, abstracted it in her turn and handed it over to Esterhazy.

8. A telegram was therefore sent from the War Office to Picquart in Tunis asking him if he had not allowed a secret document to be stolen from him by a woman.

9. Picquart having denied this, it was necessary to manufacture evidence in support of the story. Esterhazy invented an elaborate story of how he received the document from a veiled lady on Alexander III. Bridge, and to support it got his young cousin to write out at his dictation two imaginary letters from this imaginary female making the appointment.

10. In order to explain the identity of his handwriting with that of the bordereau he invented the theory that Dreyfus had traced the bordereau from Esterhazy's writing, and in order to support this hypothesis, he invented a romance to explain how Dreyfus might possibly have obtained some of his MSS.

11. As for the petit bleu found in the German Embassy with its damning evidence of Esterhazy's communications with the Germans, the forgers at the War Office promptly explained it away as a forgery of Colonel Picquart's.

12. A judicial inquiry into the charge against Esterhazy was ordered by his confederates for the express purpose of springing the charge of forgery (and purloining secret documents) on Colonel Picquart.

13. The plot was carried through. Esterhazy was triumphantly and unanimously whitewashed.

Picquart was arrested and thrown into gaol.

14. "Not this man, but Barabbas!" The Gentile after nineteen centuries had repeated the crime of the Jew.

CHAPTER X .- M. ZOLA'S "J'ACCUSE."

1. But the Affaire Dreyfus would not "down." The apotheosis of Esterhazy and the arrest of Picquart was followed by the publication of the scathing impeachment of the War Office and its myrmidons, which M. Zola published in the Aurore.

2. M. Zola's position and the tremendous energy of his onslaught compelled the Government to order his prosecution, by which means the Affaire was at last brought before a Court of Law.

3. The prosecution was, however, limited to the single passage in the Letter of Accusation, in which M. Zola declared Esterhazy had been acquitted by order. All reference to the case of Dreyfus was ruled out as belonging to une chose jugée.

forge

£,6,00

meme

I.

profo

succe

also 1

revisi baulk

2.

3.

forgir

milita

exclu

said,

cell th

that canne

accus

with '

army

when

no ot

the o

resign

Cour

6.

5.

4. Picquart was tried and found guilty by a secret court of communicating Gonse's letters to his lawyer.

He was sentenced to dismissal from the army

5. When M. Zola was tried, General de Pellieux appealed to the jury to save their sons in the army from the butchery which would follow, if the prestige of these generals was impaired, and General de Boisdeffre threatened the retirement of the Chiefs of the Army if M. Zola was acquitted.

6. To extort a verdict M. de Pellieux produced the despatch which Lemercier-Picard had forged at the dictation of Henry, in which a foreign military attaché was made to avow his determination to deny his relations with this Jew Dreyfus.

7. All cross-examination on this document was forbidden, M. Zola was condemned, and M. Meline's speech threatening special legislation to suppress the agitation in favour of Dreyfus was placarded by vote of the Chamber in every Commune in France.

8. M. Zola however appealed to the Court of Cassation, which on April 2nd, 1898, quashed the verdict on the ground of technical illegality. A new trial was ordered, but M. Zola allowed judgment to go by default, left the country and remained for some months in England.

CHAPTER XI.—THE THROAT-CUTTING OF FORGER NO. 2.

1. Militarism had apparently triumphed over justice. To fill up the cup of iniquity to the brim it was necessary that the newly-elected Chamber of Deputies, with the Government at its head, should endorse the verdict.

2. On July 7th, 1898, M. Cavaignac, Minister of War, declared that Dreyfus had confessed his guilt, and to make assurance doubly sure, he produced the forged despatch written by Picard at Henry's dictation, in which Dreyfus was named as the traitor.

3. Amid enthusiastic applause 572 deputies against two voted that M. Cavaignac's speech with the lie about the confession and the forged despatch should be placarded in all the 36,000 communes of France.

4. Colonel Picquart wrote a letter pointing out that the despatch was a forgery, and as a reply he was arrested on the charge of showing Gen. Gonse's letters to his lawyer, for which he had already been dismissed from the Army.

5. But now the sluggish consciences of the German and Italian attaches who had bought the secret docu-ments were roused. Panizzardi the Italian published through Count Cassela the story of Esterhazy's guilt. The German and Italian Governments informed Cavaignac that the famous despatch which had procured the condemnation of M. Zola and the triumph in the Chamber was forged by Picard at the instance of Henry.

6. Cavaignac therefore subjected Henry to a crossexamination. Twelve times Henry solemnly swore he had not forged the despatch, but at the end he admitted his guilt, and confessed the forgery. He had "done it under orders for the good of the army."

7. Henry was arrested, and locked up in Mount Valerien, exclaiming "My conscience reproaches me with nothing. What I did I am ready to do again. It was for the good of the country and of the army.

8. Next day, after a long interview with an unknown officer, Henry was found dead in his cell, his throat cut from ear to ear. Whether he was suicided by order "for the good of the army," or whether he was murdered is a question not yet decided.

9. Henry was glorified by the press as a martyr. His forgery was merely "deceiving for the public good." And £6,000 was raised as a public subscription for a public memorial to the convicted forger.

ingle

Zola

as

ecret

yer.

ieux

rom

hese

effre

ly if

the

the

ché

ions

for-ech

tion

the ssa-

the

red.

the

. 2.

ice. ary the ar, to ged ich nst out ded the ted er, ny. an cured he nac onber SShe ted it int me It wn cut for

CHAPTER XII.—REVISION AT LAST.

I. Henry's confession and Henry's death created a profound impression. Cavaignac resigned, and was succeeded by General Zurlinden. General Boisdeffre also resigned.

2. M. Brisson, then Prime Minister, decided upon revision; but the War Office was not content to be baulked of its prey.

3. It was decided to prosecute Colonel Picquart for forging the petit blen. He was immured au secret in a military dungeon, from which even his counsel were excluded.

4. Before his disappearance, as he left the court, he said, "I would have people know, if there is found in my cell the rope of Lemercier Picard or the razor of Henry, that I have been assassinated—for a man like myself cannot for an instant think of suicide. I shall face this accusation erect and fearless, and with the same serenity with which I have ever met my accusers."

5. Esterhazy meanwhile having been removed from the army, together with Du Paty de Clam, left France and when in England repeatedly declared that he himself and no other wrote the bordereau.

6. In September, M. Brisson having decided to send the case to the Court of Cassation, General Zurlinden resigned; and on September 26th, 1898, the Supreme Court began to investigate the whole matter. 7. After prolonged inquiry the Supreme Court decided that Esterhazy wrote the bordereau, and that this constituted a new fact sufficiently grave to justify revision, which meant a new trial of the whole case.

8. Dreyfus was brought from the Devil's Isle and placed for trial, not with closed doors, before seven officers sitting as a Court Martial at Rennes. The trial began August 6, and at the date of writing had not yet concluded its sittings.

9. Four Ex-Ministers of War attended to declare their unshaken belief that Dreyfus was guilty, and four other Generals, Chiefs of the Army, swore the same thing. Of evidence in the English sense there has been none.

10. General Mercier put in with great flourish of trumpets a despatch alleged to have been written by Colonel Schneider, the Austrian Military Attaché, affirming the guilt of Dreyfus. This also turned out to be a forgery.

11. Du Paty de Clam avoided the witness box by pleading illness. He, however, communicated through General Mercier to General Chanoine a document about the Panizzardi telegram of 1894, so full of inaccuracies that General Chanoine would not use it.

12. At the moment of going to press the last word from Rennes is the evidence of a witness who deposed that he heard Colonel Henry say to M. Bertulus the day before his throat was cut: "Don't insist, I beg of you. Above all we must save the honour of the army. Leave me Esterhazy and let Du Paty de Clam blow out his brains."

13. "Above all the honour of the army." Was there

THE PUBLIC IN THE COURT AT RENNES.

ever a case in which "honour rooted in dishonour stood?"

M. BERNARD LAZARE.
(Author of "The Truth about the Dreyfus Affair.")

The foregoing narrative contains the leading outlines of the most remarkable story of scoundrelism in high places that has ever appalled the conscience of mankind. There are many forgeries not mentioned, but the above will suffice. The effect of this exposure as to the logical evolution of militarism somewhat resembles the way in which the cruelties of the Spanish Inquisition prejudiced the cause of the Roman Church in the sixteenth century.

of

dre

the

de

ma Gr

dia

de

im

It

ma

Sta

18;

the

nui

by

str

gre

so be

tha

me

me

the tho

the

wit

sibl

of who inc rev calcan WOI I pas illu can rest SO cha fror san whi ron wat For inva OWI

Militarism as revealed in the Dreyfus case involves the negation of individual responsibility. The soldier even in time of peace is not a man, but a bit of a machine. He is, as the Jesuits used to say, as a corpse in the hands of his superiors. In the army the only morality recognised is absolute obedience to the orders of the superior officers. Militarism is the modern Jesuitism. To lie, to forge, to kill, all these crimes are virtues if committed "by order." The Jesuit could at least argue that he placed his will in the hands of another in order to save the souls of men. Militarism demands an unconditional surrender of will and conscience merely to secure the efficiency of a great mechanism of human slaughter.

The result is before us. The worst man—the Henry, or the Du Paty de Clam—worms himself into the centre of the machine, and directs it for his own profit and the destruction of honest men.

As militarism is in France, so in its essence it is everywhere. Always the human unit loses his individuality in the ranks. Always the supreme morality is that of implicit, unreasoning obedience. Wherever there is absolute power there is always the possibility of absolute injustice. The question of the guilt or innocence of the individual weighs as nothing compared with the interest of the army. It is to the glory of France that she has produced citizens who have at least made a magnificent protest against a system which in other countries would have been impossible.

THE WAR OF THE FUTURE.

nkind.

above

ogical

vay in diced eenth

es the even chine.

nds of

sed is ficers.

ge, to rder."

vill in

men:

f will great

ry, or tre of

d the

every-

ity in

at of e is solute of the terest

e has ficent

vould

THE appearance of the English abridged translation of M. Bloch's great work, which more than anything else drew the attention of European statesmen to the evils of the Armed Peace, seems an appropriate seal on the deliberations of the Conference of the Hague. The material for this abridgment ("Is War Impossible?" Grant Richards, 63.) is largely drawn from the sixth volume of the "War of the Future," which summarised M. Bloch's contentions; and it contains more than a hundred diagrams and plans. The volume is divided into two parts, the first dealing with the effect of military and naval developments, and the second treating of the economic difficulties which M. Bloch contends have made war an impossibility. For war, he says, is impossible not only tactically and strategically, but economically and morally. It is tactically impossible because of the vast advance made in armaments. Leaving all questions of rapid fire out of consideration, the 6 mil. rifle adopted in the United States is ten times more powerful than the Mauser of 1871. In 1877 the soldier carried eighty-four cartridges; the 5 mil. rifle will enable him to carry three times that number, and the adoption of a 3 mil. rifle will enable him to carry five hundred and seventy-five cartridges. The power of artillery fire has increased to such a degree that by this means alone armies eight times as great as could be placed in the field might be exterminated. War is strategically impossible, because armies have become too great to handle and to feed, because frontiers are fortified so strongly that superiority of speed in mobilisation will be neutralised, because of the equality of the forces that would be placed in the field in a great European struggle, and because retreat under modern conditions means accession of strength, while every mile advanced means dimunition and danger. War is economically impossible because none of the great Powers, with the exception of Russia and Austria, can feed, not alone their armies, but even their populations, and those Powers could not terminate a war, being hampered by allies whose economic condition makes the continuance of a campaign impossible. The Powers with the greatest surplus of food are also those with the least financial resources. It is morally impos-sible, because modern armies will be composed largely of half-trained reserves, commanded by retired officers who will have forgotten their duties; because peasants and artisans have not the morale, the stamina, or the incentives of the trained soldiers of the past, and because revolutionary doctrines-both humanitarian and anarchical-have so eaten into the social life of Western Europe, that the misfortunes of a prolonged-even a successfulcampaign would call forth such internal convulsions as would make its continuance impossible.

Decisive battles, M. Bloch considers, are a thing of the past, and he brings up all his armament of statistics and illustrations to prove that this is so. But when battles cannot be decisive, how can wars? Artillery duels will result in mutual extermination; and defence has become so strong that direct attacks are impossible, while a change of posts will equally forbid successful defenders from attacking in turn. A zone of death a thousand paces wide will separate the combatants, across which no living thing can pass; and all the clash and romance of battle will be replaced by days of intolerable watching and endurance, which can have no result. Fortresses and immense entrenched camps will delay invaders for weeks, till the defending side, operating in its own country, will be reinforced.

M. Bloch examines minutely all the plans of campaign which have been advocated in the event of a struggle between the Dual and Triple Alliances, and comes to the conclusion that while both coalitions are safe in a defensive war, neither can enter upon a campaign of invasion—even after repelling an attack—with any prospect of success. Such a war, therefore, could only be ended by exhaustion; but since this exhaustion would be general, it would no more decide the quarrel than the battles gained and fortresses captured. The strategical results of the struggle would be nil. Even in the event of conclusive defeat, Russia could fall back upon the immensity of her territory and her vast resources of population and food, while Germany, if beaten, might restore the lost provinces to France, and thereby ensure her neutrality. In fact, no conceivable strategical combination could bring about a decisive result. And long before any results could be obtained, starvation and internal commotions on the one side and national bankruptcy on the other must end the

The position of England, M. Bloch considers, is by no means guaranteed by her refusal to adhere to either of the Continental alliances; and a chapter devoted to the Economic Difficulties of England in Time of War show that his apprehensions have some justification. The interruption of maritime communications and the closing of Continental markets will affect disastrously, even fatally, the industries and feeding of her population. The real interest of England is not only to preserve peace with all the Continental Powers, but to do her best to foster amity between them. M. Bloch does not believe that the British fleet is a guarantee of England's economic safety; and this, not because it is not strong enoughhe admits it is overwhelming-but because a dozen cruisers let loose on the seas would do more damage than any naval victory could repair. He even goes so far as to say that attempts at revolution are probable in England. Russia alone, he says, has nothing to fear from revolutionary propaganda. Her landless proletariat is inconsiderable, and the communal system ensures the cultivation of her land when most of her ablebodied population shall have been summoned to the colours. But in Germany, Austria, and France, where from thirty-eight per cent. to forty-nine per cent. of the agriculturists must serve in the ranks, the fields will remain uncultivated, and the population which, even in times of peace, is largely dependent on foreign supplies, must starve.

M. Bloch declares that the military profession has declined as a source of honour, and is now regarded as an arduous and thankless occupation by soldiers themselves. The modern officer is the worst remunerated of all men considering the educational qualifications which are demanded of him, and the tedious duties he has to perform. It is true that these drawbacks existed in the past; but they were counterbalanced by the glamour of a life of action and the consideration given to fightingmen in society. The modern soldier gets neither glory nor profit. Few believe in the possibility of war and none desire it. For the first operation in every battle will be the killing off of the officers. M. Bloch, who has obtained the views of many officers of different nationalities, found a general conviction that few would escape. With a smokeless field of battle, modern accuracy of fire, the necessity for showing example to the rank and file, and the rule of killing off all the officers first, there is little chance of any returning home uninjured.

Photograth by L. Forbech.]

MR. LUND.

(President of the Interparliamentary Conference.)

have war whappe month manist to foothe so the I outsid maint But o has bein suc just e one w entire for th or ma the p anyth It ma the T incide accou it affo Sor article series The t waste and use o pitalit on go of int confir and g tage No ye crown that t nothin mode Kaise develo which they r essent more friend grams potent acqua by em Demo where well a

own

186

THE TOPIC OF THE MONTH.

A PLEA FOR INTERNATIONAL PICNICS.

INTRODUCTORY.

THE real Topic of the Month is, of course, the Dreyfus case; but this is dealt with in the Character Sketch. The second Topic is the effort which the Jingoes have been making to force on an utterly unjustifiable war with the Transvaal. Nothing fresh, however, has happened in relation to that Topic within the last month. We have only a more clear and discreditable manifestation of the determination of our war party to force on hostilities at any cost, and we have at the same time a welcome demonstration of the anxiety of the Dutch of South Africa, both in the Transvaal and outside, to make such concessions as are necessary to maintain peace and secure tranquillity in South Africa. But over and above the political topics of the day there has been, as there always is in August, but more especially in such a hot month as that through which which we have just emerged, the great topic of holiday-making. Everyone who can go has gone out of town, political life is entirely suspended, and editors and legislators, who are for the rest of the year employed in manufacturing copy or making material for the same, are scattered throughout the pleasure resorts of Europe, endeavouring to think of anything in the world excepting the Topics of the Month. It may not, therefore, be altogether unseasonable if as the Topic of the Month I were to deal with one notable incident which took place early in the month, not on account of its intrinsic importance, but for the suggestion it affords as to what might be done in the future.

Some years ago in this REVIEW I began a series of articles on "The Wasted Wealth of King Demos," a series the publication of which has been suspended. The title at least suggests that King Demos has many wasted opportunities as well as much wasted wealth, and one of the opportunities which he wastes is the use of the ordinary simple, time-honoured rites of hospitality as a means of good fellowship and keeping on good terms with his neighbours. Hitherto, the rites of international hospitality have been almost entirely confined to monarchs. Emperors and kings, princes and grand dukes have in every age known the advantage of keeping up the practice of neighbourly calls. No year passes without one or more notable visit by a crowned head to a brother sovereign. It is idle to say that these visits are mere matters of ceremony, signifying nothing, they form an essential part of the mechanism of modern government. No doubt on many occasions the Kaiser, Tsar or king may not enter into any treaties or develop any change of policy when they pay the visits which are so diligently chronicled in the newspapers, but they may be none the less useful on that ground. It is essential that the ruler of a modern State should be in more or less personal and sympathetic touch with his friends and neighbours. Not all the apparatus of telegrams, telephones, ambassadors and special plenipotentiaries can do away with the need of personal acquaintance. But although this principle is recognised by emperors and sovereigns, the representatives of King Demos have never taken it to heart. Even in England, where we have the advantage of a monarchy as well as parliamentary institutions, the example of our own Sovereign has failed hitherto to impress this truth upon the minds of our people. Nevertheless I make bold to say that the time is coming, if it is not even now at our doors, when the House of Commons will consider the making of due provision for the exercise of the rites of international hospitality as one of the duties of the State which should not be confined to the visits of Shahs, Ameers, and Sultans. In other words, as kings entertain kings, so should the elected representatives of the people show hospitality to each other. Parliaments should entertain Parliaments, members of Reichstags and Chambers of Deputies should meet on the same friendly footing round the hospitable board as the sovereigns whose power they have largely inherited. This is no Utopian dream. A beginning has already been made towards its realisation, and it is because the time seems peculiarly propitious for such a development that I devote these pages to a special appeal to all those who may be regarded as leaders of public opinion in this country and on the Continent in order to give greater development to a germ which has already given good promise of vigorous

There is a danger that a certain austere school among the representatives of the people may resent an appeal to the pleasures of the table as unworthy the high standard of virtue which should be maintained by civilised men. Nevertheless, such pedants of political purism will do well to consider what happened at the Hague. There were representatives gathered together expressly for the purpose of arriving at a friendly solution of the great problems endangering peace. They were well-disposed, and by common consent there never was any assemblage of diplomatists gathered together in Europe where the element of personal jealousy and national rivalry was so conspicuously absent. Nevertheless, it is a fact that the Conference at the Hague would never have arrived at a satisfactory result but for the fact that the delegates were constantly meeting each other at luncheon and at dinner. Not only was the mid-day meal provided for the members of the Conference by the hospitality of the Dutch Government at the Huis ten Bosch, but one at least of the delegations made a special point of utilising the rites of hospitality as a means of overcoming differences which threatened to render their deliberations abortive. Whenever a very knotty question was coming on, this delegation was in the habit of inviting those members of the Conference whose opposition was regarded as most dangerous to lunch or to dine, and it was invariably found that when people were eating and drinking and smoking together they were in a much better mood to appreciate the virtues of a compromise than they were when assembled in the committee-room. All people, plenipotentiaries included, are very human, and food and drink have been recognised from time immemorial to be potent contributors to the development of friendly intercourse. Everyone recognises this in private life. Why should we any longer refuse to recognise it in the affairs of nations?

The need for introducing something of this element into the relations of peoples led to the formation some years ago of the Interparliamentary Conference which in the first days of August assembled in the city of Christiania. The meeting was one of the most successful of those which have been held since the formation of the Conference, and deserves a little more than a passing notice. It may be regarded as one of the most notable incidents of the holiday season, and although the cynic may sneer at the Conference at Christiania as little more than an international picnic and cosmopolitan junketing party, it is precisely because it was both an international picnic and a junketing party that it supplies such an opportune text for the preceding observations.

I.-FROM THE HAGUE TO CHRISTIANIA.

It was when I was lunching with Mr. Konow, one of the Norwegian delegates at the Hague, that the suggestion was first made that I should attend the meeting at Christiania. Mr. Konow, himself a leading member of the Interparliamentary Couference, strongly pressed upon me the importance of going to Christiania in order to report what had been done at the Hague. He said that there was some reason to fear that some members of the Conference might be imperfectly informed as to what had been done, and that it was extremely important that some one should be there who could explain matters. At that time there was some hope that M. Descamps and M. Beernaert might have been able to go, but when the Conforence did not rise until July 29th it was evident that the Belgian delegates could not fulfil their original intentions. Affairs in Belgium were too serious, a ministerial crisis was brewing, and both M. Beernaert and M. Descamps were more needed at Brussels than they were at Christiania. Hence it came to pass that although not a member of the Conference-for no one can belong to it who has not held a seat at one time or another in some parliament-I was despatched as the only available messenger to bring the good news from the Hague to Christiania.

The journey from the capital of the Low Countries to the capital of the Scandinavian Highlands takes two days. In my case it unfortunately was lengthened by a blunder in taking the wrong train at Copenhagen; so that, although I left the Hague on Sunday night, I did not arrive at Christiania till Wednesday night, and missed the opening meeting of the Conference. The journey from the Hague to Hamburg calls for no notice. The country is flat and uninteresting, but after leaving Hamburg the real pleasure of the journey begins. From Hamburg to Kiel the line runs through a prettily wooded country, and the sea voyage from Kiel to Korsor is a welcome break when you can leave the cars and enjoy a sea breeze on a steamer which very seldom passes out of sight of land. From Korsor to Copenhagen is a run of two hours, and as in my case I was put on board the wrong train and went towards Berlin instead of Christiania, I traversed the whole of the island from north to south as well as from east to west. Denmark from a democratic point of view is one of the most interesting, if not the most interesting country in the world. At the time of my journey the little kingdom was witnessing the closing scenes of a great strike, which had lasted from the last week in May until the beginningof August. It was a great strike, and ought to have been watched by the press of the world with somewhat the same minute attention which is paid, let us say, to a frontier war. Capital and labour, organised to a point far in advance of anything that exists in Great Britain, challenged each other to a trial of strength. There is no necessity here for entering into the merits of the original dispute. Each side was thoroughly convinced that the issue justified a cessation of industry which led to two months' idleness on the part of 40,000 workmen. The population of Denmark is only 2,400,000, or about one twelfth of that of England. A strike of the same dimensions in this country would have involved a lock-out of half a million of men. In essence it resembled somewhat the old quarrel that was fought out in this country between the engineers and their employers. On one side it was believed that capital was striking at the existence and authority of the trade unions. On the other side it was asserted not less loudly that the unions were practically aiming at the destruction of the authority of the captains of industry. That is to say, the employers were no longer to be free to decide how many men they were to employ at a time on any specific job, and in other ways the indispensable liberty of the directing head was curtailed. Hence the great strike, which, after two months' privation and loss, was ended by a compromise in which both parties consider that they have gained results well worth the struggle.

The exact question at issue is of much less importance in the eyes of the outsider than the method in which the struggle was fought out. The dispute in Denmark may be regarded as marking a very high standard in industrial war. There were forty thousand men on strike, or locked out, chiefly in and about Copenhagen, yet there was not a single case of violence of any kind reported by the police, nor was the percentage of cases of drunkenness and disorder higher than that of a normal season of industry. In fact, the whole cost of maintaining the forty thousand out of work was borne either by the men themselves, their unions, or their sympathisers. The presence of this vast mass of unemployed did not increase by a single farthing the charge upon the poor rates of the city. Precedents for this may be cited in the case of English industrial disputes. But what was quite new and original was the use which was made by the men on strike of their leisure. Usually in this country when workmen are either on strike or locked out the very last thing that they think of doing is utilising their period of enforced leisure by intellectual study. In Copenhagen, however, the fact that forty thousand men were left with the whole working day on their hands without any occupation suggested the opportunity of utilising their leisure for purposes of study. Denmark has long been famous for the fraternal feeling which exists between all classes, and not less famous for the vigorous and successful efforts which have been made by the university for the purpose of raising the popular level of intelligence. Hence it is not very surprising, although it is very gratifying to know that shortly after the dispute broke out a series of what we would call University Extension Lectures were organised in the halls of Copenhagen, which were attended by the men on strike. These lectures were supplemented by visits which were paid to the museums and at collections of the capital under the guidance of qualified students. Thus the two months' cessation of manual labour was utilised so as to afford the workmen an opportunity for mental culture such as they would never otherwise have enjoyed.

Leaving Copenhagen, which is afflicted with a plague of rats, which even the slaughter of ten thousand a week seems unable to abate, the train carried us along the Sound northward to Elsinore. It rather jars upon the traveller to find the scene of Hamlet's midnight interviews with the ghost resonant with the clang of hammers, for Elsinore is now a great shipbuilding port, and the castle is quite dwarfed by the great iron hulls which are growing up on the adjacent stocks. I crossed the Sound fast asleep in the Swedish sleeping carriage, which was me fir co

tak

tha

of

and fro

mo

on rai

the

edi Cle

fro

ex

pa

the

tha

all

yo

in flu

mi clo mi th we th

ut one same ved a nce it tht out loyers. ing at On the unions hority loyers men b, and ecting , after com-

have tance which mark rd in trike, there ed by nkenon of g the men The not poor ed in was made this cked loing intelfact vhole ation e for s for and forts pose it is now what d by nted llecified

an ever ague reek the the iterers.

nual

the are und was

Photograph by Lindahl. PANORAMIC VIEW OF CHRISTIANIA FROM ST. HAUSHAUGEN.

taken aboard the ferry boat with so little disturbance that I never woke until I found myself close to the town of Gothenburg, where we breakfasted, changed carriages, and took the train for Christiania. The railway journey from Gothenburg to Christiania runs through a beautiful mountainous country closely resembling that of Scotland, only that there are more lakes on either side of the railway in Scandinavia. The population is sparse, for the line runs mostly through forests and along by the edge of lakes shining bright and blue in the sunshine. Close by the invisible frontier which divides Norway from Sweden we dined. Here it was I had my first experience of the primitive Norwegian hospitality. You pay a couple of shillings for your dinner, and on entering the restaurant are allowed to help yourself to everything that is going. The soup and fish and meat and sweets all stand together on a great central table, from which you can help yourself in such order as may seem good in your own eyes. Waiters are regarded as superfluous in Swedish railway restaurants, and there is a certain rough and ready ease about the arrangement which is totally different from that which prevails in any other railway restaurant in the world. Here we first came across the red and white wild strawberries, served with abundance of milk, and here also they supplied coffee without making an extra charge, a custom which might be imitated nearer home. At last, towards the close of a long, hot day, the train began to skirt the edge of the fiord upon which Christiania stands, A few minutes more and we are at the station, in time to reach the Victoria Hotel just as the last of the invited guests were taking carriage for the Prime Minister's banquetthe first of a series of entertainments with which Norway welcomed her visitors from afar.

II.—THE INTERPARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE.

The Interparliamentary Conference, which met this year at Christiania, owes its origin to Mr. W. R. Cremer, whose services on behalf of international arbitration have never been adequately recognised, least of all by his own countrymen. Mr. Cremer some years ago visited Washington as an emissary from the friends of arbitration in the British Parliament. The good results which followed his mission attracted so much attention, that when he was in Paris a year or two later, M. Goblet, then French Foreign Minister, asked him for information on the subject, and suggested whether it was not possible to arrange for a periodical meeting of the friends of peace in the Parliaments of England, France, and America. M. Passy, the veteran friend of French peace societies, cordially supported this suggestion; and as a result the Interparliamentary Conference was born in the year 1888. The first Parliamentary Conference was held in 1889. It was limited to British Members of Parliament and French Deputies and Senators. Its object was defined as that of ensuring the maintenance of the peaceful relations between Great Britain, the United States and France, and its further object was the preparation of treaties of arbitration between these three nations. At this Conference M. Passy presided, and seven countries were represented. In 1890 the Conference met in London, under the presidency of Lord Herschell, when the representatives of eleven different parliaments met together, and in 1891, when the third Conference was held in Rome, no fewer than seventeen States were represented. That is the highest number that has ever been represented until this year at Christiania, when eighteen different parliamentary groups assembled under the presidency of Mr. John Lund. The essential principle of the Interparliamentary Conference is that it is a conference of persons who have been or who are members of the legislatures of the different States to which they belong. No one is eligible to belong to an interparliamentary group if he is not in favour of international arbitration, and is willing to use his influence in the assembly to which he belongs for the purpose of promoting international arbitration, and securing the extension of the domain of international law. The organisation and constitution of the Interparliamentary Conference were drawn up at the Conference held at the Hague in 1894. They were modified at Christiania this year so as to enable the representatives of non-parliamentary Powers to be admitted to the Conference. This change was brought about in response to an appeal from the Government of Russia. When the Conference met in Buda Pesth in 1896, M. Basili, who was then Russian Consul-General in Hungary, asked to be allowed to attend, which raised a difficulty, for the Conference was exclusively composed of representatives of the parliaments of the world, and as Russia had no parliament his application could not be acceded to. He was however allowed to be present at the Conference, and it was largely due to the impression produced upon his mind that he brought the subject of arbitration and diminution of armaments before the attention, first of Prince Lobanoff, and then of Count Muravieff when he was promoted to the Russian Foreign Office. At Christiania it was decided to allow representatives of non-parliamentary Powers to become members of the Conference if they had credentials from their Governments. Each parliamentary group organises itself as it pleases in its own country, but the associated groups meeting together at the Conference have established a central bureau at Berne, whose duty it is to make arrangements for the summoning of the annual Conference, and generally to serve as a medium of intercommunication between the various parliamentary groups through the rest of the year when the Conference is not in session. The following is a list of the places where the Interparliamentary Conference has held its sittings, the number of countries represented, and the presidents :-

Date.	Place.				Countries r.presented.					Presidents.
1889		Paris				6				M. Passy.
1890		London				11				Lord Herschell.
1891		Rome				17				M. Biancheri.
1892		Berne				12				Dr. Gobat.
1893	No	Conference.
1894		Hague				15				Senator Rahusen.
		Brussels				14				M. Descamps.
1896		Buda Pesth				15				M. von Szilagyi.
		Brussels								M. Beernaert.
1898	No	Conference.
1899		Christiania			6	,18				M. Lund.

It will be seen that the Conference has met every year with the exception of 1893 and 1898. In 1893 there was no Conference because a political crisis had broken out in Norway which rendered it impossible to meet as was intended at Christiania. In 1898 it was proposed to meet in Lisbon, but when the date was fixed it was found that so very few members could atter d the Conference that it was declared off. It was therefore only the ninth Conference which was held at Christiania this year, and it was the first time the members had assembled for two years. The following is a list of the parliamentary states which were represented at Christiania, together with the number of members who were present:—

Austria .			15	Norway		47
Belgium				Portugal		2
Denmark				Roumania		12
France .			17	Servia		2
Germany			50	Spain		1
Greece .			3	Sweden		19
Great Brit				Switzerland		2
Hungary			30	The Netherlands
Italy .			32	United States .

Photograph by Worm-Petersen.]

(Christiania

THE MEMBERS OF THE NINTH INTERPARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE COMING UP THE CHRISTIANIA FIORD ESCORTED BY NORWEGIAN MEN-OF-WAR.

ıtl

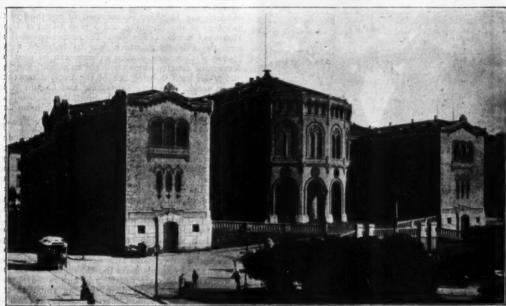

nutl

ti

tl

The figures are not quite correct. There were about three hundred members from all nations assembled in the Storthing. These three hundred members were in many cases accompanied by their wives. Possibly onethird of them had either wives, or sisters, or daughters travelling with them. England was very inadequately represented at Christiania. Parliament was still sitting. the position of affairs in the Transvaal did not seem at all calculated to encourage members to leave St. Stephens to attend an Interparliamentary Conference on the Continent, and hence there was a mere handful of the English parliamentary group, which at one time had as many as one hundred and seventy members. The Hon. Philip Stanhope, who has been one of the most indefatigable members of the Conference since its foundation, was there; so was Mr. Burt. Mr. Cremer, Mr. Agg Gardner, and Mr. Byles represented the ex-M.P. contingent; while group, but by the whole parliament and people of Norway. can only hope that when the Conference meets in London, as it ought to do in 1901, its reception will be as thoroughly national as that which the Norwegians gave to the Conference in 1899. The committee of organisation includes the Ministers of Public Works, the Director General of the Norwegian Railways, of the Mail Steamships, and various other representative persons who were able to place the whole disposal of the resources of Christiania and of the Storthing at the disposal of their guests. Christiania is splendidly situated at the head of a beautiful fiord which is the ocean vestibule of the Most of the Continental de'egates arrived by steamer from Copenhagen. When their coming was signalled, the President of the Conference, Mr. John Lund, accompanied by all the officials and members of the Storthing as well as by those other members of the

THE STORTHINGIT, CHRISTIANIA: NORWEGIAN PARLIAMENT HOUSE.

among the members present were Mr. John Lough, Dr. Clark, Mr. John Wilson, and Mr. Schwann.

III.—NORWEGIAN HOSPITALITY.

The great feature of the Conference was not its political resolutions or the alterations which it made in its organisation. Its essential characteristic was the opportunity which it afforded for the exercise of the rites of hospitality on an international scale. The Conference has been entertained royally in many capitals, but nowhere with more cordiality and hospitality than at Christiania. The Storthing voted £2,000 for the purpose of making provision for the reception of the guests. Mr. John Lund, President of the Lagthing, and his fellow presidents of the Storthing and Odelsthing, formed the bureau of the Norwegian Parliamentary group, and from first to last every member of the Conference was made to feel that he was being received not by a parliamentary Conference who had already assembled, steamed down the fiord in gaily decorated steamships to meet their expected guests. But they did not go alone. To the unutterable scandal of some Conservative old fogies the whole Norwegian fleet was directed to accompany the president. It was not a large fleet. There was a battleship, a cruiser, and a gunboat, but it sufficed to add the missing element to the official reception of the Storthing. When the Danish steamship hove in sight and greetings were exchanged, a royal salute was fired from the warships, and the members of the Interparliamentary Conference found themselves received with more cannon thunder than has ever been spent in welcoming the emissaries of peace. Mr. Baijer, the President of the Danish Peace Society, one of the delegates at the Conference, was much too austere a man to tolerate the use of ironclads even for the purpose of welcoming an Interparliamentary Conference. He therefore travelled overland, and reached hell.

husen

agyi.

year

as no

Nor

led at

sbon, y few clared which time ollow-epre-nbers

eri.

DS.

rt.

Photograph by Szacinski.]

[Christiania.

MR. STEEN.

(Norwegian P.ine Minister.)

Christiania by rail without being insulted by the roar of cannon. The rest of the delegates, however, liked it extremely, and one of them was heard to declare that it was the first time an ironclad was ever put to any good use in the world. The delegates in the steamer were then escorted by the Norwegian steamer and the ironclads up the ford. When they landed the whole garrison of the capital was under arms to receive them. Every street blazed with bunting, and an enormous multitude assembled to witness their arrival, and they were escorted through the streets to the Storthing by cheering thousands. Everything was done that could be done to make every visitor feel not only that he was at home, but that he was an honoured and welcome guest in the capital of Norway.

In the evening of their arrival the members of the Conference and all those who accompanied them, including Baron and Baroness Suttner, M. Bloch and others, were officially welcomed at a concert given in their honour in the park of St. Haushaugen.

The next day the Conference was formally opened by the Norwegian Prime Minister, Mr. Steen, who afterwards cntertained the members at dinner. Mr. Steen, the Prime Minister, is the head of the Liberals, who have for some time been waging a not unsuccessful campaign in favour of a further recognition of the right of Norway to an independent national existence.

The flag question is still under discussion; the consular question will probably be arranged, although it is rather difficult, and makes considerable havoc with recognised traditions for two consuls to be appointed in each port—one for Norway and one for Sweden. Norway having more than double the shipping of Sweden, feels that she has a claim to have her own consuls at seaports visited by vessels flying the Norwegian flag. The question is one for arrangement, and Mr. Steen and his followers in the Storthing are evidently determined to lose no chance of securing a decision in their favour.

But the man who was the heart and soul of the Conference was not Mr. Steen, the Prime Minister, but Mr. John Lund, the President of the Lagthing. The Norwegian Parliament consists of a single chamber called the Storthing, which divides itself for purposes of legislation and administration into two parts, the smaller of which, the Lagthing, is composed of one-third of the members of the Storthing, and acts as a kind of Upper House or Chamber of Revision. The remaining two-thirds form the Odelsthing, which may be regarded as the House of Commons, if such a phrase can be used in a democratic country which abolished its nobility long ago, and prides itself in being one of the freest democracies in the world. When the Odelsthing and Lagthing differ on any point, they reunite in Storthing, a two-thirds majority of which decides the point. Mr. John Lund was President of the Lagthing, and he was also President of the Interparliamentary Conference. Lund is a shipowner and merchant who has done a good deal in the way of developing the oversea trade of Norway. He was for many years Mayor of Bergen, which town he has represented in the Storthing for fifteen years, and is one of the most energetic and uncompromising of the Norwegian patriots. He is chairman of the Parliamentary Railway Committee, and has done good service in making the railway from Bergen to Christiania, which in five or six years will be ready for opening. When that time comes they hope for a daily steamship communication between Bergen and Newcastle. In old days Mr. Lund would have been described as a veritable steam-engine in breeches, but modern improvements make the old simile obsolete, and it would be more correct to describe him as a dynamo in broadcloth. Never was there such an embodiment of inexhaustible and almost feverish energy. From the first thing in the morning to the last thing at night he was always "on the go," working off an amount of human vitality perfectly frightful to contemplate. But even then he was not satisfied. "If only I could sleep," he explained, "I would be a giant," and this we could well imagine, for three hours of drowsy stupor which has often to be artificially induced is all the rest he can obtain out of the twenty-four. It was worth going to Christiania if for no other purpose than to meet Mr. Lund, whose effervescing energy, exceptional spirits and imperturbable good humour enabled him to permeate the whole of the Conference, making every member feel that he had in his president a kind host and a personal

The arrangements for the Conference were splendidly elaborated to the smallest detail. The Norwegian Parliament House was handed over with all its appurtenances to the members of the interparliamentary groups for their use. An admirable guide, copiously illustrated with portraits of the leading members of the Conference, was printed in French and Norwegian and distributed to all t the tion to u the was port able anti raily The and Swe pens the Cole duce and becalitsel. A method deal forturest of a promfollogation post

The most, the parmie

of thi

shou

Norw abroa Ev natur and durin feasib pensa Swed this i said stitute the p amou to ea Institu the r resolv the th

of na ology, In regard though what will wand la

by ma

establ

foreig

for the It he the car to be all the members. Never was there a more lavish use of the printing press for the purpose of distributing information, so as to enable every one to make their way about and to understand perfectly what was going on. Mr. Lund is the author of a popular history of Norway, a copy of which was given to every member as one of the contents of the portfolio, which contained among other things an admir-able, large size map of Norway. Almost every want was anticipated down to a time table of the Norwegian railways, and a directory to the best hotels in Christiania. The organisation committee arranged for the reception and the housing of the delegates, and the Norwegian, Swedish and Danish railways carried them free of expense over the whole of their lines, and even conveyed the wives of members at a considerably reduced tariff. Coloured maps were issued, which I regret I cannot reproduce here, showing the railway routes by which members should travel from the uttermost ends of the Continent and converge upon Christiania. Christiania, indeed, became for a moment the centre of Europe, and showed itself not unworthy of its distinguished position.

A good deal of curiosity had been expressed as to the method in which Mr. Nobel's famous legacy was to be dealt with. Dr. Nobel, of dynamite celebrity, left his fortune for public use, and one object to which the interest on the capital was to be devoted was the awarding of a lump sum to the person who had done the most to promote the cause of peace. It will be seen from the following extract from the report of the Norwegian delegation that the distribution of the Nobel bequest is postponed until 1901:—

This prize is to be awarded him or her that has laboured most, or in the best manner, to create a fraternal feeling among the peoples, who has laboured to abolish or to decrease standing armies, and to form or spread peace congresses. The awarding of this last prize rests with five men or women, elected by the Norwegian Storthing, and who may reside in Norway or abroad.

Every year a prize is to be awarded for the best work on natural philosophy, on chemistry, on physiology or on medicine, and for the best literary work published during the year. In order to make this feasible it has proved absolutely indispensable for the scientific institutions in Sweden to get the necessary assistance in this complicated task. In consequence of this it has been resolved to found, in the said four branches, so-called Nobel Institutes, to which every year one-fourth of the proceeds of the property will be employed, besides which, to start with, an amount of Kr. 300,000,00 will be allotted to each of the four Institutes. These Institutes being first of all necessary for the reason mentioned, it has also been resolved to develop not only these, but also the thought underlying the will of Nobel, by making these Institutes purely scientific establishments, where native as well as foreign scientists may labour in the spheres of natural philosophy, chemistry, physiology, etc.

In consequence of this it has also as regards the fifth group, that of peace, been thought desirable to make provisions somewhat similar to those mentioned. These will very likely be framed next winter, and laid before the Norwegian Storthing for their approval.

It has been thought that also, as regards the cause of peace, a Nobel Institute ought to be established here in Christiania, in the same manner as mentioned above, with a capital of Kr. 300,000.00 and with an annual subsidy of one-frurth of what devolves on this group, i.e., something like Kr. 50,000.00 a year. The primary object of this Nobel Institute would be in accordance with the provisions in the will of Dr. Nobel, viz., to labour for the creating of a fraternal feeling among the peoples. It has been thought this might best be done in this manner, that the Institute be made a central establishment for the study and scientific treatment and exposition of international law. Old and young scientists of every nationality would be admitted to this Institute and be assisted by the same in their inquiries, in writing their works, and in giving their lectures.

The first Nobel prize will be awarded in the year 1901, simultaneously with the founding of the Nobel Institute I have been referring to. The awarding of the prize will take place on December 10th, the date of Mr. Nobel's death, and he, or she, who during the immediately preceding years has done most for the brotherhood of the nations, will then get a prize of Kr. 150,000.00 together with a diploma, and a gold medal bearing the portrait of the testator.

Who will be selected as the first recipient of the Nobel peace bequest is not known. When the subject was first mooted the names of M. Passy, Mr. Cremer, and Baroness Suttner were mentioned as the most likely favourites, but as it will be seen the whole subject is still in abeyance till 1901.

The business of the Conference was chiefly social, as befits an occasion of international hospitality.

On Tuesday night a concert in the park, on Wednesday a dinner at the Prime Minister's, paved the way for the third great social function, given by the municipality of Christiania to the Conference on Thursday night. Those who are most familiar with civic festivities in the city of London would be the most surprised by the pleasant surprise which was prepared by the municipality of Christiania. Instead of meeting in the city they provided from 100 to 150 carriages and pairs to convey the members to a restaurant at Frognersveteren, some five or six miles from the town on one of the wooded heights, whence a magnificent view was obtained of the city of Christiania and the fiord on which it stands. It

Photograph by Worm-Petersen.]

Christiania.

THE OPENING OF THE CONFERENCE IN THE STORTHING BY MR. STEEN.

an

ular

ther

ised

rt-

ring

she

ited

n is vers

no

the

but

The

ber

s of

ller

the per irds

the

in a go,

cies

iffer

irds

und

also

Mr.

e a ade

en,

ing

and

is

and om

be

ope

gen een

but in in

of

the

ght of But

he 125

an

to

Mr.

nd

the

nat

nal

lly

an

ps ed

ce.

was a picnic on a mountain top, and young and old heartily threw themselves into the enjoyment of the party. In the interior of the banqueting hall waiters were provided in accordance with convention, but outside in the annexes the guests helped themselves in Norwegian fashion, and the fun was fast and furious. After the dinner was over the Mayor of Christiania, speaking in admirable English, proposed the health of the Conference, to which Mr. Stanhope replied on behalf of the English delegation. Then there was a little more speaking, but the company very soon adjourned to smoke over their coffee at the adjoining chalet. The scene was most picturesque. The day lingers long in these northern latitudes, and it was still a clear pleasant twilight when the long procession of carriages climbed down the mountain side and conveyed us home.

The following night we had another great function in the shape of a dinner given by the Norwegian Parliamentary group to the members of the Conference in the Masonic Hall, which is one of the most remarkable buildings in Europe. Freemasonry, indeed, must flourish in Christiania for the brotherhood to be able to rear and to use so stately a pile of masonry. The spacious dining hall was crowded, the music was varied and choice, but the great attraction of the banquet was the presence of Mr. Björnstjerne Björnson, who was the most conspicuous figure at the head of the table. Mr. Björnson, although nearing seventy, retains all the vigour and fervour of youth. He spoke with immense vehemence, and with a voice which hurtled down the tables to the extremity of the room, evoking from time to time enthusiastic cheers. He was the only speaker who had a chance. The only custom in Norway which is distinctly bad is that by which they begin public speaking before the dinner is half finished. The result is a very disagreeable dilemma. eating is suspended, in which case the dinner gets cold, or the speaking is inaudible owing to the clatter of knives and forks. After Mr. Björnson had delivered his speech in comparative quiet, Dr. Barth, of the Nation, one of the most influential of the German members, delivered his speech, which, although audible at first, was towards the close a matter of dumb show for all those who were not immediately within range of his powerful voice. After Dr. Barth things went from bad to worse. Count Apponyi, one of the tallest, handsomest, and most eloquent members from Hungary, was heard with difficulty. The climax, however, was not reached until, at the suggestion of some English friends, the President called upon me to speak. At least one-half of those who were present could not understand one word of English, and at least two-thirds were absolutely out of earshot; therefore they went on talking and eating regardless of loud cries of order. I stood silent and motionless, awaiting an opportunity, when a German delegate at the far end of the room sprang upon the table with a carving knife in his hand and began a vehement oration in fluent and somewhat strident German. I sat down and waited with amusement to see what would happen. On went the German, brandishing his carving knife as if it were a dagger, getting cheers from a few who were near enough to hear what he was saying, and being mistaken by many for Mr. Stead, the fluency and accuracy of whose German excited some remark! At last, in obedience to a peremptory summons from the chair, I went to the head of the table and stood in front of Mr. Björnson while some kind friend got hold of the carving-knife orator by the coat-tails and hauled him to the ground. In the momentary lull I succeeded in uttering one sentence, which was that I had never been accustomed to speak in a bear-garden, and that I certainly was not going to begin in Norway. Then the uproar broke out again, and, after uttering a sentence which Mr. Björnson told me he could not hear a word of although he stood immediately behind me, I sat down. After this it might have been hoped that we could have finished our dinner in quiet, but speeches followed in continuous succession. One good man whose heroism deserves note had his speech written out, and read it in a stentorian voice in the midst of a perfect babel of sound. Nobody heard a syllable, not even those in front of him, but we could see at intervals for about a quarter of an hour this worthy orator gesticulating with one hand and holding his notes with the other. On one occasion he lost his place, but, nothing daunted, he turned over the leaves again and started afresh. What he said and of what he was speaking no one knows. We began to understand how it was that the old Vikings used to kill missionaries who attempted to preach to them during their meals by hurling beef bones at their heads. It is a pity that the martyrdom of the missionaries did not lead to the relegation of speaking until after dinner-time. At last the banquet ended, and we all streamed out into the reception and smoking rooms, where we had music and singing, cigars and gossip in a dozen languages upon all subjects under heaven. Mr. and Mrs. Björnson were the observed of all observers. Mr. Ibsen, copiously decorated, was a conspicuous figure at the Prime Minister's banquet, but he was not present at the Freemasons' Hall. His son was there, and also a son of Mr. Björnson, who has just returned from China, and was full of interesting talk concerning the progress of events in that great empire. A workmen's chorus came in and sang Norwegian national songs, finishing up with Mr. Björnson's national anthem. Everything was homely and informal, and ample opportunity was afforded the delegates of the various nations meeting each other and talking over the difficulties which divide nations, or, still better, upon those common interests and objects which unite them. It was well on to midnight before the Masonic Hall was cleared of the last lingering guests.

We had to be up betimes next day, for on Saturday the excursion to Skien, the birthplace of Ibsen, started at seven, and we had a long day before us. A special excursion train ran from Christiania through Drammen, and then across a delightfully wooded country through which beautiful views of the fiords were caught from time to time on one side, while on the other the line ran for miles and miles past the edge of lovely lakes. Skien, which curiously resembles Lucerne, both in its church, its quay, and its location, was en fête to receive us. The Municipality entertained us to a luncheon in the civic buildings, when we had music, playing the various national hymns, "Rule Britannia" this time not taking the place of "God Save the Queen," and the "Wacht am Rhein " and the " Marseillaise " being played alternately in honour of Germany and France. After luncheon we hurried down to the wharf, where two steamers were lying to take us up the canal to see somewhat of the beauties of the Norwegian waterfalls, and the triumphs of Norwegian engineering. The boats were rather crowded. On one of them there was a band of music which played at intervals various national airs. It was a splendid day. It would have been rather hot had we not been on the water. We passed every now and then through dark gorges, partly artificial and partly natural, where the steamers were hoisted as by gigantic steps and stairs from one lock to another, until at last we found ourselves nearly two hundred feet above the

that I hen the sentence word of at down. ld have owed in heroism d it in a sound. of him. an hour nd and sion he over the and of egan to I to kill during It is a not lead ne. At into the sic and ipon all vere the corated, anquet, His son as just lk conire. A ational nthem. oppor-

day the reted at special ammen, chrough t from ine ran Skien, arch, its is. The e civic various nations

s which nterests

taking cht am rnately eon we s were of the iumphs rather music t was a ot had ow and partly igantic at last we the PEDRELANDSSANG.

"Ja vi elsker dette Landet"

af Björnstjerne Björnson

THE NORWEGIAN NATIONAL ANTHEM.

level of the sea. Seldom has there been a pleasanter excursion, or one in which everything combined better to increase the pleasure of the excursionists. At the great series of locks, which in rapid succession lifted the steamers a hundred feet, the spectacle of a huge steamer standing as it were half-way upstairs, above our heads, was unique, and added to the attraction of a scene which in natural beauty left nothing to be desired. The thunder of the waterfalls and the foam of the torrent as it hurled itself upon the rocks at the foot of the precipitous gorge reminded me of Niagara. The volume of water was no doubt much less; but I cannot convey the impression produced by the Norwegian falls better than by saying that it reminded me of Niagara, and did not suggest beverages on board the steamer. It was getting late, and even the summer day in Norway failed to hold out until we reached Skien. The sky was bright with stars when we passed through the last electric-lighted lock, which heralded our approach to Skien. It was midnight before we disembarked. All the town seemed to be waiting on the quay to receive us. After this those who were not dead-tired made their way to the church, where an audience of several hundreds listened to an organ recital by a famous local organist, after which, about one o'clock, we all went to bed. Next morning the steamer went back to Christiania, taking the whole company back by water. The excursionists stopped at Larvig, where there was a dinner at which an American delegate

Photograph by Worm-Petersen.]

CARRIAGES OF THE MEMBERS AT THE SUMMIT, FROGNERSVETEREN.

Christiania.

disparaging comparisons. At this waterfall we stopped, and, as the day was hot, there was an extensive consumption of beverages, but no food, which was reserved until the homeward journey. We then began a series of outdoor speeches, in which everybody proposed everybody else's health; then the Norwegian National Hymn was played, and played again and cheered; then we had eloquence in German and in French, with occasional interludes in English, every one doing his best to say the pleasantest things he could think of-the guests in honour of their hosts, and the hosts in honour of their guests. At last, after dallying an hour in this pleasantest and most romantic of all places, the company wound their way to another waterfall, below which the steamer took them aboard, and they began the homeward journey. Sandwiches were served with tea and coffee and other essayed to reply in German, but was requested by the Norwegians to use the language of his country, which they understood better than that of the Fatherland. It was after ten o'clock when we arrived at Christiania, thoroughly tired out, but having heartily enjoyed this excursion through a wonderland of nature. Not the least surprising thing was the vivacity of Senator Labiche, who after singing the "Marseillaise" an in-definite number of times to the accompaniment of the band, looked as gay and buoyant as Mr. Lund

Next year the Conference will meet in Paris. It is the year of the Great Exhibition, and the French Republic will no doubt do its utmost to welcome the representatives of the European parliaments with a hospitality worthy of the Third Republic. Whatever it may do, it will not

Gay mos succ

OU

gr

de

pa va to

of

wl

pa Wa by di

ru

th

fea In no ad de an Co by ex the dis Ch tw the are H tha it 1

gre fou dir the wil Th

hea

cre mo

Wi

in e

wo:

T tion

con

His

outdo in fervour the hospitality with which the Norwegians greeted the Conference in 1899.

ate,

out

tars

ock.

ight

be

who iere

gan

one

mer

any vig,

gate

the

ich

It

nia,

his

the

tor

in-

of

ind

the

olic

ves

of

ot

VIIM

IV.—THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE CONFERENCE.

The first day of the Conference was devoted to the delivery of speeches by the representatives of the various parliamentary groups reporting the progress made in the various countries, which, however, it is impossible even to summarise here; and the second day, after a discussion of the proposed adoption of the Swiss Military System, which was negatived, the constitution of the Interparliamentary Conference was modified, and then a very warm debate arose over some abstract resolutions proposed by a Pole, Mr. Lewakowski. This led to a considerable difference of opinion between the Germans who, as a rule, command the support of the English members, and the French, Italians, and Belgians. There was a fine feast of languages, but French and German predominated. In the end Mr. Lewakowski's proposition, amended if not revolutionised, was carried and the Conference adjourned. The third and final day of the sittings was devoted to a consideration of the work done at the Hague, and the subsequent policy of the Interparliamentary Conference. Mr. Philip Stanhope opened the proceedings by reading my Report, of which the following is a brief

I bring you glad tidings of great joy. If you did but realise the magnitude of the success which has been achieved you would be singing Te Deum Laudamus in the Cathedral, rather than discussing abstract propositions in the Storthing. For the Great Charter of the General Peace has been signed, and that which twelve months ago, as M. Descamps said, seemed to be beyond the hopes of all the Peace societies, has now been accepted by all the Powers in the world.

It is as if a miracle had been wrought before our eyes, but we are too dull to realise its significance. There may be some, even in this Interparliamentary Conference, who imagine that the Hague Conference has failed. I tell you with all earnestness that in the opinion of your members who took part in the work it was believed a success so brilliant that the triumph crowns the closing century with glory.

The Reglement Parifique of the Hague Conference is the first great International Law of Peace. It is more: it lays the foundation not only of Peace based upon Justice, it is the first direct definite step towards the Federation of Munkind

The starting-point of this new great International Charter is the formal declaration by all the Powers that henceforth they will use all their efforts to prevent war and to maintain peace. They then proceed to define the methods by which they will attempt to attain this end. [Which I then described under seven heads.]

That is the machine which the Conference at the Hague has created. It is for you to supply the steam which will make it

What our friends at the Hague bid me to say to you is this: Without your help in popularising the work which we have done in educating the peoples as to the new opportunities afforded for avoiding war, all our work will be in vain. The battle has been won. It is for you to secure the spoils.

The Conference then after debate unanimously passed the following resolutions :-

The Interparliamentary Conference having received information of the official text in the agreement, accepted by the conference at the Hague, is anxious to express immediately to His Majesty the Russian Emperor, the generous projector of this Conference, and to those princes, heads of States and Governments that have attached themselves to the Emperor, the most respectful congratulations on the excessively important and successful result which the Conference has obtained.

The Interparliamentary Conference is happy to find in it a fundamental acceptance of that scheme for the institution of an international court of arbitration which was adopted at the Conference in Brussels, 1896, and it is fully in the right to note with satisfaction that its labour has not been without utility for the resolution of the Hague Conference.

At the same time as it admits, in agreement with the President, M. de Staal, that the work of this Conference is not so perfect as we might have wished, the Conference regards it as a happy historical incident of enormous importance, and it trusts that this first step taken, the most difficult of all, together with the kind feelings of the Governments, which have found expression at the Hague on the part of most of their representatives and under the pressure of the public opinion which has been encouraged by this first result, shall secure the continued development of the new institutions.

With this aim in view, it offers its moral support, penetrated by the feeling that it is its duty to continue its work with doubled ardour after such an important result.

The Interparliamentary Conference requests its groups to u e their influence in the promotion of the following aims:—

(1) To prevail on their Governments to attach themselves to the peace-loving and humane resolution of the Hague Conference in so far as this adhesion has not yet taken place:

(2) To encourage their Governments to conclude treaties of arbitration with as many States as possible;

(3) To support the adhesion of those lands which were not represented to the agreement which was the resu't of the Hague Conference;

(4) To bring the result of the Hagu: Conference to the knowledge of the great body of the people, with the necessary explications and appreciations.

III.

As the Conference has only just now received information of the official text of the Hague Convention, it charges its permanent officer with the preparation of resolutions which may be laid before the next Conference in respect of the Hagu: Con-

It is obvious that here is an opening which promises much useful effort. If the various groups of Deputies and Members of Parliament who are in favour of international arbitration will undertake each in his own country to carry out the propaganda of education, we have the basis of a European movement the end of which it will be difficult to foresee. At Buda-Pesth the Interparliamentary Conference passed a resolution which committed the parliamentary groups definitely to undertake an active propaganda in order to popularise arbitration. They recommended that the members of the groups should be kept in touch with one another in order the better to realise their ideals. These groups should issue information as to their objects and aims, and should address special memorials to the Governments, drawn up from the point of view of their own country, pressing for the adoption of international arbitration,

The first thing to be done is to see what material we have in each country with which to work. In England we have in the House of Commons a muster roll which at one time had 170 names, but which does not now contain so many. In the House of Lords we have none at all. Now the first thing to be done is to get the parliamentary group in this country into effective working order. One of the chief difficulties with us is the fact that the Hon. Sec., Mr. Cremer, is not a member of the House of Commons, and the work which is to be done must be done in the House. Mr. Cremer has the entry to the lobby, but he has no love for St. Stephen's until he returns to it as a full-fledged member. It might be possible for Mr. Cremer to find some young Member of Parliament who would act as his assistant secretary, and who would also act as whip under Mr. Stanhope for the friends of international arbitration in the House of Commons. We have then to see what can be done in the way of organising a parliamentary group in the House of Lords. There are many peers who are quite as earnest in the cause of international arbitration as any members of the House of Commons, and as senators as well as deputies attend from France, so peers as well as commoners should attend from this country at the Interparliamentary Conference. It would not be necessary to have a separate secretary for each House of Parliament. One secretary would suffice, and legislators who are nobles or commoners would appear together as members of the British parliamentary group.

members of the British parliamentary group.

It is very important from the point of view of action this autumn that something should be done this month to get the parliamentary group into action. By the resolution passed at the Conference at Christiania the parliamentary group undertook to do two things: first, to press upon the Government the conclusion of as many treaties of arbitration as possible; and secondly, to make a propaganda of education among the people. The first thing to be done is to know how many members of the parliamentary group can be depended upon to carry out this resolution; secondly, what we have to do is to ask them to do it; thirdly, we have to see what can be done to recruit their numbers among the legislators who are not formally enrolled in the parliamentary group. There is, therefore, a good opening for a propaganda both among Members of Parliament and among the constituents. The way in which members of the parliamentary group can carry out the resolutions passed at Christiania is obvious. Most of them will be addressing their constituents this autumn. What could be more valuable than that they should describe what has been done at the Hague, and ask their constituents to call upon the Government to conclude treaties of arbitration making reference to the permanent tribunal obligatory in as many instances as possible. Members of Parliament who address their constituents are often at a loss for what to say, and it would at least be a very welcome change from the dead banalities of party recrimination to set forth before their constituents the story of what has been done and what remains to be accomplished. The propaganda in the country cannot be allowed to depend solely upon the initiative of the parliamentary group, although the general direction might well be left in the capable hands of Mr. Cremer; but what we have to do is to increase the numbers of the parliamentary group. This might be done if sympathisers with the cause of arbitration in each constituency were to write to their member and ask him if he has joined this group, and if not, why not. If they did not care to write a letter, they might ask him when he addresses his constituents. By this means the subject might be brought promptly before the public, and a good deal might be done towards carrying out the project.

It may be predicted in some quarters that this involves the supersession of the Peace Societies by the Interparliamentary Conference, but this is by no means the case. No doubt for the present moment the direction of the movement would be placed in the hands of the elected representatives of the people, who are not in a position to give the most effective assistance to such a propaganda. There is no other international organisation so widely spread or so influential to whom we could so naturally entrust the direction of such a movement. The Peace

Photograph by Worm-Petersen.]

MEMBERS EN ROUTE TO THE PICNIC ON THE FROGNERSVETEREN.

[Christiania.

Societin every gramm. The before are no need t wheth conduct the parlia the sh Indus sent p It is c a mar maga Fei of our with i and C the sp W. H copio Centr paper Build have to esc in tor public so di questi

ducin maint indus on its milita I cor him u

In there the in youth Bally intended was be persoremove to the wrigh the d takin perso Societies can join, and will no doubt be very glad to join in every effort that may be made to carry out the programme of the International Conference.

The Interparliamentary Conference has a great future before it. The various groups represented at Christiania are no doubt often in a state of political lethargy. They need to be energised into activity. It remains to be seen whether the definite object now placed before them to conduct a propaganda of education as to the work done at the Hague will contribute to the conversion of the parliamentary group into an effective executive engine.

It will depend very largely upon the presidents and secretaries of each group, and on them a heavy responsibility lies. It would be a great misfortune if they should neglect the present opportunity of increasing their adherents and of vindicating the efficiency of their organisation. They could do this international work better than any one else, and it would be a thousand pities if any parliamentary group has to appear in Paris next year and report that nothing has been done in the shape of popular agitation in obedience to the resolutions passed in Christiania.

FEILDEN'S MAGAZINE.

I AM delighted to welcome yet another magazine in the shape of Feilden's Magazine and World's Record of Industrial Progress. It is published at a shilling, but is sent post free for an annual subscription of ten shillings. It is capitally got up, admirably printed, and is edited by a man with a thorough grasp of the way in which such a magazine should be brought out.

has

ents

of

inal bers

at ery

irty

the

not

the ion er; of mncy

nas

not

he ect

a

he

res

er-

he

of

ed

to

la.

ely

lly

ce

Feilden's Magazine deals chiefly with the vital question of our industrial position, and compares not unfavourably with its only two competitors, the Engineering Magazine and Cassier's, both of which are of American origin. Among the special articles in the first number there is one by Sir W. H. Preece on the Engineering Conference of 1899, a copiously illustrated article on the building of the Great Central Extension Railway to London, and an admirable paper on Recent Characteristics of British Locomotive Building, from which it would seem that the new engines have practically no funnels, or such small ones as almost to escape notice. Some of the illustrations are printed in tone, and all the illustrations are good. There is no publication at present in existence which addresses itself so directly and with such practical aim to the vital question of stimulating our manufacturing and producing classes to bestir themselves in order to maintain the grievously threatened position of British industrial supremacy. Feilden's Magazine is described on its cover as "militantly British"; but it is a friendly militancy which is not in any way of the Jingo variety. I cordially wish Mr. Feilden success, and congratulate him upon having produced a magazine which is a credit to the periodicals of Great Britain.

In Justice to a Protestant Ulsterman.

In the August number of the Review of Reviews there appeared a paragraph which seemed to reflect upon the indifference of Protestant Ulster to the welfare of youth. In justice to Mr. William Johnston, M.P., of Ballykilbeg, I am glad to state that when the Bill intended to prevent the sending of young children to gaol was before the House of Commons this session, it was the personal intervention of Mr. Johnston which secured the removal of the block that otherwise would have been fatal to the passage of the measure.

In a warm appreciation of Mr. A. W. Pinero, the playwright, in Cassell's, his friend, Mr. M. C. Salaman, shows the dramatist as a man of most conscientious painstaking, of punctual regularity of habit, and of great personal lovableness.

The Puritan.

THE September number is a very good one. Dr. Lunn gives a vivid sketch of the Methodist Times, its inception, its success, its editor and assistant editors. He mentions that at its commencement older Methodist ministers called it "The Boy's Own Paper," while others felt sure it would be a "Hughesful" journal. Rev. Anderson Scott describes Westminster College, the Presbyterian Theological Hall transplanted to Cambridge. The illustrations suggest that Free Churches will have no reason to blush for this latest outpost of theirs in our ancient universities. Dr. McLaren, of Manchester, is the subject of an appreciation by Hugh Cameron. Rev. F. B. Meyer gives a glimpse of D. L. Moody, Northfield, and his work there. A portrait of Professor Sylvanus Thompson forms the frontispiece. Mr. Charles Sheldon's Satanic colloquies do not appear this month. Mr. Mee's estimate of the circulation of Spurgeon's sermons claims separate notice.

"A Salt-Water Number."

So the September Century styles itself, and it is fairly consistent with its title. "Sailing Alone Around the World," by the intrepid sailor himself, Joshua Slocum, forms the most interesting travel paper. This Nova Scotian by birth, now a naturalised Yankee, vivaciously describes how, in the sailing sloop Spray, he twice crossed the Atlantic in 1895. The voyage took twenty-nine days out and forty back. His chief trouble seems to have been, not the storms, but the intense solitude. He writes with warm appreciation of the hospitality he received at the Azores and from the British fleet at Gibraltar. A narrow escape from pirates was one of his many adventures. Miss Eliza R. Scidmore recounts her experiences cruising up the Yang-tse. Mr. B. E. Smith discusses with a map the many puzzling questions connected with the line in the Pacific where it has been agreed "a day is lost or gained." Mr. H. P. Whitmarsh suggests various remedies for making voyages safer on "the Atlantic speedway." Mr. John S. Sewall recounts thrilling stories of Chinese pirates and their punishment under the heading, "The Scourge of the Eastern Seas." Mr. R. S. Rantoul recalls the voyage of the Quero, the ship which first brought to London the news of British disaster at Concord and Lexington in 1775. Pictures and poetry are full of the wild sea wave and the briny breeze. So is the fiction. The sorrows of an American Dreyfus-Uriah Levy-are referred to elsewhere; and he was a naval hero.

LEADING ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

MR. CHARLES BOOTH ON PUBLIC-HOUSE REFORM.

A SUGGESTIVE EXPERIMENT.

18 the Contemporary Review for September, Mr. Charles Booth introduces the report of an experiment in public-house management. The terms of the experiment were thus laid down:—

 That the manager's wages should be fixed independently of any increase or decrease of the quantity of alcoholic liquor sold.

2. That he should have a positive inducement to increase the sale of food and non-alcoholic drinks.

3. That there should be supervision of such a kind as to secure adherence to the regulations laid down, especially as to maintenance of order; and

4. That all articles sold should be genuine.

Five fully licensed public-houses were selected of different sizes and in neighbourhoods of different character. The managers of the houses were servants of the promoters of the experiment, with allowance for board and a fixed salary. To this was added a commission of 20 per cent. on any increase they could effect in the sale of food and non-alcoholic drinks over, and above the normal sale of such articles, which had been previously ascertained from the books relating to each business. It was a sufficient inducement to lead them to push this branch of the trade.

On the sale of tobacco, commission was allowed in some and not in other of the houses: but it made no visible difference in the sale. Managers were instructed to refrain entirely from pushing the sale of alcohol, to push the sale of food and non-intoxicants, to keep good order, to refuse drink to any one not perfectly sober, and to tamper with no articles for sale.

LARGE PROFITS ON TEETOTAL DRINKS.

In a note occurs the following statement :-

It may surprise the reader to learn that the motive of extra profit already attaches in ordinary public houses to the sale of teetotal drinks. Ginger beer, soda-water, and lemonade are all sold to yield a much larger gross profit than the average gross profit on other drinks. Ginger beer is bought at 8d. and sold at 1s. 4d. a gallon; small bottles of lemonade or sodawater cost 7½d. a dozen, and are sold for 2s.; large bottles cost 9½d. a dozen, and are sold for 3s.; so that these drinks yield profits respectively of 100, 220, and 280 per cent. These splendid returns already create a sort of automatic Gothenburg system.

THE TRADE OF AN ORDINARY PUBLIC-HOUSE.

First are offered statistics of the ordinary class of trade in a public-house used by working men. Here are the figures for a year of goods consumed in two houses, one (the "Bull") in a neighbourhood where working men live; the other (the "Fox"), also in a poor district, but in a main road, and doing a large passing trade, due to the traffic:—

	Bear.	Wines and Spirits.	Tobacco.	Food.	Testotal Drinks.	Total.
The "Bull"	1,644 55.7%	1,065 30.1%	£ 142 4·8%	£ 1.9%	£ 1.5%	£ 2,938 100%
The "Fox"	3.312. 52.4%	(? 36·1) 1,979 31·3%	4:7%	505	3.6%	6,316 100%

CHANGES DUE TO THE EXPERIMENT.

The first three months of the experiment showed a slight increase in food and teetotal drink, but not sufficient to satisfy the promoters. The managers were urged to augment the increase. It was found that there was an idea that "to sell Kop's ale would degrade the house" to the level of a cheap coffee-shop. The report proceeds:—

The experiment ran thus for a year, with the general result that the total percentages for the five houses were thus altered:

	Testotal Driaks.	Food.	Together.	Tobacco.	A!coholic D:inks.	Total.
1895	267 1·8%	£ 506 3.4%	£ 774 5·2%	£ 649 4·4 %	£ 13 293 90·4 %	£ 15,489 100 %
1896			- miner	12 76	13,005	15,695

The consumption of alcohol does not appear to have been affected by the commission. Among conclusions drawn from individual analysis are these: The least impression was made on those houses that do the poorest trade. The various results depended in each case on the manager. Hence "the public advantage depends on the personnel of the public-houses." Probably public management would ensure greater attention to the character of the managers.

A CHANGE OF TASTE NECESSARY-

Mr. Booth's prefatory comments vouch for the bona fides of the experiment. He finds the results suggestive rather than conclusive, negative perhaps more than positive. He says:—

Men drink to please themselves, and they will go where their tastes are best considered. Any new method, unless supported by a very strict monopoly, must coincide with a change of taste, if it is to bring about a change of habit. The reform of the public-house, when it comes, will most likely be a development of this character. The shape it will take will in all probability be unexpected, like the extraordinarily successful enterprise of the Aérated Bread Company in London, and that of other tea, coffee and cocoa rooms in recent years, not only in London, but throughout the country.

-AND CHANGE OF STRUCTURE.

If I may hazard so much I should say that change of character will most likely be connected with change of structure, with (e.g.) the provision of more space and comfort for the customers; accommodation for sitting, it may be, in place of standing, with more, or it might equally be with less, class distinction; but almost certainly with more consideration than is now shown for the wants of those who do not seek alcohol. This last may possibly be by separate rooms and entrances, but quite as probably by the incursions of a larger public, sweeping away all such distinctions, as has been seen with railway refreshmentrooms, which cater impartially for all wants.

EFFECT OF BONUS ON TEETOTAL DRINKS.

The public-houses experimented with being constructed and devised with a view to alcoholic profit, the experiment was "in one sense foredoomed to failure." Mr. Booth observes:—

No great revolution could possibly be effected by the mere giving of a bonus to the managers on non-alcoholic sales, and when the actual figures of these sales are compared with the experi they a notice chang

Re tendi Mr. I interi throu volun But rising express the el than chang drink Th

all so

douck detect a Eu head: The l used cauck

Th

gram

St. P An to dis before exagg 1894, Germ create have situat arran friend M. I order misco reduc reduce was of the a main peace Peter TI

Chir the Gerr has

has to The grant for H

gross amount of the alcoholic trade done on the premises experimentalised with, it will be seen how small and insignificant they are. Nevertheless the percentage of increase shown is very noticeable, and may, perhaps, point to a coming or possible change of fashion.

THE MOST POTENT ENGINE OF REFORM.

Reputable management is much to be desired as tending to improvement in every direction; and, adds Mr. Booth, "for this and other reasons we may welcome interference by the licensing authority, or experiments through the medium of municipal control, or, it may be, voluntary association." Mr. Booth goes on :-

But for persistent progress we must, I think, look mainly to a rising standard of life, the growing demands of which cannot be expressed in terms of "more grog:" and I should rely more on the elastic energy of private enterprise supplying new wants, than to any possible control by a public authority, for such a change in the habits of the people as is needed to put the love of drink in its proper place.

These conclusions on the drink question by our most eminent sociologist will doubtless be duly pondered by all social reformers, and, in especial, by temperance men.

"THE COALITION-NIGHTMARE."

"DIPLOMATICUS" in the Fortnightly turns a cold douche of commonsense on the heated alarmists who detect in the Franco-German flirtation another proof of a European coalition forming against England. heads his paper "Bergen and the Coalition-Nightmare." The latter is a phrase taken from Count Shuvaloff, who used to banter Prince Bismarck on his irrepressible cauchemar de coalitions.

TRUTH ABOUT THE FRANCO-GERMAN FLIRTATION.

The writer offers this explanation of the Kaiser's telegram to M. Loubet and of M. Delcasse's journey to St. Petersburg :-

Any one can see now that the Bergen courtesies were intended to discount the effect of General Mercier's startling deposition before the Dreyfus Court Martial. The picture—however exaggerated-of France and Germany on the brink of war in 1894, and the revelations of French military ardour against Germany supplied by the evidence of the Generals, would have created a very disagreeable impression in Europe, and would have aroused serious fears for the stability of the political situation, had not the French and German Governments wisely arranged beforehand that the world should be assured of the friendliness of their relations. The subsequent visit of M. Delcassé to St. Petersburg obviously belongs to the same order of ideas. Had the Bergen courtesies stood alone, misconceptions would certainly have been created. The visit of the French Minister for Foreign Affairs to St. Petersburg reduced the Bergen courtesies to their proper proportions. It was designed to show that nothing was changed in Europe, that the alliances were as solid and as distinct as ever, and that their main rivalry was directed to the preservation of European peace. This is the plain truth about Bergen and its St. Petersburg sequel.

The writer furthermore points out that when France, Germany, and Russia joined in intervention between China and Japan, they actually invited England to enter the coalition. In Egypt, and in South Africa, had Germany or Europe wished to act against England, there has been plenty of opportunity.

"THE SPOILT CHILD" OF EUROPE.

He grants the effusive courtesy with which the Kaiser has treated France time and again; but adds:-

That these politesses are more than neighbourly may well be granted without admitting that they show a peculiar predilection for France and a desire for her alliance. They are amply explained by a natural wish to conciliate a sensitive neighbour in the interests of the general peace. All the Powers treat France in the same way, because she is a spoilt child with an adult's capacity for mischief, and because this fact is one of the weak spots in the European situation.

The writer argues that a Franco-German alliance is a chimera, for "the lost provinces" interpose an insuperable obstacle; for "restitution, compromise, and neutralisation are alike impossible."

ENGLAND TOO GOOD A CUSTOMER.

Yet, even were this obstacle removed, what would be the object of the suggested coalition?-

Its object, we have been plainly told, would be to avenge Fashoda, to liberate Egypt, to revive the colonial glories of Louis XIV., to give South Africa to Germany, and India to Russia; in short, to dismember the British Empire by war. When the peril is thus b'untly stated, it requires, I think, very little reflection to show that the whole thing is a monstrous delusion. No country can desire such a coalition, because, whether it succeeded or failed, it would lose infinitely more than England, he points out, is the most valuable market in the world. No acquisition of British Colonies would compensate the Powers for the ruin of the English market. England alone takes 28 per cent. of the total exports of the five Great Powers. Of Germany the British Empire buys very nearly as much as the other four Great Powers put together buy. Of France the United Kingdom alone buys over twice as much as the other four. "British purchases from each of the two Great European alliances are much higher than those of either of the alliances from each other. The European Powers would not readily ruin their best customer."

A COALITION WHICH IS POSSIBLE.

One form of coalition has, the writer allows, been discussed frequently on the Continent, but so far without much encouragement :

It is a tariff-coalition of the Central European States against the three World-Powers-Great Britain, Russia, and the United Continental economists have been much disturbed by the fact that while these World-Powers control between them 50 per cent. of the dry surface of the globe and 35 per cent. of its population, two of them are already rigid Protectionists... Were all three Powers to become Protectionist, the Central European States would of course suffer severely, and hence it has been suggested that they should protect themselves by means of a common retaliatory tariff.

DEMOCRACIES' EYE TO THE MAIN CHANCE.

"Diplomaticus" grants, indeed, it is not at all improbable that the idea of a sort of Central European Zollverein will grow, for the same reason that a political coalition against England is unlikely. The material interests of the people have to be served. Such a Zollverein may also, in the dim future, prove the stepping-stone to a closer political union. Such a union would, however, possess no terrors for England while she adhered to her Free Trade traditions.

What is most important to remember is, that industrial interests are everywhere supreme to-day, that these interests can only flourish with peace and the cultivation of foreign markets, that the United Kingdom is the richest and freest market in the world, and that the Governments of foreign States are now, for the most part, in the hands of those who are most interested in the preservation of peace and the cultivation of markets.

Democracies may indeed be misled, but have after all a keen eye to their own most vital interests.

MUCH good stuff with many entertaining illustrations "concerning amateur and school magazines" is given by E. M. Symonds in the Girl's Realm for September.

XUM

may te as y all nentcted nent

wed a t suffi-urged was an se" to eds :-

l result

ered:

otal.

£

5,489

have isions

least porest

n the n the nage-

ter of bona estive

than their orted

taste, of the oment

bility

ise of

r tea, i, but racter

with

ners;

with

; but

n for

ooth mere and the

THE EUROPEAN REACTION.

A TOCSIN OF ALARM.

MENTAL tension—to use no stronger phrase—seems to be extremely acute in France at present—acute to a degree altogether inexplicable to sober Englishmen. It is, of course, conspicuously attested by the conduct of the anti-Dreyfusite swarm. But it appears to have infected the valiant minority. Otherwise, it is hard to explain the overstrung feeling which vibrates through the first paper in the National Review, "Anglophobia—a French warning to Fngland," by M. Urbain Gohier, author of the famous "L'Armée contre la Nation." The article simply palpitates. The writer sees the lists drawn for a fell international combat, the issue of which is to settle the fate of civilisation:—

On the one side is liberty, justice, and progress; on the other political servitude, oppression, and reaction. One or other of these forces will carry the day, according as the people of Western Europe prevail against, or succumb before, the Catholic and military conspiracy inspired by the Jesuits from Rome and the Emperor from Berlin.

A NEW "HOLY ALLIANCE."

There is a new "Holy Alliance," the organ of a Counter Revolution:—

To-day throughout Europe, and notably in France, which I will take as an illustration, the hostility against England is rising, and with it is rising the tempest of political, religious, philosophic, and economic reaction. It is England's glory to see her cause linked to that of human liberty, but this glory carries with it certain grave risks of which she will become conscious before long. For against England and against liberty the Holy Alliance of reactionary Governments and the Roman Catholic Church are ranging themselves. The chosen chief of the Holy Alliance is the German Emperor, while the Roman Catholic Church is dominated by the Jesuits whose "General" is the real Pope.

THE KEY TO THE SITUATION.

The writer then serves up choice specimens of the anti-English garbage which litters the Jesuits' Yellow Press, misrepresenting the English people and their ways of life in the most absurdly ludicrous but venomously bitter manner. In conclusion the writer reiterates:—

The key to the European situation is obtained by a rapprochement of three facts: in the first place, the Jesuits, the leaders of a world-wide reaction, were recently officially recalled and reinstated in Germany by William II.; in the second place, the French Jesuits control the Army, the money power, and the social and political forces of France; in the third place, all the writers and politicians working for the Jesuits are striving to reconcile France with Germany, and to kindle French hatred against England.

The practical point of this feverish alarm-cry is to back up the "No-Popery" agitation in England. The writer luments that Englishmen are "sceptical as to the Catholic encroachment in England," and "exceedingly contemptuous as to the danger of the European reaction." Yet, he exclaims, "Had not the vigilant distrust with which she once regarded the Papacy some reasonable basis?" With all the earnestness of italics the writer assures us, "With the strength and well-being of England is bound up the fate of liberty in France." The average Briton will, we fear, conclude that if this be so the cause of freedom in France is much safer than he thought it was. We are an unemotional race, and, when they seem a trifle over-wrought, frigid even towards our friends.

BY RAIL FROM THE NILE TO THE YANG-TSE.

PLEA FOR A BRITISH LINE THROUGH SOUTH ASIA.

INTERNATIONAL emulation has its good points. Yet who would have expected Russia to give us the lead in railway extension? The Siberian line promises to draw a deep furrow of progress in other lands besides the northern region it traverses. Here, for example, is Mr. C. A. Moreing, prompted by the great Russian precedent, pleading in the Nineteenth Century for "an All-British Railway to China." The case is simple. To go from London to Shanghai by the Brindisi and P.O. route takes thirty-three days and costs (first class) $\frac{2}{8}0:$ by Siberian rail to Vladivostok and steamer to Shanghai it will take fifteen days and cost $\frac{2}{4}0.$ Why not a British line to secure the trade which would otherwise inevitably pass over Russian metals? Mr. Moreing kindly gives a map and summarises the various sections of the line which he would fain see built:—

Alexandria to Gulf of Akabah (Egyptian)	Miles 250
pendent)	1,000.
Koweit to the Perso-Baluch boundary (Persian)	700
Persia to Kurrachee (Indian)	520
Kurrachee to Kunlong (Indian)	2,800
Kunlong to Shanghai (Chinese).	1,600
	-

of which 2,000 miles have been already built.

From this it can be seen that the circumstances for the construction of a through line to China are far more favourable than they were for Russia in the case of the Siberian Railway, so far as the mere mileage to be covered and the physical difficulties of the route are concerned.

The writer mentions that the Amir of Jebel Shomer, virtual sovereign of Central Arabia, has completely approved the project of a railway through his territory, and the facilities it would afford to pilgrims to the holy places have won for the scheme the hearty and expressed support of the Mohammedan world. He further says:—

It is worth while bearing in mind that as soon as the proposed line reaches India, it will revolutionise the sea route and traffic with Australia. It is about 3,500 miles from Madras to Perth, the capital of Western Australia, and in view of the federation of the Australian colonies, Perth will shortly be connected with Sydney by rail. It would thus be possible to send mails and passengers to Perth in eighteen days instead of twenty-four, and thence by rail to Sydney in four days.

It will be seen that the term "All-British" must be interpreted somewhat loosely, seeing about half of the route lies under other flags than our own. But the writer assumes that "Great Britain regards her position and influence in the Indian Ocean as paramount;" yet "though Great Britain controls and holds the Persian Gulf, and though along the coasts of Arabia and in the interior her influence is predominant, she lacks the great aid to consolidation that a railway would afford." The commercial and military advantages of such a route are obvious.

THE vitality of Macaulay is the subject of a very interesting and suggestive essay by H. D. Sedgwick, Junior, in the Atlantic Monthly for August. Spite of all that dryasdusts may allege, Macaulay's history "suits the majority of Englishmen, by its virile directness, its honest clearness, its bold definiteness." So with his verse: it is "the poetry of a strong, healthy, typical Englishman."

IN on the

I

Roth

last Siber
Th built is imp trolla contii demo
impu Certa
the g

tratic view the h years and consi Englishort sixty to th Whe days from

TI

Tf

of th

Briti their dista no e Add and agai

It is or a measure ord It is end nen the

COS

fasc hard bot ther

I

THE CAPE TO CAIRO RAILWAY.

In the Windsor for this month there is an article by me on the Cape to Cairo Railway, illustrated by a map of the route and photographs of its construction.

A DAIMONIC DESIGN.

I begin by recalling a significant remark of Herr Rothstein, financial adviser to M. de Witte, whom I met last year in St. Petersburg. Speaking of the great Siberian railway, he said:—

This railway, like many others of the same nature, is being built under the compulsion of an impulse, or an instinct which it is impossible to justify on financial, political, or military grounds.

... Nations appear to be sometimes possessed by an uncontrollable passion to bring together the uttermost ends of a continent, quite irrespective of rational motives. It is a kind of demon which drives them; and I can only suppose that the impulsion is intended to promote the general good of mankind. Certainly, in our case, the sacrifices are much more obvious, than the gain to Russia.

WHOM THE SIBERIAN LINE MOST BENEFITS.

This suggests the reflection :-

If this be the case with the Siberian railway, what can be said of the Cape to Cairo line, but that it is a still more striking illustration of Herr Rothstein's doctrine? From a political point of view the British Empire will profit even more than Russia by the building of the Asiatic through-railway over which in a few years will pass all the mails between England and her colonies and dependencies in the Pacific. From every point of view the construction of the line across Siberia is more important to the English-speaking world than the Cape to Cairo railway. To shorten the time in which one can travel round the planet from sixty-five to thirty-three days is an achievement of supreme value to the only race that has planted its families all round the world. When the Siberian line is built, Shanghai, which is now thirty-five days distant from London, will only be divided by a fortnight from the General Post Office in St. Martin's-le-Grand.

THE AFRICAN LINE NO GAIN IN TIME-

The Cape to Cairo railway offers few of the advantages to the British Empire that the Russians are securing for it by building their line across Siberia. . . . It will not materially shorten the distance between London and the Cape. . . . After it is built no express will traverse the Continent in less than eleven days. Add to this the four or five days between London and Cairo, and we have fifteen or sixteen days for the overland route as against seventeen or eighteen days by sea.

-OR DIVIDENDS.

Still less is it likely to be fertile of dividends. It would cost ten—possibly twenty millions sterling to construct. It is extremely doubtful whether it would earn a dividend or avoid regular loss. Nevertheless I indicate as a by no means impossible prospect that the line will be in working order in 1909. Why?—

It is difficult to explain, except on the theory of Herr Rothstein—that the Providence that rules mankind has willed that the ends of the world should be linked together and that the continents should be bridged by the iron rail; and so, obedient to the invisible Power behind the veil, mortal men hasten to carry out their appointed task.

THREE CHIEF CAUSES.

Passing from this occult cause, I suggest certain outward and visible reasons for the project :—

The first and dominating cause is the fact that the idea has fascinated the imagination of Mr. Rhodes, and the second and hardly less potent reason is the fact that the Cape and Cairo both begin with the letter C. . . . After these two leading motives there must be mentioned, as a potent third cause, the jealousy of the nations, and especially the anxiety of many Englishmen for the security of their somewhat precarious position in Egypt and the Nile Valley. It is true the railway, even when constructed, will not paint the African map British red from the Mediterranean to the Table Mountain; but it undoubtedly tinges the whole intervening region with the ruddy glow that heralds the dawn of Empire.

Turning to the temporal origin of the idea :-

It would not be easy to say when first the magic formula, "From Cape to Cairo," fell from the lips of Mr. Rhodes. . . . Possibly the invitation sent him by General Gordon to accompany him to Khartoum in 1884 may have first turned his attention to the Cairo end of the trunk line.

THE WIRE BEFORE THE RAIL.

His first step to the construction of the railway was to set about laying an overland telegraph from the Cape to His appeal for funds fell on deaf ears, and he resolved, failing other help, to find the money himself. He has, in fact, had to find nine-tenths of the money personally. I go on to show how the line is being pushed forward. The entire distance is 6,600 miles. The Anglo-Egyptian Government has already got the wire in operation as far as Khartoum, which is 1,300 miles from Cairo. In the South the wire is in operation from the Cape to Umtali,-a distance of 1,800 miles. So that out of 6,600 miles, 3,100 have been already laid, and 3,500 remain to be covered. If Abercorn on Lake Tanganyika be taken as its northern terminus, the distance to be covered is only 2,800 miles. It cost £50 a mile in Rhodesia: it is estimated to cost from £80 to £100 a mile for the Central African stretch.

A ROUTE ALL BRITISH EXCEPT 300 MILES.

After stating the exorbitant terms exacted by the German Government for right of way through their territory, I sketch the remainder of the route:—

After leaving German territory the telegraph line will make its way to Mengi, in Uganda, and then, avoiding the malarious valley of the Nile between Lake Albert and Khartcum, it will traverse the edge of the plateau that skirts the frontier of Abyssinia and make a junction with the Anglo-Egyptian system on the frontier of the Soudan. With the exception of the 700 miles of German territory, the whole distance from Cape to Cairo is already colcured British red on the African map. That distance may be reduzed to 300 miles, if the beginning of German territory is reckoned at the north end of Tanganyika instead of the scuth. England has a right of free navigation over the whole length of the lake—400 miles; so that in reality, of the 6,600 miles which stretch between Cape and Cairo, the travelling Briton need only for 300 miles stray beyond the protecting shadow of the Union Jack.

CHEAPENING CAPE MESSAGES.

This wire I estimate will pay. It will cost, at £75 a mile, about half a million to construct, as against three to four millions sunk in the African cables:—

The net result is that when the overland wire is in working order Mr. Rhodes will be able to reduce the cost of telegraphy at once from 5s. to 3s. 6d. a word, and earn a good dividend besides.

Returning to the railway, not half of which is contracted for, I mention Mr. Rhodes's estimate of ten millions as the probable cost. He reckons that 3,229 miles are still to be built and would cost £3,000 a mile. This is a sanguine estimate. The Bechuanaland railway cost no less than £3,000 a mile, the Rhodesian railway ran up the cost to £3,800. I conclude that the outlay will not exceed £15,000,000. I mention Mr. Rhodes' kind invitation to me to be present at the laying of the last rail on January 20th, 1909.

rable way, diffiner, tely ory, holy and

He

SE.

ASIA.

Yet

ad in draw

s the issian

"an class)

er to

Why

ther-

reing

tions

Miles

250

700

520

1,600

,670

con-

P.O.

osed affic rth, tion with and be the ter nd yet an he eat

he

re

ry k, all ts ts

al

VIIM

THE DREYFUS CASE.

A MICROCOSM OF MODERN FRANCE.

PERHAPS the most illuminating article which has yet appeared on the Dreyfus case is that which M. André Golfernaux contributes to the Fornightly Review for August, under the title of "The Philosophy of the Dreyfus Case." M. Golfernaux is not concerned with the merits of the cuse, and indeed he seems to think the question of the guilt or innocence of Dreyfus of secondary importance. The Dreyfus case is not merely a struggle between a group of corrupt generals and a Jewish officer. It is not even a struggle between the lovers of justice and its enemies. Its real significance is much greater, for in the Court-house at Rennes converge all the opposing tendencies of modern France; and the currents of two contending civilizations. It is a conflict between order and justice—between authority and free examination, or, in a more indirect fashion, between Faith and Science. It is in oscillation between these opposing principles lies the whole intellectual and social movements of modern France.

THE COMING OF THE CHANGE.

The period from the war of 1870 to the year 1889, says M. Godfernaux, was a period of recuperation—military, political and industrial. But at the latter date there began to be discerned a distaste for life, an incapacity of effort, a renunciation of ideals which invoked the inevitable reaction. It was a period of lassitude and moral dwindling in active life, and of mysticism and sensuality in literature and art. Many cried for a pretender, and without a protest servitude might have been re-established. Others resigned themselves to the decadence which has overtaken the other branches of the Latin race. The heroic ages were past, and the country had lost faith in its destiny. Such was the moral condition of France when the Dreyfus case sprang upon the scene, and awoke the two opposing tendencies of the nation again.

A CONFLICT OF PRINCIPLES.

Of these tendencies Dreyfus was merely an instrument for condensing the great invisible struggle into a concrete form. For the struggle had taken place a hundred times before in literature, in religion, in sociology. The same spectacle had been seen before in France, especially at the Reformation:—

France, politically the most unified of all lands, is nevertheless divided between two adverse tendencies, between two currents easily discernible throughout the whole length of her history. On the one side, an eminently social love of the hierarchy, of official authority, derived from her Latin past; surviving in her Catholicism, in her army, and even to a great extent in her civil organisation. On the other side, the spirit of independence, of free examination, inherited from the north, ever looked upon with suspicion by the governing body, but ever heard dully vibrating and exploding in the great eruptions of the centuries: the Reformation, Cartesianism, the Revolution of '89. In spite of all, France has remained till now a country on the side of authority, inheriting from its Latin civilisation a superstitious respect for all who hold the smallest share of power, for every functionary, in a word, civil, ecclesiastic, or military. It is well known that Catholicism supports this idolatry. It exacts from the faithful absolute submission, complete surrender of the rights of reason, unqualified acquiescence not only in the word of God, but also, and especially, in that of His accredited representatives.

A REVOLUTION IN IDEAS.

The difficulty was not a struggle between truth and falsehood. Both parties engaged in it with equal seriousness and absolute good faith, and both desired the truth, with the exception of a small party of agitators and fabricators of falsehood and hatred. The Coppées, the Drumonts and the Cavaignacs sought it with closed eyes, according to a venerable tradition, and believed with passionate ardour in the words of the priest of their present cult, the Flag. The Zolas and Picquarts sought it by slow and patient personal inquiry; and, notwithstanding the anguish of their hearts in face of evidence which drove them to despair, they had the courage to proclaim the truth. We must not therefore urge it as a crime against France that she temporised and hesitated painfully:—

th

ar

Fi

M

Ce

D

th off

of

ag

Be

an

In

no

ma

pro

car

lar

pir

rec

ore

lie

off

to

do

ag

beg un

fri

fel

wil

CO

fire

eitl

dis

in

Co

Ri

de

U.

rec

six

the upo

cou

For her the case was, and still remains, a veritable revolution, with every revolutionary characteristic, if we except the street-fighting; a revolution in which the two parties were striving to deal mortal blows and to pierce each other to the heart. "Civil wars are terrible struggles, wherein men, inspired by the loftiest ideas, slay each other in the dark." Yes, in the dark indeed, but all, to their honour be it spoken, united in asking for light. Surely no struggle could be nobler, for, once more, two ruling historic laws, two traditions, two essential forms of truth were ranged in all their majesty one against the other.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE AFFAIRE.

The Dreyfus case did not begin this struggle, and it is not destined to end it :-

The consequences are not less important with regard to the home policy of France, and her position externally. Under the stress of the Dreyfus question the old political groups have been broken up, to form themselves anew. The question of a Monarchical restoration has become secondary. All minds are henceforth divided according to their opinion of the Republican system of government. On one side a "Nationalist" party has been formed, jealous, above all, of purely French traditions, of military glory, of a policy of conquest, or at least of obstinately maintained revanche; a Cæsarian party in fact if not in name, distinguished by its desire for a strong government. Here we have an amalgamation of the old Clerical party, the old Royalist and Imperialist parties, sectaries of all shades, but taken as a whole the embodiment of narrow "Chauvinism." The other party, for which a name has not yet been found, is composed of true Liberals: of minds open to progress and to the future: containing some suspicious elements, also, it must be owned: but, above all, consisting of those who believe in the universal power of reason. These understand that conservation is not reaction, and while maintaining what is venerable and useful in the legacy of the past, they desire to eliminate all that is frail or

A LESSON FOR THE WORLD.

The final issue, says M. Godfernaux, cannot fail to be beneficial. For—

It has forced the combatants in the bitter struggle for life to look above life towards the Ideal, or towards the Chimæra—to something higher, at any rate, than their own daily interests. France has been chosen by fate for the theatre of this drama; she has supplied the actors and the victims. At the present moment she should surely congratulate herself upon this, her stern privilege, and leave other nations to profit by the spectacle at which they have come to gaze.

Blackwood offers much of attraction and suggestion this month. The Looker-on's sumptuary diatribes are noticed elsewhere under his own title, "The Delirium of Dress." Sir Herbert Maxwell opens a paper with the inviting caption—"Summer-tide in a Scottish Forest"—by an argument to show that deer forests only swept out sheep walks, and brought more boon than bane to the labouring class. Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson discusses Nelson at Copenhagen by the light of his grandfather's private diary. He concludes that the signal to withdraw, which Nelson is credited with flatly disobeying, was in fact a discretionary one, and that Nelson simply exercised the discretion entrusted to him. Which spoils a good story. E. M. contributes an attractive study of St. Columba as post.

AN AMERICAN DREYFUS.

eyes,

with

pre-

ht it

andhich

laim

rime

ated

tion.

treet-

g to Civil

ftiest

leed.

ight. uling

were

it is -

the

the

been

of a аге

ican

has

, of

itely

ame,

e we alist

as a

ther

d of

ure :

ed:

ersal

not

1 in

l or

be ook

me-

has

she ege.

hey

ion

are

of

the

out

the ses

er's

aw,

in

ply

s a of JEW-BAITING IN THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

WHILE we English-speaking folk are returning devout thanks that in matters military, naval, and judicial we are not as other races are, and notably not as are the French, it is a timely and salutary reminder which Mr. James Morris Morgan offers to us in the September Century that there has been "an American forerunner of Dreyfus." This was an Israelite named Uriah P. Levy, the victim of forty years' persecution from his fellow-officers in the U. S. Navy because he was a Jew, yet throughout an upright and disinterested patriot and able officer to boot. Born in Philadelphia in 1792, "at the age of eleven he ran away from home and went to sea. Before he was eighteen he had saved sufficient money to buy an interest in a schooner, of which he was made master." In 1812, during the war with Great Britain, Levy, now twenty years of age, received an appointment as sailing-master in the United States navy, a position not in the line of promotion. He was ordered to the famous brig Argus, which carried Mr. Crawford, the American envoy, to France. . . . After landing the envoy, the Argus went on a cruise, destroying shipping to the value of five millions. . . . When peace came, Levy, in common with other officers, desired that his services should be recognised by promotion, under the rule that "masters of extraordinary merit and for extraordinary services may be promoted to lieutenants."

OSTRACISED.

To this a formidable opposition developed among the line officers, who claimed that Levy's advancement would be a wrong to older midshipmen, whose promotion it would retard. It is doubtful if ever an officer suffered so terribly from the effects of a gratified ambition. With his commission as a lieutenant he began a life of strife wherein undeserved punishment followed unmerited disgrace in almost ceaseless succession. . . . Ostracism was first tried for the purpose of forcing the Jew to resign . . . Lieutenant Levy always found himself alone.

OFFICIALLY PROTESTED AGAINST.

When he was transferred from the Franklin to the frigate United States, the officers of the latter vessel made a remonstrance to the Commodore twice. The only fellow-officer on a frigate in the Mediterranean who would speak to Levy was the doctor. Another Commodore witnessed that Levy received six or seven shots in mortal combat without returning the fire, remonstrating at every fire with his antagonist:—

As a lieutenant Mr. Levy spent nearly the whole of his time either under arrest or under suspension. It is difficult for a man with four hundred pairs of eyes concentrated upon him to avoid displeasing somebody. Frequently his enemies were successful in having him sentenced to dismissal. They always had him in Coventry, but they never broke his dauntless spirit or impaired his patriotism.

COURT MARTIALLED SIX TIMES.

Moved with admiration by a special deed of daring at Rio de Janeiro, the Emperor of Brazil offered Levy the command of a new Brazilian frigate, which Levy declined, saying he would rather be cabin boy in the U. S. service than a captain in any other fleet. Other conspicuous deeds of courage and patriotism are recorded; and yet—six courts martial, one court of inquiry, a star-chamber known as the "Shubrick board," and the board which replaced his name upon the Naval Register, form a part of the extraordinary official record of Post-Captain Levy. We stand aghast as we contemplate the triviality of the charges of which dignified courts took cognizance.

CASHIERED-BUT RESTORED.

The sentences of these courts-martial—that he be dismissed from the frigate United States,—that he be dismissed from the U. S. Navy—were disapproved by Commodore or President. Again and again he was tried on trumpery and vexatious charges, but no serious charge was ever proved against him. In 1844 he was promoted to a post-captaincy, but his application for a command was taken no notice of. In 1855 a Naval Board dismissed him without warning and without assigning any reason. Happily—despite all the great influence brought to bear against this Jew, the United States Government ordered still another board, which restored him to his rank and emoluments. In 1858 he commanded the Macedonian during a cruise in the Mediterranean as flag-officer of the squadron. He died in New York city, March 22nd, 1862, and was buried with full naval honours.

Among other merits of this prototype of Dreyfus may be mentioned that "the freedom of the city of New York was presented to Captain Levy in recognition of his services in having whipping abolished in the navy." The persecution he suffered was not due to his having entered the navy as sailing master. Other sailing masters similarly promoted experienced no such persecution.

The Largest Monastery in the World.

ACCORDING to Mr. W. J. Wintle in the August Harmsworth, the monastery so distinguished is to be found not in any of the Catholic countries of the Continent, but in our own "Protestant England." It is the Carthusian Priory, known as St. Hugh's, Parkminster. It "stands in an ideal situation for lovers of silence and solitude," about eight miles from Steyning in Sussex, and, as many cyclists know, "the lofty spire of the monastic church forms a conspicuous feature in the landscape." The quadrangle or cloister-garth measures six hundred feet in length, and is said to be the largest in the world. Round this quadrangle stand, each distinct from its neighbour, the tiny villas or cottages or cells of the monks. The monk's "cell" does not consist, as we are perhaps apt to imagine, of a single dungeon sort of apartment: it is a house of four rooms, two up- and two down-stairs, viz., study, bedroom and library, a log-room where the monk saws and chops his firewood, and a carpenter's shop where he works to keep himself in health. Of the life of the monastery these features will be observed with interest :-

Every passing beggar receives a portion of bread and a penny. Formerly much more was given, but the procession of the unwashed that wended its way to Parkminster assumed such proportions that the magistrates were compelled to ask the monks to moderate their generosity. A considerable number of poor people in the neighbourhood are practically maintained by the community, who own six hundred acres-and a large number of houses in the village. Contrary to the custom of most monastic orders, the majority of the services are not held in the church, but are said by each monk in his cell.

They meet in the church at midnight service, which lasts two and a half hours :—

The singing of the Carthusians is peculiar to their order. To the austere tones of the ancient ecclesiastical plainsong the monks have added a weird wailing quality, and the midnight chant seems to be sobbed rather than sung. This is by no means accidental, for the nocturnal worship of the Carthusians is one long lamentation and intercession for the sins of the world. . . . Including the services of the day and night these monks spend ten hours of every twenty-four in prayer and intercession.

The writer closes with the remark :-

If it be true, as Tennyson sang, that "more things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of," then the Carthusian monks at Parkminster are not the least of England's friends. MARK TWAIN ON THE JEW PROBLEM.

Harper's for September contains a paper by Mark Twain "Concerning the Jews." It purports to be written in answer to a Jewish lawyer who asked his cool judgment on the unpopularity of the Jews.

A GOOD WORD FOR SATAN.

Mark Twain begins by declaring himself free from any anti-Jewish feeling. He says:—

I am quite sure that (bar one) I have no race prejudices, and I think I have no colour prejudices nor caste prejudices nor creed prejudices. Indeed, I know it. I can stand any society. All that I care to know is that a man is a human being-that is enough for me; he can't be any worse. I have no special regard for Satan; but I can at least claim that I have no prejudice against him. It may even be that I lean a little his way, on account of his not having a fair show. All religions issue bibles against him, and say the most injurious things about him, but we never hear his side. We have none but the evidence for the prosecution, and yet we have rendered the verdict. To my mind, this is irregular. It is un-English; it is un-American; it is French. Without this precedent Dreyfus could not have been condemned.

Of course, Satan has some kind of a case . . . We can at least respect his talents. A person who has for untold centuries maintained the imposing position of spiritual head of four-fifths of the human race, and political head of the whole of it, must be granted the possession of executive abilities of the loftiest order. In his large presence the other popes and politicians shrink to midges for the microscope. I would like to see him. I would rather see him and shake him by the tail than any other member of the European Concert.

After this prelude the writer proceeds to deal with the Jew. He grants his business ability, his honesty, his benevolence. He pronounces judicially: "The merits and demerits being fairly weighed and measured on both sides, the Christian can claim no superiority over the Jew in the matter of good citizenship." Yet, he observes, "in all countries, from the dawn of history, the Jew has been persistently and implacably hated, and with frequency persecuted." Why?

JOSEPH'S GIGANTIC "CORNER."

He once thought fanaticism was the reason; but not now. He looks far back :

We have all thoughtfully—or unthoughtfully—read the pathetic story of the years of plenty and the years of famine in Egypt, and how Joseph, with that opportunity, made a corner in broken hearts, and the crusts of the poor, and human liberty—a corner whereby he took a nation's money all away, to the last penny; took a nation's live stock all away, to the last hoof; took a nation's land away, to the last acre; then took the nation itself, buying it for bread, man by man, woman by woman, child by child, till all were slaves; a corner which took everything, left nothing; a corner so stupendous that, by comparison with it, the most gigantic corners in subsequent history are but baby things, for it dealt in hundreds of millions of bushels, and its profits were reckonable by hundreds of millions of dollars, and it was a disaster so crushing that its effects have not wholly disappeared from Egypt to-day, more than three thousand years after the event. Is it presu nable that the eye of Egypt was upon Joseph the foreign Jew all this time? I think it likely. Was it friendly? We must doubt it.

Yet all this was centuries before the Crucifixion. The writer then refers to a remark by a Roman historian-" I read it in a translation"-that "some Christians were persecuted in Rome through error, they being mistaken for Jews." Hatred of the Jews thus antedates Christianity.

THE REAL SECRET.

Mark Twain recalls the hatred with which in his Mississippi home the "Yankee" was regarded. "In a trade a Yankee was held to be about five times the match of the Westerner." He was accordingly "competently cursed." So with the Jew :--

I am persuaded that in Russia, Austria, and Germany ninetenths of the hostility to the Jew comes from the average Christian's inability to compete successfully with the average Jew in Lusiness -in either straight business or the questionable sort. England and America give them an open field and yet survive. Scotland offers them an unembarrassed field too, but there are not many takers. There are a few Jews in Glasgow, and one in Aberdeen; but that is because they can't earn enough to get away, Scotch pay themselves that compliment, but it is authentic.

Here speaks the prophet through the satire of the humorist :

The Jew is a money-getter; and in getting his money he is a very seriou; obstruction to less capable neighbours who are on the same quest. I think that that is the trouble. In estimating worldly values the Jew is not shallow, but deep. With precocious wisdom he found out in the morning of time that some men worship rank, some worship heroes, some worship power, some worship God, and that over these ideals they dispute and cannot unite-but that they all worship money; so he made it the end and aim of his life to get it. He was at it in Egypt thirty-six centuries ago; he was at it in Rome when that Christian got persecuted by mistake for him; he has been, at it ever since. The cost to him has been heavy; his success has made the whole human race his enemy-but it has paid, for it has brought him envy, and that is the only thing which men will sell both soul and body to get.

WHAT THE JEW SHOULD DO?

Mark Twain turns with force on his correspondent's plea that Jews have no party—are non-participants. "Perhaps," he cries, "you have let the secret out and given yourself away." Asked if Jews could do anything to improve the situation, he replies :-

In England and America put every Jew on the census-book as a Jew (in case you have not been doing that). Get up volunteer regiments composed of Jews solely, and, when the drum beats, fall in and go to the front. Next, in politics, organise your strength, band together, and deliver the casting vote where you can, and where you can't, compel as good terms as possible. . . . And then from America and England you can encourage your race in Austria, France and Germany, and materially help it.

Of the Austrian situation he says :-

Nine per cent. of the population of the empire, these Jews, and apparently they cannot put a plank into any candidate's platform! If you will send our Irish lads over here I think they will organise your race and change the aspect of the Reichsrath.

The Zionist scheme is dismissed in these words :-

I am not the Sultan, and I am not objecting; but if that concentration of the cunningest brains in the world was going to be made in a free country (bar Scotland), I think it would be politic to stop it. It will not be well to let that race find out its strength. If the horses knew theirs we should not ride any

THE GOLDEN RULE.

Asked "What has become of the golden rule?" the incorrigible satirist replies :-

It exists, it continues to sparkle, and is well taken care of. It is Exhibit A in the Church assets, and we pull it out every Sunday and give it an airing. But you are not permitted to try to smuggle it into this discussion, where it is irrelevant and would not feel at home. It is strictly religious furniture, like an acolyte, or a contribution-plate, or any of those things. It has never been intruded into business; and Jewish persecution is not a religious passion, it is a business passion.

The paper ends :-

All things are mortal but the Jew; all other forces pass, but he remains. What is the secret of his immortality?

fore the i if c Brita in th shou Hes W on th admi I thin Chin no ap direct By a peopl provi Chine would squee

a few locali

under would

of suc

officia

- 66

a lu

Sep

a c carr

han

insu

mas

socia

by dep gradua Th certai mome "we man's the w the sp of Bri thirsty to dej offices

of the friend

"Se Pekin China. Sir Cl Queen bably This is

We right w good ir hundred spread o too glad Minister in the c

WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE IN CHINA.

(1) BE READY TO INDIANISE IT.

"THE White Man's Burden in China" is the title of a lucid discussion of the Far Eastern Question which "Senex" contributes to the Contemporary Review for September. He denounces the partitioning of China as a crime and a blunder. He declares that if it were carried out by France or Germany in their usual high-handed way, they would find themselves face to face with insurmountable opposition on the part of the Chinese masses. Secret societies, by resolute resistance and social boycott, could make life unendurable for the foreigner. But, the writer proceeds to point out—and the foreigner will smile at the naïveté of the argument—if circumstances m. Je occupation a necessity, Great Britain could occupy the whole Yang-tse Valley, and not in the high-handed manner of France or Germany. We should rouse no subterraneous fire of secret society revolt. He says:—

We could proclaim it British protected territory, paint it red on the map, ascume in a general way the responsibility for its administration, and exploit it to advantage commercially. This, I think, we could do with comparative ease. . . . We must rule the Chinese by Chinese men and Chinese methods, from the top, with no appreciable change at any given moment anywhere, except in directions which will be most welcome to the people themselves. By a wise and well-directed policy of this kind the masses of the people will never be stirred against our rule. . . . The various provinces of our future Chinese Empire would then be ruled by Chinese Governors, appointed by the British Government, which would pay them liberal salaries, with strict precautions against squeezing and maladministration. They would be supported by a few British bayonets and British gunboats stationed in central localities; but the majority of the troops would be Chinese under British officers. A practically omnipotent British Resident would "advise" the Viceroys or Governors. After some years of such a rule we could probably afford to introduce British officials in all the higher appointments throughout the country by degrees as vacancies occurred. Presently they would control all the departments. Then the administration would tend gradually to approximate to the Indian standard.

The foreigner will smile again as he reads that "most certainly" this policy is not to be adopted—"at this moment"; but it is possible, and "most probable," that "we shall be practically driven to take up the white man's burden whether we like it or no." Nevertheless, the writer holds we need a small available field force on the spot in the Far East to protect the lives and property of British subjects in the Yang-tse Valley from "blood-thirsty insurgents." He thinks it possible we may have to depend at present on Russian soldiers for these kind offices, and he looks forward to washing out the memories of the Crimea by British and Russian blood shed in friendly co-operation.

WHY NOT UTILISE THE MISSIONARIES?

"Senex" makes a useful suggestion for keeping our Pekin Embassy more in touch with what is going on in China. He remarks on the ignorance which could let Sir Claude MacDonald go off sea-bathing just when the Queen-Dowager's coup d'état was breaking out, as probably every foreign embassy but our own was aware. This is his plan:—

We of all the Powers are, or ought to be if we went the right way to work, in the best possible position for acquiring good information relating to every part of China. There are hundreds of capable and well-informed English missionaries spread over every district therein. Most of them would be only too glad to give valuable reports from time to time to the British Minister at Pekin of the state of affairs in their district. Being in the closest touch with the natives and speaking Chinese, the information which they would supply would be invaluable. They say that their advice and opinion are never sought.

The paper closes with a word of warning as to the possibility of the Yellow Man with the white money ruining the White Man with the yellow money, though the writer disavows bimetallism; and with a hint that China could best save her empire by opening all her coast to European Powers. Their mutual trade jealousies would then prevent exclusive occupation by any Power.

(2) DEAL DIRECTLY WITH THE VICEROYS.

Mr. R. S. Gundry, in a Fortnightly paper on "The Yang-tse Region," gives this advice:—

Suppose we turn now to the Provinces, and see what can be done within the Yang-tse sphere. Each Viceroyalty being a separate unit, having its own finance and its own militia, and enjoying within certain limitations a considerable degree of administrative independence, the local authorities could effect large reforms without overstepping those limits. They would need encouragement, doubtless, and assurance of support. I suggest that we afford that support on condition that they accept our help in introducing necessary reforms. It would be within their power, for instance, to reorganise the Provincial militia, under British officers. There appears to be a consensus of opinion that the reform movement is only checked: that a perception of the necessity for change has made such progress among the younger members of the educated class that it will, sooner or later, be resumed. But the need is pressing, and a eaceful restoration of the Emperor seems beyond hope. . . Within the Yang-tse region the opposition would be less acute. There are no eunuchs, at least, in the palace at Nanking.

(3) THE EMPEROR'S PACE NOT TOO RAPID.

Mr. George S. Owen in the National Review describes the origin and progress of the Chinese Emperor's reform policy. That policy was born the day when the Emperor was forced to sanction the treaty of peace with Japan. Speaking of the coup d'état, the writer says:—

Most people suppose that the Dowager-Empress interposed because the Emperor was pressing on reform too rapidly. Had this been the case, she would probably have said so; but there is no hint of it in any of her edicts. Her reasons were personal. She interfered with the reformers because they were going to interfere with her. The Emperor's pace was no doubt rapid, too rapid in the opinion of many foreigners, but nearly all foreigners said the same thing thirty years ago about Japan, and prophesied a speedy collapse. The new system was called "a house of cards" or "a bit of thin veneer." Asiatics, however, have their own way of doing things; they generally move in masses, and with a rush. Besides, the times required immediate action. The European nations were pressing on China, and she was in danger of going to pieces. The peril was at the door and must be faced at once.

BACK UP THE REFORMING EMPEROR!

Mr. Owen by no means despairs of effecting reforms through the Pekin Government. He says:—

It is not too late to aid the cause of reform even now. Our Foreign Office might, in a sympathetic despatch, represent to the Chinese Government the peril in which the present reactionary régime is placing China, and advise the Emperor, who is still the nominal ruler, to resume the course of reform begun last year. The United States and Japan might be invited at the same time to make a similar representation. The Empress-Dowager would not venture to disregard such influential advice, and would probably withdraw her opposition to reform. The Emperor, again on his throne, would speedily recall the scattered remnant of his old advisers, and, calling to his assistance foreign experts, would bend all his energies to the reorganisation of his great empire. It is a stupendous task, but not impossible. What Japan has done so successfully, why should China not do? And a reformed China is the solution of so many difficulties that it is worth our while to make a strenuous effort to secure it.

nine-siness gland tland many deen; The

the is a re on

with that orship they

y; so s at it when s been, uccess d, for dent's pants. given

men

a-book et up en the olitics, easting terms

ou can

, and

Jews, idate's think of the

if that going uld be nd out le any of. It every to try colyte, never not a ss, but

AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

THE August and September numbers of the Pall Mall Magazine contain articles by Mr. William Archer recording his impressions of America from the point of view of internal unity and in its relations with England.

NORTH AND SOUTH.

The Spanish War, says Mr. Archer, has for ever effaced the memories of the great civil struggle, and consummated the process of consolidation which has been going on for the last twenty years. It deposed the Civil War from its position as the last event of great external picturesqueness in the national history. A new line of cleavage has been substituted for the old. The States of the Atlantic seaboard are drawing together to counterpoise the growing predominance of the West; but this conflict of interest is a natural one in a country like America, which, Mr. Archer insists, is not a simple national organism resembling a European State, but a great congeries of communities, united in spite of difficulties in many respects resembling those which keep Europe disunited.

A HARBINGER OF UNITY.

In this lies the hope of Europe in the future :-

The United States of America, let us say, is a rehearsal for the United States of Europe, nay of the World. It is the very difficulties over which the croakers shake their heads that make the experiment interesting, momentous. The United States is a veritable microcosm: it presents in little all the elements which go to make up a world, and which have hitherto kept the world, almost unintermittently, in a state of battle and bloodshed. There are wide differences of climate and of geographical conditions in the United States, with the resulting conflicts of material interest between different regions of the country. There are differences of race and even of language to be overcome, extremes of wealth and poverty to be dealt with. As though to make sure that no factor in the problem of civilisation should be omitted, the men of last century were at pains to saddle their descendants with the burden of the negro—a race incapable of assimilation and yet tenacious of life. In brief, a thousand difficulties and temptations to dissension beset the giant Republic: in so far as it overcomes them, and carries on its development by peaceful methods, it presents a unique and invaluable object-lesson to the world.

THE EMPIRE AND THE REPUBLIC.

Of the probable drawing together of the nations Mr. Archer sees the first germs in the sympathy between England and America created by the late war. Before the war neither love nor hatred, but indifference was the keynote of American tendencies towards England. But this was an indifference which might easily have been deflected into dislike; it is now an indifference which tends if anything to friendship. But this change is only of recent growth:—

We deceive ourselves if we imagine that there is, or at any rate that there was until recently, the slightest sentimental attachment to England in the heart of the American people at large. Among the "hyphenated Americans," as they are called—Irish-Americans, German-Americans, and so forth—it would be folly to look for any such feeling. The conciliation of America will never be complete until we have achieved the conciliation of Ireland. It is evident, indeed, from many symptoms, that Irish-American hostility to England is declining, if not in rancour, at any rate in influence.

THE AMERICAN IN ENGLAND.

But Mr. Archer thinks that the American's view of England differs very much from the Englishman's view of America. The Englishman never can realise that the United States is a foreign country:—

But that is precisely what England is to millions of Americans—a foreign country like any other. We see this even in many travelling Americans; much more is it to be noted in multitudes who stay at home. Many Americans seem curiously indifferent even to the comfort of being able to speak their own language in England; probably because they have less false shame than the average Englishman in adventuring among the pitfalls of a foreign tongue. They—this particular class of travellers, I mean—land in England without emotion, visit its shrines without sentiment, and pass on to France and Italy with no other feeling than one of relief in escaping from the London fog. These travellers, however, are but single spies sent forth by vast battalions who never cross the ocean. To them England is a mere name, and the name, moreover, of their fathers' one enemy in war, their own chief rival in trade. They have no points of contact with England, such as almost every Englishman has with America.

in

CO

ba

W

pr

th

ba

w

fr

W

he

no

pi

pi

T

he

M

ex

le In

ha

ne

th

aı

pi W ec

la

E

of

Sa

to

na

01

th

of

ît

ne

to

b

th

SC

ti

di

COCKNEYISM IN DISGUISE.

Nevertheless the travelling Englishman is intolerant of American customs; and this intolerance leads to many misunderstandings. An English friend declared to him that he could not tolerate Americans because they hung up their trousers instead of folding them:—

The same vice, in a more insidious form, appears in a remark made to me the other day by an Englishman of very high intelligence, who had made a long tour in America, and was, in the main, far from unsympathetic. "What I felt," he said, "was the suburbanism of everything. It was all Clapham or Camberwell on a gigantic scale." Some justice of observation may possibly have lain behind this remark, though I certainly failed to recognise it. But in the form of its expression it exemplified that illusion of metropolitanism, which is to my mind the veriest cockneyism in disguise, and which cannot but strike Americans as either ridiculous or offensive.

A CITY OF MANY SUPERLATIVES.

MR. W. J. GORDON takes as the subject for one of his charming city-sketches in the September number of the Leisure Hour the Port of Belfast. He frankly confesses that it is a much better place than he expected "in these days of unscrupulous advertisement." Belfast, standing on land mostly won from the water, and on a harbour which is artificial for miles, is "the largest and most progressive town in Ireland, numbering a third of a million inhabitants, and extending and improving yearly." Comparing it with other towns, Mr. Gordon says:—

It is in a better position, with better surroundings than most; it has no particularly brilliant architecture, but nothing conspicuously monotonous or bad; of churches or chapels it has a hundred and fifty, of which perhaps half a dozen are rememberable for their good features, but there is no centre, nothing that dominates the crowd of spires and chimneys, which perhaps may be done by the city buildings now rising on the site of the old Linen Hall. Its streets are wide and modern.

It became a port in 1637, but its principal progress as a seagate began with the making of the river eighty years ago. The Harbour Commissioners have now four miles of quays under their control, and receive yearly in dues £150,000. Belfast, says Mr. Gordon, "admires the large, and fortune has favoured it":—

It claims to have the five biggest things of their kind in the world: the biggest shipyard which built the biggest ship, the biggest rope-work, the biggest linen factory, the biggest whisky store, and the biggest tobacco factory.

The biggest shipyard belongs to Messrs. Harland and Wolff; the biggest ship is the Occanic; the biggest ropework is that which has the son of "Self-Help" Smiles as its manager; the biggest factory, built by Mr. Mulholland, now belongs to the York Street Flax Spinning Company. As a set-off to the biggest whisky store may be put the fact that Belfast is the chief seat of the manufacture of acrated waters in the United Kingdom; and though it has the biggest tobacco factory, Belfast is, as Mr. Gordon's pictures show, by no means one of the smokiest of towns.

EXPORT AND IMPORT.

A ROSY VIEW OF ENGLISH TRADE.

A WELL-INFORMED writer, M. S. J. Rapoport, writing in the Vyestnik Yevropui for August, denounces what he considers to be the Protectionist conspiracy in England based on the economic fallacy that increase of imports over exports is a symptom of declining trade. writer's solicitude for Free Trade in England might be suspected of a purely patriotic origin were it not that he professes himself in favour of Free Trade all round, and would apply to Russia itself the great principle which he thinks is now imperilled in this country. It is the 'consumer" now, not religion or thrones, for which battles are fought and armies increased; and on the day when the export-and-import superstition shall vanish from the minds of the people, militarism and all its ills will vanish also. "With the abolition of custom houses," he says, "cannons will disappear and soldiers will have nothing to do."

The greatest danger to the spread of Free Trade principles now comes from England, the only country in which the principle is recognised; and this danger proceeds from the panic-fear which has been caused in this country by the increase of exports from Germany. This fear has so taken possession of certain minds in England, that even Ministers of the Crown do not hesitate to express their apprehensions. "Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Chamberlain have more than once expressed themselves, if not inimically to Free Trade, at least favourably to Protection." Of this, the idea of an Imperial Customs Union and the West Indian agitation have been the most notable symptoms.

All this, says the writer, is a blind superstition, for never was British trade more flourishing than now; and this is proven by the extraordinary internal prosperity of the country, the demand for better housing, better clothes, and better food by the people. M. Rapoport takes to pieces the "made in Germany" scare, denouncing Mr. Williams' book as " babbling," and declares that technical education in England has been so developed within the last decade that there is danger of general education suffering. The smaller polytechnic schools of provincial England and suburban London are equipped in a way which is only met with in the richest technical institutes of the Continent.

All apprehensions as to the decay of English trade, says the writer, are based upon a misunderstanding as to the real objects of international exchange. International exchange ceases to be an aim in itself, a source of wealth, and becomes more and more an instrument for the satisfaction of certain requirements. Ricardo's theory of international commerce, though it remains true for the past, has lost its significance for the future, and is losing it at the present day. England exports not because she needs purchasers, but because she needs imports. She needs tea and coffee, and grain and wine, which she cannot produce at home; and in payment she is forced to export cloths and other products which are required by other peoples. Her large imports are in themselves the best guarantee of her national prosperity. It is an absurd mistake to look on great exchange of goods as a source of riches, instead of what it really is, the result of increased demand resulting from riches.

M. Rapoport gives an interesting sketch of the agitation which, under the specious name of "Fair Trade," disguises a desire for a return to Protection; and con-cludes that Protection has not and cannot make any progress in England, its open advocates being too insignificant and its secret friends in high places too much afraid of public opinion. He sees, nevertheless, an attempt to introduce the thin end of the wedge in legislation dealing with imitations, diseases of cattle, and foreign prison labour; but beyond this no one will go. The view which regards the Free Trade struggle in England as essentially a conflict between the agricultural and manufacturing classes is a wrong one, proceeding as it did from the mere accidental coincidence of the landlords with Protectionism, and the manufacturers with Free Trade. In Russia at the present day the interests of the landowners coincide with Free Trade. The struggle in essence is not one between two classes. but between two constant tendencies of the human mind. Free international trade is an emblem of the living community of all peoples, of the brotherhood of men and of general solidarity.

What Degrades Domestic Service.

MISTRESSES would do well to read the paper on domestic service and the responsibilities of employers which is contributed to the August Forum by Mary Roberts Smith, associate professor of sociology in Leland Stanford Junior University. The writer finds the cause of the increasing disfavour with which domestic service is regarded chiefly in three things: as compared with other occupations, its irregularity of hours, social stigma, and lack of personal independence. The social stigma is traced to the fact that household service, almost alone among all classes of labour, has not yet been emanci-pated from the traditions of feudal servility. The learned Professor proceeds :-

A deeper cause, however, is the liking of human nature to command its inferiors. Women especially do not want intelligent equals to serve them: they want an inferior, a subordinate—a servant, not an employee. Compare the attitude of the business man toward an employee, and the attitude of the mistress toward the servant. Because there is this indefinable social stigma attaching to service, intelligent, self-respecting women shun it: because self-respecting women shun it, the social stigma increases. Cause and effect are reciprocal. The fact of social inferiority is expressed in many petty ways,-by the use of the Christian name, by the requirement of livery when not on duty, by a servile manner, and, more than all, by the social isolation. Every other class has its amusements, every other girl her opportunity for suitable marriage; but the maidservant must go out of doors to be entertained or to be courted. Some of this is due to the low social standard of domestics as a class; but much more of it is to be attributed to the notions of the mistress. The social ban extends to every stratum of society: the petty tradesman will marry a sewing-girl, a shop-girl, a tailoress, but not a "hired" girl; the working girls' clubs admit all kinds of respectable women to their membership except the domestic. Socially, the domestic is tabooed, ignored, slighted by every class except the day-labourer.

That it is a woman who thus probes the weakness of the mistress-mind adds to the pungency of the remarks.

McClure's for August is described on the cover as a "midsummer fiction number." It does not belie its title. Out of its eleven articles only three cannot be classed as fiction. Ray Stannard Baker tells how three Northern secret service men captured a Confederate mail, and maintained a heroic defence with revolvers against two hundred and fifty Southern cavalrymen. They escaped on parole—with the enemy's mail-bags! The story is told as thrillingly as a romance. The same may be said of Ida M. Tarbell's graphic tale of Lincoln's assassination.

different language me than alls of a ravellers. shrines with no London ent forth England ers' one have no Englisholerant ads to eclared se they remark ry high nd was, he said, ham or ervation

ertainly

ssion it to my

not but of his of the nfesses these anding arbour

most

l of a early." most; t has a emberng that os may he old ess as years miles dues large, in the ip, the dand ropees as lland, pany. t the

are of igh it don's owns.

WOMAN'S WORLD PARLIAMENT:

Two OPPOSITE VIEWS.

THE North American Review for August opens with two very different versions of the Women's International Conference held in London earlier in this summer.

(1) BY THE COUNTESS OF ABERDEEN.

The first is by the President, the Countess of Aberdeen, and a very gratified retrospect it is of "The Woman's International Parliament," as she calls it. She says:—

That the Congress has been a success is indisputable, and is testified to from most unexpected quarters. The fact that meetings on the most varied subjects, going on in five sections simultaneously for a week, were always crowded by persons who had thought it worth while to pay for their seats, is sufficient evidence in itself. A list of over two thousand five hundred members of the Congress, a financial balance on the right side, and a collection of valuable papers presented by some four hundred speakers from different parts of the world, and experts on their own subjects, these are the visible results we have left to us

"CO-OPERATION WITH MEN."

The Countess mentions, as possibly the first practical outcome of the Conference, the endeavour, initiated by Mr. Gilbert Parker, to promote homes for educated working women. She remarks:—

That this action should have been suggested by a man is in itself typical of the spirit of the Congress. We have sought to emphasise by every means in our power that we welcomed all to our platforms who were interested in women's work, and that we considered that women's work could only reach its highest development when done in co-operation with men, and regarding the home as the centre to work from.

The writer regrets that the public attention was diverted by the public meetings from the business session of the Council, which was sedulously drawing closer the links binding together the various National Councils. She insists that the delegates were not self-elected, but were duly chosen either by National Councils or representative National Committees. The Chinese representative, Madame Shen, was "officially appointed from China through the Chinese Ambassador in England." While regretting the lack of opportunity for more personal fellowship, the writer refers with pleasure to the great receptions given.

THREE MEMORABLE SCENES.

She singles out as specially memorable scenes the opening gathering at the Church House, "where representative women from all the continents of the world mustered for the roll-call;" the stately special service in Westminster Abbey conducted by the Bishop of Southampton; and the gracious reception given to the foreign, American and Colonial delegates by the Queen of England at Windsor. The Countess observes:—

It was a moving sight to see the aged sovereign, whose sixty years' reign has done more for women than the centuries which preceded it, and whose name is loved and venerated in all the countries of the world, both as the ideal Queen and the ideal woman, slowly moving in her carriage across the quadrangle of the old Castle, past the long rows of women who, in all parts of the earth, are trying to leave the world better than they found it.

(2) AN ADVERSE CRITICISM.

The rôle of "the spirit who denies" is taken by Kassandra Vivaria. She does not think that the Council marked any considerable or lasting step in the development of women's intelligence. She says:—

Slowly... the conviction dawned on me that there was something young and amateurish and beside the mark in many of the papers read, and that the general drift of these was to merge the individual work of clever women into a kind of collective fanaticism, to bring to the front too many of the women only capable of mediocrity, and to isolate the work of woman from the work of man. There are several remarks which I think no one who attended the Congress can fail to have made4, for instance, that the standard of the speeches, apart from some brilliant exceptions, was not high; that the tendency was to lower the increased scope of woman's work, which is an ideal, into a sex question, which is a fad; that much that was said sounded illogical towards nature, and was intensely feminine in the calm ignoring of facts that have governed the world, and that, unless not social prejudices, but physical laws can be reversed, must go on governing it.

WHY SET "WOMAN" AGAINST "MAN"?

The writer especially objects to the tendency of the Council—which, by-the-bye, Lady Aberdeen above point blank denies—to set up woman's work as apart from man's work, and antagonistic to it. She says:—

A persistency in this kind of isolation, of feminine freemasonry, is, to say the least, impolitic. Where will woman's effort be if, by dint of isolation, she should either estrange man from her struggle more than he is already estranged, or reducethe directing and supporting heads of the world to the state of puppets? We have seen them, these men whom hard, laborious, but selfish women had apparently taught that sweet femininity no longer exists, and would not be a good thing if it did. They are not many, and they are not good specimens. We have seen them too, those other men whom woman has subjected by her intelligence and her exactions, following her lead and shining at her tea parties, and we have not found them men.

CONJUGAL MERCENARIES-OH, HORROR!

The writer is greatly shocked at the suggestion that a wife, who does more work than any housekeeper, should receive at least a housekeeper's wages. She says:—

The lady who spoke of "the unpaid services of the housewife" would, I think, if her views were to be generalised, turn away from matrimony more men than already step back, frightened by the rather appalling aspect that so many modern women think it their duty to assume. . . It seems rather hard on man that he should have to pay his wife for superintending the comfortable home which she has the greater opportunities of enjoying, from the fact that she need not usually, once married, spend her days in city offices in order to support her family.

THE THREE TYPES OF WOMANHOOD.

The writer fears that "the woman of action, as a type, after having rapidly changed for the better, is beginning to deteriorate." She finds portrayed in the Song of Songs the three types of woman—the two imperfect that have been, and the perfect that will be.

These are her texts: "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense?"—the traditional woman, a streak of smoke rising from the domestic sacrifice perfumed with the fragrance of self-forgetting bitterness and death.

The emancipated woman—clear, cold, combative—is found limned in the cry, "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"

The ideal woman yet to be, affluent in delights and twin-souled with man, answers the question, "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, rich in joy, leaning upon her beloved?"

The writer concludes with the hope "that before the next International Congress symptoms of a change will appear, signs that hearts are beginning to throb quicker side by side with the brains that strive." The conception of beauty, if applied to woman's character and heart, must be realised in the main by aid of two forces—"not exactly what women have been demanding lately."—"more pain and more love."

THI Bernai for Au Plays, in his Cham respon

"TE

Thi about

" midd Englar he mal of Am does w Englis himsel the Ex

of lite The said to anythi salary and p new p ten do

Mr

in E novel

and l

from into a being of a subur preve which or o finall actre inten

66

On celebi The given subur Brow perfo only pay a the so of it the results.

perfo

theat

from

hand

wher

betw

"THE MOST POWERFUL MAN IN ENGLAND."

WHO IS HE?

ind of

of the ork of which have

h is an

t was ninine

d, and an be

f the point

from freeman's

man

educe

ate of

rious, ninity

They

seen her ng at

at a ouse-

turn

ack, dern

hard ding

s of

ied,

ing of hat

of rrh

of

ith

eth

ın,

nd is

y,

he

er

pot

apart

This so distinguished personage is, according to Mr. Bernard Shaw, writing in the North American Review for August, none other than the little known Examiner of Plays, who keeps the conscience of the Lord Chamberlain in his capacity as censor of the English stage. The Lord Chamberlain is but "the Malvolio of St. James' Palace, responsible to nobody but the Queen."

THE EXAMINER OF PLAYS!

This royal steward being much too busy to trouble about dramas—

The result is that the Examiner of Plays, humble, untitled, "middle-class" though he be, is yet the most powerful man in England or America. Other people may make England's laws; he makes and unmakes its drama, and therefore also the drama of America. . . The Examiner of Plays, greater than all these, does what he likes, caring not a dump for nations or constitutions, English or American. The President of the United States himself practically cannot see a new play without first getting the Examiner's leave.

The person selected for the onerous post is no professor of literature or dramaturgy:—

The post is held at present by one George Alexander Redford, said to have been a bank clerk, but not ascertained to have been anything except lucky enough to obtain a place at Court with a salary of some fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars a year, and powers to exact from every author or manager producing a new play five dollars and a quarter for each one-act plece, and ten dollars and a half for each piece of two or more acts.

HOW THE STAGE CENSOR WAS OVERREACHED.

Mr. Shaw recounts some strange oddities of stage right in England. Whoever gets a version, say of a popular novel, licensed and put on the stage, has the stage right; and hence one novelist had to buy back his stage right from a sharp country solicitor who had turned his novel into a drama and had it licensed. To prevent themselves being thus forestalled, novelists push through some sort of a stage version, and get it furtively performed at some suburban theatre. The same thing is gone through to prevent a version being performed first in America, in which the English stage right in a play is forfeited.

Mr. Shaw then tells how Examiners have been mollified or overreached. A French play at first refused was finally granted a license by the late Examiner on the actress promising to insert the words, "I sinned but in intention," in confessing to an early intrigue.

"THE CENCI" ACTED IN SPITE OF THE CENSOR.

Here is the story of a famous evasion of the Censor:—On the centenary of Shelley's birth, it was proposed to celebrate that occasion by a performance of "The Cenci."
The Examiner would not hear of it; but the performance was given for all that in the Grand Theatre, Islington (a northern suburb of London), before an audience of poets, headed by Browning, and a crowd of their disciples. Technically, this performance was not a public representation of the play: it was only a meeting of the Shelley Society. The spectators did not pay at the doors: they had all joined the Shelley Society for the season, and were attending this particular "private" meeting of it in the exercise of their ordinary right as members. For the moment the defeat of the Censor was complete. But the performance had taken place in a London theatre; and London theatres are subject to the Lord Chamberlain, who licenses them from year to year. The unfortunate lessee, having let his house to the Shelley Society (without any knowledge of the plot in hand), found himself at the mercy of the outraged Chamberlain when the time came for renewing his license. What passed between them is not known; but there is now a clause in the lease of that theatre stipulating that no performances of unlicensed plays shall be given in it. When the Shelley Society proposed to repeat "The Cenci" some years later, the Lord Chamberlain was master of the situation.

HOW "GHOSTS" EVADED HIM.

Since then, says Mr. Shaw, "the blockade has been run only by the Independent Theatre, which succeeded in producing Ibsen's 'Ghosts' on three occasions without a license." The first time it was technically "private" and without a license in the Independent Theatre; the second time it was given at an "At Home" by the founder of the same theatre in a hall let for miscellaneous public purposes; and similarly the third time also.

THE ENGLISHMAN AS MR. SHAW SEES HIM.

Mr. Shaw is kind enough to explain this sort of British censorship to American readers by saying of the Englishman:—

Far from believing that either he himself or anybody else can be safely trusted with further liberties, he lives absolutely convinced that only by a strenuous maintenance of restrictive laws and customs, supported on every public occasion by the most reverent professions of faith and loyalty, feigned or sincere, can Society be withheld from casting all moral considerations to the winds and committing suicide in a general Saturnalia of reckless debauchery. I do not pretend that this will be accepted in England as a sane statement of fact; for, if England were conscious of its own absurdity, it would cease to be absurd.... For myself, as a dramatic author, I can say that few things would surprise me more than to meet a representative Englishman who regarded my desire to abolish the Censor otherwise than he would regard the desire of a pickpocket to abolish the police.

THE RULES OF THE STAGE CENSOR.

Mr. Shaw, having thus relieved his feelings, endeavours, charitably enough, to put into words for the Examiner the (mostly unwritten) rules which appear to guide his procedure. He makes Mr. Redford say:—

There is one rule that never varies, and never can vary; and that rule is that a play must not be made the vehicle of new opinions on important subjects, because new opinions are always questionable opinions, and I cannot make Her Majesty the Queen responsible for questionable opinions by licensing them. The other rules are simple enough. You mustn't dramatise any of the stories in the Bible. You mustn't make fun of ambassadors, Cabinet Ministers, or any living persons who have influence in fashionable society, though no notice will be taken of a gag at the expense of General Booth, or a Socialist or Labour member of the County Council, or people of that sort. You mustn't have any love affairs within the tables of Consanguinity in the Prayer Book. If you introduce a male libertine in a serious play, you had better "redeem" him in the end by marrying him to an innocent young lady. If a female libertine, it will not matter if she dies at the end, and takes some opportunity to burst into tears on touching the hand of a respectable girl.

Mr. Shaw's remedy is simply to abolish the Censorship, and throw the legal responsibility for plays on author and manager, as for books on author and publisher. But Mr. Shaw utterly despairs of this remedy being adopted, and declares that the stage censorship will probably outlive the House of Lords and the Established Church.

The chief features in the Lady's Realm for September are sketches of Princess Victoria of Wales, of whom little is told beyond her amiability of character, of Onslow Ford, and of the Rev. Arthur Robins, of Windsor. A subject peculiarly fascinating to the feminine mind is treated under the heading of "Royal Trousseaux." Marion Leslie furnishes interesting particulars about the spinning and weaving school in Blenheim Street, founded by Miss Clive Bayley.

FREE DINNERS FOR WORKPEOPLE.

A CAPITALIST'S SUGGESTION.

It is not in any Socialist print that the proposal is made, but in the Engineering Magazine, and in the same August number in which another writer, Mr. John Swinburne, says, "Socialism consists chiefly in dissatisfaction with all possible economic conditions." The proposer is Mr. H. F. L. Orcutt, his general subject is "machineshop management in Europe and America," his particular, "elements of a modern machine-shop."

WANTED-A LABORATORY.

He puts forward a plea for a laboratory in every important machine-shop. He says:-

It is remarkable what a long-suffering victim the machine-shop has been simply because it has not made use of any scientific methods to check the mysterious workings of iron and steel makers. The laboratory should be an auxiliary to the machine-shop, the value of which is, I believe, not yet recognised by any machine-tool maker, either European or American. It is, howevere, to be thoroughly tried by the Loewe Company, who are fitting up a laboratory adapted to machine-shop requirements, for the chemical and physical testing of all materials which enter into the construction of a machine-tool. The results will be watched with interest by all machine-tool makers, and it is hoped that the laboratory will be of use in determining the exact specifications of material, particularly of that used in cutting-tools.

"IT WOULD BE A PAYING INSTITUTION."

He goes on to treat of heating, ventilating and lighting, and to remark:—

To secure the greatest comfort and the best surroundings for workmen is, as almost every manufacturer will admit, a paying investment; at the same time, the practical value of these accessories is scarcely ever fully realised. The health of workmen is of first importance, and by the absence of discomforting and distracted surroundings their efficiency is increased. As far as I know, no machine shop has tried the experiment of supporting a restaurant, and of giving the men a good mid-day meal, free of cost to the employees. I am strongly of the opinion that free dinners would be a paying institution. In European shops where the standard of living is, amongst employees, lower than in America, a good dinner could easily be supplied at a cost of sixpence, or fifty pfennigs per head. If free, this would be equivalent to increasing the pay of each man by the cost of the meal, with the certainty that that portion of his wages was used for the material welfare both of himself and of his employer, and was not devoted to beer, which does not nourish but incapacitates. To a machine shop of any considerable size, I look upon a restaurant as an element worthy of consideration.

"FIRST, LAST AND ALWAYS."

This is Mr. Orcutt's parting counsel:-

First, last and always should manufacturers, especially those who are to erect new shops, remember that it is economy as well as humanity to plan factories "in which human life is of more account than machinery," into which human beings will not be driven by hunger, but attracted by superior hygienic surroundings—air, light, comfort, as well as by the most modern equipments for saving labour, increasing output and raising the standard of workmanship and wages. Specialisation is an economic necessity. How to mitigate the incapacitating effects of routine work is one of the coming industrial problems. The least that capital can do at present towards solving this problem is to erect rational workshops.

In the August number of the Law Magazine and Review are two appreciative articles on the late Viscount Esher, Master of the Rolls, by A. R. Jelf, Q.C., and a member of the Northern Circuit.

LIFE IN NOVA ZEMBLA.

ESPECIAL interest in this tropical weather attaches to Mr. J. Russell-Jeaffreson's paper in the September Windsor on "A Summer Visit to Nova Zembla." The writer went in 1896 on the Russian mail-steamer in company with the Governor of Archangel. Nova Zembla was, he says, no man's land until 1872, when it was taken by Russia. In 1873 it was placed under the Humane Society, who built and stocked three huts for the benefit of shipwrecked or storm-stayed mariners. It 1892 it was put under the official oversight of the Archangel Government, and a colony of 88 Samoyads, which in 1898 had grown to 120, including a priest and an unqualified peasant doctor. He says:—

There are now two settlements, the largest, Karmenkula, consisting of three big wooden houses, a church, a wooden parsonage, a store, a bath, and six to twelve chooms, or native skin wigwam-like huts. The other settlement, purely a native one, consists of chooms only, eight in number. . . . Now a vessel visits this island twice a year—in July and September—and stays a day or two at each settlement. Barring that, and between those times, there is no communication whatever with the mainland, for no one is allowed to land without a special permit. This is to discourage what used to happen in the old days when a foreign fishing-boat would land, and after dosing the Samoyads with brandy, would induce them to part with all their year's catch for a few more bottles of "vodka" to continuatheir "bust" on; so now the Governor, when he cannot go himself, sends his Secretary every year to negotiate with them. The product of each man's hunting is taken to Archangel and an account in his name is kept at the bank. If he is poor or unlucky the Governor helps him, if not he gets his money and can, through the Secretary, order what he wants up to his balance.

WIVES SUPPLIED ON APPRO.

Gunpowder, lead, tea, sugar, flour, china cups (a great delicacy), knives, salt, cloth, needles, dogs, snuff, tobacco, were the chief of the orders given. I heard one added a wife, and his order, which was serious, was booked by the Secretary, and next'voyage the Governor sent him one, a girl from the Samoyad settlement on the Petitioya. He was very pleased, but next time the boat called (the Governor told me this story at the English Club at Archangel, when we were dining, and we roared over it) the Samoyad sent the girl back to the Secretary with a message to the Governor that he must change this wife (as if she were a gun or a bale of merchandise) for another, as she was no good, too lazy, and a poor cook, and he refused to keep her; so the Secretary had to take the poor girl home and another wife was sent him. This time, I heard, it was a success, perhaps backed by the Governor's message that he would not change any wives sent again. This couple he sent on a honeymoon to Solivetski Monastery, as a sort of example and pilgrimage.

"ONE DOG BETTER THAN TEN WIVES."

Naturally the natives have no very exalted view of womankind:-

Sitting on an upturned saucepan in a choom chatting to one, I said, "You have here a nice home, a wife and children, and yet you say you are not satisfied. What more do you want?" "Dogs," was the laconic reply. "One dog better than ten wives ' wives can't drag sledge and catch deer; want dogs."

A QUAINT FAREWELL.

When the Governor left, a pathetic farewell was given him. The whole colony knelt to kiss his feet, and one said for the rest:—

"I, poor, dirty Samoyad, to you, great father, can nothing give; but there" (pointing to the sky) "is our God, yours, great father, and mine, poor Samoyad. He will give you all happiness, a happy voyage and a good, happy, lawful wife. God with you, God with you, a Samoyad's good-bye. Goodbye, great white father, good-bye."

MR Contect late Je by the chara in ma in acc shortl

CA

I all warrar
the vis
in the touch Gover
the Ch exercis Churc
though it for

In

I d

Apos

Churc teach such differ insan morta Pius sense Eliza this

R

and

As centre sustanation least whice the every of till other grade

may
A rathe neith
such publ Cha taler
its e utter esta

0

CARDINAL NEWMAN ON CATHOLIC CRIME.

FIVE HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED LETTERS.

MR. J. R. MOZLEY publishes in the September Contemporary five letters written him by his uncle, the late John Henry Newman, in 1875. The question raised by the nephew was the difficulty of admitting the Divine character of the Roman Church, when its conduct had in many cases, and its influence in others, been so little in accord with Divine morality. The uncle's answer was shortly:—

I allow, then (and for argument's sake I allow more than facts warrant), the existence of that flood of evil which shocks you in the visible Chu ch; but for me, if it touched my faith mortally in the divinity of Catholicism, it would, by parity of reason, touch my faith in the Being of a Personal God and Moral Governor. The great quistion to me is, not what evil is left in the Church, but what good has energised in it and been practically exercised in it, and has left its mark there for all posterity. The Church has its sufficient work if it efficies positive good, even though it does not destroy evil except so far forth as it supplants it for good.

THE SPANISH INQUISITION.

In a later letter :--

I do confess that bad is in the Church, but not that it springs from the Church's teaching or system, bu', as our Lord and His Apostles predicted it would be, in the Church, but not of it, Good men and good works, such as we find them in Church history, seem to me the legitimate birth of Church teaching, whereas the deeds of the Spanish Inquisition, if they are such as they are said to be, came from a teaching altogether different from that which the Church professes. I think such insane acts as St. Bartholomew's Massacra were prompted by mortal fear. . . . I was reading the other day a defence of Pius V. against Lord Acton, the point of which was that in no sense was it the Pope who sanctioned the plot for assassinating Elizabeth, but the Duke of Alva. Yet who can deny, true as this may be, still that to readers of history the Pope and the Duke are in one boat?

LATIN AND "MORIBUND NATIONS."

Recent speech of "dying nations" and Latin decadence and "Americanism" gives point to these remarks of Newman—written a quarter of a century ago :—

As to the state of Catholic Europe during these last three centuries, I begin by allowing or urging that the Church has sustained a severe loss, as well as the English and German nationalities themselves, by their elimination from it, not the least of the evil being that in consequence the Latin element, which is in the ascendant, does not, cannot know, how great the loss is. This is an evil which the present disestablishment everywhere going on may at length correct. Influential portions of the Latin races may fall off; and if Popes are chosen from other nationalities, other ideas will circulate among us and gradually gain influence. . . At present the Catholic Church is encumbered by its connection with moribund nations.

ADVANTAGES OF DISESTABLISHMENT.

On the temporal power Newman says something that may sound strange in orthodox ears, e.g.:—

As to the bad government in the Papal States, I allow, or rather argue, that an ecclesiastical world-wide sovereign has neither time nor thought to bestow on secular matters, and that such matters go to rack and ruin, and cause great scandal in public opinion, as surely as would happen if I undertook to be Chancellor of the Exchequer. The temporal prosperity, success, talent, renown of the Papacy did not make me a Catholic, and its errors and misfortunes have no power to unsettle me. Its utter disestablishment may only make it stronger and purer, removing the very evils which are the cause of its being disestablished.

" POPES HAVE ERRED."

In answer to the question whether the Church of Rome as a society has not done or sanctioned actions which were wrong, Newman replies:—

I should say that the Church has two sides, a human and a divine, and that everything that is human is liable to error . . . I have no difficulty in supposing that Popes have erred, or Councils have erred, or populations have erred, in human aspects, because, as St. Paul says, "We have this treasure in earthly vessels," speaking of the Apostles themselves. No one is impeccable, and no collection of men. I grant that the Church's teaching, which in its formal exhibitions is divine, has been at times perverted by its officials, representatives, subjects, who are human. I grant that it has not done so much good as it might have done. I grant that in its action, which is human, it is a fair mark for criticism or blame. But what I maintain is, that it has done an incalculable amount of good, that it has done good of a special kind, such as no other historical polity or teaching or worship has done, and that that good has come from its professed principles, and that its shortcomings and omissions have come from a neglect or an interruption of its principles.

THE ETHICAL SYSTEM DISTINCTIVE.

What Mr. Mozley rightly considers the most vital point in the controversy is given in the following passage:—

I consider it historically undeniable-First, that in the time of the early Roman Empire, when Christianity arose, it arose with a certain definite ethical system, which it proclaimed to be allimportant, all-necessary for the present and future welfare of the human race, and of every individual member of it, and which is simply ascertainable now and unmistakable. Next, I have a clear perception, clearer and clearer as my own experience of existing religions increases, and such as every one will share with me, who carefully examines the matter, that share with the wind large with this ethical system ($\tilde{\theta}\theta \text{we} used to call it at Oxford as realised in individuals) is the living principle also of present Catholicism, and not in any form of Protestantism whatever -living, both as to its essential life, and also as being its vigorous motive power; both because without it Catholicism would soon go ou', and because through it Catholicism makes itself manifest, and is recognised. Outward circumstances or conditions of its presence may change or not; the Pope may be a subject one day, a sovereign another; primus inter pares in early times, the episcopus episcoporum now; there might be no devotions to the Blessed Virgin formerly, they may be superabundant of late; the Holy Eucharist might be a bare commemoration in the first century, and is a sacrifice in the nineteenth (of course I have my own definite and precise convictions on these points, but they are nothing to the purpose here, when I want to confine myself to patent facts which no one ought to dispute); but I say, even supposing there have been changes in doctrine and polity, still the ethos of the Catholic Church is what it was of old time, and whatever and whoever quarrels with Catholicism now, quarrels virtually, and would have quarrelled, if alive, 1800 years ago, with the Christianity of Apostles and Evangelists.

Mr. Mozley's comment thereon is :-

The question, it will be seen, is this—and truly it is an important one—whether the spirit of St. Peter and St. Paul can be shown to differ, in any material respect, from the spirit of the Church of Rome at the present day.

Newman specifies as note of the distinctive ethos of the Church: that it is "in utter variance with the ethical character of human society at large," that "she wars against the world from love of it," and that her aim is the worship of the Unseen God; the sole object of the world is to make the most of this life. He adds:—

You can no more mak: the Catholic and Protestant ethos one, than you can mix oil and vinegar. Catholics have a moral life of their own, as the early Christians had, and the same life as they—our doctrines and practices come of it; we are and always shall be militant against the world and its spirit, whether the world be considered within the Church's pale or external to it.

attaches eptember a." The r in com-Zembla as taken Humane e benefit 92 it was Govern-1898 had qualified menkula,

wooden

or native a native a native a native that, and ever with a special in the old er dosing with all continuamnot go the them, el and an unlucky and can,

(a great

lance.

wife, and arry, and Samoyad but next y at the and we secretary his wife other, as fused to ome and success, ould not a honey-

o one, I en, and want?"

ple and

s given nd one

gs."

nothing s, great you all il wife. Good-

THE TRAINING OF OUR SOCIAL OFFICERS.

ASPECTS OF SECONDARY EDUCATION.

THE current glorification of the British Empire has had one unexpected result. It has in certain quarters resulted in something like the canonisation of our "Public Schools." The argument is easy and obvious. The British Empire is the most successful example of Imperial administration which history has produced. But its administrators have been trained in our "Public Schools." Therefore—— But let Mr. J. C. Tarver, in his paper on "English Headmasters and Their Schools" in the September Fortnightly, state the conclusion:—

It is admitted in England, in America, in France, in Germany, that the English nation has developed in what it calls its "Public" School education, absolutely the best form of education for administrators, for statesmen, for soldiers, for high officials.

SCHOOL LIFE VERSUS EXAMS.

Mr. Tarver is highly incensed with the examinationsystem of admission to public service. He denounces it as one of the outcomes of "the abominations of the Education Act in 1870," and adds, "Having discovered the best form of education, we deliberately give all our money, all our pains, all our interest, to fostering the worst." His practical advice is given in this par graph:—

The "Pu'lic" Schools are practically the schools of the "Public" Services. Let the fact be officially recognised, and any school, whether owned by a private proprietor or worked by a local authority, which can show that it can or does give the education which we recognise as a Public School education, be registered as such; submitted to sufficient inspection to ensure that its standard is being kept up, and then let three years' attendance at such a school be a necessary preliminary to competition in the examinations for the Public Services, till such examinations are happily relegated finally to the Celestial Empire.

GERMAN VERSUS ENGLISH IDEALS.

The parallel argument, from British commercial supremacy to the supreme excellence of British commercial education, is, however, not being drawn. The pressure of German competition is too heavy to admit of such inferences. In the same number of the Fortnightly Mr. J. J. Findlay reminds us that however successful our secondary education may be in turning out soldiers and administrators, it does not provide the best training for captains of com nerce and industry. The bookish and sedentary Teuton has here the advantage over our athletic and sport-loving Englishman. Mr. Findlay writes on "the Genesis of the German Clerk," who "steadily makes his way in every country and in every large city in the world, against his English rival." He starts with the statement that the German clerk as we have known him since 1880 "has taken about sixty years to produce." Two leading factors in his production are specified :-

Firstly, the Germans have developed a liking for culture and books, for an indoor, sedentary life, for intellectual intercourse, which no other country in the world can parallel, except perhaps the smaller Teutonic peoples about her—Holland, Norway, Sweden. Now a commercial life is not the ideal outcome of these tastes—you real native German boy longs to be a professor and to write a book—but work in an office is an alternative which is far preferable to digging beet and potatoes in the fields. Commerce has its intellectual rewards to a man whose chief interest in life is in reading and thinking. Your typical German is genuinely interested in learning all that he can about foreign nations, not only because he may profit thereby in pocket, but because he likes to learn things.

The second is the German's poverty and thrift, which enable him to accept a much lower salary than his English rival. Mr. Findlay admits that the German Government has helped in making these factors operative by establishing commercial colleges and sending teachers to study abroad. We cannot by Governmental action transform the English boy into a double of the German. But some of the leeway might be made up:—

The one main reform which is possible of achievement is to foster every school which provides a sound, complete course of education for boys of the so-called middle classes. And this fostering care must be exhibited, not only by the Education Department, but by every local and imperial authority.

A LEAF OUT OF THE GERMAN BOOK.

Mr. Henry Birchenough writes in the Nineteenth Century a paper full of fact and thought on "The Imperial Function of Trade." He hails foreign competition as a blessing in disguise, in teaching us to bestir ourselves in regard to Imperial intercommunication and technical training. He says:—

If we are to retain our position in the trade of the world, or even in the trade of our own Empire, we must take a leaf out of the book of our most successful rival. The marvellous industrial progress of Germany during the past twenty-five years is by common consent in great part due to the care with which she has educated—physically, intellectually, and morally—her whole population. Those who have most carefully studied the German educational system, while fully acknowledging its drawbacks and its imperfections, are most impressed, I might almost say are most depressed, by its marked superiority to our English system, if system it can be called. I am aware that much is being done for secondary, for technical, and for commercial education in England. But in spite of efforts for which we can only be grateful, we are still at an enormous disadvantage as compared with Germany, and even with France and Switz-rland.

INDEX TO THE GERMAN PERIODICALS OF 1898.

THE third volume of the Index to German Periodicals, Issued by Felix Dietrich at Leipzig, has just been published. It forms a title-index to the contents of some 520 periodicals in the German language, and a separate author-list is added. It differs from the English Index in several important particulars. Many of the German periodicals indexed are weeklies, whereas in the English Index all weeklies are rigidly excluded. Some of the German publications included are transactions of learned societies; in the English Index these are all omitted practically. The transactions and proceedings of our scientific and learned societies would indeed provide material sufficient for a separate bulky index, and the work still remains to be done. The same may be said of our weeklies. In the German Index by far the greater number of the publications indexed are of a purely scientific nature, and the Index thus appeals rather to the student of special sciences than to the more general reader or journalist. There is not much attempt at classification, and cross-references are few. The volume nevertheless runs to about 330 pages, and in paper cover is issued at 16 Marks.

In the September Great Thoughts, Mr. Raymond Blathwayt has an interview with Mr. T. Sidney Cooper, the painter, who has reached the age of ninety-six, and continues to paint—without glasses, too! He attributes his long life to a certain extent to his own industry, to living temperately, and out of London, with daily exercise and regularity in his habits, especially as to the hour of meals. He has not taken either tea or coffee for over forty years; he finds porridge very sustaining, and at the same time provocative of good appetite, while it keeps the head clear.

TH aliy a the to of It Mag power sente Will which destit

He

fully The tainou of oth by the of the Italy own v foreig riority valua expor them from substi devel metal

land,

water

charge

slow conse hensi nativ agric forth. Proble Our Italy nearly drains sterili availa

Alr looking traction into of privation of actual tion of steam lightin marin other least tion to that a rapid be can exceed Th

170 1

THE INDUSTRIAL REGENERATION OF ITALY.

How IT IS TO BE EFFECTED.

e by ers to trans-

t is to urse of d this ecation

teenth

"The

npetibestir

and rld, or out of ustrial

is by

he has

whole

erman

s and

ly are done

ion in ly be pared

898.

icals,

pub-

some arate

ndex

rman

glish

f the rned

itted

f our ovide

l the said

the urely

o the neral

lume

cover

nond oper,

, and

butes

ry, to ercise

ur of over

t the

s the

THE lightning and the torrent—two agencies traditionally associated with wreck and ruin—are now invoked as the twin forces capable of saving industrially the future of Italy. Enrico Bignami writes in the Engineering Magazine for August on the utilisation of the water powers of Italy. He puts the case in his opening sentence:—

While on the one hand Italy is extremely rich in water powers which are capable of utilisation, on the other hand it is absolutely destitute of coal.

He mentions a few attempts which have been successfully made, and he goes on to say:—

There is no country in the world which, by reason of its mountainous slopes, its needs, its absolue lack of coal and its scarcity of other fuels, which can be expected to profit more than Italy by the development of electric power stations for the utilisation of the immense potential energy of its rivers and streams. If Italy had earlier attempted to substitu'e power derived from her own waterfalls for that imperfectly and expensively supplied by foreign coals, her present manufacturing and commercial infe-riority would not be so humiliating. Possessing as she does valuable deposits of iron ore and copper, yet nearly all of this is exported, while the manufactured articles are imported, some of them from the very countries which purchase the raw material from Italy. If therefore electro metallurgical processes could be substituted for the older methods the current required could be developed from the numerous water powers. At present the metallic imports of Italy come from America, Sweden and England, but with a home article in the market, produced by Italian water power and with cheap Italian labour, the double freight charges on exported raw material and re-imported products would form a natural protective tariff for the home product.

A NEW WATER CURE FOR MALARIA.

He remarks on the curious fact that Iralian capital is slow to embark in these new industries, which are consequently being worked by German capital. Comprehensive plans should he thinks, be formed, backed by native funds, for using the water powers of Italy in agriculture, industry, reclaiming marsh lands, and so forth. Water power could solve the vastly important problem of drainage. He says:—

Out of the two hundred and fifty-nine districts into which Italy is subdivided only sixty-five are free from malaria, while nearly all could be relieved from this disability by proper drainage, and where necessary the drinking water could be sterilised by ozone, for all of which work the power is readily available, if capital were only forthcoming for its development.

WATER VERSUS STEAM.

Already the State and the railway companies are looking to water power as the source of possible electric traction. Central stations for transforming water power into electric power are to be counted by hundreds and private plants by thousands. The figures of Italy's actual and potential horse-power are a suggestive illustration of the writer's point. He says:—

Recent official statistics give the total horse-power of the steam boilers of Italy as 160,000 h.p., not including those for lighting plants, for traction of tramway lines and railways, nor marine boilers of any kind. Compared with the statistics of other countries, Italy, to occupy a similar rank, should have at least 2,000,000 h.p. in order to compete industrially. In addition to the 300,000 h.p. already taken up, it has been calculated that about 5,000,000 h.p. remain, if proper use is made of the rapid falls of the Italian rivers, the Po alone being estimated to be capable of furnishing 1,000,000 h.p. at a cost for plant not exceeding 600 lire per h.p.

The writer puts the operative cost of water power at 170 lire per annum operating at twenty four hours daily; of steam power at 200 lire per h.p. per year of 300 days of ten hours. Among the mountains, nearer the torrents, and further from coal, the respective costs of the horsepower would be 50 lire against 500 lire per annum for steam.

There is something odd in thus pitting water against steam, the same substance in liquid and gaseous conditions.

THE AGE-LONG TUSSLE FOR INDIAN TRADE.

THE question of the route to India, involved for us in to-day's problems of the Transvaal and the Cape, is no new bone of international contention. An essay in the Scottish Review for July, on Sir William Hunter's History of British India, recalls the "early struggles for the Indian trade"; and begins very "early" indeed—with the times of Abraham. The writer says:—

The promise recorded as made to Abraham covers the whole of the Syrian trade-routes, and the achievement of David's reign was to obtain possession of them. When he captured Damascus and extended his rule to the Euphrates, he secured control over the whole of the Indian trade, and it is easy to understand why the Phenicians were anxious to be on good terms with him and his successor. To Israel the control of this trade, though always a source of danger to those who possessed it, meant prosperity, and its loss was among the bitterest of its national memories.

There were alternate routes: the Northern, which went from the Indus valley via the Oxus and Caspian to Novgorod or Byzantium, and the Southern by sea from Calicut in India to ports on the Red Sea. Speaking of the latter, the writer observes:—

It was not upon this rou'e, however, that the main struggle for the Indian trade was fought out in either ancient or mediæval times. On, this route there was absolutely no competition, except during the few years that Solomon sailed his fleets from Ezion-geber, or that Uzziah probably re-established the navigation at Elath, which Jehoshaphat had attempted some ninety years before, but without success. Nor was it upon the Northern route. It was upon the lines of the Central or Syrian route that the struggle was in ancient times fought out. For a time, as we have seen, the lines were in the hands of Israel; but Israel was too weak to hold them long. Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Macedonia, and Rome, all in their turn fought for them, and in their turn controlled them. In the seventh century A.D. they were seized by the Saracen Arabs. A trading no less than a fighting race, they soon realised their value, and under the Caliphs, Bussorah and Baghdad became "the opulent head-quarters of the Indian trade."

Then came the avalanche of Turkish invasion, which closed first the Northern route, then the Central, and finally, after a brief period of Egyptian possession, the Southern. Yet, says the reviewer, the final closure of these ancient highways was "probably the best thing that could have happened." It "made the discovery of a new route to India almost, if not absolutely, imperative." This was the great quest of Columbus. It was the achievement of Vasco da Gama. He reached Calicut by sea in 1498. By dint of much fighting with Moslems and others, the Portuguese got control of the Indo-European trade. On their heels came the English. "In 1591 the first English squadron sailed round the Cape of Good Hope for India." In 1595 a Dutch squadron followed suit. The English after much fighting compelled Portugal in 1654 to concede rights of trade and settlement in all her Eastern possessions. A long struggle over the Spice Islands led to their abandonment by the English to the Dutch. Here the survey of the reviewer ends.

THE ADVANCE OF EGYPT.

AN AMERICAN TRIBUTE TO LORD CROMER.

THE HON. T. S. HARRISON, U.S. Consul-General in Egypt, writes in the August Forum on "Egypt under Lord Cromer." He deals first with prospects for American trade, and observes :-

There are two lines of industry which ought to flourish in Egypt, viz., machinery and novelties. The Americans can defy competition in both. In machinery I include engines, presses, light safes, electrical appliances, and, particularly, mechanics' tools. The tools must be very light and simply made. As regards novelties, the Egyptian market will just now absorb an astonishing quantity.

He next refers to the significant fact of the readiness of the natives to put their money in Egyptian securities. He says the telegraph system is doing well, except for the dearth of poles; the postal service is excellent; the police is all that can be expected. The native working classes are fairly well off. The educated or half-educated proletariat—the candidates for Government clerkships and like posts-present a difficulty not yet overcome. Not content with erecting enormous dams to regulate the inundations of the Nile, the Egyptian Government has sent noted experts to look into the question of using the cataracts of that river for the generation of electrical power.

ENGLAND AS PROHIBITIONIST.

Here is a story which will make many a temperance enthusiast long for a beneficent despot like Lord Cromer in Great Britain :

Another reform in which Lord Cromer is much interested has to do with the enormous consumption in Egypt of hashish. This drug is ruinous in its effect upon the mind and physique of the native; but only within the past few years have really serious efforts been made to counteract the evil. Enforcement of the prohibitive laws has now led to smbggling; and the genius of the Oriental in this line is almost incredible. The hollow frames of iron bedsteads, interiors of nominal grindstones, staves of casks, anything and everything, are made receptacles for hashish. Open indulgence in the drug is no longer possible. The stuff is confiscated wherever detected; and the imprisonment last year of hundreds of traffickers in it has had a deterrent effect. Large quantities, however, are smuggled over the Libyan Desert, and buried in the sand until a favourable opportunity is afforded for conveying it into Egypt by means of camels. The Bedouins are charged with most of the guilt of these proceedings; and no traveller who sees a long line of camels in any part of the Khedive's dominions can feel sure that one among them is not bearing upon its back a consignment of hashish. The natives in the villages regard the smuggler of hashish as a public benefactor. Detection thus becomes next to impossible the moment the load gets upon the camel's back. Nevertheless, the habit has been to a considerable extent stamped out, though the traffic is at present enormously profitable.

THE PROGRESS OF EDUCATION.

The writer recalls the odd anomaly of the Mixed Tribunals that English is excluded from the list of languages in which pleas may be presented. Americans, as well as British subjects, must plead in French, Italian, or Arabic, or not at all. Education the writer takes to be now "the most important administrative branch." Only eight thousand pupils are in Government schools:—

A great many of these pay, through their parents, a moderate sum for their tuition. When the English first entered Egypt they had to pay the parents before the latter would send their children to school. In sixteen years a great change has been effected; and to-day Egyptian parents are very eager to send their children to the Government schools. Unfortunately, the great majority of the children must attend the village schools,—or rather, mosque schools; for they are connected with the mosques of the country. About one hundred and eighty thousand children attend these schools, where the instruction is entirely in Arabic, and where the peril in which their health is placed is dire.

Female education is still a comical idea to the native mind; but there are one thousand five hundred female pupils in Government schools :-

Nor, in considering education, should it be overlooked that Egypt has a school of engineering, a school of medicine, a school of agriculture, and a school of technical training. The University of El-Azhar, the great seat of learning of the Moslem world, flourishes at Cairo, of course. It is the resort of all who would perfect themselves in the wisdom of the Koran.

CHARACTER OF THE KHEDIVE.

Of the present Khedive the writer offers more favourable evidence than has been tendered by others. He

The character of the Khedive seems to be of that type to which the Italians apply the term "simpatico." He is gentle yet self-respecting, serene yet strong, and quite above the pettiness of opposing a policy simply because its advocates are not personally agreeable to him. Abbas II. is the possessor of the rare capacity of inspiring regard-I might say affection-in those brought into contact with him; while even the strongest opponents of his policy admit that, at least, the welfare of his country is the height of his ambition. He is exceedingly welf educated, from both European and Oriental standpoints, tolerant, receptive of ideas, and progressive. . . . Of Abbas II. it may I think be truly said that, in addition to being born great and to having greatness thrust upon him, he has achieved greatness by his own force of character.

Of the future of Egypt the writer refuses to prophesy; he ends with the remark :

The one assured thing is Egypt's growing prosperity, based upon great natural resources, wise administration, and a conscientious regard for the welfare of the people.

How Women Dress in China.

MRS. HENRY CLARENCE PAGET contributes a delightful travel-paper to the September Cornhill on her wanderings in China. Her journal is full of vivid pictures, and even of stirring adventure. Two sketches may be selected, both of Turanian women,—one of the Manchurian passengers on the Peiho steamboats, the other of what she found in a Mongol encampment just within the Great Wall :-

The ladies on the boats looked excessively smart amidst their grimy surroundings, in their bright-coloured tunics reaching to the knees, and loose blue trousers fastened round the ankle. Their blue-black hair is plastered back with cosmetics and adorned with artificial flowers, the back hair being arranged to stand out very far at the back of the head by means of long ornamental pins. The getting-up of their faces must make a Chinese woman's toilet a lengthy one, for from forehead to chin the face is covered with a fine, smooth, white paste, with an astoundingly brilliant rose-coloured spot in the middle of the cheek. Long earrings, generally of pearls and coral, a fan, and black embroidered satin shoes complete the costume. In China the shoes of both men and women (at least of the Manchu women, for it is only the Chinese women who maim their feet) are made of black or dark blue satin, with little floors of their own, that s, they have a sole of several layers of felt, nearly two inches thick, which adds considerably to the height of the wearer.

We turned off the road before reaching the Wall, to visit a Mongol encampment. The men came out of their tents and greeted us in the most friendly manner, and afterwards fetched the women, who took the deepest interest in my clothes, being especially fascinated with my straw hat, feeling it all over in turn very gently, and smiling back at each other. They were taller and much better-looking than the men, and wore beautiful head-dresses of embossed plates of silver, studded with turquoises, pearls, and coral, and long clusters of pearls were hung around their ears. Their dress consisted of a short, rough, brown woollen skirt striped with red, and a woollen jacket which was almost concealed by a sheepskin cloak with the wool inside.

I I kno eloq he e out spre elep did. grad pays Indi eithe on I M close deta decla high long, trave while the caref

Whe

choo

and offsp.

eleph than

as a can :

being

eleph eleph unles Th who i quan the r 50,00 their ascer almos howe once, in thi

M.

servic

intelli

elepha M. Fe of wo placed had p pushe with. he he that w has pl his sta

In child's instea soldier if it se

IS THE ELEPHANT FOLLOWING THE DODO?

In the Revue de Paris for August, M. Foà, a well-known hunter of big game in Africa, puts in a most eloquent plea on behalf of the African elephant, for whom he entreats a certain measure of protection. He points out that a hundred years ago the elephant might be found spread over the greater part of South Africa, but that now elephant land only comprises one-tenth of what it once did. During the last thirty years the elephant has been gradually disappearing from African soil, and M. Foà pays a very high tribute to the wisdom of the Anglo-Indian Government, which strictly forbids the slaying—either for the sake of the ivory or for sport—of an elephant on Indian territory.

M. Foà has studied these huge creatures at very close quarters, and gives some touching and interesting details of what may be called their home life. He declares that maternal love is developed to a very high degree in the female elephant. When taking any long, dangerous journey, the mother pushes her little calf in front of her, holding him up with her trunk, and if traversing a river, makes him swim just in front of her, while if high grasses and closely interwoven bushes bar the way, the female places her baby behind her and carefully opens a passage through which he can pass. When the calf begins to eat ordinary food, the mother chooses the best fruit and teaches him how to eat it, and before washing herself at a spring first douches her offspring with her trunk. M. Fod considers that the elephant's trunk plays a far greater part in its existence than is generally supposed; in fact, he regards the trunk as a sixth sense. It is through the trunk that the elephant can smell the approach of an enemy, his sense of sight being so little developed that on many an occasion an elephant has mistaken an antelope for a man. Again, an elephant cannot hear anything but a very loud noise unless it occurs quite close to his ears.

The modern ivory hunter is quite indifferent to those who may come after him. As long as he can get a good quantity of this valuable product he gives no thought to the morrow, and in one year in Africa alone close upon 50,000 elephants were slaughtered simply for the sake of their tusks. Lately there has been some attempt to ascertain how many herds still remain in Africa, but it is almost impossible to make a census of this kind. It is, however, quite certain that unless measures are taken at once, the African elephant will be as extinct as the dodo in thirty years' time.

M. Foa takes great pains to point out the many useful services which an elephant can render to man. So highly intelligent is the Indian species that all over the country elephants are employed in factories, and on one occasion M. Foa saw one of these huge beasts placing long blocks of wood in serried lines. Each time a block had been placed in position, the elephant stepped back to see if he had put it quite straight, and if it was not so he carefully pushed it into its place before fetching another to go on with. When the day's work is over—that is to say, when he hears a bell ring—the elephant carefully puts down that which he is carrying with his trunk, and not until he has placed it where it should be does he go off joyfully to his stable.

In Siam the elephant is often turned pro tem, into a child's nurse, and, as M. Foà significantly points out, instead of occupying itself with the passing policeman or soldier, devotes itself entirely to its precious charge, and if it sees a vehicle or suspicious-looking individual in the distance, takes up the child with its trunk, and puts it between its legs, where it is quite safe. "As man o' war, as hunter, as workman, as labourer, as carrier, and as a child's nurse, this incomparable animal accomplishes any task confided to him with submission and docility."

M. Foà hopes to call together in the year 1900 a congress for the special object of protecting the African elephant. He would like to see during the next few years a close time established for ivory, and he advises that a reward should be given to those who can effect the capture of the elephant without hurting him, and in such a fashion that he may afterwards be utilised in civilised life. He thinks that it is incumbent on those who make the law for that region of Africa where the elephant is found, to combine together to inflict a heavy penalty on those who want only to injure this noble animal, and would make it a grave offence to kill or capture elephant calves. It is to be hoped that M. Foà will be successful in his humanitarian enterprise, which deserves every possible encouragement.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD AS PROPHET

In his entertaining "Farmer's Year," Mr. Rider Haggard recalls, in the September Longman, a prophecy of his concerning the future of the Transvaal.

OF THE TRANSVAAL

It was written in 1876, when most people thought the bankrupt South African Republic of no value. After describing "the monotony and dreariness of the great Transvaal wastes," he said:—

And yet those wastes, now so dismal and desolate, are at no distant date destined to support and enrich a large population. Before us lies the country of the practical future, of the days when the rich man will have his estate in Switzerland to gratify his eyes, and his estate in the Transvaal to fill his pockets. This vast land will one day be the garden of Africa, the land of gems and gold, of oil and corn, of steam-ploughs and railways. It has an assured and a magnificent future.

AND OF EMIGRATION.

What has followed this prediction, uttered at a time when the Rand was innocent of goldmining, may lend greater weight to Mr. Haggard's eulogy of emigration which appears in the same paper. He says:—

Why should people continue to be cooped up in this narrow country, living generally upon insufficient means, when yonder their feet might be set in so large a room? Why do they not go to where families can be brought into the world without the terror that if they are brought into the world they will starve or drag their parents down to the dirt; to where the individual may assert himself and find room to develop his own character, instead of being crushed in the mould of custom till, outwardly at any rate, he is as like his fellows as one brick is like the others in a wall? Here, too, unless he be endowed with great ability, abnormal powers of work, and an iron constitution, he has about as much chance of rising as the brick at the bottom has of getting to the top of the wall, for the weight of the thousands above keeps him down, and the conventions of a crowded and ancient civilisation tie his hands and fetter his thought. But in those new homes across the seas it is different, for there he can draw nearer to nature, and, though the advantages of civilisation remain unforfeited, to the happy conditions of the simple, uncomplicated man. There if he be of gentle birth, his sons can go to work among the cattle without losing caste, instead of being called upon to begin where their father left off, or pay the price in social damage; there his daughters will marry and help to build up some great empire of the future, instead of dying single in a land where marriage is becoming more and more a luxury for the rich. . . . If I were young again, I would practice what I preach.

where

d that ine, a The Ioslem

ll who

vour-He gentle pettire not of the on—in ongest of his lerant, may I and to hesy; based a con-

ess by

ghtful erings ven of , both engers and in st their ankle.

cs and ged to of long nake a to chin with an
of the m, and ina the visit a ats and fetched being over in y were omen,

e made

autiful uoises, around voollen almost

THE "WHITE NEGRO" IN THE UNITED STATES.

PITIABLE TALES OF RACE-PREJUDICE.

MISS ELIZABETH L. BANKS writes in the Nineteenth Century on the American negro and his place. She believes, to put it shortly, that there is no place for the negro within the borders of the United States. She begins with the South. She says that she knows of a surety that "lynch law is seldom appealed to except in regard to questions that are more fitly settled at the point of a shot-gun than in the courts." She reports that "every Southern State has enacted a law forbidding the intermarriage of members of the white and black races.'

THE "BRUNETTE BEAUTY" AT VASSAR.

Miss Banks, herself a Westerner, seems to enjoy turning the tables on the Northerner when he affects to condemn the Southerner. She tells one "Northern outrage" which is pitiable enough :

Two years ago there was a "scandal" at Vassar College. It was discovered that a young woman with one small drop of African blood in her veins had graduated from that exclusive and aristocratic seat of American female learning! . . . A few years ago there entered . . . a handsome young girl of perhaps eighteen or nineteen, recommended and introduced to the faculty by no less a person than the Rev. Dwight L. Moody, the noted evangelist. Few of the girls at Vassar could surpass her in beauty, cleverness, or good taste in dress, and in a few months she became a general favourite, and was known as the "brunette beauty." She had for her room-mate one of the most popular girls in the school, and the two became firm A long time afterwards the room-mate suddenly decided that she would like to change her room and her mate, and, without giving any reason for her decision, she took another apartment, leaving the "brunette beauty" to herself. It was noticed thereafter that the latter looked sad and lonely, that she entered less into the amusements of recreation hours, kept out of the way of her former associates, and grew worn and thin, Then, one day, a member of the faculty was surprised to receive a visit from her. She had, she said, a secret to divulge, a confession to make. She had entered the school under false pretences. She was not as the other girls, though they had no reason to suspect it.

SHE WAS A NEGRESS!

The blood of the despised race of Africa was in her veins! In some way her recent room-mate had discovered this fact probably by means of a letter or a leaf of a diary that might have been accidentally left about, so the room-mate left her. The room-mate could not live in the same apartment with her who was an outcast—an outcast from hope. Should she leave the college and go away unto her own people?

Her own people! The lady of the faculty stared at her.

This girl, white as herself, refined, clever, sensitive. Were her "own people" the thick-lipped, broad-nosed, black-faced sons and daughters of Africa? It was incredible, yet it must be so, for the girl had told her that her blood was nine-tenths Caucasian, one-tenth African.

A special meeting of the faculty was called. The confession of the young woman who was within a few months of graduation was discussed in all its bearings, and it was finally decided that she should remain to finish her course.

A TEST FOR THE COLLEGES.

Miss Banks tells of another case in which she interested herself—a "New York girl who had what is known as 'coloured blood' in her, notwithstanding her light hair, blue eyes, and fair skin." She wished to go to college, but not to a negro college, or to a composite college where she would have to consort with the blacks. But she said there was no chance of her being admitted on equal terms with "white girls. Miss Banks reports :-

In order to discover if this statement were absolutely true, I wrote, with her consent, a letter, taking the facts of her case and stating them as my own, and, making about thirty copies of it, I sent it to the leading colleges in America and England, , , Might I be received into the college, and if so, on which terms?

H

els

to lik

Ed M

its

the

the

inc

L

Co

pr

W

the

wl

sh

20 da

w

ar

de

Lith

m

fo

ex

C

of

SU

ac

is

SO

W

th

SE

bi

ar

Southern colleges suggested in reply that she should go to institutions for negro and mulatto women; Western colleges suggested she should apply to Eastern colleges; and Eastern colleges suggested she should apply to Western colleges as likely to meet there with less prejudice against colour. Even Oberlin College, almost the birthplace of the Abolition movement, would only allow her to reside with a mulatto woman along with other mulatto girls.

THE ENGLISH ANSWERS.

So Miss Banks was forced to conclude :-

There was no place for her among the white students of America; but when there had passed sufficient time for replies to come from the several English colleges to which I had applied, there was found to be a place among the white women students of England for this lonely, aspiring girl! The principals of the English colleges wrote presenting their compliments to the girl in America, telling her when the new term began, inclosing their catalogues and pamphlets, and assuring her that there was no necessity for her to have stated anything concerning her slight mixture of African blood. It could make no difference in any possible way. There was a place at Newnham and Girton and other English colleges for her. I know of nothing more pathetic and more tragic in the North than the loneliness of the situation in which persons, both men and women, who are only slightly allied to the negro race find themselves. It matters not how refined, how beautiful, how intelligent, how well educated the light-skinned negro and negress may be, they are outcasts-outcasts by their own choice from the blacks, outcasts, by the horror and repulsion felt for them, from the whites.

WHY A U.S. MINISTER BECAME AMBASSADOR.

After these horrors here is a comical story:

A few years ago, before an ambassador had been appointed to Great Britain, and when the United States was represented by a minister plenipotentiary, I heard a group of Northern Republican politicians in Washington discussing the advisability of having an American ambassador sent to England, One man declared there was no need for an ambassador; that we had no foreign complications, that, indeed, there was really no need for a minister even; that a consul-general was all we required in London. All the others agreed with him except one man, who stood whittling a stick while the talk was going on.

"I want to know," he said finally, "whether any of you know that at Court ceremonials in England our American minister has to walk behind a negro from Hayti?"

A look of astonishment and horror overspread the faces of the whole group of politicians. "Behind a black man, did you say? Behind!" they exclaimed.
"Yes, behind a negro," was the answer. "It's because the negro has been there the longest, they say; but that's neither here nor there, since our American minister has to walk behind him. Now, if we had an ambassador, he would be in line with the other ambassadors, and would walk in front of the negro, who goes with the ministers."

"Well, there's no use talking any more about it, then," answered they all. "We must get an ambassador as soon as

Miss Banks mentions that Frederick Douglas, sent as American Minister to Hayti, was refused table-fellowship by the officers on board of the American man-of-war that took him; and his widow, a pure white, lives outside Washington alone and ostracised for having dared to marry a mulatto.

An entertaining and instructive paper on sea-gulls is contributed by Lieutenant W. Johnson, of the Royal Navy Reserve, to the September Leisure Hour, which taken as a whole is a singularly bright and useful number.

HOMES FOR HOMELESS GENTLEWOMEN.

of it, I

terms ?

uld go

estern

leges;

ply to

s pre-

st the allow other

nts of replies

I had

vomen

ncipals

ents to

began,

r that erning differ-

m and

othing

eliness

, who

s. It

w well

ey are casts,

ted to

by a olican

ng an lared

reign

for a

who

you

f the

the

here him.

who

en,"

n as

t as ship

that side

l to s is avy

as

.

PLEA BY THE COUNTESS OF ABERDEEN.

"THE Woman's International Parliament," as stated elsewhere, is reviewed by Lady Aberdeen in the August number of the North American Review. After referring to other and less direct results, the Countess proceeds:—

At this moment, the first outcome of the Congress appears likely to be the consideration of the problem of the Housing of Educated Working Women in great cities, brought forward by Mr. Gilbert Parker at a Conference convened by the Council itself. Mr. Gilbert Parker has taken infinite pains to collect the facts of the case, as far as they exist in London, and, as there was no time for discussion, it was decided that a further independent meeting should be called to deal with the matter for London, and a resolution was also passed urging National Councils generally to make this a subject of special inquiry.

Mr. Parker brought a formidable indictment against the present condition of affairs. He takes as his client the educated woman earning from £50 to £140 by typewriting, secretarial work, research work for authors, etc., and eloquently depicts the sordidness of their life and the impossible conditions under which they labour. He pictured the girl brought up in a sheltered and refined home, thrown on the world and counting herself lucky in having found a position where she can earn from 20s. to 30s. a week.

The three typical cases given to indicate the class of workers for whom he pleads, are those of a clergyman's daughter earning 25s. a week and paying 10s. of that sum for one room in the south-western district; a girl who does research-work in the British Museum at 28s. a week and pays 8s. 6d. for a tiny room in Chelsea; and an Admiral's daughter who earns £80 a year, and in despair of suitable rooms rented an unfurnished flat at £60 a year, which a friend shares with her. Having cited these instances—

Mr. Parker concludes his paper by sketching out a plan that might be tried to meet the desperate need revealed, which, by instituting residential furnished mansions with accommodations for, say, four hundred ladies in single bedrooms, at a rate of 5s. or 6s. a week for lodging, and Ios. for board and other expenses, might at the same time be made a financial success.

This is only another illustration of the need of Co-operative Homes as a remedy for the wretchedness of "life in lodgings." If the Countess of Aberdeen succeeds in solving this problem for London alone, she will have performed a service inferior to none which adorn her philanthropic career.

"THE DELIRIUM OF DRESS."

THE heading is "Onlooker's" in Blackwood. With it he brands what he takes to be one of the chief characteristics of the London season which has just passed. A putative correspondent of his is made to declare:—

"No pleasure at all, except what the loom and the vat provide. Beautiful tissues in exquisite dyes, fashioned in the taste and sometimes by the hand, apparently, of an upholsterer. Indeed, were there a tolerable synonym of 'upholstered,' that is the word I should choose to describe many a dame of my acquaintance in her newest gown."

He has heard rumours that "London dressmakers were all out of their minds before the middle of July with the extraordinary number of gowns they were ordered to supply, their young women being in similar case for want of sleep." What was the reason?—

Were our multitudinous daughters of luxury to make a clean breast of it, they would confess that often, where many of them are gathered together in array, it is a milde in which wounds are given and taken, and triumphs glory and rankle right and left in a silent Donnybrook of the brag of spending. Return to eards as a fashionable vice cannot be recommended Per se*; but whether, on comparison of broad results and ultimate consequences, it be not preferable to this other when an equal height of extravagance has been reached, will be an interesting question before long. That the prevalent vice is essentially the more savage, more indulgent of the lower primitive instincts, can be shown at any time I think. And again, again, again, where does the money come from to supply the game at which so many play?

One explanation of the new rage for dress is found in the invasion of the newspapers by the fashionable feminine:—

The craving for notoriety which is at the same time inspired and gratified by the newspaper press, has overcome the crowd of idle, rich women as readily as other folk. To them the lady journalist appears with help to their only way of satisfaction; and, by degrees, her account in the public press of Mrs. B.'s wonderful appearance in one turn-out, the dream of loveliness presented by Lady C. in another, has stimulated a competition of cost and display in dress which has never run so high as this season. But the consequent mischief ends not where it began. It is not only to a few hundreds of fine ladies, of course, that the competition appeals. At the same moment many wealthy women who hope to figure publicly-that is to say, notoriously -in the world of fashion to which they belong, hear and respond with all their hearts, and with all their souls, and with all their financial strength. These raise the standard of "living up to what is expected of us" for others of the same rank and the same "sets," but with no such command of the wherewithal. Hence much tribulation, much temptation of sorts, soreness of heart incalculable, and all for no real or no substantial cause. And still the mischief spreads, descending from class to class, and in every class afflicting women of small means and no pretentiousness quite as much as any.

The Duchess of Orleans.

In Tilskueren for August Herr S. Schandorph has a character sketch of Charlotte Elizabeth of Orleans. The article is pleasantly written, and interesting chiefly by reason of its chattiness. The light-hearted, goodreason of its chattiness. tempered, pock-marked little Duchess-whose portrait at Versailles, however, denies that she was quite so ugly as she makes herself out to be-is brought bodily before us. and is treated of familiarly, as an actor on life's stage seen from the wings. Her great love for her brother-in-law, Louis XIV., "le roi soleil," her friendly liking for La Vallière, her substantial hatred of Madame de Montespan. and Madame de Maintenon, all her little prejudices and pet weaknesses and more amiable qualities are here-a sprightly, taking little figure is the Duchess on this canvas of the Court of Versailles, though she was scarcely the great personality Wolfgang Menzel and Eduard Bodemann find her. Notwithstanding all she suffered and went through, she kept her integrity and good temper, amusing herself with comedies and songs. Her ingrained German naturel hindered her from understanding the French thoroughly, and she was, perhaps, not free from love of gossip and scandal, but, withal, she is a winning and interesting little soul, whom, says Herr Schandorph, one is bound to love. She shows us the other side of the Versailles Court medal, which from the distance looks so resplendent—a side which must be seen if we are to understand the times and the people.

THERE is a very amusing paper on Mrs. Samuel Pepys, as she appears in her husband's famous diary, in Temple Bar for September. The glimpses given of their homelife are richly entertaining. One instance is cited in which he laid out on clothing twelve pounds for her and fifty-five for himself; whereon the writer remarks, "After this, let no woman desire the return of picturesque fashions for masculine attire!"

ON THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

ATTITUDE OF THE PAPACY.

IT is a curious footnote to history which M. Goyau has written in the first August number of the Revue des Deux Mondes. As is well known, the Holy See was not directly represented at the Peace Conference, though the first circular of Count Muravieff was formally communicated to Cardinal Rampolla, together with a personal letter from the Tsar to Leo XIII. This letter expressed the profound veneration which the Tsar felt for the Pope, for his wisdom, and for his love of peace, so many times displayed. Moreover, the Russian monarch went on to render homage to the Papacy itself, and recall historical memories of the mediæval pontiffs, the zealous promoters of universal peace. The reply of the Vatican was, as may be imagined, cordial, and yet it fearlessly asserted the great principle that the relations between nations must be founded, not on self-interest or force or accomplished facts, or other theories which conflict with the eternal and immutable principles of justice, but upon Christianity, the failure to recognise which had led Europe into her present disastrous state. There is no need to retrace the story of the successive steps by which the King of Italy prevented the Pope from being represented at the Peace Conference. M. Goyau quotes from a letter which Mr. Stead wrote to Cardinal Rampolla on May 8th last, in which he endeavoured to console his Eminence by pointing out that this slight on the Papacy furnished an argument in favour of restoring the territorial Sovereignty of the Papacy. Summing up the whole question, M. Goyau observes that while Italy had a "success" to record, the Holy See and the other nations had to record an "experience."

ENGLAND'S "MORE EXCELLENT WAY."

William Cunningham discusses in the August Atlantic Monthly the prospects of universal peace. He notes a disposition not to take the Peace Conference quite seriously, but observes :-

Paradoxical as it may appear, this very apathy and incredulousness in the public mind are in themselves a complete justification for the action of the Tsar. Even if it accomplishes nothing else, the Congress at the Hague will have done a great work if it familiarises men's minds with the idea of universal peace as a thing to be consciously aimed at. So soon as this object is deliberately accepted, and the ambitions which interfere with it are honestly laid aside, the expedients for securing universal peace will certainly be found. At present the prospect is not very hopeful.

What hope the writer has is based on the facts that religion and commerce have been the chief cause of wars in the past, and that England, now the chief missionary and commercial race, deliberately refuses to take up quarrels on these grounds. The two chief dangers are national vanity and "irresponsible meddlers"—notably journalists. He says :-

A London evening paper has boasted that it compelled the Government of the day to send Gordon to the Soudan; but it failed to insure his being properly supported there; and the expenditure of blood and treasure in a series of campaigns may be in large part debited to the editor who instigated the initial step... But outside agitation is a cumbrous method of conducting the affairs of state. It is the duty of citizens to exercise their responsibilities as electors with care, and to gauge the capabilities of the men to whom the policy of a country is committed; but it is not wise for any individual or any section of the community to try to jerk the reins of government at a critical moment.

Mr. Cunningham omits to say what is to be done when Government has let the reins go so slack as to endange.

horses and passengers and all. Mr. Cunningham ends with the suggestion that while Russia puts her trust in disarmament and America supports arbitration, the third great Power—

England alone has entered upon a line of policy by which the old occasions of hostility are laid aside; with all her national pride, she shows a genuine unwillingness to take offence. Perhaps this is the more excellent way.

A CANADIAN OPINION.

Mr. John A. Ewan, writing in the Canadian Magazine for August on current events abroad, gives a rather personal tone to his comments on the Conference at the Hague. He says:—

One of the oddest things which the movement for holding a peace conference produced was the copartnership between the Tsar and Editor Stead. The latter acted as the advance agent, so to speak, of his Imperial Majesty's great attraction. copartnery was about as incongruous as would be an alliance between the Llama of Thibet and an American drummer. This is said in no spirit of hostility to Mr. Stead. Those who do not like him-and such a perfervid spirit naturally sets the teeth of certain persons on edge-would have us believe that he is merely a notoriety hunter and therefore insincere. No greater mistake could be made. While Mr. Stead may not be averse to attracting attention to himself, the basis of his character is a moral enthusiasm with which he has the faculty of infecting others. It vitiates his ju Igment and good taste at times, but the only people who make no mistakes are those good people who sit in the centre of their household gods with hands folded determined that they shall never be guilty of any conduct which would be a departure from good form.

The only criticism that can be urged against that attitude is that it seldom results in good to any human being outside the narrow pale of that particular household. Mr. Stead is the son of a Congregational clergyman and evidently has the Puritan earnestness and energy largely developed in him. When his mind and soul have seized on some fitting subject he will not reject the services of a big drum and pair of cymbals if he deems that they are necessary to attract the people's attention to it. In this respect he may be said to have imported into political and social questions the method that Barnum perfected in the show business and that General Booth adopted in the name of religion.

Mr. Stead's services to the Peace Conference were invaluable. He made it certain that Britain would take a hearty part in it, and with the chief autocracy at one pole and the chief democracy at the other there was plenty of room between for all the other ocracies of Europe. It is said that the Conference has accomplished nothing and will accomplish nothing. That such a meeting has come together at all is a tremendous stride. It will at least set the subjects of the various potentates thinking, and war will hereafter have to justify itself before a cooler and more enlightened jury than it has hitherto encountered. All the arguments which we hear about the impossibility of doing away with war used to be employed with reference to duelling. But in the countries where duelling has been abandoned, absolutely none of the dire evils that were predicted have appeared.

THE MOST PROMISING OUTCOME.

Eleonore d'Esterre-Keeling in the Leisure Hour thinks the failure of the Disarmament proposals not an unmitigated evil, and looks to reach disarmament through arbitration. The law, she holds, which has suppressed duelling and made the carrying of arms in public unnecessary in the case of individuals, can equally well regulate the affairs of nations:—

The chief requisite is a well-informed, large-hearted public opinion in every nation. The principle of arbitration, it was seen at once, was the most promising feature of the present Conference. . . . The Peace Conference at the Hague is over, and more than has been are implished it would be unreasonable to demand.

THE ARMY AS A SCHOOL OF INDUSTRY.

CONSCRIPT AND APPRENTICE IN ONE.

ds

in

rd

al

ne

1e

he

ıt,

he

is

ot

of ly

to

a

10

d

h

is

ie

n

n ot

ie

0

d

e

er 1-

a

d

e

e

y

y

h

d

-

11

19

MR. SIDNEY LOW, having prophesied the failure of the Peace Conference, endeavours in the Nineteenth Century for September to maintain his consistency at the expense of his accuracy by declaring that the Conference has failed. He is obliged to admit that "the great success of the Conference is supposed to be the Arbitration Convention," but tries to belittle that achievement with the remark that "Nations will not be induced to abstain from war because there is a secretary and an arbitration bureau, with an office in Brussels, or some other conveniently accessible capital." Mr. Low, it will be seen, is driven to verify his prediction of failure by more prediction of failure—paying, that is to say, one promissory note with another. Mr. Low naturally promissory note with another. enlarges on the non-success of the proposal for limitation of armaments. He reiterates that great armies and navies will remain, " for they are the best security against needless and hasty disturbance of the peace." He finds nothing in M. de Bloch's elaborate argument which really tends in favour of disarmament. Quite the contrary: it is the growth in armies and improvement in appliances which, according to M. de Bloch, makes war impossible, or at least suicidal.

But these criticisms are only a prelude to Mr. Low's real essay, which is concerned with "the future of the great armies." His contention is, that the army must be transformed into a school, not for the military art only, but also for character and technical industry.

THE POOR YOUTH'S "PUBLIC SCHOOL."

Deploring the makes military service in France, and partly also in Italy and Spain, a means of personal and social demoralisation, Mr. Low proceeds:—

The Army of the Future will have to become what Professor von Stengel maintains that it already is in Germany—a national school for the training of character. The drill-sergeant and the company-officer must supplement the work of the schoolmaster. The recruit must be turned into a man as well as a soldier. In itself there is nothing that is brutalising or degrading in military training. On the contrary, it only needs to be pursued under reasonable conditions to become a magnificent educational process. Foreign observers have been struck by the alertness, the docility, the disciplined promptness with which the German artisan—the discharged conscript—goes about his work. We have examples nearer home. There is no better body of men anywhere than the bluejackets and marines of the Royal Navy.

"NATIONAL WORKSHOPS" IN SOOTH.

But, proceeds the writer-

the war-premium is so heavy that an economical people will want it laid out to the best possible advantage. It will occur to them that to teach men to fight is not providing for the whole of the national defence or the national supremacy. It is also necessary to teach them to work.

They must be prepared for the industrial struggle between the nations. Therefore—

The army will become not only a school, but a technical school. The conscript will be dismissed, not merely with some mastery of those weapons he may never be called upon to use, but also with a knowledge of those of her crafts and appliances with which his hand will be familiar all the days of his life. He will have learnt many things which will render him more capable as a clerk, artisan, labourer, or tiller of the soil, according to his vocation. He will have the opportunity of keeping up the rudiments of any trade he may have learnt before joining the ranks, and of acquiring greater proficiency in it. The Socialist ideal of atteliers nationaux may be in part, at least, realised. "The State" will undertake the industrial training of the young workman; but the studio will be annexed to the barracks, and the technical teacher will have his lien on the conscript's time as well as the drill-instructor.

This would mean extension of time as well as of kind of service. Recruits would have to enlist at sixteen or seventeen.

The article concludes with the hint that conscription will have to be adopted in Great Britain:—

We, too, may have to make the army a school, and render it, not a costly burden on industrial production, but its most efficient feeder and ally.

Whether practicable or not, this is at least a practical suggestion; and it is one which, if ever realised, would tend to relegate militarism to a subordinate element in the general industrial training of the people. For a professed advocate of militarism this is not bad.

THE ASSASSIN OF THE EMPRESS

SUBDUED AND PENITENT.

THE United States Consul at Geneva, Mr. B. H. Ridgley, communicates to the Strand for September the story of Lucheni, his crime and his subsequent life in gaol. He is, we are told, incarcerated in the Évêché or bishopry, close by Calvin's great Church. Of his accommodation the writer says:—

It is a neat and clean cell, much larger and better ventilated than any cell I ever remember to have seen in an American penitentiary. The convict has a good, clean bed, with a straw mattress; he has a small table and a chair. He is comfortably clad, not in convict stripes, but in good woollen garments, and is, in short, living under better conditions of cleanliness and wholesomeness than he ever knew before in his life.

The writer himself has seen the convict recently. This is his report:

I found that Lucheni had changed considerably since the day of his condemnation. His moustache was gone, and his face looked sleek and white and fat. The lithe figure had also grown much stouter; he still wore the gum-elastic smile, but the air of bravado was missing. His eyes were downcast; his mien humble. It was easy to see that the spirit of the Anarchist was broken.

He feels the solitary confinement terribly :-

It is particularly hard to the verbose Lucheni. He sees before him a life absolutely without hope; the ceaseless babbler is reduced to everlasting silence; the preacher of the bad cause is without a public.

Within six weeks of entrance he admitted to the priest that "three hours after committing his awful crime he repented of it."

The authorities—it sounds somewhat cynical—are hoping to turn his penitence to good account. He has already confessed that he has accomplices, and they hope to have most important revelations before long. The writer at once draws the moral which opponents of capital punishment all the world over will be quick to repeat:—

Thus, after all, perhaps it is fortunate that capital purishment is not inflicted in Geneva, otherwise Lucheni, with the bravado of his kind, would have gone under the guillotine in the conventional way, crying, "Vive l'Anarchie," and his brethren would have been spared the demoralising spectacle of the most reckless and vicious and audacious of their lot turned into a trembling gaol-bird, singing Gospel hymns and weeping tears of Baroness Rothschild has told the writer that the Empress would have escaped her death if she had foregone a visit to Geneva for the sole purpose of obtaining some confectionery at a little patisserie shop. Otherwise, she would have crossed the lake directly from the Baroness's own abode.

ENGLAND AN OLIGARCHY!

"THE LEAST DEMOCRATIC PEOPLE ON THE PLANET."

MR. WILLIAM CLARKE has a very outspoken article on the House of Lords in the September Contemporary. He ridicules the Liberal idea of making an attack on the Upper Chamber the chief cry at the next General Election. What he calls "the present craze of militant imperialism," by shelving internal reforms, will, he thinks, prevent any collision between the two Houses. Meantime the question of the Peers remains merely academic. Then, he says:—

The English people are not democratic in feeling. By the English I mean the "predominant partner," and not his lesser partners in Scotland, Wales and Ireland. The English are, perhaps, the least democratic people on the planet, if we except the Prussian junker and the Austrian archdukes. . . As national characteristics are rarely changed, it may be assumed that England will remain what she is, an oligarchic country, dominated by the idea of inequality.

LIBERTY, BUT NO EQUALITY.

Newspaper talk about "democracy" is all a mistake:—

It is assumed that because liberty exists in England to a greater degree than in any country in the civilised world, therefore democracy exists. Such blunderers forget Mill's admirable discussion of this subject, where he compares the political ideals of England and France. I agree with him in preferring liberty to equality, i.e., in preferring the English to the French ideal. . . . The two are perfectly distinct, and while England has always stood for liberty, she has never shown any permanent and consistent devotion to the idea of equality.

LIBERAL LEADERS OLIGARCHS AT HEART.

Mr. Clarke points out how the character and talents of the Peers have improved, while at the same time—

By a peculiar dispensation of Providence it has also happened that the standard of ability and character in the House of Commons, especially among the younger men, has simultaneously declined. On the Liberal side not one of the younger men has taken hold of the country or ever will. And as everything which weakens the House of Commons fortifies the House of Lords, it is clear that the latter institution has received a new lease of life.

A more serious charge is next made :-

Moreover, the masses suspect, and well-informed persons are aware, that the Liberal agitation against the House of Lords is half-hearted and insincere. The Liberal leaders profess great indignation at the wicked Lords, while one or two of them are preparing to actually join their ranks; and both Front Benches unite in maintaining the principles and methods on which the House of Lords is based. The truth is that the demonstration against the Lords is not a democratic, but a party agitation.

LONDON, BERLIN, PARIS IN PARLIAMENT.

The people of England, the writer urges, like rich

The people pack the House of Commons with rich men when they could, if they chose, send thither representatives of their own class. Compare the personnel of the London representation in the House of Commons with that of Berlin in the Reichstag or that of Paris in the Chamber of Deputies. A more striking contrast it would be impossible to conceive. The passion for equality which you find dominating the masses of Paris, Berlin, Mflan, Copenhagen, Munich, wakes no echo in London. Continental journalists have often spoken to me about this phenomenon, to them so strange: I do not now pretend to explain the fact, I merely state it. I find that the wealthy class, so long as it does not interfere with the liberty of the people and permits them to share in the crumbs which fall from its table, rules the land unchallenged.

WE ARE "GOVERNED BY THE ARISTOCRACY."

There is keen satire in the next passage :-

A practically oligarchic Government is not in the least affected by the pretence of one of the parties to represent democratic principles. Since the days of Cromwell, who was himself a wealthy middle-class man, this country has been governed by the aristocracy, and it is as much so at this moment as it ever was. Who could conceive in England of a rail-splitter like Lincoln being Premier; of a young member of Congress like Mr. Bryan, without money or connections, leaping into fame in a moment; of a young man like Hanotaux, who lived in a suite au quatrième in the Quartier Latin, being Foreign Secretary; of a man like M. Witte, the Russian Finance Minister, who is said to have been a railway porter, being Chancellor of the Exchequer; of a university professor like Castelar becoming the first political figure of the land? Two leaders of the Danish Liberal party in succession were respectively a village shoemaker and a village schoolmaster. Who can think of the son of a Jewish grocer in a small town wielding the masses of England as Gambetta wielded those of France? No, these things are inconceivable.

PARLIAMENTS IN PERIL.

Mr. Clarke then exposes the futility of many popular specifics for curtailing the power of the Peers, and argues that the only chance of effecting a reform is for the progressive party to put forward some large measure of social amelioration dealing with the monopoly of land or the taxation of unearned wealth, and on its rejection by the Peers to appeal at once to the country, when a renewed mandate might enable the Lower House to curtail the Lords' power of veto. Mr. Clarke concludes with a warning to the Commons to put their house in order. He says:—

The most superficial person can see that Parliamentary government is not gaining in the world. Alike in Europe and the United States the representative person, whether called Emperor, President, or Chancellor, is more and more accepted as the exponent of national purposes, and not the representative assembly. Indeed, were it not for the House of Commons, one might be tempted to say that there was no future for the representative assembly. But the House of Commons, to say the least, is not gaining ground.

Goethe an Eminent Christian.

REV. A. T. BANNISTER, in the September Humanitarian, writes on Goethe's religion, and concludes his paper with the following courageous utterance:—

If we make religion to consist in a feeling of the deepest reverence for the Divine, and the earnest cultivation of all that tends to promote this feeling, no man was ever more religious than Goethe. And, further, if Christianity consists in the recognition that the highest human is divine—if, as he himself says, "he who calls Jesus Lord is welcome to us"—if we recognise the following of Christ in the tenderest human love for every child of Our Father—then there have been few better Christians than Goethe. To those who have not studied the man, who have only that half-knowledge which is often so dangerously untrue, I may seem to be concluding with a paradox. But, in spite of the apparent indifference to sexual morality which pervades "Wilhelm Meister," in spite of the outburst of sensualism, naked and unashamed, of which the "Roman Elegies" is the expression, in spite of the equivocal relations with Frau von Stein, and in spite of the fact that he had lived with his wife eighteen years before he married her, I do not hesitate to assert that in Goethe also was fu'falled the Gospel promise, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

The selection of the beatitude is peculiarly surprising.

A QUAINT study of Old London taverns and teagardens is a leading feature in Gentleman's for September. The tea-gardens seem to have been peculiarly "fast" resorts. extection with imp

side

cle

be nu

do

aso

an

COL

COL

cal

ear

cha

rigl

Mie

nas

Sou

cial

Liv

tate

mar thro goo mac Nov bear som

the the Am at t com geograpers com

1

Lo

Pee fait goe be cou Sta of He qua

Brid duti

PARADOXES OF BRITISH FINANCE.

fected

cratic

self a

y the

was,

ncoln

ryan,

ent :

rieme

like

have of a itical

ty in llage

in a elded

ular

the

e of d or

by

n a

e to ides

e in

ern-

the eror,

the

tive

one

pre-

the

mi-

his pest

that ious the self

we

ove

tter

the

SO

ox.

lity

urst

nan

ons

ved

not pel d."

3.

eaer.

gues

MR. THOMAS GIBSON BOWLES writes with his usual cleverness on tariff tendencies in Great Britain for the benefit of the readers of the August Forum. He sets a number of familiar facts in the form of surprising paradoxes. To begin with, he inveighs against the common ascription to England of an unbroken continuity in action and in purpose. Yet, he insists, there have been few countries where action and purpose have varied so constantly.

BRITISH CONTINUITY ALWAYS CHANGING FRONT! He indulges in this picturesque survey of our national Since first she took rank among the notable nations of the earth, England has been engaged in a gradual but constant change of front. She has, so to speak, moved her front door right round the island—from the eastern counties, which in the Middle Ages were the great centre of population and of that nascent commercial activity which found its outlet in a trade through Flanders, round by the south coast as the trade with Southern Europe developed, through Bristol, which was especially the port for the West Indies, and up the west coast to Liverpool and Glasgow, to which has finally and mainly gravitated the great trade with North America. Thus, that district extending from Glasgow to Lancashire, once known as Strathclyde, which was uninhabited moor, morass, and forest at the time when the eastern counties were teeming with life and dotted with rich monasteries and churches, has now become the most important and the most populous part of the island.

WHAT SEEMS TO BE ENGLAND'S DESTINY.

And if England has changed the side of her house through which she looks forth and puts out her fullest hands to the outside world, she has no less changed in the same time her home Originally she was a pastoral and grazing country. . . . In the beginning of the present century she became a manufacturing country, not so much of set conscious purpose as through the accidental advantage which the juxtaposition of good coal and good iron gave to her in the early development of machinery and of the manufactures which were its children. Now, when the whole world is, as it were, being brought to its bearings, and each part put in touch with the rest, it seems to some of us as though the great final destiny of England were to be that of the carrier of the world. For the rational horizon of London embraces all the four quarters of the earth, including the whole of Europe, the whole of Asia, the whole of Africa, the whole of North America, and the greater part of South America; while England herself, set in the midst of the sea and at the crossing of those sea-roads which are the only roads of commercial importance, seems as eminently fitted by her geographical position as by her secular traditions to remain permanently the centre of, and the chief agent in the intercommunication of the chief nations of the earth.

HIGH DUTIES UNDER "FREE TRADE."

Mr. Bowles describes the adoption of Free Trade under Peel and Gladstone, and girds at the once fashionable faith in the infallibility of Free Trade principles. He goes on to startle the foreigner who supposes England to be one vast free port by announcing that "there is no country in Europe, nor, with the exception of the United States, any in the world, which levies so large an amount of Customs duties at its ports as the United Kingdom." He does not stop to explain that this is due to the colossal quantity of our trade.

THE FOUR CHIEF DUTIABLE IMPORTS.

He passes to the truly remarkable fact that "Great Britain levies practically the whole of her Customs duties on the four items, tea, wine, spirits, tobacco." The aggregate value of these imports in 1897 was £23,000,000; yet on that amount were levied duties to the extent of £21,000,000! Tea pays 35 per cent., wine 22 per cent., spirits 206 per cent., and tobacco 247 per cent. The total of the four imports in 1897 paid over 90 per cent. ad valorem. Mr. Bowles thinks these four items too few, and adduces the suggestion that, without reverting to "Protective fallacies," the tariffs imposed between 1825 and 1842 might be laid again on imported furs, feathers, lace, musical instruments, and embroidery. Diamonds might also be taxed. Mr. Bowles makes merry over the casuistry of Free Traders who hold that the motive of taxation governs all. A one per cent. duty on corn would be a crime, because suggesting the motive of Protection, while a duty of 247 per cent. on tobacco is quite orthodox, because the only motive can be one of revenue.

THE BLESSED PRINCIPLE OF EXEMPTION.

Passing to our direct taxation, Mr. Bowles discovers new surprises for the American reader :--

In the case of the death duties, it is an absolute fact—incredible as it may appear—that one-tenth of the estates pay nine-tenths of the estate duty imposed by Sir William Harcourt's Finance Act. In the case of the income-tax, again, the same feature recurs. The best authorities agree in estimating the aggregate income of the inhabitants of the British Islands at £1,500,000,000. Such, however, are the exemptions introduced into this tax that, in the year 1896, only £700,000,000 was assessed by the authorities; and such are the abatements made that, out of this £700,000,000 only £500,000,000 paid duty. ... Or, to put it in another way, the State relied, and still does rely, upon one-third of the total incomes for the whole income tax. In short, it must seem to the foreigner that, if there be a dominant principle to be found in the confused system of British taxation, it is the principle of Exemption, whereby, in effect, a grant of public money is made from those few men and things that do pay to those many men and things that do not pay.

While trade expands, doubters of Free Trade policy are not much heeded, but when depression sets in Mr. Bowles anticipates a ready hearing for them:—

Then, in short, the door will be opened and audience given to all those who, in ever-increasing numbers since the English democracy has been more fully admitted to power, have ventured to conceive distrust or doubt or qualm in connection with that strange system of Free Trade which levies high duties, of incometax which does not tax incomes, and of universal taxation tempered by nearly universal exemption which goes by the name of British finance. But that day is not yet.

"To Silvia's Cigarette."

"POETRY AND PIPES" in Temple Bar for September contains the following piece of verse headed as above:—

"To lie within her lips and learn
The secrets of half-whispered things,
To kindle there, and slowly burn
While life departs on airy wings
Of mounting, melting, sinuous rings
To which the breath of Silvia clings;
To minister to soothing thought
Though self-consumed by fatal fires,
When she, with half-closed eyes, hath sought
The peace thy breathing balm inspires;
To live by those warm lips caresst,
To gently perish on a sigh—
This were a life for man to bless;
This is a death a god might die!"

An interesting paper in Good Words by Rev. J. M. Bacon tells "how I came to bombard London"—or, to be more explicit, how he experimented on the carriage of sound by firing explosives in high heaven while his balloon was sailing over London. The different descriptions given by people below of the sound which reached them from the signal cartridges form entertaining reading.

STORIES FROM THE MAGAZINES.

THE TERRORS OF THE PARSON-SPORTSMAN.

MR. RIDER HAGGARD'S September instalment in Longman's of "A Farmer's Year" is exceptionally good reading. His record of a shooting expedition leads up to the encouraging reflection :-

However, nobody was shot, perhaps because we had no clergymen among our party. Great as is my respect for the clergy, although there are exceptions (I myself know one), I confess that I am not fond of going out shooting with them, since, on these occasions, they are apt to display too active a trust in a watching Providence. When I was a young fellow there lived in our neighbourhood a retired naval chaplain, who, in private life, was a most delightful old gentleman, but who, when armed with a gun, became a perfect terror. On one occasion I was joining a party of shooters who were advancing up a turnip field, and, seeing among them my reverend friend, I was particularly careful to show myself and call out to him. When he arrived within about twenty yards of me, however, a partridge rose at his feet and flew straight past me, whereon, without the slightest hesitation, he sent first one barrel and then the other slap into the fence within about a foot of my face.

"Mr. B., Mr. B.," I exclaimed reproachfully, "you very nearly shot me dead."

"Oh," he grunted in answer, "shouldn't have been there, you know; shouldn't have been there!"

On another occasion this same old gentleman nearly blew the middle out of one of my brothers, indeed he only escaped the charge by doubling himself up with wonderful rapidity. After that experience we dared not ask him to shoot any more.

NO GAME FOR HIM!

Here is another reminiscence of a parsonic sportsman. The parson and a friend entered at the top of a long covert with a view to walking down it in line and shooting rabbits, while I stood at the bottom waiting for pheasants. There were a good many shots fired in the covert, varied by occasional shouts, and at last my friend staggered out at the end looking very hot and flustered.

"You had some shooting there," I said.
"Shooting?" he answered in a fury. "That infernal parson had the shooting. He has been firing at my legs all the way down the covert, and Pve been jumping the shot."

"A LIVING PENDULUM."

In the Royal Magazine for September Lieutenant Peary describes with breath-taking vividness his adventures on board the Hope in an Arctic hurricane. One particularly dangerous episode was that in which a cage of bears got loose on deck—the cage, but not the bears—and jammed the steering wheel. Only by superhuman efforts the captain and the lieutenant pushed back the cage, freed the wheel, and saved the ship. The writer proceeds :-

In connection with this episode a rather amusing incident occurred. One of the gentlemen of the party came rushing on deck just after the crash, hatless and bootless, and started forward. I shouted to him that he had better go below again, as everything was all right and he would only get wet on deck. He ollowed my advice, and I closed the companion way quickly behind him to keep the cabin from being deluged. Before I could get away, a lurch of the Hope forced me to keep my grip on the companion way for a few moments, and I heard confused sounds as of a violent struggle issuing from below. Sliding the top of the companion way and peering down through the crack, I could just make out the gentleman swaying back and forth half-way between the top and bottom. I opened the companion way to see what was the matter, when he dropped like a sounding lead and landed with a crash at the bottom in a confused heap, from which issued various disconnected and unseemly remarks. It appeared that in my hurried closing of the com-panion way I had caught his coat-tails, and the next lurch of the Hope had carried him off his feet and transformed him into a living pendulum. My opening of the companion way had freed these appendages and allowed Newton's discovery to do the

A NOVEL CURE FOR LATE RISING.

Mr. B. Fletcher Robinson relates in Cassell's his exploration of the night work of the General Post Office under the heading, "The Next Day's Letters." It is a racily written as well as instructive sketch. The acting head of the sorters tells the writer some of the difficulties the members of his staff have to conquer. He said :-

Of course, they find it a trying life when they first begin. Getting up between two and three in the morning is neither one thing nor the other, neither night work nor day work. excuses generally run on the same lines. They say that their alarum clock did not go off, or else they had got so used to it that it did not wake them—which, by the way, is an inconvenient fact, as I know myself. I remember one very amusing letter which we received. A man had been reprimanded for continued unpunctuality, and he wrote as follows: "It is owing to the failing of my clock and my getting back into bed again, a habit I found had grown on me to such an extent that-I knew I should have to take some serious steps to prevent it. In consequence I married about two months ago, and have not been late since."

SELECTED ADDRESSES.

Oddities of address naturally claim attention. Last year as many as twenty-eight thousand letters were posted without any address at all. A record is kept of the most remarkable "feats of interpretation," such as discovering under the disguise of Obanvidok, Bucon Palus, Ship in Hungar, Selorhom-Tebiekaldfor, and Jerip-intine, the proper addresses at Holborn Viaduct, Buckingham Palace, Chipping Ongar, Sailor's Hometo be called for, and Jarrow-upon-Tyne.

"I sometimes think," continued the official meditatively, "that the public imagines we could get a letter to the moon if necessary. Just after the Paris had run on the Manacles we received a letter despatched by some district council in the North which had for its address: 'The Steward, on board the s.s. Paris, on the Manacles rocks or elsewhere.' A German circular that arrived the other day bore a more sensible inscription. The sender had at least recognised the fact that there was a limit to our powers, for he had transcribed upon it, 'If the receiver be dead, please do not send this on to him.'"

The New Testament as a "Special Extra."

IN a very interesting sketch of the Clarendon Press written by Amyas Clifford in the Sunday Magazine, we are informed that every week about five and a half tons of books are shipped for New York from the Oxford Press, and twenty tons of printed sheets are sent every week to London to be bound. The publication of the Revised Version gave occasion to many strange incidents :

The Americans outdid their reputation for go-ahead journalism. The Revised Testament was published in this country on May 17, 1881. The Chicago Times of May 22 contained a reprint of the whole of it. The Four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles to the Romans were telegraphed through from New York. This despatch is probably the longest and the most New York. This despatch is probably the longest and the most expensive ever sent over the wires. It consisted of one hundred and eighteen thousand words and cost £2000. The remainder of the Testament was printed from copies which arrived at Chicago on the evening of the 21st. Shortly after the vessel containing the first consignment reached New York, copies were on sale in the streets. A firm of American publishers had hired that the chickers are invited officer and the contact of the bis force printing officer and the contact of the bis force printing officer and the contact of the bis force printing officer and the contact of the bis force printing officer and the contact of the bis force printing officer and the contact of the printing officer and the contact of the printing of the pr a part of the ship for a printing office, and the compositors set up the type on the voyage out !

TWO DIPS INTO THE FUTURE.

m into a

o do the

Il's his

t Office

It is a

of the t begin.

ther one

at their

sed to it

n incon-

amusing ded for "It is nto bed

t that-I

it. In ave not

Last

were kept of uch as

Bucon

r, and iaduct,

ome-

atively,

noon if

cles we

in the

ard the German

ensible

ct that

l upon

nim.' "

Press

te, we

Press, eek to

evised

alism.

n May rint of ostles

from

e most ndred

ainder

red at vessel

were hired set up

99

k. The

The

THE forecast of finalities, imperial and international, with which Hebrew prophets and apocalyptic seers have made us familiar, are much in fashion at present; and now as in ancient times the predictive person circulates his prevision in broadsheet or pamphlet. The magazine offers the modern foreseer a periodical outlet such as the authors of the first apocalypses might have envied. The two chief American magazines for August have each of them a suggestive anticipation of the days to come. One is by a Jew, the other by a Gentile.

(1) A NEW PALESTINE FOR A RESTORED ISRAEL.

We take the Jew first. Professor Richard Gottheil, in the North American Review, describes and discusses the Zionist movement. He traces it from the persecution begun by Count Ignatieff. He claims that it has already solved part of its problem. "It has found the basis upon which a higher religious life, as well as a higher economic life, can be built up for the Jew," on which a new Jewish nation can be reared. For this reconstructed people a home must be found, and a home worthy of its potencies. This is the writer's forecast:—

The Palestine of the Zionist dream is not the Palestine which we know from Sunday-school books and missionary reports. In the Westward march of empire Asia is once more to be brought into the line of the world's thought and commerce. From two sides the sound of the twentieth century has made itself heard in that slumbering continent. Through Japan on the one side and Russia on the other influences have been sown which are bound to bear fruit before many decades have passed away. The partition of China will bring the active commercial rivalry of Europe into that beehive of humanity. The trans-Siberian railway and the threatened absorption by Russia of Armenia and Persia will rapidly drive away the sleepy pall which has hung over the whole country. When the Euphrates Valley Railway shall have been completed Mesopotamia will awake from its lethargy. When that country once more supports a teeming population, as it did in the times of the old Babylonian and Assyrian kings, the hour for a new Palestine will have struck. The nearest outlet for Asia Europewards is the border-land of the Mediterranean Sea. That inland ocean will once again be covered with merchantmen, as it was in the days of the Italian Republics, In that up-building work the Jewish people in Palestine will find an occasion to use those powers which have been generated in their midst during the long centuries of exile. Already the puff of the locomotive is heard in the Judean valleys and Assyrian hills. Joined once more to the soil from which they were so violently snatched, the Jewish husbandmen will till the fruitful places. As the waste country is built up again greater needs will make themselves felt; factories will take the place of the old feudal ruins, an active commerce will make of the Jews not only producers, but also mediators between the East and the West; but not mediators as in the Middle Ages, footsore and wandering, forced beggars for the world's grace—rather open sharers in the work of building up a new century which shall be a fitting follower of the nineteenth.

On the form of the new Commonwealth the writer refuses to speculate. He assigns as its task the realisation of "the beauty of holiness." To fulfil this dream, he says, Israel must adopt it as its own choice, Turkey must help, and the Christian Powers must co-operate. He dismisses as absurd the idea of a joint crusade against the Holy People occupying the Holy Places of the Holy Land. Christianity after all is the daughter of Judaism, and the writer concludes with the exclamation:—

What a grand lesson the nations of the daughter faith could give to a twentieth century Peace Congress, in showing a love for the people of the mother faith which is really desirous of Israel's good. Then might the two faiths work together to realise the Kingdom of God on earth, and the triumph of that righteousness for which both faiths pray.

(2) WHEN THE WORLD IS FINALLY PARTITIONED.

The Gentile seer is Samuel E. Moffett, "chief editorial writer" on the New York Journal. He writes in the Forum on "Ultimate World Politics." His predictions are based on statistics of actual imperial areas. He says:—

based on statistics of actual imperial areas. He says:—
This is the supreme significance of our age. We see taking form, not the Powers in control of some little corner of a continent, to be superseded by some mightier Power from the misty beyond, but final World-Powers, whose jurisdiction will cover the entire earth. The British Empire, including Egypt and the Soudan, now covers about 12,000,000 square miles, or one-fourth of the land surface of the globe. Of the remaining 36,000,000 square miles, outside of the polar regions, Russia controls 8,664,100 - again nearly one-fourth. China, which is about to be divided among England, Russia, France, and Germany, holds a sixth of the rest. More than half of the remainder belongs to the United States, France, Brazil, Turkey, and the Argentine Republic; and the Turkish possessions are fated before long to pass into the hands of stronger Powers. Five-eighths of all the land on the globe already belong to Great Britain, Russia, the United States, France, and Brazil; and, with the impending redistributions in China and Africa, this will be increased to at least three-fourths. The French colonial empire will be held by permission of England, the dominant sea Power; and Brazil, like each of the other South American Republics, will owe the preservation of its independence to the protection of the United States. Thus, the vast bulk of the earth's surface will be controlled by England, the United States, and Russia. . . . Europe, in the face of the World-Powers of the next century, will exactly reproduce the condition of Greece in the face of Macedon and Rome.

Great Britain when she realises the territories she has now in mortgage will have an empire of 16,000,000 square miles, or one-third of all the land of the earth. Russia has "within easy reach" territory enough to make her total area 13,000,000 square miles. Meanwhile the United States with all her new territories and the West Indies thrown in besides would have only about 3,800,000 square miles. Even if Canada and Mexico entered the Union, the States would only comprise 7,900,000, and would be exceeded by the British Empire by 60 per cent., and by Russia by the same percentage. The writer proceeds:—

Another alternative is a reunion of the members of the English-speaking race. That would make us sharers in a dominion of 20,000,000 square miles, commanding all seas, and embracing half the population of the world. Whatever the rest of mankind might do, the people of such a domain would be secure. So far as international relations were concerned, they would have reached the ultimate stability; the planet would contain nothing outside their borders that could endanger them. In default of these resources—if we neither acquire Canada and Mexico nor unite with our English-speaking kinsmen—our position under the coming definite world-settlement will be simple. We shall hold a respectable, and even secure, but modest position as the third of the three great Powers. Our territory will be between a fourth and a third of that of Russia, and somewhat less than a fourth of that of the British Empire.

Any "expansion" possible to the United States under these circumstances cannot, in the judgment of the writer, be dignified with the title of Imperialism.

~~~~~

Harmsworth's for August is less sensational and more readable than usual. It opens with a whimsical paper, "If London were like Venice," with pictures portraying well-known metropolitan centres with canal and gondolas instead of streets and wheeled vehicles. The picture of the famous space in front of "Bank" and 'Change shows on a watery expanse only three gondolas.

THE REVIEWS REVIEWED.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

THERE is a rich mine of solid and suggestive matter in the September number. Cardinal Newman's letters on the crimes of his Church, Mr. Charles Booth's suggestions on public-house reform, and Mr. Wm. Clarke's candid exposure of our oligarchic temper, as well as "Senex's" plea for Indianising the Yang-tse Valley, all demand separate treatment.

THE WORLD'S WEALTH GOES BY BOAT.

"The sea the only road for trade" is Mr. T. G. Bowles' summary caption to a study in statistics which he presents in tabular form and condenses in the following sentences:

1. That the whole trade between all the (enumerated) nations of the world amounted in 1896 (approximately) to £3,342,309,000.

2. That, of this trade, that which was carried on by the ten principal nations named amounted to £2,839,502,000.

3. That of this last-named trade as much as £1,965,249,999 represents trade carried on by sea.

4. That the trade carried on by sea was from 66.5 per cent. to 71.5 per cent, of the whole.

5. In short, two thirds in value of the trade was carried on by sea, and only one-third by land.

He claims that his figures "establish beyond doubt or question that the great mass of the world's trade is carried on by sea, and that the proportion of the trade so carried on tends, in spite of the great improvements in land communication, rather to increase than to diminish." They are certainly important facts for appreciating the age-long contest between waggon and boat.

THE VOICE OF GOD IN HISTORY.

It is a gruesome piece of reading which Mr. Richard Heath presents to us under the startling heading, "But is God Silent?" He takes strong exception to the statement of Dr. Robert Anderson, Assistant Commissioner of Police, in his "Silence of God," that "God never speaks to His people now." Mr. Heath insists that the voice of the Almighty is heard in the history of individuals and nations still, especially enforcing the two truths of "Hereditary Guilt and Vicarious Suffering." He illustrates his contention by a reference to the retribution which overtook the French nobility in the Hundred Years War for their infamous oppression of the peasantry, and which visited the Anglo-French nobility of England and in the Wars of the Roses for their brutal betrayal of the common people. Not content with expounding the vengeance of offended Heaven in these national judgments, Mr. Heath essays to trace the same retributive treatment in the miserable doom which overtook family after family of the offending nobility. The law by which the Supreme Judge assigns this award is "Thou shalt love," and stern are the penalties for disobedience. Altogether it is a grim chapter in the philosophy or—if the phrase may be allowed—the Christosophy of history.

BATTLE-TACTICS OF HORSE AGAINST WOLF.

It is an agreeable change to turn to Dr. Woods Hutchinson's "Some Prairie Chums of Mine." The writer wonders that "no one has yet formally set forth the advantages of the Darwinian theory as a basis for sympathy with and affection for the so-called lower animals," on the principle "We be of one blood." He declares cheerily, "Ninety per cent. of animals—including man—are good fellows." He gives many charming instances of this general proposition. Here is a striking story of equine versus vulpine wits at work in war:—

art

ske

aci

sup

Ev

fin

offi

in the

rep

sha

reg

sel

ord

Ch

fra

sid

for

but

the

int

pro

and

Lo

th

hi

no

COI

rea

ag

be

Th

be

Pe

of

ma

in titl

Mi

toy

pa

TAT

as

Co

ren

ite

Almost the only species, except our own, that the wolf cannot get the better of, either by force or strategy, is the horse. Here he finds himself opposed by an intelligence equal to his own and an organisation even firmer. The moment the alarm is sounded or its flank is attacked, the horse-herd rushes not away from the danger but towards its own centre. Here a compact mob is quickly formed, foals and yearlings in the middle, surrounded by a ring of grown horses facing outward. So that from whatever quarter the attack is delivered it finds itself confronted by an unbroken row of gleaming yellow ivories and iron hoofs flying like sledge-hammers. And the wolf who is bold enough to charge the square gets nothing but a mouthful of his own teeth down his throat or a broken skull. Then when all is in order, out trots the oldest stallion, the war-lord of the herd, and paces proudly up and down in front of the line, looking for the enemy. And woe betide the single wolf that he can overtake before he can gain the shelter of the chop-hills; his back will be broken by a trip-hammer stroke of the front hoofs, and the life shaken out of him by the great yellow teeth as if he had been a rat. And we are wonderfully proud of our "invention" of the serried rank of pikemen and the hollow square of bayonets to resist cavalry, when we were simply using their own ancient tactics against horses—with riders!

A curious fact is that civilised horses have forgotten these tactics, but a few broncho mares put among them soon teach them the combination.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Dr. Guinness Rogers, writing on the Archbishop's court and its pronouncement on incense and candles, states as his "general conclusion... that the Primate has employed what is nothing less than a revolutionary measure, in the hope of ending the crisis, and that he has failed." He quotes with surprised pleasure the Duke of Argyll's letter to the Times: "Free Churches are in all probability the future of the world," but declares that meantime "the Church of England is an institution in which the Nonconformist laity are as much concerned as the Archbishops themselves." Mr. John Smith replies to Mr. Dyche's eulogy of the Jewish immigrant by a most emphatic depreciation of that much discussed import. Mr. W. B. Yeats, under the heading of "Ireiand Bewitched," contributes a record of local superstitions such as one expects to find in the Proceedings of a Folk Lore Society rather than in a general organ of public opinion.

The Revue de l'Art.

THE August number of the Revne de PArt is even more excellent than usual. The Van Dyck Tercentenary, with the exhibition of Van Dyck's works at Antwerp, has called for an interesting study of the great master by M. Jean Durand; M. J. Granié forms the subject of another article by M. Jean Cruppi; and La Chapelle Expiatoire, one of the threatened architectural monuments of Paris, is described by M. Jacques de Boisjoslin. And in addition to the excellence attained by the letterpress, special mention should be made of the beautiful illustrations, notably those accompanying the Van Dyck article.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

THE September number contains a variety of good articles, most of which claim separate notice.

He

lud-

ing

king

wolf

his

m is way

pact

dle,

that tself

and

o is

l of hen

the

ine,

t he lls ;

ont

eth

our

low

ing

ten

em

p's

es,

ate

ry

as

of all

at

in

as

to ost

rt.

nd

ns

lk

ic

en

y,

y

of le

n.

ul

THE HIGH PRIEST OF THE RAISON D'ETAT.

M. Brunetière is the subject of a vivacious character sketch by Charles Bastide. M. Brunetière, critic, academician, editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, the supposed mouthpiece of the Vatican, yet an adherent of Evolution, neither Catholic nor Gallican nor believer, is finally characterised by the writer as "the last of the official critics." His standard and sanction are expressed in the words Raison d'Etat. He embodies the spirit of the French middle class, of which this sketch is worth reproducing:—

Those that found in M. Brunetière a writer who has given shape and expression to their private opinions, and have made his success, form the majority in bourgeois France. A hundred and fifty years of training by the Jesuit Fathers, under the old régime, prepared Frenchmen to accept the administrative system of Napoleon with all its consequences. In 1852 they cast them-selves at the feet of the first man who promised to restore order. To-day the same bourgeois see now in the Roman Church, now in a strong Government, only ingenious devices framed to keep the passions of man under coatrol. The right of the individual does not appeal to them; they sacrifice every consideration of abstract justice to the general interest, which means for them a momentary quietness. They are Roman Catholics, but in the same sceptical manner as M. Brunetière; the clergy for them must be an administrative body like the corps of Civil Engineers and the Police, or, as Napoleon humorously termed them, a gendarmerie sacrée. At the same time they resent any interference of the clergy with their opinions or their conduct; in a word, they have solved that curious and contradictory problem of being at once Catholics and anticlericals, Catholics and Unbelievers.

THE STYLE OF THE "VICTORIAN RENAISSANCE."

Mr. Charles G. Harper writes on the Government and London architecture. He is severe on the lack of governmental liberality and of architectural originality in the erection of our great public buildings. He allows himself this satire on the modern style:—

The term "Victorian Renaissance" cloaks all manner of adaptations, and is another name for that eclecticism which has, now that architecture as a living and a progressive art is dead, come to be the note of the age. . . . Architects have doubtless read, in common with others, that we are "heirs of all the " and it must have occurred to them that the saying might be made to apply, in a very special sense, to Architecture. This selective method, so long as the personal equation lasts, must needs prevent so-called Victorian Renaissance from ever becoming a style. One man may elect to combine Norman, Perpendicular, and Elizabethan together; to another the claims of Saracenic or Indian architecture, with excursions into classic, may appeal more powerfully, and so with combinations ad infinitum. But each and all are dubbed by the now fashionable title, and none of them have kinship. In this wise has Mr. Aston Webb's Museum design grown. You can put your finger on different parts of the drawings and say, "This central tower derives from the famous Giralda tower of Seville; these pavilions, with cupolas and grouped minarets, are spoils from Constantinople; here are campaniles from Florence; and these ranges of windows are reminiscences of Perpendicular architecture as seen at Winchester College, or the Chapels of King's College, Cambridge, or Eton. Having said so much, it remains to add that the scholarship and taste with which these items are added together and adapted are undeniable.

KING ALFRED'S COUNTRY.

The approaching Alfred celebrations give special interest to Rev. W. Greswell's paper on "King Alfred's Country." In West Somerset along the valley of the Tone and the Parrett, he dimly discerns the outlines of a King Alfred's country. Of fifteen places mentioned in Alfred's will eight are in Somerset. He says:—

The writer is not aware whether sufficient stress has been laid upon this point before, but there is no doubt that in the watershed of the Parrett there was a remarkable collection of Royal Hundreds and Manors. There was a distinct territorial area, capable of being defined with geographical exactness in Central and Western Somerset, falling to the lot of Eadweard, King Alfred's eldest son. Further, it was an inherited, and not an acquired property, a fact which throws the title-deeds, as it were, still further back. It is not unreasonable to regard Carhampton, Burnham, Wedmore, Cheddar, Chewton-on-Mendip, Quantock, and Long Sutton as a nucleus of Wessex Royal property of deeper importance than any other part. If we include Stratton in Cornwall, this section of dominion seems to follow roughly the shadowy outlines of the great Arthurian Kingdom, stretching as a riverine power from Tintagel to Glastonbury. Where tradition says that King Arthur was strong, there recorded history would have it King Alfred was undoubted master.

This remark suggests an interesting comparative study of Arthur the myth and Alfred the man.

THE LOVES OF LETTERED FOLK.

Mrs. Charles Towle writes on "literary courtships." She selects for treatment the love stories of Sir Walter Scott, Coleridge, Southey, Shelley, Hazlitt, Landor, Cowper, Sheridan, Madame d'Arblay, Miss Austen, Charlotte Brontë, Carlyle, winding up with the Brownings as climax. Despite certain eminent exceptions, the writer ventures on this generalisation:—

Certainly in many other instances it would seem to be true that "love in literary persons excites the imagination rather than the passions." They have put themselves to school to learn its language and study its manifestations; they are too much occupied in examining symptoms and nursing illusions... They have heard their own hearts beat too often not to know all about it, and they only fear, with reason, that they have taken the fever, which quickens their pulses, too lightly.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Miss Alice Law relates her discovery of a Caroline commonplace-book, and presents many quaint and curious extracts, notably seven hymns much in the spirit of Herbert. X. Y. Z. discusses as a possible result of admitting prisoners to give evidence, the erection of a Court of Criminal Appeal. He compares such an institution with the present inquiry by the Home Secretary and his exercise of the prerogative of mercy.

THE AUSTRALASIAN REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE July number, as might be expected, is largely a cricket number, the first test match at Trent Bridge, which began on July 1st, being described at length, from different points of view, by Mr. C. B. Fry and "One of the Crowd." The chief point in Mr. Fry's article is his argument that a three-day test match ought not to end in a draw, it being really a matter of generalship.
"If a team," he says, "has only three days to win a match, it ought to grasp the way to win in that time." Professor Tucker writes on Australian Poetry, and lays down some rules as to what Australian poetry and criticism should be. The History of the Month naturally begins by a pæan of triumph over the Federation victory in New South Wales, and most of the cartoons reproduced in this section deal with this subject. Writing on the Transvaal dispute, the acting-editor declares that in several of the Australian colonies "military volunteers are straining at the leash," and warns Mr. Chamberlain not to give them a rebuff if they want to fight. Mr Chamberlain does not seem to want any encouragement.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

THERE are fewer outstanding articles in the September number than are usually found in the National Review. The Dreyfus case still occupies the foremost place. Separate notice has been accorded to M. Gohier's warning to England of a European reaction directed against her, and to Mr. George S. Owen's Reform Policy of the Chinese Emperor.

A CRISP SUMMARY OF THE SESSION.

Impressions of the House of Commons from the ladies' gallery by "Grille" are racy and piquant. This is her picturesque story of the year's record :-

A Session where the existence of a hundred and forty majority never was felt by the Government to be a foundation on which they could build with any security. A lobby ruled by Whips timid in council, and flying into the House with rumours of recalcitrancy and insubordination at the slightest provocation, and as if the day of the General Election were immediately at hand. Tentative Bills, fulfilling as little as possible election pledges, drawn with a view of passing them quickly through the House; clauses couched in "inference" language, to be read only by the cypher key of other Bills; each and all preparing a rich harvest for the lawyers. Above all, the drum ecclesiastical continuously rolling, beaten by every sect, and each side scared by the noise made by its own drummers. A Session of Bumbledom and clergy. A Colonial Minister always appearing in the panoply of Mars; a day of small men, small measures, small rattings, and small bye-elections, only remarkable in as far as undue importance was attached to each incident as it arose.

THE AMERICAN VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. Maurice Low, referring to the retirement of Mr. Alger, the late Secretary for War, offers this comprehensive criticism of the Santiago campaign:—

As a matter of fact everything which calls for condemnation was done by a regular army officer; the few things worthy of praise were done by volunteers, who had not become fossilized and whose original vigour had not been sapped by the enervating influence of red tape and "system." I speak with full knowledge of all the circumstances. I was at Tampa during the six weeks the army was being equipped and organised, I sailed on one of the transports, and I was with the army in the field until the surrender. The fact is that except the rank and file the only army laurels won were by the volunteers. Wheeler was a volunteer, so was Roosevelt.

Mr. Low sees in Mr. Root's appointment as Mr. Aiger's successor another proof that McKinley's government is "an administration of bosses, by the bosses, for the bosses."

AN ITALIAN REFORMER.

Miss Irby tells of a native reform movement which has sprung up in Italian Catholicism at Piacenza. "Foreign influence had no voice in the beginning." The leader is a certain Don Miraglia, a Sicilian priest. Called to Rome in 1895 by Mgr. Carini, Prefect of the Vatican Library, he found himself by the prefect's sudden and suspicious death—he was opposed to the Jesuits—dismissed to Piacenza, where it was intended to make away with him. He had already addressed a pamphlet to the Pope urging a reform in preaching. On the Jesuit conspiracies against him being unmasked, he parted from the Papacy. He claims still to be Catholic Roman Apostolic. His watchword is "Christus et Ecclesia Romana." He preaches and officiates as priest in a spacious palace-stable now transformed by the gifts of a niece of the great Mazzini into the Oratory of St. Paul. He is a great orator, a self-consuming worker, with never less than a thousand in his congregation, with a weekly paper named after Savonarola, with Bible readings and the like. He has been conducting a tour through the great cities, insisting that the civil marriage should precede the ecclesiastical, and agitating professorships of Biblical study in the Universities. "His work is tending to form a National Church of Italy, which shall be no imitation or exotic, but essentially national and Italian. His attack is on the Vatican, the Jesuits, and the Curia Romana."

OUR NEED OF THE CRITIC.

Dr. Barry comes to the defence and the praise of critics. He styles them "keepers of literature." He exclaims:—

How few editions of the classics, ancient or modern, would satisfy the public demand were not the endowment of scholarship provided at the Universities and by authority upheld also as a national institution, and so woven into the life of the professions, lay or clerical? Here it is that the keepers of literature may fulfil a duty, as lofty as it is momentous, towards the Commonwealth, if they will rescue from oblivion, or at least from the danger of it, those mighty instructors, beacons of light to all generations, who, in the absence of such guides, would remain unvisited and, except for their names, unknown, like the highest peaks among the Alps, and on much the same account, because they tower above the common in an austere solitude. But for a long succession of critics and exponents where would now be the living influence, which alone deserves to be called fame, of Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, and the magnificent English prose writers of the seventeenth century?

He urges that the present chaos of opinions makes the critic the more necessary. "Surely there never was a time of such widespread mental confusion."

Sir Godfrey Lushington reviews the course of the Court Martial at Rennes, and Mr. S. Wyndham discusses in the affirmative the question, "Can Gardening be made to Pay?"

CORNHILL.

THE Cornhill for September is an exceedingly readable number, with plenty of lively gossip and vivid sketches, but with little that lends itself to purposes of extract. Mrs. Paget's "Travels in China" claim separate notice. Urbanus Sylvan, in his conferences on books and men, describes his visit to this year's Encaenia. Speaking of the terror which "the chartered libertinisms of young England" inspire at such ceremonies, he says:—

On this occasion one gentleman, understood to be willing to face the music generally, looked pale and flabby as he entered, and grew conspicuously more erect and solid, and master of his fate, as he found the preponderance of cries in his favour. . . .

There were many more or less veracious anecdotes told as to the secret history of the Oxford movement to sufflaminate Mr. Rhodes. One gentleman related, on the very highest authority, that a most distinguished personage had threatened to leave the theatre if the senior Proctor vetoed the degree. Another gentleman knew for a fact that Lord Kitchener had said privately to Mr. Rhodes, "Don't forget, Rhodes, that I have a sword under my gown if it is wanted."

An interesting historical document is presented by Mrs. Simpson in the shape of extracts from the journal of her maternal grandfather, Mr. John Mair, who was eye-witness of the Paris festivities attending the union of Marie Antoinetté and the future Louis XVI. in 1770. He tells a very graphic story of what he saw, in especial the gruesome crush at the Feu d'Artifice given by the city of Paris, when 866 people were killed outright. A lady recalls impressions of "People I Have Known," among whom were Lord Macaulay, Samuel Rogers, Dr. Pusey, Comte de Chambord, Garibaldi, Lord Tennyson and Faraday. Mr. H. W. Wilson revives the horrors of the mutiny of the Hermione in his vigorous sketch, and Mrs. M. L. Woods continues her vivacious "Pastels from Spain."

the sto M his Impo

A. B.
It rifle-s large.
nation our er sports disast in can nation

He

66 F

Mart loade almo less t ance establishmeigh

In three
I. nouris makir
2. are be
3. Church distinction for ce

dioce

Mr Carly man Gran histor his pictur (2) H than have "an motiv mass "The Somrand vigives and style.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

THERE are not many articles of eminent significance in the September number. Reference has been made in other pages to Mr. Moreing's plea for an All-British railway to China, to Mr. Sidney Low's scheme for turning the great armies of the future into technical schools, and to Miss Banks' sad paper on the American negro and his place, as well as Mr. Birchenough's essay on the Imperial function of trade.

A NEW NATIONAL SPORT?

"Rifle shooting as a national sport" is what Mr. W. A. Baillie-Grohman pleads for. He says:—

It is a doubly regrettable circumstance that in this country rifle-shooting has never received the support of the nation at large. It is the one branch of sport which serves really useful out enthusiasm for cricket, football, and other forms of athletic sports come to the assistance of the nation were any unforeseen disaster to befall our floating walls, upon the efficiency of which, in case of a threatened invasion, we confidingly stake our national existence?

He suggests that for the civilian's pastime the Swiss Martini is perhaps the best short-range target breech-loader, and if made in quantities could be procured at almost £2 10s. a piece. Ammunition for this rifle costs less than a halfpenny a shot. "With the patriotic assistance of public-spirited landowners," rifle clubs could be established and made self-supporting even in poor neighbourhoods.

FROM PAPACY AND PROTESTANTISM TO WHAT?

The future of the Christian religion is discussed by the Rev. Dr. Percival, presbyter of the Pennsylvanian diocese. He sums up his previsions thus:—

In taking, then, a careful view of the state of Christianity, three things seem to me to be absolutely certain:

 That among civilised nations the form of Christianity nourished by Rome, which is ordinarily called "Popery," is making no headway.

That the distinctive doctrines of every Protestant reformer are being more and more universally rejected.

 That there is in all Protestant Christendom (the Anglican Church being, perhaps improperly, included in that category) a distinct movement towards Catholicism and a most evident desire for ceremonialism.

WAS CARLYLE A HISTORIAN?

Mr. George Macaulay Trevelyan vigorously vindicates Carlyle's claim to be considered a historian as well as a man of letters, against the challenge of the Dryasdusts. Granting certain faults of omission, and that he was no historian of institutions, the writer passes under review his positive excellences: (1) He was a poet—drew pictures of the mind as well as of body and scene. (2) He possessed humour, and as "man is no less absurd than serious," the true recorder of human affairs should have an eye for the ludicrous. (3) Above all, he had "an unrivalled instinct for the detection of men's inmost motives," and not merely the motives of individuals, but of masses of men, mobs, and the like. Mr. Trevelyan ranks "The French Revolution" as his greatest history.

WANTED-A ROWTON HOUSE AT BRIGHTON.

A resident in one of the Rowton Houses, Mr. W. A. Sommerville by name, who writes like a widely travelled and widely read man, and now lives on 8s. 2d. a week, gives a humorous but appreciative account of his home and its guests. He offers suggestions in the prophetic style. He says:—

The building of these large houses for working men has proved a success, and introduced a new feature into the social life of London. As yet the scheme is only in its infancy. Houses of this class will be built in all the great industrial cities throughout the kingdom. They will not be limited to men only; they will be erected for unmarried women and for married men with families. I shall not have written this article in vain if it could be the means of inducing Lord Rowton and Sir Richard Farrant to erect a house similar to this at Brighton, perhaps with a thousand beds, to give accommodation to the hard-worked City clerk, where he could go—let us hope, upon his bicycle—from Saturday to Monday, and breathe sea air, paying only sixpence a night for his bed, and purchase his food at the prices I have named. A charity, not founded upon the shifting sands of sentiment, but built upon the solid rock of a five per cent. dividend.

A NEW INDUSTRY FOR WOMEN.

Mr. Moreton Frewen describes his visit to the U.S. Cray Brook Salmon Hatchery, in the hope that others may be attracted to hatch salmon and trout for our home waters. He commends the idea to Lady Warwick as a country pursuit admirably adapted to women's work. He concludes:—

In the case of these islands, begirt as they are by an endless expanse of ocean, its acres rent free to all men, the neglect of the state to develop scientifically the sources of its very cheapest food supply is almost shameful. Far otherwise is the enlightened attitude of the United States. During the present year, if I include some two hundred millions of young lobsters, not less than a thousand millions of tiny fish will have been hatched by the Federal Fish Department, to be liberated in their rivers and harbours.

OTHER ARTICLES.

"Are we to lose South Africa?" is the heading of Sir Sidney Shippard's rejoinder to Mr. Edmund Robertson's reply in a previous issue. One peculiarity of his diction is that he uses "Fenian" and "Little Englander almost as alternate terms. Mrs. Gaffney, president of the American National Council, replies to Miss Low's criticism of the International Women's Congress.

The Windsor Magazine.

THE September number has in it a store of varied reading, instructive as well as entertaining. Mr. Russell-Jeaffreson's paper on Nova Zembla, as well as what I have to say about the Cape to Cairo Railway, claims separate notice. Mr. James R. Falconer gives a graphic account of White Island, off New Zealand, which he describes as perhaps the most extraordinary island in the world. It is "practically one mass of sulphur," and would supply the empire in case of war with an exhaustless quantity of one ingredient of gunpowder. At its heart lies a lake about fifty acres in extent, which consists of diluted hydrochloric and sulphuric acids at a temperature of 110 deg. Fahr. The boat on which the writer essaved to pass over the lake almost dropped to pieces through the corrosion of the rivets by the acids. The whole island is in a state of perpetual agitation. When the blowholes are in full blast it presents a lively scene. Another interesting travel-paper is Mr. C. Fell Smith's account of harvesting in Far California, with its photograph of the "harvester," a machine which "reaps, threshes, and empties the corn into sacks in one operation." It requires twenty-six mules to draw it. Mr. A. K. Page sketches the growth of the Hunterian Museum in Lincoln's Inn Fields. The gathering of firemen's corps in camp at Woodstock and Blenheim, by invitation of the Duke of Marlborough, is pleasantly described by Mr. K. H. Bates.

stical, in the ational exotic, on the would blarship so as a re may mmonom the to all remain highest because it for a be the me, of h prose

ces the was a Court ses in ade to dable tches, tract. notice. men, ing of young to the hodes. that a cheatre tleman tely to under od by burnal o was ion of 1770. pecial by the t. A

own,"
ogers, ennyorrors
tetch,
astels

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

THERE is considerable variety of subject in the September number, but, as is usual, there is more of strenuousness than vivaciousness in the tone of the articles.

AN ITALIAN ON THE EUROPEAN SITUATION.

Signor G. D. Vecchia, writing on the foreign policy of Italy, reiterates the conviction that the good understanding between Italy and England remains intact, howsoever relations improve between Italy and France. For the danger common to Italy and England is that the Mediterranean may become a French lake; and this common danger if it ever became acute would compel common action. He concludes with the hopeful view of the general international situation:—

The Triple Alliance has ceased to be looked apon in a league of hostile forces, and the Dual Alliance is dissolving itself without having had the opportunity of asserting itself. France now is on friendly terms with Italy; she is more friendly with England; she mistrusts Germany less, and trusts Russia less than she did last year. I consider this a good omen for the peace of Europe. If I do not misread the events, the dawn of the twentieth century promises to be as the birth of a new era for the peace of Europe.

A FOURFOLD "CRY" FOR THE LIBERALS.

The first paper is headed "The Rallying Point and the Touchstone: are Liberals in Earnest?" It insists once more on the first step for the party being financial reform:—

Let the Liberal party, therefore, make a real, live, democratic Budget the first plank of their platform for the next General Election. In the Newcastle Programme the party stands pledged to the hilt to three great and far-reaching financial reforms: (1) The Taxation of Land Values, including mineral rents and royalties; (2) The Abolition of the Breakfast-Table Duties; and (3) The Payment of Members and of Election Expenses. The leaders have also, one and all, approved of the principle of Old-Age Pensions. Here, then, we have the makings of a sound democratic Budget. Let the Liberal party put such a Budget in the forefront of their programme at the next General Election and they will undoubtedly sweep the country from end to end.

HOW TO DESTROY VICE AS A CALLING.

Mr. Ellis Eth'lmer inveighs hotly against the Lord Chancellor for his recantation of view on the question of woman's enfranchisement, and interprets a veiled remark of his to mean that it was women's attitude on the C. D. Acts which dissuaded him. The writer argues again the general principle and effect of such measures. He calls attention to this as an additional complication of our South African problem:—

The official journal Rhodesia announces that in the Legislative Council at Salisbury (Rhodesia) on May 30th last, "Dr. Sauer's question rea Contagious Diseases Act for application to Buluwayo was answered by the Administrator of Matabeleland to the effect that its application was now being considered.

He concludes with the assurance:—
The abolition of prostitution lies in the opening of a free career to women; not in "licensing," or "tolerating," or even assuming to "regulate" conditions which can have neither recognition nor existence in any valid social system. With woman free to live honestly, prostitution dies; with prostitution die the mutually engendered unclean maladies; and with these all pretext for special and revolting enactments. So shall ensue a purer, a higher race, whose fuller progress will be the sole purpose in its own propagation.

A STRANGE ORDER OF HUMBUGS.

Mr. Oscar Boulton delivers a valuable and outspoken homily on "Art and Other Matters," in which he soundly trounces as bad citizens and bad artists and insufferable bores those "who, in the sacred name of art, ply a shameful but lucrative trade by exhibiting their lascivious and unclothed imaginations to the gaze of the crowd." In the course of his criticism he attributes a curious distortion of fashion to the young England of to-day:—

We have all heard of that hypocrisy which is the homage paid by vice to virtue. There is, however, another and a rival species of hypocrisy, which is always an occasional affectation of the young, the idle, or the unthinking. It is that hypocrisy which is displayed in insincere and reluctant ridicule of all those objects and qualities which in secret we ardently and reverently admire. It is the homage paid by the virtuous man to his own innate viciousness, and the tribute which he pays to public opinion and to the devil for his otherwise blameless conduct. And this strange manifestation of human perversity is rather more than usually prevalent just now. The fact is we are a generation of humbugs, and even in sinning we are no longer sincere. We are all acquainted, I am sure, with young men and women, chiefly of the middle classes, who have excellent reputations, and display, on the whole, exemplary conduct, but who think it necessary, in the interests of respectability, to pretend to be most desperately wicked.

A GIBBETER OF MALE EGOISM.

Molière the poet is the theme of a paper by William Platt, the purpose of which is to show the dramatist as champion of female freedom and chastiser of male tyranny. He says:—

He dealt to paltry male egoism, whether on the part of husband, father, or guardian, a blow so staggering that the male egoists could but respond with the weapons with which they felt surest —the vilest inventions, the lowest calumnies. . . . Evidently very dear to him was this strong battle for the inherent right of women to arrange freely by the light of their own souls the subtlest and most important relationship into which they can enter. Not only has he written several plays in which this is the chief motive; he has also introduced it as a minor motive in almost all of his other plays. The various egoists whom he makes the special targets of his satire all show a most painfully human readiness to sacrifice their daughters to their own particular egoism.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Herbert Flowerdew suggests as an optional substitute for the marriage law a legal agreement between man and woman, terminable by either party, involving joint responsibility for the maintenance of any children of the union, and securing compensation from the retiring partner for the other. N. C. Frederiksen, a Dane, thinks Mr. Bodley's "France" wrong in his support of centralised government and praise of the army. Mr. R. Shuddick sees in the co-operative workshop the hope of the toiler.

The Canadian Magazine.

THE Canadian Magazine continues its services in promoting a healthy national self-consciousness in the great Dominion. Its August issue—which styles itself a "Midsummer" number—is full of Canadian interest. The local sketch shows up the attractions of Halifax, as Mr. E. S. Tupper sees them. The Canadian celebrity of the month is the famous geologist, Sir William Dawson, whose services to the McGill University are warmly appraised. Dr. McCrae describes hospital life in a Canadian city, and the Parliamentary life at Ottawa is sketched in novel style by Mr. C. S. Shaw. Dr. George Stewart treats of Francis Parkman, the historian of the North American Indian (whose portrait forms the frontispiece) in a paper of personal as well as public reminiscences.

h b otld low Jif

o

d

th

m

re

h

th

THE NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

FOR an August number the North American Review is unusually lively reading. Separate notice has been given to Lady Aberdeen's estimate of the Women's International, to Professor Gottheil's vision of a new Palestine, and to Mr. Bernard Shaw's wail over our stage censorship.

WHO IS PARAMOUNT IN THE PACIFIC?

Mr. John Barrett, formerly U. S. Minister to Siam, answers, the United States; and Admiral Dewey's victory at Manila made it clear. The policy he recommends to his countrymen may be thus summarised:—

The maintenance of Chinese integrity and of the "open door": opposition to "spheres of influence" and "areas of operation"; in the event of a break-up of the empire, a port in Northern China: the cutting of the Nicaragua Canal: the laying of a cable across the Pacific: improvement by subsidy of passenger, freight, and mail steamship service across the Pacific: good men as Ministers: American banks at chief ports.

China, he says, "sees in the United States her only

A STRIKING PROOF OF JAPANESE LOYALTY.

Mr. T. R. Jernigan, formerly U. S. Consul-General at Shanghai, discusses "Japan's entry into the family of nations." He gives a swift survey of Japanese history from the earliest times. Referring to the revolt which in 1854 made the Mikado actually instead of normally supreme, he quotes as illustrative of Japanese character the loyalty of the feudal chiefs at the restoration of the Emperor. He says:—

These chiefs set out from their castles with the title-deeds of their possessions in their pockets, and delivered all into the hand of the Emperor; and this they did, not under compulsion, but of their own free will. To these very chiefs the Emperor owed his restoration; it was their strong arms and sharp swords that had rescued him from the power of the Shogun and destroyed that power. But they were moved by a sentiment of loyalty, such as history has seldom had to record, in acting out what they professed, and it would not be just to withhold from Japanese character the confidence which conduct so lau lable is fitted to inspire.

A PROTEST FROM FINLAND.

"A Member of the Finnish Diet" recounts the several stages of "the constitutional conflict in Finland" with its two-and-a-half millions, against Russia with its 130 millions of people. Over against the many statistics of the increase of Russian husbandry, industry, and capital, the writer speaks of "despotically governed Russia," "sucked out by a rapacious bureaucracy," sinking "deeper and deeper in poverty and ignorance." Of the Tsar, Nicholas II., the writer has equally original views. He says of him :—

A pupil of the procurator in the Holy Synod, Pobyedonostzeff, the reaction incarnate, and feeble of character, the young monarch was soon to become a plaything of his reactionary surroundings.

The author of the Peace Rescript as "a plaything" of reaction is a paradox almost comic in its absurdity. The writer fears that this singularly pliable monarch will not heed the voice of the Finnish people. In which case—the constitutional conflict will then be continued. For the Finns are known not only for their patriotism and obedience to the law, but also to be one of the most persevering nations in the world. Their institutions and wealth may be destroyed, but Russianised the Finns will never be. Their nation forms an individuality of its own, having its distinct historical mission.

FRENCH NOVELS FOR GIRLS.

Madame Yetta Blaze de Bury writes on "Girls' Novels in France." She makes this interesting remark:—

To the reproach foreigners are fond of making, that we write no fiction which girls can read, we might reply that we have left this task for them, since it is the Tauchnitz edition and the translations of these volumes which form the staple of our French girls' reading.

The writer does not find these suited to French girls, to whom a love-match is scarcely possible. The vogue given to the English novel under the Second Empire "furnished a model to Madame Craven, who at once began to write the novel with a purpose":—

Madame Gréville followed suit with the simply moral novel, where the society is elegant but not aristocratic. As for the novel "accessible" to girls, but written equally for their mothers, that is to say, the real, human novel, the authors who have reached the greatest literary excellence are Madame Bentzon and Madame Caro. They are without rivals in this particular kind of writing.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Mr. W. A. Purrington makes elaborate fun of "Christian Science" and its author. Magazine-writers would show themselves positively original on this subject did they leave off making fun of it, and really try to explain the attraction it possesses for such great numbers of men and women otherwise tolerably sane. The louder the laugh raised by the critics, the more puzzling their problem. Mr. Max O'Rell preaches the pleasures of poverty in a quite idyllic little dialogue between an artist and his wife, in which she dwells lovingly on the retrospect of their early domestic struggles. She would re-edit the ancient proverb thus: "When wealth comes in at the door, love and happiness fly out of the window."

Pearson's.

THERE are several papers of much more than fantastic interest in the September number, along with some superb illustrations. Mr. Herbert C. Fyfe tells the unhappy fate which has overtaken roller-boats thus far. The Bazin boat, which was to overcome the disagreeable movements which produce sea-sickness, could go no faster than them so much water that it acted like a brake. The them so much water that it acted like a brake. inventor died soon after the trial trip, and his invention now lies at Hull, bought for a fraction of its original cost, which was over £20,000. The Knapp roller-boat, invented by a Toronto lawyer of that name, consisted of a huge cylinder 110 feet long and from 22 to 15 feet broad. Launched in 1897, its trial trip registered six miles an hour. Undismayed, Mr. Knapp is constructing another, 500 by 96 feet. A third roller-boat, built by Mr. Peter Beckman, was a sort of floating barrel worked by hand cranks and gears. The trial trip so alarmed its inventor that he was glad to be hauled on another vessel, and left his invention to go derelict. Another technical subject made popular is the cumulative competition between armourplate and gun. Thewriter, Mr. Arthur Goodrich, announces himself in a position to dispel the "mystery" attaching to the sudden change of French front in regard to Fashoda. Secret trials tested the effect of French and Russian guns upon English armour-plates, and proved that the guns failed to penetrate. As this meant defeat in war, France backed down. Mr. A. Anderson explains the possibility and formulæ of pinhole photography, and offers proof in the form of remarkable photographs. Hesketh Prichard traces the career of the Spanish bull from birth to bull-Mr. George Griffith describes the interior and procedure of a convict prison, and essays to explain the working of the treadmill to the uninitiated.

rable

ame-

and

rious

paid

pecies of the which bjects

mire.

nnate and

this

than

on of

e are hiefly

dis-

neces-

most lliam

st as male band.

goists

ently

ht of

s the

his is ive in ifully

own

itute

man

joint

f the iring

ane,

rt of

r. R.

pe-of s in

the

elf a rest.

x, as ty of son,

rmly

n a

a is orge

the

the

ablic

In

THE FORUM.

THE August number has not many articles of eminent value. Special attention has been drawn to Mr. S. E. Moffett's vision of "Ultimate World-Politics," to Mr. T. S. Harrison's picture of "Egypt under Lord Cromer," to Mr. Gibson Bowles's account of tariff tendencies in Great Britain, and Miss M. R. Smith's homily on Mistresses and Maids.

ANTI-TOXIC IMMUNITIES.

Dr. J. J. Kinyoun, director of the Washington hygienic laboratory, contributes a cogent account of the progress of anti-toxins in the prevention and treatment of disease. His figures show that 1,637 deaths occurred out of 4,315 cases of diphtheria in Berlin in 1893 before the anti-toxin was used, and that the deaths fell to 987 out of 6,106 cases in 1895, when the anti-toxin was completely in use. In Paris the deaths dropped from 1,262 to 993 in the first year the anti-toxin was used, and have since sunk to 274. If administered to the patient on the first day of the disease anti-toxin would practically put an end to mortality from diphtheria. An anti-toxin is said to have reduced the mortality from tetanus in cases treated by one-half. An anti-toxin antidotal to venomous serpentbites has been tried on six persons bitten by the cobra, who have all recovered. The anti-cholera injection repeated in a second and stronger dose is believed to impart immunity from cholera infection. Haffkine's anti-plague inoculation acts as an efficient preventive. A similar preventive has been devised against typhoid fever. The writer concludes that the employment of bacterial derivatives is now established as an essential factor in the treatment of disease.

CANADIAN NOVELS AND NOVELISTS.

Mr. Lawrence J. Burpee gives an interesting account of recent Canadian fiction. Canada has, it appears, been strong in literature, except in fiction, until 1898, when the pioneer work done previously by Gilbert Parker was rewarded by an outburst of Canadian romance. At least a score of novels by Canadian authors were then published. The writer declares that Canadian women are marching apace with men in this department both as regards quantity and quality. He treats of the novelists in the following order:—Gilbert Parker, who easily takes first place with his "Battle of the Strong"; Robert Barr and his "Teckla"; Mrs. Cotes and her "Voyage of Consolation"; Grant Allen and his "Linnet," and Rev. Mr. Gordon, a new writer whose "Black Rock" is warmly praised. The historical novel in point of numbers takes first place in contemporary Canadian output. Mrs. Joanna E. Wood is styled "The Miss Wilkins of Rural Ontario Life," and Mr. W. A. Fraser, a writer of short stories, "A Canadian Kipling." After "The Battle of the Strong " the writer ranks next Mr. Gordon's "Black Rock " and Mrs. Harrison's "Forest of Bourg-Marie" the latter being described as "one of the most suggestive and thoughtful studies which have been made of the French Canadian and his habits and customs."

"A PARADISE REGAINED."

This is the title with which Mr. George Reno would replace Dr. Oswald's recent description of Cuba as "a lost Eden." He seriously challenges Dr. Oswald's "facts," and gives a picture as rosy as his was gloomy. He says:—

The people of Cuba, particularly the common or country folk, are sober, honest, industrious, and hard-working; and, as far as my experience (which has been considerable) goes, they are very trustworthy. They are most kindly disposed toward the American... Of the intelligent, cultured, travelled Cuban I can simply say that he is the equal of that class of citizen of any nation . . . In spite of Dr. Oswald's gloomy prediction, I am confident that within the next ten years the value per acre of Cuba's commercial products will exceed that of any other spot in the known world.

mu

fort

lett

of

eve

lish

of c

wh

wit

Sul

arb

Ka

me

tha

ast

pre

he

me

imp

in

rep

the

the late

der occ

pos

in

lan pig Ne

roll

to:

out

car diff

ser

res

did

On

val

wh

abl

det

inc

wit

it i nig

and

diff

an

Ne

to ha

cer

OTHER ARTICLES.

Oscar P. Austin, Chief of the U.S. Bureau of Statistics, gives a concise summary of the remarkable "cycle of Cathay "-the sixty years of Chinese development which have elapsed since British guns opened the Celestial Empire to the world. Mr. Lyman J. Gage is at pains to show that President McKinley's recent regulations for the Civil Service are not intended to extend the spoils system, but to ensure that considerations of real or technical ability should find recognition as well as mere book-learning or competitive-examination-passing. Professor Edwin H. Hall argues to disabuse the popular mind of the idea that three gallons of liquid air can be used to produce ten, and so to supply a limitless source of motive power. This will only happen, he says, when water is found to run uphill. Vice-Admiral Cyprian Bridge challenges Mr. Godkin's statement to the effect that it is undesirable to employ officers of the army or navy in administering Colonial Government, and cites many instances to show how frequently and satisfactorily naval officers were employed in administering British Colonies.

The Dublin Review.

THE current number of the Dublin Review contains much that is of interest to the non-ecclesiastical reader. The dramatic character which Protestants have often charged as a reproach against Catholic worship is accepted by the Rev. E. King as an excellent attribute. "The ceremonies of the Church," he says, "will be seen to contain the dramatic character in its noblest and purest form." Especially does he find the element of the drama manifest in the offices of Holy Week. Where the Prayer Book of Edward VI. is homiletical and hortatory, the Catholic rite is intensely dramatic. Rev. W. H. Kent rejoices in Dr. Pastor's vindication of the religious life of the Catholic world, its saints, missionaries, and popular piety, in the days, commonly thought so dark, of the Renaissance period. He especially commends Dr. Pastor's emphasis on the life of the common people over against the glaring misdeeds of princes and rulers. Miss Alice Shield tells the pathetic story of the last Stuart Princess, Louisa Mary, daughter of James II., born in exile and the victim of an early death. Merwin Marie Snell glories in "The Triumph of St. Thomas" Aquinas, and anticipates that "the twentieth century will witness the complete restoration of the Angelic Doctor to his former ascendency in the world of thought." This is one of the results of modern investigation, which has found "there is no place and time known to history which presents a more intense and widespread intellectual, artistic and spiritual activity, or a more beneficent evolution of social and economic institutions, than the Christian Europe of the Middle Ages." In "The Return to St. Thomas" will, the riter opines, be found the antidote to modern Socialism and Anarchism. Mediæval grammar schools form the subject of an enlightening essay by Mr. J. B. Milburn, which goes to show that Edward VI. coes not deserve his fame as the founder of grammar chools, that he merely re-established a few of the old grammar schools which had been founded in Catholic times, and that, in the words of Mr. Rashdall, "England was better provided with grammar schools before the Reformation than it has ever been since."

THE NOUVELLE REVUE.

iny

am

of

pot

CS,

of

ch

ial

to

for ils

or

re

0-

ar

be

of

er

ge

at vy

ny

al

ns

r.

en

ed

n-

st

ıa

er

Y, I.

d

r.

t.

e

n

dd, cer

THE August numbers of the Nouvelle Revue contain much interesting matter, and Mme. Adam has been fortunate enough to secure the very last batch of those letters of Napoleon which have not yet been published.

PERPETUAL PEACE.

In the first number M. Delbos analyses Kant's theory of perpetual peace. In 1795—that is to say, on the very eve of the Napoleonic era—the great philosopher published an essay on this very fascinating subject. He had of course many predecessors, from the King of Bohemia, who in 1464 was approached by Louis XI. of France with a view to perpetual peace, down to Henry IV. and Sully, who wished to see all quarrels submitted to the arbitration of the six most powerful States of Europe. Kant uttered prophecies rather than supported practical means of attaining his objects. He thought at the time that standing armies would soon disappear. How astonished he would have been could he have seen the present armed peace of France and Germany!

THE AËRIAL POST.

Captain Reynaud gives a delightful account of what he calls the "aërial post," that is to say the post by means of carrier pigeons, who are now playing a very important part in the world's affairs. He points out that in this, as in so many other matters, history constantly repeats itself. There can be very little doubt but that the first love letters ever written were sent by means of the carrier pigeon, and now, probably thousands of years later, the value of carrier pigeons is being actively demonstrated, and in a fashion that might easily have occurred to our ancestors, for by means of the pigeon post it is hoped that in the future the great liners when in distress will be able to communicate with those on land and with each other by the simple means of carrier pigeons. In 1895, La Champagne when on its way from New York was totally disabled, and for days the huge vessel rolled about, every kind of signal being found unavailable to attract assistance. Some ingenious individual pointed out to the Compagnie Trans-Atlantique that a cage of carrier pigeons on board might have made all the difference, and saved many days of anxious waiting. Accordingly, the Compagnie, losing no time, began a series of experiments, and some interesting and valuable results were obtained, for although the young pigeons did not make their way home, the older and more experienced birds traversed both long and short distances. On one occasion the pigeons really rendered most valuable service. It was in the March of the year 1898 when the Trans-Atlantique steamer La Bretagne was able to save the Bothnia, a British sailing ship. details of the rescue were put in telegraphic form, including the names of the saved, the names of the drowned, and so on, and were then fastened under the wings of seven pigeons, who were let fly at mid-day-for it is a curious fact that the carrier pigeon never travels at night, as it must find a place to rest in before sunset. La Bretagne was three hundred and sixty miles out at sea, and the fates met with by the birds were curiously different the one from the other. One pigeon met with an English steamer, the Chatterton, which was nearing New York, another alighted on a boat which had been sent out to look for La Bretagne, and a third came home to its French cote at Rennes severely wounded, and having lost the message. The other four pigeons had disappeared. It was calculated that about fifty per cent. either alighted on other ships or else finally reached land. It is, of course, far more difficult for a carrier pigeon to traverse a long distance by sea than by land, for the poor pigeons cannot rest and start again, unless they have the good fortune to meet with some kind of vessel. The carriers are almost invariably kindly treated by the sailors on these boats where they seek a temporary shelter, and are given a good feed and drink before they are allowed to start again.

THE ELDER DUMAS.

Those who wish to receive a vivid and familiar impression of the author of "The Three Musketeers" should read Madame Shaw's recollections of Dumas père. She made his acquaintance when quite a little girl, and so saw the great writer at his best, for he was devoted to children, and many years later when she again came across Dumas—although she then saw him under far less pleasant circumstances—she had the opportunity of meeting at his house a number of famous people, perhaps the most notable of all being Madame Desbarroles, the great fortune-teller. Still, vividly amusing as is the account which Madame Shaw gives of the strange world which surrounded Dumas in his old age, it is not difficult to understand that the writer's family very much disliked her pursuing her acquaintance with him.

MORE NAPOLEON LETTERS.

The unpublished letters of Napoleon I. which appear in the first number of the August Revue will well repay the perusal of them by those interested either in the man or in the prisoner. They are, with few exceptions, very short, and addressed to various of his Ministers. From those written to his military commandant it is very clear that Napoleon looked after all the details himself, and one of the letters even concerns the shoes that are to be worn by his soldiers. Indeed, no trifles were really indifferent to this extraordinary man, and he must have spent hours of each day writing these brief notes. He writes that he wishes "to know all about one Bellamy, of the 7th Hussars, who was wounded at Morengun, and to whom I am told that I have promised the Legion of Honour"; or he writes a few words of congratulation on an approaching marriage, and what he says is equally to the point in each case, and he writes with that lucidity of style which is so often wanting in a Frenchman's official despatches. Even when actually in the midst of company he seems to have kept an eye on everything and everybody, and to have busily concerned himself with all that was going on around him. He evidently took note of any information sent him by even the most humble of his subjects, and, as far as he was able to do so, he tried to secure that rough justice should be done especially when the humble poor were in question. He treated all his correspondents in a very cavalier manner, and generally began his letters with the plain title of the person he was addressing, losing no time over any of the elaborate and gracious compliments which generally are so conspicuous in the correspondence of well-known Frenchmen.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Other articles deal with the literary vocation, as seen from the young Frenchman's point of view, and the influence that Baudelaire has on modern literary life. M. de Borde contributes a curious chapter to the history of France in the shape of some scurrilous songs and lampoons written on the favourites of Louis XIV. and Louis XVIV, while Mme. Adam, in her bi-monthly letters on foreign politics, violently attacks Mr. Jeseph Chamberlain on his attitude towards the Transvaal.

THE REVUE DES DEUX MONDES.

THERE is, if anything, more of interest than usual in M. Brunetière's review for August. M. Goyau's article on "The Peace Conference and the Holy See" is dealt with elsewhere.

SEÑOR CASTELAR.

Two articles by M. Varagnac are devoted to a study of Castelar as a typical Spanish statesman. The writer had the advantage of an intimate acquaintance with his subject, as well as an unpublished autobiography of Castelar, to which he makes frequent reference. Towards the end of his life Castelar once said in the Cortes that he had represented many times the conscience of the nation. It was true; all his life Castelar struggled for the ideal of liberty, and he was, in a very real sense, the voice and the conscience of "new Spain." Yet, in spite of his ardent patriotism, the Spanish blood which ran in his veins, and the Castilian eloquence of which he was master, he was at the same time a son of France. France had educated him and had directed his thoughts, and to France he looked as to a second fatherland. No Spaniard of modern times has summed up so completely the national characteristics, and of no one in modern times has Spain been so proud as of Castelar. M. Varagnac traces the story of his eventful life as statesman, President of the ephemeral Republic of 1873, journalist and orator.

THE TURF.

The Viscount d'Avenel contributes two interesting articles on the Turf as part of the mechanism of modern life. He notes as the first characteristic of the Turf its aristocratic traditions; certainly the pedigrees of racehorses are more carefully kept and are much more to be relied on than the family trees of the great houses of M. d'Avenel traces the enormous growth of the Turf both in England and on the Continent. The prizes annually contested in Great Britain are worth, he says, over half a million of pounds, and in France they are worth about half that sum. But in England a large proportion of the races are for horses of second-rate powers, while in France a greater proportion of encouragement is reserved for the best blood. M. d'Avenel goes into much detail about the training of horses and the gradual growth of more sensible methods of preparing them for the races. The increasing magnificence of the jockey is also explained, and the enormous sums which he can earn if he is ordinarily prudent and business-like. In his second article M. d'Avenel deals with the owners of horses and the questions of betting, bookmakers, and the pari-mutuel. THE FIGHT AGAINST DRUNKENNESS.

owe to him by a deeply interesting paper on the struggle against alcoholism. He attributes the increase of drinking in France to the law of July 17th, 1880, which established free-trade in liquor, and enabled any one to open, on a simple declaration, café, wine-shop, or whatever he pleased, for the sale of intoxicating drink. From 1850 to 1880, during the period of regulation, the number of establishments for the sale of intoxicating drinks varied but little; it was only increased during the thirty years from 350,000 to 356,000, but the number now approaches half a million, and in some places there is actually a

M. Dastre adds to the obligations which we already wine-shop for every sixty-six of the population. M. Dastre even says that in one Department, that of the Eure, there is a liquor-shop for every eleven inhabitants; but this seems hardly credible. Certainly if these figures are tested in another way, the consumption of alcohol in France has gone up enormously; indeed, as compared with 1850 the consumption of brandy, for example, has increased nearly four-fold. A sharp line of distinction must be drawn between wine and spirit : wine is diluted alcohol, spirit is concentrated alcohol. It is commonly supposed that light and natural wine can never do harm, and that it is only adulterated wines which are injurious; this, says M. Dastre, is a fatal error. Undoubtedly adulteration increases the harmfulness of alcohol itself, but as a general principle it seems to be established that, whether natural or not, alcohol can never be healthy; taken with moderation and considerably diluted, it may escape being harmful, but that is all that can be said. On the other hand, there is among the enemies of alcoholism a tendency to extend to every alcoholic drink the condemnation which they pronounce against alcohol itself. This is an exaggeration. The physiological harmfulness begins beyond a certain limit of quantity and of dilution; that limit is difficult to fix, because it depends on the individual. M. Dastre brings a terrible indictment against alcohol as the principal cause of various maladies; thus it is associated with tuberculosis, the symptoms of which it appears to intensify, mental diseases also are naturally much increased by the alcohol habit, and we find whole families devastated, and either destroyed altogether or marked with various stigmas of degeneration, such as malformation of limbs, deafness, dumbness, and so on.

OTHER ARTICLES.

Among other articles may be mentioned the conclusion of M. Breton's paper on the Painters of our Century; an article by M. Lévy on the Financial and Economic Consequences of the Industrial Movement; a study of the Reaction against the Woman Movement in Germany by M. Seillière; and a paper by M. Doumic on National Education in the University.

The Church Quarterly Review.

THE first place in the current number of the Church Quarterly Neview is naturally claimed by the Church crisis. The writer on the "Hearing" at Lambeth on incense regrets that "a period of expansion should be governed solely by the legislation of a period of compression," but feels sure that, whatever the Archbishops' decision may be, the tendency of these Hearings is not to intensify, but to define differences, with a better mutual understanding as the possible outcome. A notice of Dr. Pastor's "History of the Popes in the Renaissance Period" expresses the fear that he has perhaps repainted in too bright colours the picture of the religious life of the period, which common tradition has painted so black.
"Nothing is more amazing in Dr. Pastor's history than the apparent complacency with which he recounts the treachery, the underhand intrigues, the absolute untrust-worthiness of his spiritual hero," Julius II. "The hidden history of the Oxford Movement" is found by the writer of another review in Miss Yonge's story of "John Keble's Parishes," in the quiet country life and unaffected piety of the "acknowledged founder of the Oxford Movement." Sidney Lee's Life of Shakespeare leaves the reviewer longing for a study of the poet in relation to his historical environment, distinguishing what is due to his times and what to his own genius. There is an instructive essay on the beginnings of the English Reformation in Wiclif, Peacock, Gascoigne. A paper on the three creeds—even in the Church Quarterly /—must begin by explaining that the "Apostles' Creed" was not the composition of the Apostles, that the Nicene Creed is not the formula adopted by the Council at Nicaea, and that the Athanasian Creed was not the production of Athanasius.

the his wa 179 an had to mu of 6

exc

He

no

esp

she

str

ori

nu

six

as

OCC

tor

his

Re

tric

COL

tor

ori

has

am lan wea no and ded had hav

and

and

nat

the

Arm of reign und The cap sple

medarm gready very Arm infin

two

star

...

THE REVUE DE PARIS.

ised

t be ho!

osed

that says

tion

eral

ural odeeing

ther

ncy

nich

gge-

id a t is

M.

the

ted

to

in-lies ked

na-

ion

ry;

mic

of any nal

rch

rch

on

be

mps'

not ual

of

nce

ted

the

ck.

the

the

st-len

ter

hn

ted

ve-

the

his

his

ive

in

ree

by

m-

the

the

THE August numbers of the Revue de Paris, with the exception of a first rate article on "Elephants and their Home Life," by a distinguished explorer, M. Foà, are not only non-topical but absolutely unrelieved by any especially interesting matter. An exception, however, should be made in favour of the fiction, which is very strong, Signora Mathilde Sarao contributing a very original short novel of Italian life, completed in the two numbers, M. Tilon continuing his curious study of the sixties, "Sous la Tyrannie," while Pierre Loti describes, as he alone can do it, an old French manor-house occupied during many centuries by his Huguenot ancestors, but which was sold to strangers after the death of his great-grandmother sixty years ago.

SOCIALISM IN FRANCE.

As usual a very great portion of both numbers of the Revue is devoted to purely historical subjects. M. Renard tries to trace the evolution of literary history, M. Faguet concludes his very elaborate analysis of Taine, the historian, and M. Aulard attempts to prove the historical origins of French Socialism. As an actual fact Socialism has never taken avery strong root in France. According to the writer, who has evidently made a very careful study of his subject, Socialism, in the modern meaning of the word, was practically unknown and had no votaries till the year 1791, when there appeared in a Paris revolutionary paper an article entitled "The Poor and the Rich." Marat had strong socialistic theories, but he does not ever seem to have formulated them. As seems to have been so much the habit during the French Revolution, all sorts of childishly simple and obvious means of remedying the then almost universal poverty were proposed. One of the suggestions which does not seem to have met with any response was that every one possessed of a certain amount of wealth should choose a poor man and bestow land or money upon him; "if this were once done, great wealth would speedily disappear and there soon would be no poor." The article produced a considerable sensation, and even many leading Republicans indignantly denounced it; on the other hand, others came forward to declare, apparently for the first time, that each individual had a moral right to a living wage. Danton seems to have been horrified at this general attack on property, and the Convention formally decreed that individuals and property should be in future safeguarded by the Thus Socialism seems to have been both born and scotched during the Great Revolution.

A FAMOUS MADRID MUSEUM.

M. Maindron gives a really fascinating account of the Armeria of Madrid, which seems to be a perfect example of what a military and historical museum should be. The reorganisation of the Armeria began during the reign of the late King, and has been carefully continued under the personal supervision of the Queen-Regent. Those whom pleasure or duty takes to the Spanish capital should certainly make a point of visiting this splendid collection, which shows modern as well as mediæval Spain at her artistic best, for every piece of armour, every sword, in a word, every relic of Spain's great and glorious past, is there shown to the very best advantage. The Spaniards have always possessed to a very extraordinary degree the art of arrangement, and the Armeria is arranged in a series of tableaux, as might be an infinitely artistic Madame Tussaud's. In a great hall, forty yards long and sixteen yards broad, the visitor passes by two hundred figures, some mounted on horseback, some standing, each figure clothed in the very armour or original habiliments of the king or noted historical personage whom it represents. Trophies are arranged above the figures, and between each group are splendid tapestries, while here and there fine old Spanish furniture carries out the illusion. Every century, every costume, every weapon, is here represented; the great historical trophies won on many a battlefield are all gathered together in the Armeria. Here may be seen noted Spanish heroes at different times of their lives, four figures representing Charles V., as a youth, as a young man, as a middle-aged man, and as an old man.

THE ITALIAN REVIEWS.

THE Nuova Antologia (August 16th) publishes a discriminating and well-informed article on Robert Louis Stevenson, pointing out, what is undeniable, how much of the popularity of his novels is due to the wonderful charm of his personality. It is not easy for a foreigner to appreciate Stevenson, and it is only natural that his Italian admirer should prefer him as an essayist and letter-writer, and a teller of humorous tales, rather than as a writer of historical romance. By "David Balfour" Signor Bosdari confesses to having been "bored and distillusioned." The Librarian of the National Library at Florence, Signor Chilori, contributes a chatty article on the ethics of catalogue-making and the many difficulties that have to be surmounted. He instances new scientific terminology as a fertile source of bewilderment to compilers, and points out as an example that the photographs obtained by the X-rays are known in France as radiographs or radiograms, in England as skiagraphs or skiagrams, and in Germany as actinographs. well-known Deputy, Napoleone Colajanni, discusses at length our English land-tenure under the title of "The Agrarian Crisis in England," and P. Turiello writes in pessimistic vein of the futility of the Peace Congress at the Hague. The previous number (August 1st) contains a philosophically despondent article on the decadence of Latin nations, by G. Sergi. They all, he admits, suffer from "immobility"; they alone stand still while other nations rush forward, and their weakness is intensified by the fact that in their pride they refuse to acknowledge their decay, and launch out into futile efforts at conquest and colonisation.

The Rivista Internazionale prints an excellent article from the pen of Professor Corsi of Pisa, describing the Constitution of Finland, which was confirmed by Alexander I., and the circumstances which have led up to the present unhappy crisis. To introduce the reforms contemplated by the present Emperor without first obtaining the assent of the Finnish Diet, is, he maintains, nothing short of a coup d'état, and the Professor appeals to Nicholas II. to pause and consider how his action will be judged before the tribunal of history.

In the Rassegna Nazionale, Professor P. Villari pleads in favour of an improved system of teaching geography both in the elementary and higher schools; and the Deputy R. de Cesare urges the claims of the Pope to be President of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, a suggestion which was originally brought forward by Mgr. Bonomelli, the energetic Bishop of Cremona.

The learned ecclesiastical review Bessarione contains an opportune article on "The Precept of Charity among Christians and Jews," in which, after pointing out how emphatically the Jewish law inculcated the duty of charity, it reminds both Jews and Christians of the duty of practising charity towards one another, and of treating each other as men and as brothers.

THE ENGINEERING MAGAZINE

THE August number is full of excellent matter, charged with human as well as technical interest. Rudolph Haack gives the first of what promises to be a most interesting series of papers on the development of German shipbuild-The enormous progress which it has registered since the Franco-German war is vividly portrayed.

THE RAILWAY TO KLONDYKE.

Mr. H. Emerson tells what is quite a romance of engineering adventure in his story of the formation of the railroad to Klondyke (the White Pass and Yukon route). He finds a curious illustration of the fallibility of intelligent human judgment in the fact that "nearly all the capitalists organised transportation companies to reach the Klondyke by way of the mouth of the Yukon, leaving the nearer and obvious road in the hands of men without capital but with plenty of energy and ready quickness." He thus shortly indicates some of the

The railsoad is a great example of engineering and constructive skill. It would have been a great feat to grade forty miles and build twenty over a similar rocky pass under the most favourable conditions, but this work was done in seven months, in a region without labourers, one thousand miles from supplies, three to four thousand miles from rolling mills and car shops, and against fearful climatic conditions. Day after day fresh snow drifted over the road bed and day after day it had to be shovelled off, sometimes to a depth of six to eight feet. Supplies, bridge timbers, firewood even, for the enormous camps had to be carried over almost impassable snow trails. There were days when men could not work on account of the storms or the intense cold, but they had to be fed and warmed.

In two short years the savage trail with a dozen Indian packers has given way to road and now to railroad over a summit 2,885 ft. high. The writer adds, "Nowhere else as on this gold trail has the genius of engineers wrought such beneficent and rapid change in so short a

BRITISH AND AMERICAN ENGINES COMPARED.

Mr. Charles Rous-Marten traces further differences in design and construction between English and American locomotive building. The American prefers bar-framing, the Britisher plate-framing. The American puts as many as possible of the working parts outside, the Britisher puts them inside. The American locomotive is allowed a height of 15 ft. and a breadth of 10 ft. 3 in. The limits in Great Britain are 131 ft. and 9 ft. British makers use copper where Americans use steel, for firebox and boiler-tubes. The differences are, after all, says the writer, only few and tend to become still fewer.

"GIRLS who Excel in Sports" is the subject of a suggestive paper by Kathleen Waldron in the Girl's Realm for September. The "champions" selected supply an enlightening indication of the freedom of modern feminine education. Mary Hezlet, amateur golf-player of five years' practice, won the Irish and United Kingdom championships last May, when she was just seventeen years old. Edith de Salis, when only fifteen, won one of the silver medals given by the United All England Croquet Association. Edith Freeman, aged sixteen, won the championship in ladies' tobogganing at Davos. Stella Bird, a champion bow-woman, won several prizes in archery by the time she was fourteen. Janet Tooth passed the third, second, and first class tests for figure-skating, imposed by the National Skating Association, in a single season, when only thirteen years old. Flora Hastings at fifteen years took first prize in this season's driving competition at Ranelagh.

AN ELECTRIC RAILWAY NUMBER.

Cassier's for August is a notable issue. It is a handsome volume, double the usual size, wholly an "electric railway number." It is made up of eighteen articles on the various aspects of electric traction-lines, rollingstock, ownership, profits, etc., written by competent authorities most of whom can write popularly-and lit up by the most illustrative of illustrations. In this way apparently we get our technical education. Here we have the latest up-to-date information, with the lucid assistance that typography and photography can supply, on the whole subject of harnessing the lightning to draw our waggons for us. It is a little encyclopædia in itself of 540 pages The preface explains that Mr. Louis Cassier has spent many months in America and on the Continent for the express purpose of compiling this monumental work. It gives also this summary view of the progress of the industry :-

While the first commercial electric tramway was installed at . Lichterfield, in Germany, as long ago as 1881 and the electric car has made its way into almost every country of the world, it is in the United States that electric tramways have found their highest and most widespread development, and from the few struggling experimental lines of the late eighties a magnificent system has grown, covering over 15,000 miles of town and country streets, operating, at the present time, about 40,000 tram cars, and yielding profitable returns on the enormous capital investment of over three hundred million pounds sterling.

Among the many articles which clamour in vain for separate notice, the layman with an eye to social reform naturally turns to Mr. Benjamin Taylor's article on "Municipal Ownership of Tramways in the United Kingdom," and finds—possibly to his surprise—that "in no single instance has it been perfectly successful." Glasgow is admitted to come near to success; but Glasgow, we are told, has so enormous a dependent population that only very bad management could produce a failure there. When, however, the reader finds that the profits which would have made public equally successful with private ownership have largely gone in higher wages, shorter hours, better clothes for the workpeople, as well as more comfortable accommodation for the general public, he is consoled, and reflects that there are different standards of success.

The Royal.

THE Royal for September offers much variety of the raree kind. The most thrilling paper is Lieutenant Peary's account of an Arctic hurricane in Davis Strait, from which an extract has been given elsewhere. Mr. A. Goodrich describes what he calls "the most curious place in England"-Canvey, a peninsula off Benfleet in the Thames, which Dutch ditchers reclaimed from swamp two hundred and fifty years ago. There is little else mentioned that is curious about it except that it is stated to be "the quietest spot near London." Mrs. Jessie W. Brown groups together an unexpected number of wooden-legged celebrities, in the active services, too. "The strange freak of a great man," produced by T. Beaugeard, is nothing else than M. Sardou practising "automatic" writing and drawing and other "medianimic" feats. Alick Munro describes the coronation of a gipsy king at Kirk-Yetholm, when Charles Foa Blythe, hawker, ostler, navvy, lodging-house keeper, was gravely, after prayer, crowned king of the Border

H st gr of be cr ce tic of

ci

K se th th de be ab pe St

in

for

ha

SO CO an we by El St the E pa Su ea du Cl fin no ha

pe op ca mu fro mo sm

of ger shi by Bis

THE BOOK OF THE MONTH.

MR. WALSH'S ROD FOR RITUALISTS.*

THE other day I arrived in London at about ten o'clock from the north of Scotland. I drove from King's Cross to Westminster. It was a long time since I had been in London on Sunday morning. The whole city seemed asleep. Street after street was lifeless. Here and there a servant was sweeping the front doorsteps; but, for the most part, London might have been a City of the Dead. Once or twice we came upon small groups of worshippers wending their way to some place of worship; but, so far as outward and visible sign could be perceived, the number of worshippers in the densely crowded area through which I passed was almost imperceptible. An hour later there was more sign of animation; but still, the prevalent note was that of Rest, not of Worship, of Sleep rather than of Devotion. Of the half million of Londoners inhabiting the area between King's Cross and St. Stephen's the attendants at Divine service probably did not exceed ten per cent. What of the ninety per cent. which neglected the assembling of themselves together for the worship of God?

tric

ingtent

llit

way

we

icid

ply,

raw

self

nuis

the

the

dat .

ctric

d, it heir

few

cent

and ram

oital

for rm mi-

m," gle

is

are nly

ere.

ich

ate

ore

is rds

the

ant

ait.

Mr.

ous

in mp

lse

is

rs.

ed

ive

n,"

M.

nd

he

les

er.

lei

The spectacle of the sleeping city was somewhat depressing. It was well, no doubt, to see such unmistakable evidence that even in the heart of busy London the beneficent command of the Hebrew Lawgiver had been able to give rest to the weary and to secure one day's peaceful slumber for the overdriven children of toil. But Sunday is not merely a rest day. It is the one day in seven which in Christendom is specially set apart for the public worship of Almighty God, for the solemn assembling together for purposes of religious communion of all believers. In olden times our ancestors believed that the religious uses of Sunday were sufficiently important to justify their enforcement by the secular arm. By the famous Act of Queen Elizabeth of the year 1559, which still stands upon the Statute Book, due provision was made by Parliament for the attendance of all the lieges at the means of grace. Every one who failed to attend Divine Service in his parish church or some authorised place of worship each Sunday and holy day was to be fined twelve pence for each offence. On the Churchwardens was imposed the duty of levying the fine, and the Bishops were to see the Churchwardens did their duty. How many twelvepenny fines, I wonder, ought to have been collected from non-attendants at church or chapel last Sunday!

The subject is worth thinking about. For it so happens that it is this very Act of 1559, with its twelvepenny fine for non-attendance at Divine Service, which is invoked by the Archbishops as the foundation for their opinion that no incense must be used and no processional candles burned in the churches during the Holy Communion. The absence of the majority of our population from the service of the sanctuary is assuredly a much more serious phenomenon than the presence of a pungent smoke in a few churches attended by a small minority of our people. Such, however, does not seem to be the general opinion. Concerning the absence of the worshippers we hear not a word. Nor is anything proposed by Archbishop or layman to use the twelvepenny lever to enforce attendance at Divine worship. But all the Bishops are on the alert to command the obedience of their clergy to the opinion of the Archbishops based upon the Act of 1559 as to the matter of candles and incense. Whether it is right or wrong to burn daylight with unnecessary candles, to create a smell by making smoke in church—such are the momentous questions which, if some good people may be believed, are convulsing the Church of England to-day.

There are many problems which the uninstructed outsider visiting this country from another planet would have imagined would take precedence of this burning question. There are, to take only one example, many nominally Christian men habited in decent broadcloth, and capable of writing for the public press, who are every day clamouring for hurling the disciplined legions of the British Empire upon the herdsmen of Transvaal uplands. Whether such a war is morally justifiable; whether the reek of powder-smoke should fill the South African air as with a kind of Devil's incense—is at least a question apparently more vital to essential Christianity than the lighting of candles in daylight, and the fumigation of churches with aromatic vapour. Nay it might even be believed that the horrible overcrowding which fills the human kennels of London slums with incest and disease would be more worth thinking of than these adventitious details of ceremonial. But such ideas are apparently foreign to many of our

There is a crisis in the Church we are told on every hand—a crisis indeed. For the Archbishops, and Bishops, and priests and laymen of the Anglican Communion, standing face to face with all the weltering problems of modern civilisation, conscious that the majority of the nation no longer attends their ministrations or worships at their altars, deem this question of incense and of lights of paramount importance. That, indeed, is the crisis. Not the incense or the lights, but the fact that grave, good Christian men at this time of day should deem such matters worthy of even a passing thought. Perhaps the fact that such is the case explains the fact that an attempt to enforce the twelvepenny fine of the Act of 1559 is absolutely unthinkable by modern men. Humanity is conscious enough of its need of guidance, but it seeks it otherwhere.

I.-MR. WALSH'S BOOK.

The person chiefly responsible for the sudden, extraordinary disturbance of the public mind on the subject of incense and lights is not Mr. Kensit-whom Lord Halifax describes as a "profane and blasphemous agitator"-but Mr. Walter Walsh, the author of "The Secret History of the Oxford Movement." This book, which he is now reissuing in an edition of 100,000, has for a year or two past been doing its quiet work in all parts of England. It prepared the ground for the campaign of Mr. Kensit and his merry men. But for it the Archbishops would never have given their famous opinion, nor would the Bishops have summoned their incense-burning clergy everywhere to deny themselves the luxury of their fumigations. When Lord Halifax bewails the opinion of the Archbishops adverse to incense and lights as one of the greatest misfortunes that has fallen on the Church since the rise of the Oxford Movement, he pays Mr. Walsh a tribute of which he is naturally proud. For Mr. Walter Walsh is temporarily in the ascendant. He has, to put it vulgarly, "wiped the eye" of his sacerdotal opponents, and sees the Bishops everywhere exhorting their clergy to do his bidding. He is greater than the Archbishops, for without him the Archbishops would have done nothing—not even emitted an opinion. Let us, then, see what is this potent miracle-working volume which, in the last year of the nineteenth century, has succeeded in compelling materialistic, commonsense, practical-minded Englishmen to worry their heads about such trifles as incense and lights, when unjust wars are threatened abroad and unhealed cancers eat into the vitals of the social organism at home.

<sup>* &</sup>quot;The Secret History of the Oxford Movement." By Walter Walsh.

WHAT THE BOOK CONTAINS.

"The Secret History of the Oxford Movement," by Walter Walsh, is published by the Church Association, 14, Buckingham Street. The volume before me belongs to the sixth edition, described as the forty-second thousand, and is published at 3s. 6d. It is bound in red cloth, and contains four hundred and twenty-four pages. As a book it is creditably put together—that is to say, it has a good table of contents summarising the book in half a dozen pages at the beginning and a good index of fourteen pages at the end. There is also an appendix, which many people will regard as much the most interesting portion of the whole. For this appendix is devoted to a description of what the Ritualists teach, and is composed of a series of classified quotations from the public writings of the Ritualists. There is no doubt that the effect of simply reading these forty pages of Appendix upon persons who have been brought up in guileless innocence to believe that the Church of England, as by law established, was a Protestant institution, and that the Reformation was really what its name implied-a great act of reform which cut the English Church clean away from the Roman Communion-will be very great—much greater, indeed, than the perusal of anything else that is in the book. The extracts, of course, are most carefully selected from the most extreme writings of the most extreme members of the High Church party. There is no necessity to follow Mr. Walsh in what is described as the Sacerdotal tendency of the modern Anglicans. They do not deny it; on the contrary, they exult in it. So far as their publications are concerned, there is nothing new in Mr. Walsh's book, although, by compacting together all the strongest things he could find, he undoubtedly has produced a very effective polemical pamphlet.

ITS KEYNOTE.

Mr. Walsh is a Protestant of the Protestants, whose spirit of dealing with the Church of Rome may be gathered from the poetical prayer with which he brings his book to a close:—

God give her wavering clergy back
That honest heart and true
Which once was theirs ere Popish fraud
Its spells around them threw;
Nor let them barter wife and child,
Bright hearth and happy home,
For the drunken bliss
Of the strumpet kiss
Of the Jezebel of Rome."

In that last line is contained the essence of Mr. Walsh's conception of the Latin Church. The faith which at this moment sustains hundreds of millions of human beings, each of whom, we may suppose, is as respectable in the eyes of his Maker as Mr. Walsh himself, is "the drunken bliss of the strumpet kiss of the Jezebel of Rome." The book is more of a directory than a literary composition, for the chief task which the author has set himself is to parade before the eyes of the British public such evidence as he is able to secure concerning the secret societies which exist among the clergy and the laity of the Church of England, with the avowed object of gaining over the people of our country to "the drunken bliss of the strumpet kiss of the Jezebel of Rome." Only now and then he ventures into epigrams, which are not devoid of smartness; for instance, when he sums up the whole of his contention in a sentence, when he says, "Ritualists supply Popery in the Church of England as some Irishmen supply whisky without a license."

WHAT IS "POPERY"?

Before quoting a summary of Mr. Walsh's evidence as to the secret conspiracy to thrust England once more under the heel of the Pope, there are two preliminary observations which may not be out of place. The first is that no mistake could be greater than to assume, as Mr. Welsh constantly does, that the extreme sacerdotalists among the Church of England clergy desire to put themselves, or to put this country under the domination of the Pope. Even those who are the most extreme in their advocacy of the distinctive doctrines of the Roman Church recoil with horror from the suggestion that they should put them-selves under the yoke of the Bishop of Rome. They have no objection to the dogmatic system over which the Pope presides in the Eternal City, but they want his system without submitting to his authority. They are representatives not of obedience and discipline, but of liberty carried to the verge of license. Each man is his own Pope with them, and they are therefore quite justified in declaring that nothing is further from their wishes than to submit themselves to a yoke which they would find infinitely more galling than the heaviest burdens laid upon them by His Grace of Canterbury. That is the first observation, which is only made to call attention to the misconception which arises from using the word Popery in two different senses. By Popery Mr. Walsh means a belief in Purgatory, Transubstantiation, substitution of the Mass for the Communion, and the practice of the Confession, whereas Popery with those with whom he is in controversy means submission to the absolute authority of an infallible Pontiff.

SECRET SOCIETIES WITHOUT SECRETS.

The second point to which I must call attention is the fact that Mr. Walsh prodigiously exaggerates the significance of the secrecy upon which he lays such great stress. No doubt it is effective enough as a mere method of exciting prejudice against your adversary; but do not let us forget that the secrecy of which he complains is largely due to the very fact that such men as he exist in considerable numbers in this country. The net effect of the publication of "The Secret History of the Oxford Movement" and the agitation which it set on foot will certainly not tend towards publicity. It will have an exactly opposite effect, for the habit of hiding is the expression of fear. The brave and the strong never hide. It is the weak and the timid who-afraid of being persecuted-take refuge as the early Christians did in the Catacombs of Rome, and as do our Ritualists in the various secret societies upon which Mr. Walsh pounces with such savage glee. That is one explanation of the secrecy. Another is the natural tendency of a good many men to amuse themselves by making pretence and by indulging in the harmless pastime of belonging to secret societies and organisations which in reality have no secrets. We are here hon whi gam afte seen descand and driv pass

the

exp

F

all

the

has sandare, what Ror app fact to p som doc revir

pre

prie

more in the believe the selve mire by for avoidely specific to the selve mire by the selve the s

spe the pop har suc doc is t

pain nati nati beli shor

who

Ang

all familiar with such secret orders, whether they call themselves Good Templars, or United Buffaloes, or whatever other fantastic name they may choose. Both here and still more in the United States society is honeycombed with secret associations not one of which has a secret worth keeping. Children play at such games of make-believe, and men are grown-up children It is difficult to see why there should be any after all. secrecy observed by the societies which Mr. Walsh describes. The Ritualists are now quite strong enough, and ought to be bold enough, to come out into the open and avow frankly, as many of them do, what they are driving at. The period of secret conspiracy is surely past; but of course, if we are to have a period of Protestant ascendency vigorously enforced, we shall find the Ritualists resorting to the invariable and natural expedient of the weak.

The

on,

to nce ies

rch

the pet

he

rt-

his

oly

en

ce

ore er-

no

sh

he

en

he

th

m-

ve

he

nis

re

of

ed

ld

id he

to rd

sh b-

ce

m te

he

C-

S.

of

et

ly

n-

ne

ly

of

ie.

os

et

re

er

se

ie

d

A ROMANIST TEN PER CENT.

Roughly speaking, what Mr. Walsh proves is the open secret that a section of the English clergy which has always existed, and which numbers perhaps two thousand-or ten per cent. of the clergy of the Establishmentare, as he would say, Romanists at heart. They believe in what Protestants regard as the distinctive dogma of the Roman Church. Primarily, to the observer it would appear that their chief sympathy with Rome lies in the fact that it enables them to magnify their own office, and to pander to their vanity and love of power by supplying some kind of impalpable foundation for their sacerdotal doctrine. For behind all the flummery of the Ritualistic revival there stands clear and distinct the desire on the part of the clergyman to claim the supernatural status and prerogative supposed to be exercised by the Roman priests.

THE GENESIS OF RITUALISM.

It is not difficult to see the genesis of this movement. The Church of England clergy, especially in the country districts, have too good a conceit of themselves and of their office. They are trained to believe that they are in some peculiar way different from other ministers of religion. Many of them cocker themselves up into a belief that they have received in some miraculous fashion exceptional gifts of divine grace by right of their succession from the Apostles, and for every one man who may be regarded as an avowed Romanist there are at least a dozen who have deluded themselves into the belief that they hold in some special manner credentials from God Almighty giving them a semi-demi-priestly prerogative to reign as little popes over their parishes. The divine right of kings dies hard, and still lingers on in a few centres of enlightenment, such as Berlin, but the divine right of the clergy is a doctrine firmly held in many a country parsonage. This is the stuff out of which is shaped by the natural process of development the extreme sacerdotal party of whose pretensions and aspirations Mr. Walsh gives us some painstaking account in this book. Clericalism tends naturally to sacerdotalism, and sacerdotalism, threatened by the spirit of the time and the lay sense of the world, naturally seeks allies where it can find them. Thus it is natural and logical that those who start out with the belief that they hold an exceptionally privileged position should end by endeavouring to identify themselves as far as possible with the main body of the army of priests whose professions, however absurd, are nevertheless infinitely more respectable than those of the ordinary Anglican clerical.

A ONE PER CENT CATHOLICITY.

Nothing is more curious than the way in which the minority of extreme sacerdotalists in the Anglican Church use the word "Catholic" to describe themselves and their rites. Even the claim of the Roman Church to be the Catholic Church of God is nonsensical on the face of it, for if Catholicity is anything it is universal, and the Roman Church is only one section, although a large section, of Christendom, which in its turn is but a section, and that not the largest section, of the Universal Church of the Living God. But that ten per cent. of the clergy of a church, which in its totality does not muster ten per cent. of Christendom, should arrogate to themselves the title of Catholic, leaves us in bewilderment as to whether the self-styled Catholics are more conspicuous for their lack of humour or their ignorance of arithmetic.

THE SOCIETY OF THE HOLY CROSS.

Now, without further preamble, let us come to what Mr. Walsh has to tell us. After a preliminary observation concerning the Tractarian movement, he describes the most dangerous of the secret organisations by which the Ritualists are endeavouring to Romanise the Establishment. This organisation is the Society of the Holy Cross, which began with six members of whom three joined the Church of Rome and the other three spread the organisation throughout the Church of England, until it is now, as Mr. Walsh declares, the most powerful of all the secret organisations connected with the Ritualistic movement. Its founder was the Rev. Joseph Newton Smith, who began operations in 1855. It is difficult to say how many members this society has, but it would appear not more than five hundred, among whom are the Bishops of Limbobo and Zanzibar. Mr. Walsh has not been able to obtain the reports of its proceedings later than 1881, with the exception of a Roll of the brethren for 1895. Judging from Mr. Walsh's own account of the society, it seems to be an innocent enough association; and it is so little secret, that its members are required to wear openly the society's cross, so that they may be identified when they meet. The members hold meetings on the second Tuesday of every month, with the exception of May and September. They have various degrees, like the Oddfellows and other charitable societies; and they have a special section devoted to persons who do without wives, and who wear the celibate ring of the Society of the Holy Cross.

"THE PRIEST IN ABSOLUTION."

They issue books; among others they were responsible for "The Priest in Absolution." They have founded the St. George's Mission in the East of London, and have done generally what they could to promote the Ritualist propaganda. There is nothing to show that they would not be equally useful if they met in public; and the leading members certainly make no scruple in avowing what they are after. Between them and Mr. Walsh there is open war. He declares that there can be no peace with the Ritualists: "The end of the struggle must be that either Protestant Churchmen must retain their position, and recover the lost property which belongs to them, or else the sacerdotalists will oust them out of their rights and out of the Church of England." Mr. Walsh, no doubt, believes this, but there is very little evidence that the Ritualists have the slightest hopes of being able to do more than secure for themselves liberty to exist in the Church. A minority of ten per cent. is seldom in a persecuting mood, and it would take much more than the utmost efforts of the Society of the Holy Cross to convert that minority into a majority sufficiently powerful to threaten the ingrained Protestantism of the English character.

THE OUESTION OF PENANCE.

On reading Mr. Walsh's indignant denunciation of the Romanising practices of the High Church party it is impossible not to feel a certain degree of sympathy with those whom he assails. He tells us in accents of horror that it is one of the pastimes of the Romanisers to subject themselves to discipline for a quarter of an hour at a time—discipline being the flogging on the bare back by the cat-o'-nine-tails of knotted whipcord or of fine wire, the result being that the back is torn and mangled, or else it is one mass of black and blue bruises. There is very little danger in these self-indulgent days of such practices becoming very popular. Dr. Pusey, Mr. Walsh says, wore a hair shirt, and Mr. Kensit has recently been exhibiting in his shop window various instruments of torture by which devout Ritualists endeavour to mortify the flesh and refine their souls. There are, for instance, stomachers of horsehair, and barbed hearts, the size of a man's hand, studded with fine barbs of wire to be worn upon the breast. If this does not suffice there are wristlets and anklets and leglets of barbed wire by which the devout can inflict unnecessary pain upon themselves, and believe that by so doing they can please their Maker and improve their chances of salvation. No doubt these instruments of torture and the practice of discipline do not commend themselves to the ordinary man; but if my brother likes to wear mustard blisters on his body in the belief that it will help him to be a better man, why in the name of Charity and Liberty should I object?

It takes all sorts to make a world, and in every age and every religion there have been persons who imagine that they do good to their souls by punishing their bodies. They will always be a minority. The number of martyrs to gout or delirium tremens enormously exceeds the number of those who wear hair shirts, and barbed hearts, and lacerating anklets, and as we contentedly acquiesce in the sufferings inflicted by self-indulgence, it is difficult to see why we should work ourselves into a frenzy of indignation because a miserable handful of mistaken mortals lacerate their flesh by way of penance. Liberty might fairly be claimed for men who practise such things, and not only liberty, but even a certain degree of respect similar to that which we pay to the Indian fakir who lets his finger nails grow through the palms of his hands, or acquires a great reputation for sanctity by standing for years upon one leg.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE MASS.

The second secret society upon which Mr. Walsh dilates is the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament. This association is known as the C. B. S., and has Canon Carter, of Clewer, as its Superior, and generally prints fifteen thousand Intercession Pamphlets every month. These pamphlets contain the subjects for which the brothers are to pray, and also the subjects for which the brothers are to pray, and also the subjects for their thanksgiving. Papers circulating at the rate of fifteen thousand every month can hardly be regarded as extremely confidential. The Society itself was founded in 1862, and in 1867 absorbed the Society of the Blessed Sacrament. In the year 1894 it had one thousand six hundred and eighty-two clergymen as members and thirteen thousand laymen. Mr. Walsh says that the object of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament is nothing less than the propagation in the Church of England of "the blasphemous sacrament of the mass under the name of the eucharistic sacrifice." Every member of the Confraternity is expected to offer prayers for the dead. They might be much worse employed, for at least it can do no one any harm, and that is more than can be said for the activity which commends itself to Mr. Walsh and some of his friends. Among the members of this fraternity are the Bishops of Zululand, Zanzibar, Nassau, Limbobo, and Corea. It ought to please Mr. Walsh that the Bishops of the Confraternity are banished to such distant regions; but he is in no mood to be satisfied by any such considerations.

PURGATORY.

After the Society of the Blessed Sacrament he tells us of a purgatorial society under the title of the Guild of All Souls, which was founded in 1873. This is also a widespread organisation with branches in most of the colonies. It numbers among its members six hundred and forty-six clergymen. This society also issues an intercession paper, but unlike the C. B. S., its periodical appears not monthly but quarterly. This is also a strictly It contains a list of churches secret document. in which masses for the dead are said every month, together with the names of deceased persons for whom prayers are asked. They believe in purgatory do these good people, and issue a manual of the guild containing litanies for the faithful departed. Mr. Walsh evidently thinks that no members of these societies should be appointed to any livings or should obtain any preferment in the Church. That this is not an exaggeration we may see from his protest against the appointment of the Rev. J. P. F. Davidson, President of the Guild of All Souls, to the important living of St. Mathias, Earl's Court, London. If Mr. Walsh had his way, and a general boycott was enforced, it is easy to understand how anxious members of these associations should be to preserve a strict anonymity. To carry out this plan consistently Mr. Walsh should add to the next edition of his book another appendix containing the names of all the clergy who are on his black books, all of whom must hereafter be shut out from all preferment.

There is no reason to suspect that Mr. Walsh has exaggerated the extent to which his Ritualistic enemies have succeeded in carrying on their propaganda in favour of what used to be called distinctively Roman doctrines.

CIVILITY IN CONTROVERSY.

Despite his famous poem about the "Drunken bliss of the strumpet's kiss of the Jezebel of Rome," Mr. Walsh is usually civil enough in his references to the Roman Church, and his wrath is chiefly poured upon those who while eating the bread of the Protestant Establishment spend their lives in endeavouring to destroy its Protestant character, and secure a resurrection of all the Papistical ritual which we got rid of at the Reformation. The accusation brought against him that he has been guilty of ungentlemanly conduct in publishing private documents is ridiculous. The secrecy of papers distributed by tens of thousands each month cannot be regarded as anything more than a secrecy pour rire. My complaint is not that he has published anything that he ought not to have published, but simply that there is nothing serious in the secrecy of the conspirators whom he unmasks.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE.

If Mr. Walsh and those who are perpetually abusing the Ritualists would but endeavour, as an intellectual exercise, to put themselves in their place, there might be a great improvement in their method of controversy. Let them

ra

b

w

w ti

P

o

tr

e

s: u o tl b

imagine, for instance, that the Church of England were radically reformed by extreme Broad Churchmen, and that all references to miracles or to the supernatural were carefully excluded from the services of the Church. Of course, if this were done now, there would be a secession; but supposing that after these changes had taken place and the Church had existed for a hundred years on a strictly rationalistic basis, some members of the clergy were to wake up to a conviction that the rationalistic hypothesis did not account for all things, and that there was a good deal of truth in the doctrine of the incarnation, that the miraculous after all had played a great part in the history of religion, and that the doctrines of the Atonement and justification by faith embodied truths of vital importance to the salvation of man. What would be the duty of ministers of such a Church upon whom the truth of the old evangelical creed gradually dawned? Should they at once come out from the rationalistic establishment, or should they remain where they were, and endeavour so far as was permitted by law to permeate the establishment with the evangelical doctrines from which it had broken loose a century before? If Mr. Walsh would but imagine himself in the position of such a clergyman after such rationalistic reformation he would be able better to understand how difficult is the position ## of those against whom he unlooses all the artillery of "THE GREATEST OF THESE IS CHARITY."

After all it may perhaps be discovered, when the truth of all things is made manifest, that there is more of the genuine spirit of the Founder of our religion in the men who persistently look at the good points of all religions, even of the religion of Rome, than in those who, for the sake of Protestant Orthodoxy, concentrate their gaze upon the seamy side of the Roman system. There is one thing of which Mr. Kensit may be quite sure, and that is that there is a great deal more to be said on behalf of the old Pope and of the Roman system than he has realised, or perhaps than he ever will; for the spiritual arrogance which characterises all that intolerant school is fatal to the sympathetic insight by which alone a man can gain a true conception of the real spirit of a great religion in which millions of their fellow-creatures have found their inspiration in life and their comfort in

II.-CUI BONO?

Such is Mr. Walter Walsh's contribution to the Christianity of our day. That he is earnest and sincere no one can deny. But that his effort will render any real service to the cause of true religion as defined by the Apostle is a matter much more open to question. Even in his present victory over the Ritualists it is difficult to see how he and his episcopal satellites will be able to circumvent their foes. Mr. Walsh has to deal with men who are as earnest and sincere as himself. believe that incense is edifying, historical, and evangelical. They regard the "raid against incense" as a present distress" which they are justified in alleviating b; any expedient that may come handy. They may be right or they may be wrong. That is not the question. What Mr. Walsh and his school have to consider is, whether the game is worth the candle. They may stop one hole in the Ritualistic warren, but the Ritualistic rabbit has a thousand others which not even Mr. Walsh

What we should like to ask both parties in this unhappy controversy is-whether they are not diverting the attention of the religious world from the weightier matters of righteousness in order to concentrate them upon un-essential points of ritual? They make the worldling scoff. Do they make the Christian more Christ-like? Ought not the strong to bear the infirmities of the weak? If my brother thinks he can raise his soul nearer to the throne of grace by making a disagreeable smell in church, why not let him tickle his nose with smoke and be done with it? Is not more than half the alleged mischief of these lights and censers done by imputing to them a significance which they intrinsically do not possess? Why play into the hands of the sacerdotalists by pretending to see anything in incense other than a pungent smoke, in itself as religious as that of tobacco, or in the lighted candles merely a burning of daylight, wasteful but innocent? Of course, where congregations object to be fumigated, that is another matter. But where congregations enjoy the smell, and imagine it does them good, why not let them rouse their imaginations through their

Mr. Walsh will reply that the Ritualists use both incense and lights as symbols of infernal papistical doctrines, of priestcraft, and I know not what devilry. But so do the zealous Highlanders of the Free Kirk regard the use of the organ in the service of song in the sanctuary. The organ is no more papistical than incense. If once incense were treated merely as what it is—a fragrant smoke used for purposes of fumigation—

the problem would evaporate into thin air.

There is another point of view not much insisted upon by these eager disputants. There is a good deal to be said for the use of incense and of lights, and of many other things of the same sort from the standpoint of the believer in magic. Incantations, spells, mantrams, and all the apparatus of witchcraft, have much more in them than the ordinary sceptic imagines. Much of what the ardent Protestant denounces as the Mumbo Jumboism of Popery and Ritualism may possess an occult magical It is a kind of pious necromancy, linking our Catholic ritual to all other rites of like nature down to the mystic ceremonies of the Obeah men of Hayti and the West Coast. But as neither Lord Halifax nor Mr. Walsh defends or attacks the incriminated practices on this the only scientific and tenable ground, I need not press the matter.

Finally, I would ask whether in this world of sin and sorrow, with so many crimes unpunished and so many needless sufferings unrelieved, there is nothing better for Christian men to do than to fight about candles and incense? As for the nightmare of a return of sacerdotal tyranny, we are now at the dawn of the twentieth century, and they strangely mistake their era if they imagine that any spiritual authority is in danger of acquiring too much power over this materialistic generation. The men of the Oxford Movement have been the agents of a great spiritual revival in a very lethargic and Erastian Church. They have done in this century what Wesley and Whitfield did in the preceding century. They have done good work. If as a reward for their solid services they crave liberty to burn candles in daytime and swing censers of incense in church, why not humour their little The labourer is worthy of his hire. And if Broad Churchmen will do as much good next century as the High Churchmen have done this, and were to claim as their reward permission to smoke tobacco in the sacred precincts-by all means let them have it. For these things are trivialities of the outward, not worthy the attention of serious men.

ifice."

offer

worse

, and com-

ends.

ps of

Con-

but

con-

ls us

f All wide-

nies.

y-six

ssion

pears

rictly

ches

onth.

hom

hese

ning

ently

l be

nent

may

Rev.

s, to

don.

was

bers

trict

Mr.

ther

are shut

has

nies

our

s of

h is

rch,

ing

ves

and

we

ght

nly

us.

nds

an

as

ed,

of

he

se,

at em

es.

his invective.

It

Some Notable Books of the Month.

THE CURSE OF CONSCRIPTION.

BY ONE WHO KNOWS.

MR. LIONEL DECLE'S book "Trooper 3809" (Heinemann, 6s.) is a scathing indictment of conscription as it is carried out in France. He disavows any intention of bringing a railing accusation against the French army as a whole or the officers in particular. Nevertheless his volume sets forth, in a fashion which no one can misunderstand, the curse of conscription. Mr. Decle describes his own experience as a trooper in a cavalry regiment in 1879. Since then a few improvements, thanks to General Boulanger, have been made, but as a whole the system remains the same. The army, if we may judge by Mr. Decle's vivid descriptions, is a gigantic machine organised so as to lower the standard of national life. "The three years every ablebodied Frenchman has to serve in the army," he says, "are nothing but a period of ceaseless degradation for those possessing any self-respect." In theory conscription may be admirable. That is an arguable point. In practice it is abominable—an elaborate system of tyranny based on punishment and the denial of justice. It herds together men of refinement and the dregs of a city's slums, and it works in a fashion to drag down the cultivated to the level of the degraded. The Dreyfus affaire is but a natural and logical outcome of a system which is so constructed as to perpetuate injustice and to deny redress to the innocent once judgment has been pronounced.

A DEGRADING EXPERIENCE.

Mr. Decle served for one year, for he had taken his degree at a university, and therefore was enabled to escape the five years' service which was enforced at that date. But what he saved in length of service he lost in the severity of his punishments and the harshness of his treatment. At the end of the period his examinations were so manipulated as to compel him to serve eight months longer. He only escaped from the clutches of the military authorities by being invalided as unfit for further service. That day, he says, was the happiest in all his life. His recollection of his conscript life is that of a sordid and degrading experience, to be remembered with loathing and forgotten-if possible. It is continually brought up against Dreyfus that he took an intelligent interest in his work and knew things which should have been of common knowledge but of which his comrades were ignorant. A French conscript is not supposed to think; if he does he will pretty soon learn what the inside of the salle de police, or police cell, is like. Nor is he supposed to read. Newspapers are strictly prohibited in a French barracks. Any soldier found reading one is severely punished. Mr. Decle was enabled to avoid many of the more unpleasant duties by bribing his fellow troopers to do them for him. A full purse made many things endurable, but the gold pieces had to be liberally expended. He calculates that it cost him about £300 a year while in service.

THE ABUSE OF PUNISHMENT.

Practically all the work is left to the non-commissioned officers. The cavalry officers depend almost entirely upon the sergeants to look after the drill, discipline, and comfort of their men. During his twenty months' service his colonel did not come fifty times to the barracks, and the other officers merely performed their duties in a perfunctory manner. Almost everything devolved upon the sergeants, whose power is enormous. Esprit de corps is utterly lacking. The privates feel no pride in the body to which they are unwillingly attached. The officers on promotion are sent to another regiment, and the hard-and-fast lines of social distinction which are drawn between officers of different ranks are a fatal obstacle to the corporate well-being of the regiment. This huge construction of artificial grades is kept together by one thing alone-punishment. The conscript is treated like a convict, or worse. Any superior officer can send his inferior to the lock-up, and all can inflict punishments upon the privates, who are absolutely helpless in their hands. Nominally there is a right of appeal to the colonel, but practically the only result of such an appeal is an increase of the punishment. All that a superior officer knows of a case is learned through the man who has inflicted the punishment. With a very vivid memory of the horrible punishments he endured, Mr. Decle declares that he fully understands and excuses the motives which prompt so many men to desert. An officer who sends a man before a court-martial is almost certain to be rewarded for his harshness. Under this ceaseless punishment men become desperate, and soon cease to care whether they are punished or not. "But," Mr. Decle adds ominously, "had war broken out when I was a trooper, I am quite sure that the first battle would have resulted in the death of at least three of our officers and four of our sergeants, and that they would not have fallen under the enemy's bullets."

THE CELLS.

It is impossible to find room to quote the episodes of Mr. Decle's life as a conscript. They should, however, be read by all who are interested in the question of militarism, for they are a valuable commentary upon the frequently vaunted blessings of conscription. I have only room for one passage describing the cells in which soldiers were confined:—

Each was about twelve feet by six. On one side stood a wooden bed raised a couple of feet from the ground, and about seven feet long and two and a half broad. A small shelf, a foot square, suspended against the wall by two strings, was meant for the prisoners' bread, so that the rats should not get at it. In a corner was a small "jules," and alongside of it an earthenware water-jug with an iron beaker on the top of it; the only ventilation consisted of a small hole a foot square and strongly barred, opening above the door, so that when the latter was closed the prisoner found himself in almost complete darkness. While we were cleaning the cells the sergeant of the guard remained marching up and down the corridor, as there was a prisoner in one of them. His door was the last to be opened, and the sergeant of the guard ordered him to step out in the passage, while we were told off to clean his cell. The man looked the picture of misery. He had already been confined for five days, and during that time he had been able neither to wash nor to shave, and the short allowance of food had told heavily on him. Prisoners in cells are only allowed the ordinary trooper's ration every other day; during the intervening days they get one ration of soup without meat, their other meal consisting of dry bread and water.

A NATION OF BONDSLAVES.

The power of the military authorities in France is enormous. From the age of twenty to fifty-five every, Frenchman is liable to military service. During that period he is the b touch them also follow Eve

a boo paren has re impor it has judici Wher domic genda down must preser reside opera Englis impris

Ouece serve according from serge army in the apparagrams.

To peop and of wa usefu Emp the g to a His move again wher soldi almo man has 1 his li base bette much chap supp

the l

enlis

ment "Th

mod

the bondslave of the authorities. How closely conscription touches the everyday lives of the people, hovering over them like the pestilence that walketh not only by day but also by night, is well summed up by Mr. Decle in the following passage:—

Every soldier receives on joining his regiment a livret matricule, a book in which are stated his age, his name, the address of his parents, his full description, the list of all the punishments he has received, and many other particulars. It is of the utmost importance for every Frenchman to keep this book carefully, as it has to be produced whenever required by the military, civil or judicial authorities, and its loss entails several days' imprisonment. Whenever a Frenchman wishes to absent himself from his domicile, he is bound to present his livret at the nearest gendarmerie and to declare where he is going; this is written down in his livret, and on the arrival at his new residence he must have this book vist anew. If he goes abroad he must present it to the French Consul, and whenever he changes his residence for more than three months he must repeat the operation, exactly after the fashion of a ticket-of-leave man in England. To omit to do so renders the offender liable to imprisonment.

THE POLICE OF THE EMPIRE.

A DAY IN THE LIFE OF A SOLDIER.

It is interesting to compare Mr. Decle's book with a companion volume by Mr. Horace Wyndham on "The Queen's Service" (Heinemann, 6s.). Mr. Wyndham served in the ranks as a private for seven years, and his account of life in a British infantry regiment is drawn from his personal experience. He rose to the rank of sergeant when he purchased his discharge from the army. The interest in the comparison lies not so much in the similarities as in the differences, which are at once apparent to even the most casual observer.

POLICING AN EMPIRE.

To begin with, we are not like a Continental nation-a people under arms. Nor is our army merely a defensive and offensive weapon kept in a state of readiness in case of war. The soldiers of the Queen have other and more useful duties to perform. They are the police force of the Empire, keeping the pax Britannica in all quarters of the globe. How varied these duties are will be apparent to any reader of Mr. Wyndham's interesting volume. His regiment was first stationed in Dublin; it was then moved to Cape Colony, after that to Gibraltar, then again to Malta, and was on the point of sailing for Aden when he was discharged. Under all climes the British soldier is on duty, and his experience of the world is almost as extended as that of the British man-of-war's man who keeps order in the seven seas. Mr. Wyndham has many interesting things to say about the soldier and his life, and he does not fail to make several suggestions, based on his own experience, as to ways and means of bettering the soldier's lot. He prints at the commencement of his book a quotation from the advertisement of "The General Advantages of the Army." This is a model of conciseness, but as regards precision it leaves much to be desired. Mr. Wyndham in the following chapters fills out these bald statements with an abundant supply of details and particulars.

BED-MAKING.

Among other things, he gives a picture of the daily life in an infantry regiment from reveille to tattoo. It is a delusion, he declares, to believe that the British soldier is the hard-worked individual he is supposed to be. Before enlistment he probably worked a great deal harder than after he joins the army. The day in a barracks begins

